

98686

---

---

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE,
DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED, 1865

VOLUME 160

JANUARY 6, 1945, to JUNE 30, 1945

98686

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, Inc.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK 7

INDEX TO VOLUME 160

JANUARY 6, 1945, to JUNE 30, 1945

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A Art
 A Architecture
 C Correspondence
 CH Chart
 Ct Cartoon
 D Drama
 E Editorial Article
 EP Editorial Paragraph
 M Music
 MP Moving Pictures
 P Poetry
 S Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages	Pages
1-28 January 6	373-400 April 7
29-56 January 13	401-428 April 14
57-84 January 20	429-472 April 21
85-112 January 27	473-500 April 28
113-140 February 3	501-528 May 5
141-168 February 10	529-556 May 12
169-196 February 17	557-584 May 19
197-232 February 24	585-612 May 26
233-260 March 3	613-632 June 2
261-288 March 10	633-660 June 9
289-316 March 17	661-680 June 16
317-344 March 24	681-708 June 23
345-372 March 31	709-728 June 30

A

PAGE

A. F. of L. See American federation of labor
AMG. See Allied military government
Abrams, Charles
Stuyvesant town housing project; S.....	328
Acker, Achille van. See Belgium
Adamic, Louis
Asks for contributions for Yugoslav relief ship; C.....	139
Aeronautics. See Aviation
Affairs of Susan, the. J. Agee; MP.....	370
Agee, James
Best films of 1944; S.....	80
Death of President Roosevelt; S.....	497
Nazi-atrocity films, the; S.....	579;
see also C.....	680
Reviews of motion pictures:
Affairs of Susan, the.....	370
Betrayal from the east.....	257
Break the news.....	314
Bring on the girls.....	257
Brought to action.....	110
Can't help singing.....	24
Clock, the.....	508
Colonel Blimp.....	370
Corn is green, the.....	425
Counter-attack.....	554
Enchanted cottage, the.....	425
Fighting lady, the.....	230
Glamor for sale.....	230
God is my co-pilot.....	370
Guest in the house.....	110
Hangover square.....	166
Having wonderful crime.....	230
Here come the Waves.....	24
Hollywood canteen.....	24
Hotel Berlin.....	314
I met a murderer.....	314
I'll be seeing you.....	314
It's in the bag.....	469
Keys of the kingdom, the.....	24
Lash of the penitentes, the.....	230
Ministry of fear.....	110
Mr. Emmanuel.....	110
Molly and me.....	469
Music for millions.....	24; see also.....
Newsreel on the Iwo Jima fighting.....	342
Objective Burma.....	230
On approval.....	230
Pan-Americana.....	257
Picture of Dorian Gray, the.....	285
Practically yours.....	395
Report on Italy.....	230
Roughly speaking.....	314
Royal scandal, a.....	395
San Pietro.....	608
Shanghai drama.....	136
Song to remember, a.....	166
Southerner, the.....	314
Sunday dinner for a soldier.....	136
Suspect, the.....	110
Thin man goes home, the.....	230
Three caballeros, the.....	166
Thunderhead, son of Fickla.....	314
Tomorrow the world.....	110
Tree grows in Brooklyn, a.....	192
Unknown battle, the.....	110
Unseen, the.....	469

Valley of decision, the.....	554
When strangers marry.....	395
Winged victory.....	24
Without love.....	395
Agencies, governmental. See United States; names of agencies
Agriculture
Anderson, C. P., named head of the Department of agriculture and the War food administration; E.....	616
Food interests seek to curtail production in order to boost prices. I. F. Stone; S.....	406
House appropriations committee denies the WLB jurisdiction over agricultural laborers; EP.....	711
New ceiling price on live cattle, the; EP.....	58
Saving the family-sized farm. S. Chase; S.....	39
We can feed Europe without impairing American nutritional standards; E.....	532;
see also 378;.....	406
Air power. See Aviation
Aitken, Webster, recital. B. H. Haggin; M.....	137, 231
Akers, Milburn P.
Chicago's un-American guests; S.....	597
G.O.P. sales conference; S.....	125
Alaska
Canol, the war's epic blunder. E. A. Harris; S.....	513
Albania
Allies withhold recognition of the Hoxha government; UNRRA suspends relief plan; EP.....	503
Alcoa. See Aluminum company of America
Alien property custodian
And the problem of supervising German industry. I. F. Stone; S.....	7;
see also EP.....	143
Crowley reports on the operation of General aniline and film. I. F. Stone; S.....	7;
see also EP.....	143
Allied military government
Criticism of policy for Germany. H. Mendershausen; S.....	184
Faces the problem of distinguishing between "nazis" and "non-nazis." Argus; S.....	335;
see also C.....	499
I record in Italy. M. Tassi; S.....	569
Plans for post-war administration of Japan	667
Allied reparations commission
Pauley, E. W., to serve as American member. A. Barth; S.....	563
Aluminum company of America
Decision in the government's anti-trust suit. I. F. Stone; S.....	322
Aluminum company of Canada
Receives an order from the Spanish government; EP.....	635
Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
America and the coalition; S.....	430
Brazil plays at democracy; S.....	276
France's role at the San Francisco conference; S.....	599; see also.....
Geneva casts a shadow at the San Francisco conference; S.....	507;
see also 501; EP.....	502;
Notes from the San Francisco conference; S.....	559
V-day and revolution; S.....	304;
see also 334; C.....	555; EP.....
World labor at San Francisco; S.....	536;
see also E.....	235;
Ameghino, Caesar. See Argentina
America. See United States
State department orders arrest of editors for making use of confidential department documents. I. F. Stone; S.....	666;
see also 667; E.....	683
America
America first
Holds meeting in Chicago to hear G. L. K. Smith; EP.....	347; see also.....
Amoskeag bankers association
Opposes the Bretton Woods monetary agreements; E.....	171;
see also EP.....	290; E.....
American federation of labor
Left isolated by decision of the world trade union congress to renege the I.F.T.U. with a new organization; E.....	235;
see also 176; EP.....	199
American historical association
Eighty members oppose the election of C. J. Hayes as president; EP.....	31
American legion
Hollywood post accepts a Japanese American into active membership; EP.....	59
Hood River post removes the names of Japanese American soldiers from its honor roll; EP.....	59
American medical association
Opposes the Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill. G. Sertain; S.....	691

American veterans' committee
Its postwar program for veterans. C. G. Bolte; S.....	351
Anderson, Clinton P.
Named head of the Department of agriculture and the War food administration; E.....	616
Angry pengwings and the Malay hoax. M. Marshall; S.....	518; see also.....
Anti-Semitism. See Jews
Anti-trust laws. See Monopolies
Aprista party. See Peru
Arab league. See Pan-Arab league
Arabs
Back Syrian-Lebanese demand for immediate independence; E.....	636;
see also.....	617
Arendt, Hannah
Essay on post-war Germany. M. Marshall; S.....	308
Argentina
Admitted to the San Francisco conference. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	507;
see also EP.....	402; E.....
E.....	444; 501; EP.....
502; 531; 559; 637
And the Chapultepec conference; EP.....	86;
see also 137; EP.....	186; E.....
200; EP.....	234; EP.....
261; 267; 297
C.T.A.L. demonstration against the dictatorship	157
Cortesi, A., reports on internal conditions;.....	649
Declaration of the Union civica radical protests against dictatorial actions of the present government; E.....	417
Declares war on Germany; EP.....	374
Defended by N. Rockefeller as a "bulwark against bolshevism." I. F. Stone; S.....	637;
see also EP.....	633
Fascism wins a round; American recognition of the Farrell regime. A. Haden; S.....	443;
see also E.....	444
Gestapo methods of the dictatorship. J. W. White; S.....	248; see also EP.....
234
Pelluffo, O. L., resigns as foreign minister following differences with J. Peron; C.....	Ameghino becomes the new minister; EP.....
86
Statement from the underground; E.....	444
Argentina, dance recital. B. H. Haggin; S.....	609
Argus
Articles on Germany:
Allied censorship blacks out news from occupied territory.....	214
Allied policy for post-war military, economic, and political administration.389; see also.....	377
Battle for upper Silesia may create an acute coal shortage.....	129
Concentration-camp atrocities and the guilt of the German people.....	517; see also EP.....
474; 509; 510; EP.....	530; C.....
537; 579; C.....	680
Diplomatic personnel in Switzerland leaving the service.....	102
Eisenhower's proclamation on the "conquest" of Germany exploited by nazi propagandists.....	74
Gestapo liquidates all persons with any Russian connections.....	214
Growing scarcity of foodstuffs and civilian supplies; S.....	74
Hitler's New Year's speech.....	102;
see also EP.....	1
Nazis act to quell any large-scale defection from above or below.....	158
"Nazis" and "non-nazis.".....	335;
see also C.....	499
Nazis prepare to resist in the southern mountains.....	214
Officials take steps to protect official documents as military crisis deepens.....	158
Post-war currency problem.....	278;
see also.....	16
Propagandists denounce the Crimea decisions.....	250; see also E.....
169; 174
Refugees and soldiers flee toward.....	214
Two directors of the Messerschmidt factories seek asylum in Switzerland; S.....	46
Underground factories continue to produce Wercwolf and "non-nazis".....	444
Armaments. See War effort
Armour, Norman. See United States — and Spain
Armstrong, Clarence
Conscription for peace? C.....	287;
see also 210; 246; C.....	315; 330; C.....
399; C.....	400; C.....
427; C.....	428
Army, United States. See United States — Army

Arrau, Claudio. B. H. Haggin; M.....	26, 231	Bolté, Charles G.		People's court tries Prince Cyril on charges of atrocities and collaboration with Germans; EP.....	58
Art (articles by C. Greenberg)		Best military achievements of 1944, the; S.....	6	Burma
Exhibitions:		British troops race to Bremen; S.....	481	Allied troops seize Mandalay; Chinese capture Lashio; EP.....	290; see also.....	481
American abstract artists.....	396	Carrier-based air attacks on the Japanese mainland, the; S.....	202	British advance toward Rangoon. C. G. Bolté; S.....	481
Degas, Edgar.....	82	Final phases of the war against Japan; S.....	639	British troops in the outskirts of Mandalay while other units clean up south of Akyab; EP.....	85
Dutch painting.....	396	Iwo Jima campaign; S.....	239; see also.....	Leah-Burma road, the; EP.....	85; see also EP.....	142
Friedman, Arnold.....	314	Juncture of Russian and allied forces imminent; S.....	481; see also E.....	Busch chamber players. B. H. Haggin; M.....	166
Gorky, Arshile.....	342	Luzon landing, the; S.....	62	Business
Graves, Morris.....	193	Military decisions at the Crimea conference.....	173	Inflation in Europe. F. Sternberg; S.....	16
Hofmann, Hans.....	396	New weapons of war; S.....	481	Post-war:
Kandinsky, Vasily.....	52, 396	OWI under the ax, the; S.....	690	Britain fears America's trade plans. K. Hutchison; S.....	65; see also.....	177
Mondrian, Piet.....	396	Okinawa campaign, the; S.....	639; see also EP.....	Britain's economic position. K. Hutchison; S.....	147, 177	299
Monet, Claude.....	526	Outcome of the German offensive into Belgium; S.....	266, 294	Economic relations between the United States and Latin America. A. Brenner; S.....	267; see also EP.....	297
National academy of design.....	396	Over the German rivers; S.....	266, 294	Shall America help Russia to rebuild? E.....	588
Pollock, Jackson.....	396	Permanent peace-time conscription; S.....	330; see also 210; 246; C.....	Prices:
Pousette-Dart, Richard.....	396	Red offensive seeks the destruction of the German army; figures for the offensive to date; S.....	119	New ceiling on live cattle; EP.....	58
Problem for critics, a.....	657	Roosevelt as strategist; S.....	434	OPA versus the food and textile industries. I. F. Stone; S.....	406
Rouault, Georges.....	581	Ruhr front collapses, the; S.....	379, 407	Second annual hold-the-line report, the; EP.....	402
Associated press		Russian mid-war offensive; S.....	351	WPB-OPA controls on production and pricing of clothing; EP.....	115
Kennedy, E., violates censorship ruling to transmit announcement of V-E day; EP.....	558	Veterans at San Francisco; S.....	351	Wherry amendment to the price control act, the; EP.....	682; see also EP.....	711
Supreme court decision in the government's monopoly suit. I. F. Stone; S.....	714	Zhuikov's gamble in the drive on Berlin; S.....	145	Trade agreements. See Trade agreements
Atlantic charter		Bonnet, Henri. See Franco-American relations		Butler, Nicholas Murray; retires as president of Columbia university; EP.....	504
And the Crimea conference; E.....	169; see also.....	Bonneville power administration. See Power, public		Butler, Sir Paul. See Japan. Post-war
Austin, Warren R.....	174	Book-of-the-month club; sponsors broadcasts of chamber music. B. H. Haggin; M.....	470	Byrnes, James F. See War mobilization, office of
Proposes a compromise manpower bill; EP.....	346	Books		C
Australia		Boston judge dismisses obscenity charge against E. Caldwell's "Tragic ground"; EP.....	2	C.T.A.L. See Confederation of Latin American workers
White paper on post-war reconversion; EP.....	634	Bornstein, Joseph		C.C.F. See Canada
Austria		Dr. Goebbels talks to himself; S.....	486; see also.....	C.I.O. See Congress of industrial organizations
New provisional government formed headed by K. Renner; EP.....	530; see also 591; C.....	When does morale break? S.....	156	CVA. See Columbia valley authority
Automobiles		Boyle, Kay		Caldwell, Erskine
Manufacturers survey post-war production prospects. I. Richter; S.....	719	Hotel behind the lines; S.....	642, 668	Boston judge dismisses obscenity charge against "Tragic ground"; EP.....	2
Avery, Sewell. See Montgomery Ward company		Boyle, Kay, and others		California
Aviation		Reply to K. Cannell on her Reader's Digest article about France; C.....	55	Governor Warren's social program. C. McWilliams; S.....	152
Post-war:		Who are the partisans? S.....	273	Housing conditions among Negro workers in Los Angeles. D. Baruch; S.....	95; see also C.....	315
Senate committee suggests a "community" company with a monopoly of American foreign air traffic; E.....	172	Bradley, General Omar. See Veterans, war		Supreme court bars anti-Negro job discrimination under the closed shop; EP.....	31
Several states seek state control of the interstate operations of commercial airlines; EP.....	319	Brazil		Canada
Aznar, Manuel. See Spain		Domestic mail now censored.....	157	Cooperative commonwealth federation, the; EP.....	114; see also EP.....	115
B		Goes Monteiro, General P. A., urges return to constitutional government; EP.....	276; 277	EP.....	171; EP.....	347; EP.....	587; 618; EP.....	663; 688; EP.....	710
Balanchine, George, choreographies. B. H. Haggin; S.....	398	Gómez, General E., to run for president in opposition to Vargas. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	276; 277	Dalhousie university drops a president. J. Robinson; S.....	274
Balkan states		Voy; S.....	276; 277	Development of motion-picture industry. J. Grierson; S.....	12
Landed estates being broken up and distributed among the peasants; EP.....	234	Plays at democracy J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	276; 277	Drew government defected in Ontario; CCF seen in a strong position to become the next government; EP.....	347
See also names of countries		Press censorship lifted; EP.....	289; see also.....	Hepburn, M., swings Liberal vote to defeat the Drew government in Ontario; EP.....	347; see also.....	618
Ballet russe de Monte Carlo. B. H. Haggin; S.....	398	Presses, Luis Carlos, released from prison; EP.....	475	Issue of the election in Grey North may force a general election; EP.....	114; see also EP.....	171
Ballet theater, the. B. H. Haggin; S.....	470, 699	Uniao democratica nacional fights the Vargas dictatorship. S. Wainer; S.....	277	Its soldiers fighting under British command receive improper recognition; EP.....	290
Barnard, Ellsworth		Breathless, Louis, released from prison; EP.....	475	King, W. L. M., seen as probable victor in the federal election. J. K. Gordon; S.....	618; see also EP.....	114; EP.....	171; EP.....	347; 688; EP.....	710
Postwar military conscription; C.....	427; see also 210; 246; C.....	Uniao democratica nacional fights the Vargas dictatorship. S. Wainer; S.....	277	Lymans, Ltd., urges its employees to vote against the C.C.F. in the election; EP.....	663
330; C.....	399; C.....	Breathless, Louis, released from prison; EP.....	475	Names L. B. Pearson and H. Keenleyside as ambassadors to the United States and Mexico; EP.....	710
Barnes, Leo		Inter-American conference of foreign ministers, the; S.....	267; see also EP.....	Soldier-vote in the election, the; EP.....	3
Anatomy of full employment, the; S.....	593; see also EP.....	Bretton Woods monetary agreements. See Finance, public		Spain places an order with the Aluminum company of Canada; EP.....	635
Barrett, Jack		Bridges, Harry		Cane, Melville
Cross-word puzzles.....	28, 56, 84, 112, 140, 168, 196, 232, 260, 288, 316, 344, 372, 400, 428, 472, 500, 528, 556, 584, 612, 632, 660, 708	Deportation case against, to be argued before the Supreme court. I. F. Stone; S.....	350	Puran poem; P.....	272
Barth, Alan		Supreme court decision. I. F. Stone; S.....	714	Cannell, Kathleen
"Discovery" of Buchenwald, the; S.....	509; see also 510; 517; EP.....	Bring on the girls. A. Agee; MP.....	257	Answers a letter in The Nation criticizing her article on France which appeared in the Reader's Digest ; C.....	55
C.....	537; 579; C.....	Britain. See Great Britain		Canol project. See Oil
Truman: a trial balance; S.....	563	British empire. See Great Britain		Can't help singing. I. Agee; MP.....	24
Baruch, Dorothy W.		Broadcasting. See Radio		Carpenter, Charles T.
Sleep comes hard; S.....	95; see also C.....	Brothers, Geoffrey		Reply of E. Browder to "V-day and revolution" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C. T. Carpenter; C.....	555; see also.....	304
Barzun, Jacques		Young students ask public support in their campaign against racial discrimination; C.....	259	Policy outlined by him for American communists is sharply attacked by French communist leader J. Duclos; EP.....	613, 614
Distrust of brains; how to use educational endowment funds; S.....	18	Brought to action. J. Agee; MP.....	110	Broz, Josip (Tito). See Yugoslavia
Should teachers organize? S.....	130	Bruder, Earl R.		Bruller, Jean (Vercors). M. Marshall; S.....	48, 418, 518
Bases, Pacific. See Pacific islands		His reply to "V-day and revolution" by J. Alvarez del Vayo. C. T. Carpenter; C.....	555; see also.....	How to kill nazism; C.....	259
Becker, Carl, death. J. W. Krutch; S.....	490	Policy outlined by him for American communists is sharply attacked by French communist leader J. Duclos; EP.....	613, 614	Budapest quartet. B. H. Haggin; M.....	166
Beckoff, Samuel		Brothers, Geoffrey		Budget, public. See Finance, public
Reply to F. Oursler of the Reader's Digest , a; C.....	139; see also C.....	Young students ask public support in their campaign against racial discrimination; C.....	259	Bulgaria
Belgium		Brought to action. J. Agee; MP.....	110	Communists dominate the political scene. C. Poulos; S.....	695
Labor rallies behind Premier A. van Acker against the return of King Leopold to the throne; EP.....	682	Bruder, Earl R.
Bellini, Mario		His reply to "V-day and revolution" by J. Alvarez del Vayo. C. T. Carpenter; C.....	555; see also.....
Italian partisans, the; S.....	249; see also 273; E.....	Policy outlined by him for American communists is sharply attacked by French communist leader J. Duclos; EP.....	613, 614
505; 539, 569, 624		Broz, Josip (Tito). See Yugoslavia
Betravay from the east. J. Agee; MP.....	257	Bruller, Jean (Vercors). M. Marshall; S.....	48, 418, 518
Bidault, Georges. See France		Buchanan, John
Biddle, Francis. See Department of justice		How to kill nazism; C.....	259
Bisson, T. A.		Budapest quartet. B. H. Haggin; M.....	166
Trouble brews in China; S.....	621	Budget, public. See Finance, public
Black, Hugo L.		Bulgaria
To be honored at dinner given by the Southern conference for human welfare; EP.....	348	Communists dominate the political scene. C. Poulos; S.....	695
Blum, Léon. See France
Bolivia
Paz Estenssoro, V., and the National revolutionary movement. J. W. White; S.....	333
Villarreal regime is pro-fascist. J. W. White; S.....	333

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Don't forget some of us are Germans; friend, Low; S. 537; see also EP.....	530	Clark, Michael		Czech-Soviet relations unaffected by the issue of Carpatho-Russia; EP.....	114
Engine? What engine? Low.....	665	French view on Syria, the; S.....	715	Interview with E. L. Delaney, K. Mann; S.....	717
Fine team—but could do with a dash of unity, Low.....	713	Syria; Near east cockpit; S.....	301	Revisited, K. Mann; S.....	717
Guest from Spain, a. Rivero Gil.....	416	Clark, Thomas C.
"I appeal to common sense," Low.....	206	Replaces F. Biddle as attorney-general; E.....	616
Ironing out the creases, Low.....	508	Clock, the, J. Agee; MP.....	608
Mobile canteen, Low.....	66	Clyde, Ethel
Pep talk to the dead, Low.....	151	Army and navy will accept Negro nurses; C.....	196
Right of asylum, Rivero Gil.....	17	Coal
Take me in, mister? Low.....	376	Lewis opens campaign for increased wages for the miners; E.....	263
"We shall never surrender," R. La Palme 329	329	Soft coal contract brings substantial wage increases to the miners; EP.....	432
Well, well, look who's here, Low.....	488	Cohen, Maxwell
You must have something that will fit. R. La Palme.....	516	Canadian election results analyzed; S.....	688
Carousel, J. W. Krutch; D.....	525	Collier, John; testifies as commissioner of Indian affairs; E.....	321
Casualties, war, See Russo-German war; War, European; War, Pacific		Colonel Blimp, J. Agee; MP.....	370
Catholic church, See Roman catholic church		Columbia valley authority
Censorship		Needed for the development of the Pacific northwest, C. McWilliams; S.....	622, 645
Allies black out news from conquered German territory, Argus; S.....	214	Columbia university
And E. Kennedy's "scoop" on V-E day; EP.....	558	Butler, N. M., retires from presidency; EP	504
As a political weapon, E. Seyditz; S.....	415	Commerce, See Business
Cooper, K., proposes diplomatic immunities for newspaper correspondents; EP.....	114	Commerce, department of, See United States Committee on un-American activities
Moss, P., closes the play "Trio" because of its theme; EP.....	291	Hart, E. J. Rankin seeks to dominate the committee; EP.....	87
See also D.....	52	House passes resolution making the committee permanent, I. F. Stone; S.....	35
Chamberlain, Elmer		Miner, a janitor; E.....	172
Chief rabbi of Volo, Greece, thanks the E.L.A.S.; C.....	611	Communist political association
Chapultepec conference, See Inter-American conference on problems of war and peace		Appeases capitalism, C. T. Carpenter; C.....	555; see also
Chase, Stuart		Ban against members lifted by the army, I. F. Stone; S.....	238
Democracy under pressure:		Its policies are sharply attacked by French communist leader, J. Duclos; EP.....	613, 614
3. Production first; S.....	39	Confederation of Latin American workers
Hayek: back to grandfather; S.....	564	Calls demonstrations against the Argentine government.....	157
see also EP.....	403; 489; EP.....	Lombardo Toledano, V., deploras admission of Argentina to the San Francisco conference; E.....	417
Chicago Tribune		Report on its second general congress, V. Mishnau; S.....	73; see also
Attacks Britain's participation in the Pacific war, J. Fromm; S.....	409	Congress
Chinese		Increase in salary supported by President Truman; EP.....	662
American war supplies and Chinese politics; E.....	236	New Senate foreign relations committee, the; EP.....	58
Effective national government is essential to an early victory over Japan; E.....	533	Congress of industrial organizations
Kuomintang-Communist impasse; EP.....	151	And the World trade union congress, M. Stewart; S.....	176; see also EP.....
see also EP.....	172; 180; E. 236; 324, 339	Political action committee:
Leading section of the Chinese press in North and South America calls for Kuomintang-Communist unity; EP.....	172	Roosevelt's death and its future role, E. Kirby; S.....	429
National assembly to draft a constitution in French, T. Blisset; S.....	621	See also National citizens political action committee
Present-day educational system retards progress.....	67; see also C.....	Connolly, Cyril
Reorganization of the army reported; EP.....	142	Author of "The unquiet grave," M. Marshall; S.....	187, 220
Revolt reported in Sinkiang; background of the Russo-Chinese dispute over this area; EP.....	586	Paris regained; S.....	626, 651, 674
Soong, T. V., named head of the executive Yuan; EP.....	634	Conscientious objectors, See United States Army
To Lin Yutang, E. Snow; S.....	180	Conscription, See Selective service see also 324, 339; C.....	471	Cooper, Kent, See Freedom of the press
Yuanan, 1945, a focus; S.....	15	Cooperative commonwealth federation, See Canada
Chinese-Japanese war		Cooperatives
Allied troops seize Mandalay; Chinese capture Lashio; EP.....	290	In Canada, threatened by a big-business assault, O. O'Cloutard; C.....	259
British advance toward Rangoon, C. G. Bolte; S.....	481	What the San Francisco conference can do; S.....	482; see also E.....
British troops near Mandalay; other units mop up south of Akyah; EP.....	85	Corey, Olga
Chinese capture port of Nanning; EP.....	613	Nation, The, lacks a clear-cut position; C.....	167
Completion of the Okinawa campaign leaves the Japanese position around Shanghai vulnerable; EP.....	662; see also EP.....	Confederate green, the, J. Agee; MP.....	425
Japanese consolidate their position along the Canton-Hongkong route; EP.....	710	Corporate
Japanese make no headway north of Foochow in effort to hold the China coast; EP.....	613	Fashion; P.....	68
Japanese move troops to Manchuria to meet possible Russian attack; EP.....	613	Cortesi, Arnaldo; reports to the New York Times on conditions in Argentina; E.....	649
Japanese withdrawals reported in the India China corridor, north of Foochow and west of Hongkong; EP.....	662; see also EP.....	Council of Jewish women
Ledo-Burma road is opened; EP.....	85	Turns over settlement house in Harlem for use of Negro children; EP.....	375
see also EP.....	142	Counter-attack, J. Agee; MP.....	554
Christian, Sutton		Crawford, Frederick C.
Bready, Lowell, death; C.....	259	Reports on conditions in France; EP.....	30
Church, Roman catholic, See Roman catholic church		British permit German troops to retain their arms as defense against the vengeful population; EP.....	586
Churchill, Winston, See Great Britain		Crimea conference, See World war
Citrine, Sir Walter		Crowley, Leo T., See Alien property custodian
His mission to Greece; EP.....	199	Crum, Bartley C.
Opposes formation of new world trade union organization; defends the I.F.T.U.; EP.....	199	New world court, the; S.....	641
Civil rights		Cuba
Conscientious objectors and the case of Private H. P. Weber; EP.....	171	Curfew
Summers, C., conscientious objector, barred from law practice in Illinois; EP.....	682	La Guardia, F. H., opposes midnight ruling of J. F. Byrne; S.....	346
Civilian production, See War effort		Czechoslovakia
Clariana, Bernardo		Beneš leaves England; will form a new cabinet at once; EP.....	234
Spain and the peace, Translated from the Spanish by D. Fitts; P.....	360	Correction concerning an article by J. Masaryk in The Nation.....	195

98686

PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Egypt		Foreign economic administration
Enters the war on the allied side. C. G. Rolfe; S. . . . .	239	Offers testimony to House foreign affairs committee on lend-lease operations; EP . . . . .	170
Eisenhower, General Dwight D.		France
His proclamation on the conquest of Germany. Argus; S. . . . .	74	And Great Britain:
Rebukes American army officers for their incorrect handling of captured Nazi leaders; EP . . . . .	558	Problem of Syria and Lebanon. the M. Clark; S. . . . .	301	see also E. . . . . 636; 715
Returns to the United States; EP . . . . .	681	And Spain:
Serves as American member of the Allied control commission for Germany; E. . . . .	664	Foreign affairs committee of the Consultative assembly asks allies to demand Franco's abdication; EP . . . . .	614
El Salvador		Foreign affairs committee protests Spain's failure to deliver P. Laval for trial; EP . . . . .	614	see also EP . . . . . 530
Election results . . . . .	101	Train reported returning Blue division to Spain is attacked at Chambery; EP . . . . .	682
Eliot, T. S.		And the Crimea conference; E. . . . .	169	see also EP . . . . . 198
Raises questions about culture, society, and religion. S. Hook; S. . . . .	69	And the United States. See Franco-American relations
see also C. . . . .	195, 440	Battle of the Rhone, the. A. Viollis; S. . . . .	179
Employment. See Labor		Bidault, G., and foreign policy. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. . . . .	531
Enchanted cottage, the. J. Agee; MP. . . . .	425	Blum, I., freed from German prison, returns to Paris; EP . . . . .	530
England. See Great Britain		Communists and socialists challenge R. Pleven, minister of finance, on nationalization of key industries; EP . . . . .	401	see also EP . . . . . 262
Espionage		De Gaulle urges postponement of the program for socialization of industry; Doriot, Jacques, death; EP . . . . .	262, 263
State department orders arrest of six men under the espionage act for making use of confidential department documents. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	666	Foreign policy; relations with the big three. C. A. Micaud; S. . . . .	150
see also 667; E. . . . .	683	French journalists visit the United States. M. Marshall; S. . . . .	187
European war. See War, European		General De Gaulle appeals for aid for the French forces fighting the Japanese in Indo-China; EP . . . . .	346
F		Its role at the San Francisco conference. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. . . . .	599	see also EP . . . . . 531
FEA. See Foreign economic administration		Laval, P., seeks refuge in Spain; EP . . . . .	530
FEPC. See Fair employment practices committee		Lemaigre-Dubreuil, J. and J. Rigaud arrested. P. Stevens; S. . . . .	97
FSA. See Farm security administration		Les temps modernes to replace the Nouvelle revue française. M. Marshall; S. . . . .	308
Fair employment practices committee		Literary letter, a. L. Kirstein; S. . . . .	103
Bill for a permanent committee delayed in both houses of Congress; EP . . . . .	318	Mendes-France, P., resigns as minister of national economy; EP . . . . .	401	see also EP . . . . . 262
Massachusetts legislature holds public hearings on state bill. J. M. Morse; S. . . . .	293	Municipal elections interpreted, the. J. Moch; S. . . . .	600
New York state's FEPC bill faces bitter opposition; EP . . . . .	263	New French press, the. E. Gallois; S. . . . .	487
Progress of the various state bills. W. Maslow; S. . . . .	410	Paris regained. C. Connolly; S. . . . .	626, 651
Taft, Senator R. A., opposes the establishment of a permanent committee with enforcement powers; EP . . . . .	318	Pétain, H. P., returns from Germany to stand trial for treason; EP . . . . .	503
see also C. . . . .	288	Problem of Syria and the Lebanon. M. Clark; S. . . . .	301	see also E. . . . . 636; 715
Far east. See names of countries		Report on conditions by F. C. Crawford criticized; EP . . . . .	30
Farbenindustrie I. G.		Theater season in Paris, the. F. Jones; S. . . . .	363
And the American alien property custodian. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	143	Would manufacture goods needed on the world market; allied shipping shortage curtails delivery of strategic raw materials; EP . . . . .	30	see also EP . . . . . 197
Farm security administration		Franco, Francisco. See Spain
Ordered by Congress to liquidate the Delmo homes project; EP . . . . .	402	Franco-American relations
Farming. See Agriculture		American misunderstanding of French psychology. J. Moch; S. . . . .	44
Fashion. Corporal; . . . . .	68	Arrest of J. Lemaigre-Dubreuil and J. Rigaud in Paris; R. Murphy's relations with them. P. Stevens; S. . . . .	97
Federal loan administration		Bonnet, H., named as French ambassador to the United States. EP . . . . .	30
Truman names J. W. Snyder as head. A. Barth; S. . . . .	563	De Gaulle refuses invitation to conference with Roosevelt on Crimea decisions; EP . . . . .	169
Vinson, F. M., named administrator; EP . . . . .	290	Pétain, H. P., may call Admiral W. D. Leahy a witness in his defense; EP . . . . .	503
Fighting lady, the. J. Agee; MP. . . . .	110	Frank, Gerold
Films. See Agee, J. (for reviews); Moving pictures		Lord Moyne's assassins on trial; S. . . . .	14	see also . . . . . 357
Finance, public		Free Germany committee
Bretton Woods monetary agreement: Acceptance voted by the House of representatives; EP . . . . .	661	In Moscow and in France increases its propaganda; EP . . . . .	141
see also EP . . . . .	711	From the press
British criticisms. K. Hutchison; S. . . . .	237	Cooper, K., proposes diplomatic immunities for newspaper correspondents; EP . . . . .	114
Indorsed by T. E. Dewey; EP . . . . .	661	Friedman, Arnold, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. . . . .	314
Morgenstern, H. Jr., points to the advantages of the plan for the United States; EP . . . . .	289	Friends of the Spanish republic
see also EP . . . . .	290	Formed by The Nation associates. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . .	33
Opposed by the American bankers association; EP . . . . .	171	Presents a document against admission of Spain to the San Francisco conference; EP . . . . .	503	see also 501; 531; EP . . . . . 586; 711
see also EP . . . . .	290	Fromm, Joe
National planning association issues pamphlet on a national budget for full employment; E. . . . .	664	England and the Pacific war; S. . . . .	409
President's budget message, the; E. . . . .	61	G
Fischer, Louis		G.I. bill of rights. See Veterans
Resigns from the board of contributing editors of The Nation ; C. . . . .	631, 706	Gallois, Etienne
see also 684; C. . . . .	728	New French press, the; S. . . . .	487
Flasch, Reuber
Lin Yutang versus Edgar Snow; C. . . . .	471
see also . . . . .	180, 324
Fleisher, Robert
Wise up, civilian! S. . . . .	207
Florida
Answer to W. Joubert's letter on the anti-closed-shop amendment. L. Morris; C. . . . .	56
see also C. . . . .	195
Food
Lack of shipping space cuts UNRRA relief shipments to Europe; EP . . . . .	30
Roosevelt makes survey of civilian-relief problem in Europe; EP . . . . .	197
Rosenman report on relief for liberated Europe; E. . . . .	532
We can help to feed Europe; E. . . . .	532
see also . . . . .	378
Foolish notion. J. W. Krutch; D. . . . .	340
Foot, Michael
British election, the; S. . . . .	619
see also E. . . . .	615

Gamow, Leo		Max Jersey progressive league, the; C. . . . .	680
Gaulle, General Charles de. See France		General airline and film company. See Alien property custodian
George, Ruth		Postwar military conscription; C. . . . .	428
see also 210; 246; C. . . . .	287	C. . . . .	315
330; C. . . . .	399	C. . . . .	400
C. . . . .	400	C. . . . .	427
Georgia		Repeals the poll tax; EP . . . . .	143
Sues 20 railroads for rate-making activities; E. . . . .	404
German-American bund		Supreme court acquits members accused of interfering with the draft; EP . . . . .	682
Germany		Address to the German people. T. Mann; S. . . . .	535
Allied censorship blacks out news from occupied territory. Argus; S. . . . .	214	And the policy of unconditional surrender; EP . . . . .	91
Battle for upper Silesia may create an acute coal shortage. Argus; S. . . . .	129	Berlin: a necrology. M. Gumpert; S. . . . .	538
Concentration-camps atrocities, and the guilt of the German people. Argus; S. . . . .	517	see also 509; 510; EP . . . . .	530
C. . . . .	537	C. . . . .	579
C. . . . .	579	C. . . . .	680
Diplomatic personnel in Switzerland leaving the service. Argus; S. . . . .	102	Dr. J. Goebbels talks with Roosevelt; S. . . . .	486
see also . . . . .	567	East Prussian junker estates may be broken up by the Russians; EP . . . . .	234
Eisenhower, General D. D., rebukes American army officers for their handling of captured Nazi leaders; EP . . . . .	558	Eisenhower's proclamation on the "conquest" of, exploited by nazi propagandists. Argus; S. . . . .	74
Foreign workers carry on effective sabotage; EP . . . . .	141	Gestapo liquidates all persons with any Russian connections. Argus; S. . . . .	214
Growing scarcity of foodstuffs and civilian supplies. Argus; S. . . . .	74	Guilt of the army officers; EP . . . . .	558
Hill's New Year's speech; EP . . . . .	1	see also . . . . .	102
Hitler's speech on the anniversary of the Third Reich; EP . . . . .	141	Kesselring replaces von Rundstedt as commander in western Europe. J. Joesten; S. . . . .	354
Ledebour, G., anti-fascist leader, celebrates his ninety-fifth birthday in exile; EP . . . . .	319	Nazi paratroopers kill the mayors of Aachen and Monschau; EP . . . . .	374
Nazis act to quell any large-scale defection from above or below. Argus; S. . . . .	214	Nazis prepare to resist in the southern mountains. Argus; S. . . . .	258
Officials take steps to protect official documents as military crisis deepens. Argus; S. . . . .	158	Population trends. M. Mandellaub; S. . . . .	362
Post-war:		Aachen residents regard future government as an allied problem; EP . . . . .	262
Allied control commission is set up; need for a common Russo-Anglo-American policy; E. . . . .	664	see also EP . . . . .	586
Allied policy for military, economic, and political administration. Argus; S. . . . .	389	see also . . . . .	377
Allies set value of mark in occupied region; threat of inflation, the. F. Sternberg; S. . . . .	16	see also . . . . .	278
Control of German industry, the. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	143	Crimea conference decisions. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	174
see also E. . . . .	169	Legal case against Hitler, the. R. Lemkin; S. . . . .	205, 268
see also . . . . .	567	Nazi plans for an underground war. A. Kantorowicz; S. . . . .	154 see also . . . . .	184	Reactionary plans of the American State department. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	637
see also E. . . . .	635	Reparations in kind opposed by C. B. Luce; EP . . . . .	262
Views of H. Marshall; S. . . . .	308	Which Germans shall we use in administrative positions? M. Hirschberg; S. . . . .	648
see also 335; C. . . . .	499	see also . . . . .	635
World trade union congress favors a hard peace. M. Stewart; S. . . . .	176	see also EP . . . . .	199
see also EP . . . . .	235	Russo-German war. See Russo-German war
Trade-union meeting in Aachen; EP . . . . .	558	Two directors of the Messerschmidt factories seek asylum in Switzerland. Argus; S. . . . .	46

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Underground factories continue to produce.		Damasinos, Archbishop, becomes regent under E.A.M.-British agreement; EP....	2	Hartford-Empire company
Argus; S.....	102	Darlan over Athens, P. Jordan; S.....	212	Supreme court decision in monopoly case; E.....	60
Visit to "Der stuermer," a. L. Kirstein; S.....	722	Mission of Sir W. C. Gurney, the; EP.....	199	Harvey, Daniel A.
Von Papen, Ernst, captured by American soldiers; EP.....	433	Plastiras, General N., forms a unity government at the request of Archbishop Damasinos; new cabinet seen as a renovated dictatorship; EP.....	29;	Prison officers ask pay increase; C.....	260
War crimes. See United nations war crimes commission		see also E.....	32	Hasty heart, the. J. W. Krutch; D.....	81
War damage to industrial centers; EP.....	474	Plastiras regime. Admiral P. Vougaris forms a new cabinet. H. Lehman; S.....	515;	Hatch act
"We shall never surrender!" R. La Palme; Ct.....	329	see also EP.....	503	House committee on campaign expenditures would lift restrictions on the size of individual contributions and the volume of partisan expenditure; EP.....	319
Werewolf movement, the. Argus; S.....	444	Rightist terror. H. Lehman; S.....	515;	Hatch-Burton-Ball labor disputes bill. See Labor
When does morale break? J. Bornstein; S.....	156	see also EP.....	503	Having wonderful crime. J. Agee; MP.....	230
Why it lost the war. H. A. DeWeerd; S.....	671	Scobie, General R. M., addresses a rightist meeting in Athens; EP.....	58;	Hayek, Friedrich A.; economic theories. K. Hutchison; S.....	489;
Why the Nazis fight on. F. Sternberg; S.....	100	see also E.....	101	see also EP.....	403; 564; EP.....
See also War, European		Greenberg, Clement		Hayes, Carlton J. H.
Gideons internment		Reviews of art exhibitions:		Members of the American historical association oppose his election as president; EP.....	31
Changes membership requirements. G. B. Oxnam; C.....	315;	American abstract artists.....	396	Health, public. See Medicine
Glamor for sale. J. Agee; MP.....	230	Degas, Edgar.....	82	Heineman, Daniel; American citizen reported as agent for German cartel interests in neutral and allied countries; EP.....	615
Glass menagerie, the. J. W. Krutch; D.....	424	Dutch painting.....	230	Heppburn, Mitchell. See Canada
God is my co-pilot. J. Agee; MP.....	370	European artists in America.....	396	Here come the Waves. J. Agee; MP.....	24
Goes Monteiro, General Pedro Aurelio de. See Brazil		Friedman, Arnold.....	314	Hill-Thomas bill. See Education
Gómez, General Eduardo. See Brazil		Gorky, Arshile.....	342	Hines, General Frank Thomas. See Veterans, war
Good night, ladies. J. W. Krutch; D.....	136	Graves, Morris.....	149	Hirschberg, Max
Gorky, Arshile, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....	342	Hofmann, Hans.....	469	Good nazis, bad Germans; S.....	648;
Government agencies. See United States; names of agencies		Kandinsky, Vasily.....	52	see also E.....	635
Government finance. See Finance, public		Mondrian, Piet.....	396	Hitler, Adolf. See Germany
Grand Coulee dam. See Power, public		Monet, Claude.....	526	Hodskins, Alton R.
Graves, Morris, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....	193	Modern academy of design.....	396	Postwar military conscription; C.....	427;
Great Britain		Pollock, Jackson.....	396	see also 210; 246; C.....	287; C.....
Anglo-American relations:		Poussette-Dart, Richard.....	82	330; C.....	399; C.....
Britain fears American competition in the post-war export market. K. Hutchison; S.....	147, 177;	Problem for critics, a.....	657	C.....	400; C.....
British criticism of the United States. K. Hutchison; S.....	65	Rouault, Georges.....	581	Hofmann, Hans, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....	469
Pacific war, the; J. Fromm; S.....	409	Grew, Joseph Clark. See United States — State department		Hollywood. See Moving pictures
Anglo-Canadian relations:		Grierson, John		Hollywood canteen. J. Agee; MP.....	24
Dispute over improper recognition to British soldiers fighting in Canadian commands; EP.....	290	Future of educational films, the; S.....	57	Hollywood pinatore. J. W. Krutch; D.....	705
Anglo-French relations:		Hollywood international; S.....	12	Holt, Lee Elbert
British policy in Syria and the Lebanon; the role of General E. Spears. M. Clark; S.....	301;	Grover, Louise W.		Soldier's view on post-war problems, a; C.....	83
see also E.....	636;	Comments on "The dilemma of T. S. Eliot" by S. Hook; C.....	195;	Hook, Sidney
Anglo-Greek relations:		see also 69,	440	Dilemma of T. S. Eliot, the; S.....	69;
British and the E.A.M. agree on a re- gency; EP.....	2	Groza, Peter. See Rumania		see also C.....	195;
British intervention results in rightist terror in Greece. H. Lehman; S.....	515;	Guatemala		Hook for the best. J. W. Krutch; D.....	229
see also EP.....	503	Severs relations with Spain.....	157	Horney, Ainslee E.
Churchill defends his policy; E.....	88	Ubico, J., ex-dictator, arrives in the United States.....	101	His anti-Semitic pamphlet "The Hoosier patriot" brings action by the Illinois senate to investigate un-American activities. M. P. Akers; S.....	597
Darlan over Athens, P. Jordan; S.....	212	Gumpert, Martin		Hotel behind the lines. K. Boyle; S.....	642,
Mission of Sir W. C. Gurney, the; EP.....	199	Berlin: a necrology; S.....	538	Hotel Berlin. J. Agee; MP.....	318
Scobie, General R. M., addresses a rightist meeting in Athens; EP.....	58;	H		Housing
see also E.....	101	Hahegger, C. T.		Congress orders the Farm security administration to liquidate the Delmo homes project; EP.....	402
Anglo-Indian relations:		Monopoly practices in labor unions; C.....	167	Labor versus the housing industry on post-war goals; EP.....	87
Britain picks the Indian delegation to the San Francisco conference. I. F. Stone; S.....	478	Haden, Allen		Negro war workers lack houses in Los Angeles. D. W. Baruch; S.....	95;
British white paper on a new constitutional system; Nehru and other leaders are released from jail; E.....	683	Fascism wins a round: American recognition of Argentina; S.....	443	see also C.....	315
India looks beyond the war. B. S. Rao; S.....	387	Hager, B. H.		Stuyvesant tower. Metropolitan life insurance company project. C. Abrams; S.....	328
Visit of Lord Wavell to England may mean an end to the political deadlock. U. Shankar; S.....	650	Articles on music:		Zoning-law amendment urged to prevent erection of skyscrapers around New York's Washington square; EP.....	318
Anglo-Italian relations:		Aitken, Webster, recital.....	137,	Hoxha, Enver. See Albania
British influence seen in the Sicilian separatist movement; EP.....	142	Arrau, Claudio.....	26,	Hughes, Asa M.
Churchill defends the Italian government's policy; E.....	88	Berlioz's "Harold in Italy".....	426	Conscription versus peace; C.....	400;
Churchill minimizes Italian guerrilla activity. M. Bellini; S.....	249	Budapest quartet.....	166	see also 210; 246; C.....	287; C.....
Anglo-Palestinian relations:		Busch chamber players.....	166	330; C.....	399; C.....
Assassins of Lord Moyne hanged. G. Frank; S.....	357;	Chamber music concerts sponsored by the Book-of-the-month club.....	470	C.....	427; C.....
see also.....	14	Istomin, Eugene.....	26	Humphries, Rolfe
Churchill rebukes Franco for suggestion of an anti-soviet pact; EP.....	170;	Lehman, Lotte.....	111,	Narcissa; P.....	106
see also.....	174	Mirage of Figaro.....	111	Russian political warfare.....	417
Churchill defends his policies toward Greece, Yugoslavia, and Italy; E.....	88	Metropolitan opera company, the.....	111	See also Russo-German war
Criticisms of the Bretton Woods monetary proposals. K. Hutchison; S.....	237;	New friends of music.....	166	Hurley, Patrick J.
see also EP.....	289;	"On the town".....	679	Mission to Moscow; EP.....	475
"Dammit, young man, we mustn't put the cart before the horse!" Low; Ct.....	252	Opera in America.....	82	Hursi, Sir Cecil. See United nations war crimes commission
Engine? What engine? Low; Ct.....	665	Prokofiev's eighth piano sonata.....	630	Hutchison, Keith
Lloyd George, David, death. K. Martin; S.....	381	Role of the musicologist.....	630	Britain — sixth winter of war; S.....	9;
Parliament is dissolved; general election called. M. Foot; S.....	619;	Rose, Leonard.....	166	see also Ct.....	10
see also E.....	615	Score for "Fury in the Pacific".....	470;	Britain's post-war economic prospects; S.....	147, 177;
Post-war economic position. K. Hutchison; S.....	147, 177;	"Seven lively arts".....	608	British criticisms of the Bretton Woods proposals; S.....	237;
Sixth winter of war. K. Hutchison; S.....	9;	Sound distortion in radio broadcasts of concerts.....	194,	see also EP.....	289;
see also Ct.....	10	231		Hayek, F. A. digested and redigested; S.....	489;
See also War, European		Szigeti, Joseph.....	26,	see also EP.....	403; 564; EP.....
Greece		Tovey, D., on Mozart.....	53	Lion bites eagle; S.....	65
Chief rabbi of Volo thanks the E.L.A.S. for protecting Greek Jews. E. Chamberlain; C.....	611	Articles on the dance:		I
		Argentina.....	609	I.A.T.S.E. See International alliance of the theatrical stage employees
		Balanichine's choreography.....	398	I.F.T.U. See International federation of trade unions
		Ballet russe de Monte Carlo.....	285,	I.L.O. See International labor organization
		Ballet theater, the.....	470,	I met a murderer. J. Agee; MP.....	314
		Danilova, Alexandra.....	398	I'll be seeing you. J. Agee; MP.....	110
		Markova, Alicia.....	609	Illinois
		Toumanova, Tancra.....	470,	Senate orders an investigation of un-American groups. M. P. Akers; S.....	597
		Tudor's "Undertow".....	609	In the wind.....	14, 71, 99, 126, 155,
		Music, recorded.....	26, 137, 166,	C.....	315; 183, 211, 247, 275, 303,
		194, 257, 343, 426, 553, 609, 679, 705, 726		332, 359, 414, 442, 485, C.....	612;
		See also Book reviews		514, 545, 568, 598, 647, 673, 694, 721
		Halbach, Ernest K.
		And.....
		see also EP.....
		Hamsun, Knut, praises Hitler, M. Marshall; S.....	697
		Hand, Judge Learned
		His decision in the government's anti-trust suit against the Aluminum company of America. I. F. Stone; S.....	322
		Hangover square. J. Agee; MP.....	166
		Harris, Edward A.
		Canol, the war's epic blunder; S.....	513
		Hart, Edward J. See Committee on un-American activities

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
India		J		Kesselring, Field Marshal Albert. See Germany
British White Paper on a new constitutional system; Nehru and other leaders are released from jail; E.....	683	Jackson, Robert H. See United nations war crimes commission		Keys of the kingdom, the. J. Agee; MP.....	24
Congress party and the Moslem league show signs of a rapprochement; U. Shankar; S.....	650	Japan		King, Admiral Ernest Joseph
Its delegates to the San Francisco conference are hand-picked by Britain. I. F. Stone; S.....	478	And the Soviet Union:		Urges a large post-war navy and the retention of Pacific bases; EP.....	402
Jinnah may press demands for Pakistan; E.....	683	Japanese troops move to Manchuria to meet possible Russian attack; EP.....	613	King, W. L. MacKenzie. See Canada
Looks beyond the war. B. S. Rao; S.....	387	Russia denounces the Soviet-Japanese neutrality pact; E.....	403	Kirchwey, Freda
Nehru, J. P., seen as logical leader of progressive forces. B. S. Rao; S.....	387	And the United States. See War, Pacific		Allied plan for the control of Germany; S.....377; see also EP.....563; E.....333; Break with Franco now! S.....333; see also EP.....1; 4; EP.....475; 711
Visit of Lord Wavell to England may mean an end to the Anglo-Indian political deadlock. U. Shankar; S.....	650	Chinese-Japanese war. See Chinese-Japanese war		If Negrin comes to Mexico; S.....	90
Indians, American		Koiso government insecure as American victories mount in the Pacific; EP.....	113	Notes on the San Francisco conference; S.....	531
Collier, J., resigns as commissioner of the Indian service; E.....	321	New cabinet headed by Baron K. Suzuki; EP.....	401	Oumansky, Constantin, death; S.....	115
Supreme court decision in the Shoshone land-claim case; EP.....	346	Post-war:		Out of the ashes of Europe; S.....	377
Indo-China		AMG plans for.....	667	Roosevelt's death: end of an era; S.....429; see also 430; EP.....432; 434; 435; 436; 497; EP.....	504
General de Gaulle appeals for aid for the French forces fighting the Japanese regime; EP.....	346	Allied policy as expressed by E. H. Dooman and Sir P. Butler may keep Japanese imperialists in power. Pacificus; S.....128; see also.....666; 667		Russia and the west; S.....684; see also 478; 501; 531; 534; 560; 561; 589; C.....631; 706; C.....	728
See also Chinese-Japanese war		Grew, J. C. advocates a conditional surrender policy. I. F. Stone; S.....666; see also 667; E.....	683	San Francisco clears its decks; S.....501; see also.....	560
Industry. See Business		Future of the reconquered islands and colonial areas; E.....	533	Yalta and San Francisco; S.....201, 264
Inflation. See Business — Prices		Japanese Americans		Kirk, Grayson
Inter-American conference on problems of war and peace		California court acquits men guilty of attacks on Japanese residents; EP.....	531	Politics of world security, the; S.....	120
Achievements. A. Brenner; S.....267; see also EP.....261;	297	California Senate committee reports on the Japanese problem; EP.....	635	Kirstein, Lincoln
Problems confronting the conference; E.200; see also EP.....	233	Hood River American legion post removes the names of Japanese American soldiers from its honor roll; EP.....	59	Letter from France; S.....103; see also.....	697
Several countries may demand break with Franco Spain; EP.....170; see also EP.....200; EP.....234; Will Argentina be recognized? EP.....86; see also 157; EP.....186; E.....200; EP.....234; EP.....261; 267;	297	Reaction to the army's order lifting the west coast ban; EP.....	59	Visit to "Der stuermer" a; S.....722
Inter-American relations, office of		Stars and stripes praises record of Nisei troops; EP.....	635	Koiso, General Kuniaki. See Japan
Warren, A. M. becomes director.....	157	Japanese-Chinese war. See Chinese-Japanese war		Krutch, Joseph Wood
Interior voyage, the. F. Rosenfeld; S.....	337	Jarrell, Randall		Becker, Carl, death; S.....	490
International alliance of theatrical stage employees		Pyle, Ernie, death; S.....573; see also EP.....	476	Reviews of plays:
Its raids against other AFL unions provoke a strike in the motion picture industry; EP.....	347	Siegfried; P.....	447	Carousel.....	525
International bill of rights. See World war — San Francisco conference		Wide prospect, the; P.....	222	Dark of the moon.....	370
International federation of trade unions		Jews		Deep Mrs. Sykes, the.....	395
To be replaced by a new organization formed at the world trade union congress; E.235; see also 176; EP.....	199	Anti-Semitic activities in Chicago. M. P. Akers; S.....	597	Foolish notion.....	340
International labor organization		Assassins of Lord Moyne hanged. G. Frank; S.....357; see also.....	11	Glass menagerie, the.....	424
Meeting of the governing board maps steps for strengthening its role in the post-war; EP.....	143	New hope in the post-war period. S. Welles; S.....	54	Good night, ladies.....	136
See also Labor unions — World trade union congress		Smith, G. L. K., presses his anti-Semitic campaign in the middle west; EP.....	347	Hasty heart, the.....	81
International rescue and relief committee		Szold, Henrietta, death. M. Lowenthal; S.....243; see also EP.....	200	Hollywood picture.....	705
Appeals for aid for liberated Europe. S. Strunsky; C.....	259	See also Palestine		Hope for the best.....	229
Istomin, Eugene. B. H. Haggin; M.....	26	Jinnah, Mohammed Ali. See India		It's a gift.....	340
Italian war. See War, European		Joesten, Joachim		Lady says yes, a.....	136
Italy		Kesselring replaces von Rundstedt as commander of German army in western Europe; S.....	354	Memphis bound.....	705
Allies bolster the monarchy, the. M. Rossi; S.....539, 569, 624; see also EP.....	557	Johnson, Thomas M.		One-man show.....	229
And the Trieste crisis. I. F. Stone; S.....	589	Post-war universal training; C.....399; see also 210; 246; C.....287; C.....315; 330; C.....400; C.....427; C.....	428	Rebecca.....	136
Churchill defends the policy of the British government; E.....	88	Jones, Dorothy B.		Sing out, sweet land.....	52
Communists had Pope Pius's speech to the Christian workers association; EP.....	318	Is Hollywood going to war; S.....	93	Sophie.....	24
Dozza, G., Communist leader, elected mayor of Bologna; EP.....475; see also E.....	505	Is Hollywood growing up? S.....	123	Stranger, the.....	257
Fascism without Mussolini. M. Rossi; S.....539, 569, 624; see also EP.....	557	Jones, Frank		Tempest, the.....165; see also.....	309
Health conditions of the children. G. Rea; S.....	412	Theater in Paris, the; S.....	363	Trio.....52; see also EP.....	291
Hotel behind the lines. K. Boyle; S.....642; Italians reported starving as shipping shortage cuts food and relief supplies; EP.....	30	Jones, Jesse H.		Up in Central Park.....	165
Lacer from Rome. G. S.; C.....	45	Fights to block his replacement as Secretary of commerce by H. A. Wallace. I. F. Stone; S.....89; see also E.....116; 117; 146; EP.....197; EP.....	262
Nenni, P., seen as next premier; EP.....	557	Jordan, Philip
see also EP.....	681	Darian over Athens; S.....	212
Parri, F., proposed for the premiership; EP.....	681	Joseph, Bernard
Partisans, the. M. Bellini; S.....249; see also 273; S.....539	680	Comments on J. L. Magnes's letter on Palestine; C.....	138
Program of the Committee of national liberation. M. Rossi; S.....569, 624; see also EP.....	557	Joubert, William H.
Roatta, M., fascist terrorist, escapes from prison; E.....291; see also.....	334	More on Florida's anti-closed-shop amendment; C.....195; see also C.....	50
Secret clause in the armistice agreement, a Sicily's separatist movement; EP.....	142	Journalism. See Newspapers
Starvation brings civil disorder; EP.....	142	Juan, Prince of Spain. See Spain
Theater season in Rome. M. Marshall; S.....	697	Jugoslavia. See Yugoslavia
Umberto, Prince, visits Bologna; E.505; see also C.....	680	K
Vatican plan for post-war reconstruction, a G. Salvemini; S.....127; see also C.....	259	Kandinsky, Vassily, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A.....	396
It's a gift. J. W. Krutch; D.....	340	Kantorowicz, Alfred
It's in the bag. J. Agee; MP.....	469	Nazi post-war strategy; S.....	154
Ives-Quinn bill. See New York state		Keats, Howard
Iwo Jima. See War, Pacific		Gallup poll bias; C.....	168
Investia. See Union of soviet socialist republics		Keeney, Hush
		Named Canadian ambassador to Mexico; EP.....	3
		Kendrick, Alexander
		Bill White's barooka; S.....	384
		Kennedy, Edward
		Ethics of his "coop" on V-E day; EP.....	558
		Kenny, Robert W., his growing popularity in California is seen as a threat to Governor Warren. C. McWilliams; S.....	152
		Kersh, Herman
		Comments on J. Agee's article on atrocity films; C.....680; see also.....	579

And the deportation case against H. Bridges.
I. F. Stone; S. . . . . 73;
Confederation of Latin American workers,
the. V. Mishnyn; S. . . . . 73;
see also 157; 304; E. . . . . 3;
Florida's anti-closed-shop amendment. L.
C. Morris; C. . . . . 56; see also C.
German trade union meeting in Aachen;
EP . . . . . 558
Government seizes Montgomery Ward after
S. Avery denies WLB directives on wages and union membership; E. . . . . 3;
see also EP . . . . . 3
Labor's role in post-war full production.
S. Chase; S. . . . . 39 Motion picture studio workers strike in jurisdictional dispute with the I.A.T.S.E.;
EP . . . . . 114
North Carolina supreme court dismisses charge against W. DeBerry, union organizer; EP . . . . . 59
Thomas, R. J., gives labor's goal for postwar housing; EP . . . . . 87
United garment workers start a book club for union members. M. Marshall; S. . . . .
United mine workers open contract negotiations for higher wages; E. . . . . 263;
see also 353; EP . . . . . 432
Versus the rights of automobile manufacturers. S. Richter; S. . . . . 719
World trade union congress:
At the San Francisco conference. J.
Alvarez del Vayo; S. . . . . 236;
see also E. . . . . 304
Disapproving eyes. Low; C. . . . . 296
Forms a new organization to replace the International federation of trade unions;
E. . . . . 235; see also EP . . . . . 199
Issues before the conference. M. Stewart;
S. . . . . 176
Lady says yes to a J. W. Krutch; D. . . . .
La Guardia, Fiorello H. . . . . 136
Will not run again for mayor; EP . . . . . 558
La Palme, Robert . . . . . 329
"We shall never surrender!" Ct. . . . . 516
You must have something that will fit; Ct. . . . . 530 Largo Caballero, Francisco, freed from German prison; EP . . . . . 230
Lash of the penitentes, the. J. Agee; MP . . . . . 230
Laski, Harold J. . . . . 435
England's reaction to the death of President Roosevelt; S. . . . . 435
Latin America
C.T.A.L. See Confederation of Latin American workers
Chapultepec conference. See Inter-American conference on problems of war and peace
Fake election in El Salvador. . . . . 101 Warren, A. M., becomes director of the Office of Inter-American relations. . . . . 157
See also names of countries
Lauterstein, Lincoln . . . . . 399;
Post-war army, a; C. . . . . 399;
see also 210; 406; C. . . . . 287; C. . . . . 315;
330; C. . . . . 440; C. . . . . 427; C. . . . . 428
Laval, Pierre. See France
League for Industrial Democracy
Celebrates its fortieth anniversary; EP . . . . .
Leahy, Admiral William D. See Franco-American relations
Lebanon, the Franco-Lebanese differences. M. Clark; S. . . . . 301; see also E. . . . . 636
Ledebour, Georg; anti-fascist German celebrates his ninety-fifth birthday in exile; EP . . . . . 319
Ledo-Burma road. See Chinese-Japanese war
Lehmann, Lotte. B. H. Haggin; M. . . . . 111, 166, 498
Lehrman, Hal . . . . . 413
Pan-Arabia deserts; S. . . . . 515; Rightist terror in Greece; S. . . . . 503
see also EP . . . . . 567
Lemaigre-Dubreuil, Jacques. See France
Lemkin, Raphael . . . . . 263
Legal case against Hitler, the; S. . . . . 205, 268;
see also EP . . . . . 567
Lend lease. See United States
Leopold III, King. See Belgium
Les temps will replace Nouvelle revue française. M. Marshall; S. . . . . 308 Urges support of bill for federal aid to states for education; C. . . . . 258;
see also EP . . . . . 287
Lewis, John L. . . . . 263 Opens campaign for higher wages for the coal miners; E. . . . . 432
Liberties, civil. See Civil rights Lilienthal, David E. See Tennessee valley authority
Lin Yutang . . . . . 180;
China as he sees it. E. Snow; S. . . . . 471
see also 324; 359; C. . . . . 432
Lipowitz, Irving . . . . . 246
Needed, a post-war citizens' army; S. . . . . 246;
see also 210; C. . . . . 287; C. . . . . 315, 330;
C. . . . . 399; C. . . . . 400; C. . . . . 427; C. . . . . 428
Literature
Angry penguins and the Ern Malley hoax.
M. Marshall; S. . . . . 518; see also . . . . . 697
Dilemma of T. S. Eliot, the. S. Hook; S. . . . . 69; see also C. . . . . 195; 440
In France today. L. Kirstein; S. . . . . 103
Interior voyage, the. P. Rosenfeld; S. . . . . 337
Notes by the way. M. Marshall; S. . . . . 20, 48, 147, 131, 187, 220, 253, 279, 308, 336, 418, 447, 518, 546, 602, 652, 675, 697
Paris regained. C. Connolly; S. . . . . 651, 674
Lloyd George, David, death. K. Martin; S. . . . . 381
Locke, George . . . . . 337
Postwar military conscription; C. . . . . 427;
see also 210; 246; C. . . . . 287; C. . . . . 315;
330; C. . . . . 399; C. . . . . 400; C. . . . . 428
Low, cartoons
"Dammit, young man, we mustn't put the cat before the horse!" . . . . . 252
Disapproving eyes. Low; C. . . . . 296
Don't forget some of us are Germans, friend. . . . . 537; see also EP . . . . . 530
Engine? What engine? . . . . . 665 Fine team — but could do with a dash of reality . . . . . 713
"I appeal to common sense" . . . . . 206
Ironing out the creases. . . . . 508
Mobile canteen . . . . . 66
Pep talk to the dead. . . . . 151
Take me in, mister? . . . . . 376
Well, well, look who's here. . . . . 488
Lowenthal, Marvin . . . . . 243;
S. . . . . 243; see also EP . . . . . 200
Lublin committee. See Poland
Luce, Clare Boothe . . . . . 663 Opposes Yalta proposal for reparation in kind from Germany; EP . . . . . 262
Luzon. See War, Pacific
Lyman, Ltd. . . . . 176
Urges its employees to vote against the
C.C.F. in the Canadian election; EP . . . . . 663
M
M. F. Well . . . . . 413
Wounded woman speaks, a. Translated from the Yugoslav by E. Sharin; P. . . . . 96
Magazines. See names of magazines
Marsel, Edward M. . . . . 271
Should veterans have legs? S. . . . . 499
Major
Report from the Pacific; C. . . . . 241
Malles, Paul . . . . . 362
What hope for small powers? S. . . . . 717
Mandelstam, Max . . . . . 241
Population problems in Germany; S. . . . . 362
Manila. See War, Pacific
Mann, Klaus . . . . . 717
In free Czechoslovakia; S. . . . . 535
Mann, Thomas . . . . . 72
Addresses to the German people; S. . . . . 663
Testament against fascism . . . . . 72
To be honored at a dinner by The Nation associates on his seventieth birthday;
Manpower. See War effort
Mapower. See War effort
Marshall, Jacques . . . . . 440;
see also 69; C. . . . . 195
Markova, Alicia. B. H. Haggin; S. . . . . 609
Marshall, Margaret . . . . . 20, 48, 75, 131, 187, 220, 253, 279, 308, 336, 418, 447, 518, 546, 602, 652, 675, 697
On the town; D. . . . . 48
Portrait of Truman; S. . . . . 438;
see also EP . . . . . 432; 436;
Lloyd George, David, death; S. . . . . 381
Martinez Barrio, Diego. See Spain
Marton, Jarmila . . . . . 95
Comments on "Sleep comes hard" by D.
Baruch; C. . . . . 315; see also . . . . . 195
Masaryk, Jan. See section concerning publication of an article by him in The Nation. . . . . 410
Maslow, Will . . . . . 293
Fair employment state by state; S. . . . . 83
Massachusetts
Legislature holds hearings on a state fair employment bill. J. M. Morse; S. . . . . 293
New organization formed affiliated with the National citizens political action committee. C. J. Witton; C. . . . . 287
Max Bailey Bird. See War effort — Manpower
McWilliams, Carey . . . . . 59 Becomes a contributing editor of The Nation; EP . . . . . 693
Northwest needs a CVA, the; S. . . . . 208
Racial dialectic: Missouri style; S. . . . . 152
Sange doing in California; Governor
Warren's social program; S. . . . . 271
Medicine
Extensive research needed on artificial limbs for disabled veterans. E. M. Maisel; S. . . . . 615
New Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill, the; EP . . . . . 691
Who are the opponents of the Murray-
Wagner-Dingell bill? G. Sartain; S. . . . . 231
Memphis bound. J. W. Krutch; D. . . . . 705
Mendershausen, Horst . . . . . 184
Nazis' next twelve years, the; S. . . . . 328
Mendes-France, Pierre. See France
Metropolitan life insurance company
Stuyvesant town housing project. C. Abrams; S. . . . . 111 Metropolitan opera company, the. B. H. Haggin; M. . . . . 502
Mexico
Fight for the admission of Argentina to the San Francisco conference is led by Foreign Minister E. Padilla; EP . . . . . 711 Statute by L. Quintana on the question of admitting Spain to the San Francisco conference; EP . . . . . 587; see also . . . . . 109
Micaud, Charles A. . . . . 16
French and the big three, the; S. . . . . 417
Middle east. See names of countries
Mikolajczyk, Stanislaw. See Poland
Military training. See Selective service
Mining. See Coal
Ministry of finance. J. Agee; MP . . . . . 110
Mishnyn, Virginia . . . . . 208
Confederation of Latin American workers,
the; S. . . . . 73; see also 157; 304; E. . . . . 157
Latin American front . . . . . 109
Pamice, Josephine; song and dance recital;
S. . . . . 109
Missouri
Racial dialectic: Missouri style. C. Mc-
Williams; S. . . . . 208
Mr. Emmanuel. J. Agee; MP . . . . . 110
Molloy, James . . . . . 600
French municipal elections interpreted, the;
S. . . . . 44
How to lose friends in France; S. . . . . 469
Molly and me. J. Agee; MP . . . . . 326
Mondrian, Piet, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. . . . . 596
Monet, Claude, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. . . . . 596 Money
Germany's post-war currency. Argus; S. . . . . 278; see also . . . . . 16
See also Finance, public
Monopolies
Biddle, F., warns that pre-war cartel arrangements are being resumed; EP . . . . . 614 Decision in the Aluminum company of Ameri-

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Chamber music concerts sponsored by the Book-of-the-month club . . . . .	470	Racial dialectic: Missouri style. C. McWilliams; S. . . . .	208	Yenan, 1945; S. . . . .	15
Istomin, Eugene . . . . .	26	Rape of Mrs. R. Taylor, the; EP. . . . .	59	Padilla, Ezequiel. See Mexico
Lehmann, Lottie . . . . .	111, 166, 498	San Quentin prison solves the race problem; EP. . . . .	476	Painting. See Art
Marriage of Figaro . . . . .	111	Student paper at William and Mary college censored for publication of an editorial advocating racial equality; EP. . . . .	199	Palestine
Metropolitan opera company . . . . .	166	Unseat the poll-tax congressman! J. M. Morse; S. . . . .	385	And the Pan-Arab league. H. Lehrman; S. . . . .	413; see also . . . . .	617
New friends of music . . . . .	166	War veterans and the G.I. bill of rights; EP. . . . .	402	Comment on views expressed by J. L. Magnes, B. Joseph; C. . . . .	138
"On the town" . . . . .	82	Will be aided by the passage of the bill for federal aid to education. C. C. Young; C. . . . .	287	For an international trusteeship. S. Welles; S. . . . .	511; see also 561; EP. . . . .	710
Opera in America . . . . .	194	Young students ask public support in their campaign against racial discrimination. G. Brothers; C. . . . .	259	Lord Moyne's assassins on trial. G. Frank; S. . . . .	14; see also . . . . .	357
Photograph needles . . . . .	498	Nehru, Jawaharlal. See India		Reader comments on The Nation's editorial on the assassination of Lord Moyne. L. I. Dublin; C. . . . .	28
Prokofiev's eighth piano sonata . . . . .	679	Nenni, Pietro. See Italy		Pan American airlines
Recorded. See Haggin, B. H.		New friends of music. B. H. Haggin; M. . . . .	166	Seeks monopoly of American foreign air traffic; E. . . . .	172
Role of the musicologist . . . . .	630	New Jersey		Pan-Americana. J. Agee; MP. . . . .	257
Rose, Leonard . . . . .	166	Progressive league formed in Bergen and Passaic counties. L. Gamow; C. . . . .	680	Pan-Arab league, the
Score for "Fury in the Pacific" . . . . .	470; see also . . . . .	New York city		And Palestine. H. Lehrman; S. . . . .	413; see also . . . . .	617
"Seven lively arts" . . . . .	679	And the Stuyvesant town housing project. C. Abrams; S. . . . .	328	Backs Syrian-Lebanese demand for immediate independence; E. . . . .	636; see also . . . . .	617
Sound distortion in radio broadcasts of concerts . . . . .	194	La Guardia, F. H., will not run again for mayor; EP. . . . .	558	Encourages Indian Moslem demand for Pakistan; E. . . . .	683
Szigeti, Joseph . . . . .	26	Moss, P., closes the play "Trio" because of its theme; EP. . . . .	291; see also D. . . . .	Paper, Franz von. See Germany
Tovey's essay on Mozart's piano concerto K 503 . . . . .	53	Surveying the majority candidates; EP. . . . .	52	Parri, Ferruccio. See Italy
Music for millions. J. Agee; MP. . . . .	24; see also . . . . .	Zoning-law amendment urged to prevent erection of skyscrapers around Washington square; EP. . . . .	318	Parche, Wallace T.
Muste, A. J.	602	New York state		Dumbarton Oaks and world federation; C. . . . .	555
Postwar military conscription; C. . . . .	427; see also 210; 246; C. . . . .	Annual message of Governor Dewey to the state legislature; EP. . . . .	30	Patents
330; C. . . . .	400; C. . . . .	Passes the Ives-Quinn anti-discrimination bill; EP. . . . .	199; see also EP. . . . .	Supreme court decision in the Hartford-Empire glass monopoly case; E. . . . .	60
N		Newspapers		Pauley, Edward W., named to serve as American member of the Allied reparations commission. A. Barth; S. . . . .	563
N.C.P.A.C. See National citizens' political action committee		Post-war venture of L. Bready, the. S. Christian; C. . . . .	259	Paz Estenssoro, Victor. See Bolivia
Narcissa, R. Humphries; P. . . . .	106	Also See Censorship		Pearson, Lester B.
Nation, The		Niebuhr, Reinhold		Named Canadian ambassador to the United States; EP. . . . .	3
Fifty years ago. . . . .	92, 242	America's role in the post-war international scene; S. . . . .	42; see also E. . . . .	Pell, Herbert C. See United nations war crimes commission
Fischer, Louis, resigns from the board contributing editors; C. . . . .	631, 706; see also 684; C. . . . .	Nollen, John Scholte		Peluffo, Orlando L. See Argentina
Lacks a clear-cut position, O. Corey; C. . . . .	167	Peace-time military conscription; S. . . . .	210; see also 246; C. . . . .	Perkins, Frances. See Labor
McWilliams, C., becomes a contributing editor; EP. . . . .	59	C. . . . .	400; C. . . . .	Perkin, Juan Domingo. See Argentina
Seventy-five years ago. . . . .	64, 204, 327, 437, 640	North Carolina		Peru
Ten years ago . . . . .	36, 298, 408	Supreme court dismisses charge against W. DeBerry; EP. . . . .	59	Aprista party holds a national convention. . . . .	157
Twenty-five years ago. . . . .	11, 149, 270, 380	Notes by the way. M. Marshall; S. . . . .	20, 48, 75, 131, 187, 220, 253, 279, 308, 356, 418, 447, 518, 546, 602, 652, 675, 697	Pétain, Henri Philippe. See France
Nation associates, the		Novels. See Books		Peter II, King. See Yugoslavia
Launches an organization, The Friends of the Spanish Republic. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . .	33; see also 501; EP. . . . .	OPA. See Price administration, office of		Philippine islands. See War, Pacific
Report on the rally to demand end of diplomatic relations with Spain. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . .	33; see also EP. . . . .	OWI. See War information, office of		Photograph records. See Haggin, B. H. — Music, recorded
To honor T. Mann at a dinner on his seventieth birthday; EP. . . . .	663	Objective Burma. J. Agee; MP. . . . .	230	Picture of Dorian Gray, the. J. Agee; MP. . . . .	285
National broadcasting company		O'Cloutard, Owen		Pius, Pope. See Roman catholic church
Sound distortions in radio broadcasts of concerts. B. H. Haggin; M. . . . .	194, 231	Big business organizes against the cooperatives; C. . . . .	259	Plasiras, General Nicholas. See Greece
National citizens' political action committee		Office of war mobilization. See War mobilization, office of		Plays. See Clark, M., Krutch, J. W.; Marshall, M., for reviews
New organization in Massachusetts announces its affiliation. C. J. Witton; C. . . . .	83	Oil		Pleven, René. See France
See also Congress of industrial organizations — Political action committee		And the Arabian delegation. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. . . . .	617	Poems
National defense. See War effort		And the Franco-Syrian dispute; E. . . . .	636; see also . . . . .	Angry penguins and the Ern Malley hoax. M. Marshall; S. . . . .	697
National income; figures on accumulated savings in low-income groups; E. . . . .	637; see also E. . . . .	Canol, the war's epic blunder. E. A. Harris; S. . . . .	513	Fashion. Corporal . . . . .	68
National physicians' committee for the extension of medical service		Okinawa. See War, Pacific		Narcissa, R. Humphries . . . . .	106
Launches advertising campaign against the Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill. G. Sarfain; S. . . . .	691	O'Mahoney, Joseph C. See Monopolies		Puritan poem. M. Cane. . . . .	272
National planning association		On approval. J. Agee; MP. . . . .	166	Refried R. Jarrell . . . . .	447
Issues pamphlet on a national budget for full employment; E. . . . .	664	On the town. M. Marshall; D. . . . .	48; see also . . . . .	Spain and the peace. B. Ciarana. Translated from the Yugoslav by E. Sharin. . . . .	96
Issues report on post-war full employment; E. . . . .	477	One-man show. J. W. Krutch; D. . . . .	229	Wide prospect, the. R. Jarrell . . . . .	222
National service act. See Selective service		Oumansky, Constantin. death. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . .	115	Wounded woman speaks, a. M.E. Translated from the Yugoslav by E. Sharin. . . . .	96
Nazism. See Germany		Oursler, Fulton		Poet . . . . .
Near east. See names of countries		Corrects statements about the Reader's Digest in an editorial by The Nation ; C. . . . .	27; see also C. . . . .	Some young poets and a new genre. F. W. Dupee; S. . . . .	159
Negrin, Juan		Oxnam, G. Bromley		Poland
Arrives in the United States for a conference with Spanish Republicans in this country; EP. . . . .	587; see also EP. . . . .	Membership requirements of the Gideons; C. . . . .	315; see also . . . . .	And the Crimea conference. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	174; see also EP. . . . .	86; EP. . . . .	198; E. . . . .	292; 589
Future of the Spanish republic; S. . . . .	614	Testament against fascism . . . . .	72	British war office refutes charge that the Red army halted its drive on Warsaw for political reasons; EP. . . . .	29
His visit to Mexico played by the British government; EP. . . . .	57; see also . . . . .	P		Ironing out the creases. Low. Ct. . . . .	508
Negroes		P.A.C. See Congress of industrial organizations — Political action committee		Land reform under the national committee of liberation. A. L. Strong; S. . . . .	122
And the FEPC; EP. . . . .	199; see also EP. . . . .	Pacific islands		Lublin committee moves to Warsaw to become the provisional government; EP. . . . .	86
410; EP. . . . .	531; E. . . . .	Post-war		Mikolajczyk, S., attacked by the Russians as anti-Russian; EP. . . . .	198
Army and navy will accept nurses. E. Clyde; C. . . . .	196	King, Admiral E. J., urges the United States to retain our Pacific bases; EP. . . . .	402	New Polish government; the EP. . . . .	710
California supreme court bars job discrimination in closed shops; EP. . . . .	31	United nations policy. E. . . . .	533; see also EP. . . . .	Russia seeks seat for Lublin government at the San Francisco conference; EP. . . . .	373
Council of Jewish women turns over settlement house in Harlem for use of Negro children; EP. . . . .	375	Pacific war. See War, Pacific		Russian press censorship obscures developments. E. Seavard; S. . . . .	415
Georgia repeals the poll tax; EP. . . . .	143	Pacificus		Russia's arrest of sixteen Polish leaders. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	709
Housing conditions among war workers in Los Angeles. D. W. Baruch; S. . . . .	95; see also C. . . . .	Dangerous allied experts on post-war policy for Japan; S. . . . .	128; see also 666; 667; E. . . . .	Political war
North Carolina supreme court dismisses charge against W. DeBerry, union organizer; EP. . . . .	59			Argentina:
Prospects for post-war employment. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	687			American recognition of A. Haden; S. . . . .	444

PAGE	PAGE	PAGE
Vargas promises an election; opposition to the dictatorship. S. Wainer; S. . . . .	277	V-day and revolution. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. . . . . 304; see also 334; C. . . . . 555; EP. . . . . 613, 614
Bulgaria: political scene shows strong communist domination. C. Poulos; S. . . . .	695	Pol tax . . . . . 244
China: Yen-an, 1945. Pacificus; S. . . . .	15	Fight against, initiated by the Southern conference for human welfare. J. A. Dombrowski; S. . . . . 244
France:		Repealed in Georgia; EP. . . . . 143
American misunderstanding of French psychology. J. Moch; S. . . . . 44		Southern electoral reform league seeks to unseat 69 congressmen charging their election was unconstitutional. J. M. Morse; S. . . . . 385
Its role at the San Francisco conference. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S. . . . . 531		Pollock, Jackson, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. . . . . 396
Municipal elections interpreted, the. J. Moch; S. . . . . 600		Post-war, United States. See United States — Post-war
New press, the. E. Gallois; S. . . . . 487		Post-war reconstruction. See World war
Germany:		Poulos, Constantine . . . . . 695
Allied censorship blacks out news from occupied territory. Argus; S. . . . . 214		Pousette-Dart, Richard, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. . . . . 82
Allied policy for post-war military, economic, and political administration. Argus; S. . . . . 377		Power, public
Battle for upper Silesia may create an acute coal shortage. Argus; S. . . . . 129		Bonnevillie power administration, the. C. McWilliams; S. . . . . 645
Concentration-camp atrocities and the guilt of the German people. Argus; S. . . . . 517; see also 509; 510; EP. . . . . 530; C. . . . . 537; 579; C. . . . . 680		Grand Coulee. C. McWilliams; S. . . . . 645
Diplomatic personnel in Switzerland leaving the service. Argus; S. . . . . 102		Lilienthal and the TVA. B. C. Shelton; S. . . . . 544; E. also . . . . . 643
Dr. Goebbels talks. Hirschberg; S. . . . . 567		Northwest needs a Columbia valley authority, the. C. McWilliams; S. . . . . 622, 645, 693
Eisenhower's proclamation on the "conquest" of, exploited by nazi propagandists. Argus; S. . . . . 74		Practically yours. J. Agee; MP. . . . . 395
Gestapo liquidates all persons with any Russian connections. Argus; S. . . . . 214		Prémice, Josephine. V. Mishun; S. . . . . 109
Growing scarcity of foodstuffs and civilian supplies. Argus; S. . . . . 74		Press. See Newspapers
Hitler's New Year's speech. Argus; S. . . . . 102; see also EP. . . . . 362		Prestes, Luis Carlos. See Brazil
Nazis act to quell any large-scale defection from above or below. Argus; S. . . . . 158		Price control, office of
"Nazis" and "non-nazis." Argus; S. . . . . 335; see also C. . . . . 499		Fights against deterioration of quality in clothing; the OPA-WPB controls on clothing prices; EP. . . . . 115
Nazis prepare to resist in the southern mountains. Argus; S. . . . . 214		Versus the food and textile industries. I. F. Stone; S. . . . . 406
Next twelve years, the. H. Mendershausen; S. . . . . 184		Wherry amendment to the price control act, the; EP. . . . . 682; see also EP. . . . . 711
Officials take steps to protect official documents as military crisis deepens. Argus; S. . . . . 158		Prices. See Business
Population trends. M. Mandellaub; S. . . . . 16		Prieto, Indalecio. See Spain
Post-war currents. Hirschberg; S. . . . . 278; see also EP. . . . . 174		Prisoners, war. See World war — Prisoners
Propagandists denounce the Crimea decisions. Argus; S. . . . . 250; see also E. . . . . 169; 174		Profits. See Business
Refugees and soldiers flee from Russians. Argus; S. . . . . 214		Public finance. See Finance, public
Two directors of the Messerschmidt factories seek asylum in Switzerland. Argus; S. . . . . 46		Public power. See Power, public
Underground factories continue to produce. Argus; S. . . . . 444		Puerto Rico
Werewolf movement, the. Argus; S. . . . . 156		Program of the new Partido popular . . . . . 157
When does morale break? J. Bornstein; S. . . . . 402		Puritan poem. M. Cane; P. . . . . 272
Which Germans shall we use in administrative positions? M. Hirschberg; S. . . . . 648; see also 335; C. . . . . 499; EP. . . . . 586; E. . . . . 635		Putzel, Howard; analyzes main tendency in American avant-garde painting. C. Greenberg; A. . . . . 657
Why the nazis fight on. F. Sternberg; S. . . . . 100		Pyle, Ernie, death. R. Jarrell; S. . . . . 573; see also EP. . . . . 476
Greece:		Q
Darlan over Athens. P. Jordan; S. . . . . 503		Quintanilla, Luis. See Mexico
Rightist terror. H. Lehman; S. . . . . 515; see also EP. . . . . 503		R
India:		REA. See Rural electrification administration
Looks beyond the war. B. S. Rao; S. . . . . 387		Radescu, Nicolai. See Rumania
Visit of Lord Wavell to England may mean an end to the Anglo-Indian political deadlock. U. Shankar; S. . . . . 650		Radio
Italy:		Sound distortions in broadcasts of concerts. B. H. Haggin; M. . . . . 194, 231
Fascism without Mussolini. M. Rossi; S. . . . . 539, 569, 624; see also EP. . . . . 557		Railroads
Letter from Rome. G. S.; C. . . . . 405		Georgia rate case, the; E. . . . . 404
Partisans, the. M. Bellini; S. . . . . 273		Rankin, John E. . . . . 616
Secret clause in the armistice agreement . . . . . 186		And war veterans; E. . . . . 616
Vatican plan for post-war reconstruction, a? G. Salvemini; S. . . . . 127; see also C. . . . . 259		Seeks to dominate Committee on un-American activities; EP. . . . . 87; see also . . . . . 35
Japan:		Rao, B. Shiva . . . . . 387
Dangerous allied experts on post-war policy. Pacificus; S. . . . . 128; see also 666; 667; E. . . . . 683		Rea, Gene . . . . . 412
Latin America:		Italy's children; S. . . . . 412
Confederation of Latin American workers, the. V. Mishun; S. . . . . 73; see also 157; 304; E. . . . . 417		Reader's digest
News flashes. V. Mishun . . . . . 157		Cannell, K., defends her article in, about France; C. . . . . 555
Press censorship as a political weapon. E. Sevaireid; S. . . . . 415		Oursler, F., an editor, corrects statements about, in The Nation ; C. . . . . 27; see also C. . . . . 139
Spain:		Publishes condensed version of F. A. Hayek's "The road to serfdom"; EP. . . . . 403
And the peace. B. Clariana; P. . . . . 360		Rebaca, J. W. . . . . 136
Franco skulduggery; E. . . . . 586		Reciprocal trade agreements act. See Trade agreements
Testament against fascism. . . . . 72		Reconversion. See United States — Post-war
Union of soviet socialist republics		Recorded music. See Haggin, B. H. — Music, recorded
Political warfare in Hungary and Germany . . . . . 417		Renner, Karl. See Austria
		Report on Italy. J. Agee; MP. . . . . 230 Republican party
		Meeting of the national committee, the. M. P. Akers; S. . . . . 125
		Names isolationists to Senate foreign relations committee; EP. . . . . 58
		Reynolds company, R. J. . . . . 59
		North Carolina supreme court dismisses charge against W. DeBerry, union organizer; EP. . . . . 719
		Richter, Irving . . . . . 416
		Detroit plans for chaos; S. . . . . 416
		Rigaud, Jean. See France
		Rivero Gil . . . . . 17
		Guest from Spain, a; Ct. . . . . 17
		Right of asylum; C. . . . . 136
		Routier, Mari See Italy
		Robinson, Judith . . . . . 274
		Dalhousie university drops a president; S. . . . . 274
		Roman catholic church
		Italian communists hail Pope Pius's speech to the Christian workers association; EP. . . . . 318
		No Vatican plan for Italy? G. Salvemini; S. . . . . 127; see also C. . . . . 259
		Pope Pius attacked by Izvestia as an appeaser; EP. . . . . 378
		Religion and politics; statement of the Archbishop of New York. G. Salvemini; C. . . . . 411
		Roosevelt, Eleanor . . . . . 432
		And the death of President Roosevelt; EP. . . . . 432
		Roosevelt, Franklin Delano . . . . . 61
		Administration:
		Budget message, the; E. . . . . 31; see also . . . . . 63
		His annual message calls for national-service legislation; E. . . . . 31; see also . . . . . 63
		Names H. A. Wallace to replace J. H. Jones as Secretary of commerce. I. F. Stone; S. . . . . 89; see also E. . . . . 116; 117; 146; EP. . . . . 197; EP. . . . . 262
		Death. I. F. Stone; S. . . . . 436; see also 429; 430; EP. . . . . 432; 434; 435; 497; EP. . . . . 504
		Root, Waverly
		Corrects "In the wind" item; C. . . . . 612; see also . . . . . 485
		Rose, Leonard. B. H. Haggin; M. . . . . 166
		Rosenfeld, Paul . . . . . 337
		Interior voyage, the; S. . . . . 337
		Italy:
		Italy: fascism without Mussolini; S. . . . . 539, 569, 624; see also EP. . . . . 557
		Rouault, Georges, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A. . . . . 581
		Roughly speaking. J. Agee; MP. . . . . 230
		Royal scandal, a. J. Agee; MP. . . . . 395
		Rumania
		Radescu government falls; P. Groza to head new cabinet; E. . . . . 319
		Ruml, Beardsley, supports the full-employment bill; E. . . . . 664
		Rundstedt, Field Marshal Karl Rudolf Gerd von. See Germany
		Rural electrification administration
		Senate refuses to confirm A. Williams as head of the bureau; E. . . . . 349
		Russell, Maud
		Lin Yutang versus Edgar Snow; C. . . . . 471; see also . . . . . 180; 324; 359
		Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
		Russo-German war
		Fierce fighting marks German attempt to relieve its encircled garrison in Budapest; EP. . . . . 29
		German refugees and soldiers flee westward before the Russians. Argus; S. . . . . 214
		Red army opens central-front drive aimed at Berlin; EP. . . . . 57
		Red offensive seeks the destruction of the German army; figures on the offensive to date. C. G. Bolte; S. . . . . 119
		Russian mid-winter offensive, the. C. G. Bolte; S. . . . . 91
		Zhukov's gambit in the drive on Berlin. C. G. Bolte; S. . . . . 145, 173
		S
		St. Lawrence seaway
		Dewey proposes that New York state undertake completion of the project; EP. . . . . 30
		Saintsbury, George; former students prepare a memorial volume in honor of his centenary. A. Muir; C. . . . . 612
		Salaries. See Labor — Wages
		Salvador, El
		Election results . . . . . 101
		Salvemini, Gaetano
		No Vatican plan for Italy? S. . . . . 127; see also C. . . . . 259
		Religion and politics statement of the archbishop of New York; C. . . . . 471
		San Francisco conference. See World war
		San Pietro, J. Agee; MP. . . . . 608
		Schuman, Gerald . . . . . 691
		Schuman, Frederick L.
		Might and right at San Francisco; S. . . . . 479; see also E. . . . . 473
		Schwelienbach, Lewis
		Replaces F. Perkins as head of the Department of labor; E. . . . . 616
		Scobie, General Ronald M. See Greece
		Scott, Roderick
		Comments on "China sets the clock back"; S. . . . . 287; see also . . . . . 67
		Selective service
		Peace-time military conscription. J. S. Nollen; S. . . . . 210; see also 246; C. . . . . 287; C. . . . . 315; 330; C. . . . . 399; C. . . . . 400; C. . . . . 427; C. . . . . 428
		Supreme court acquiesces in memorandum of the German-American bond accused of interfering with the draft; EP. . . . . 682
		See also United States — Army
		Sevaireid, Eric
		Censors in the saddle; S. . . . . 415
		Shanghai drama. J. Agee; MP. . . . . 136
		Shankar, Uma
		New hope for India; S. . . . . 650

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Shaw, George Bernard		Rebuke by Churchill suggests a new allied policy; EP.....170; see also.....	174	Sunday dinner for a soldier. J. Agee; MP.....	136
His words on war and peace. W. Wilson;.....	258	Right of asylum. Rivero Gil; Ct.....	17	Supreme court; United States.....
Shelton, Barrett C.		Testament against fascism.....	72	Acquits members of the German-American
Lilienthal and the TVA; S.....544;		Train reported returning members of the		bund accused of interfering with the see also.....	563	Blue division is attacked by Frenchmen		draft; EP.....	682
Sherman anti-trust act. See Monopolies		at Chambery; EP.....	682	Decision in the Associated press case. I. F.
Shirer, William L.		UNRRA seeks Spanish ships to carry relief		Stone; S.....	714
Testament against fascism.....	72	materials to Europe; EP.....	197	Decision in the Hartford-Empire glass
Sicily. See Italy		United States should break with Franco		monopoly case; E.....	60
Siegfried, R. Jarrell; P.....	447	now, the F. Kirchwey; S.....33;	475	Decision in the Shoshone Indian land-claim
Sing out, sweet land. J. W. Krutch; D.....	52	see also EP.....1; 4; EP.....		case; EP.....	346
Slavin, Harry		Voorhis, J., asserts that Germans control		To hear deportation case against H.
Comments on J. W. Seoville's letter about		40 per cent of Spanish industry; EP.....	615	Bridges. I. P. Stone; S.....350;
the laissez faire principle; C.....	27	Why D. Martinez Barrio convoked the		see also.....	714
Smith, Gerald L. K.		cortes. P. Kirchwey; S.....90;	57	To hear the Georgia railway case; E.....	404
Addresses meeting of America firsters in		Will Franco fall? S.....	484	Suspect, the. J. Agee; MP.....	110
Chicago; EP.....	347	Spain and the peace. B. Clariana. Trans-		Suzuki, Baron Kantaro. See Japan
His activities will be examined by Illinois		lated from the Spanish by D. Fitts; P.....	360	Sweden senate committee investigating un-Ameri-		Spears, Major General Sir Edward. See Great		Its role in the final stages of the war;
can activities. M. P. Akers; S.....	597	Britain — Anglo-French relations		EP.....	198
Snow, Edgar		Stalin, Joseph. See Union of soviet socialist		Switzerland
China to Lin Yutang; S.....180;		republics		Refuses asylum to two directors of the see also EP.....172; 324; 359; C.....	471	Stanford, Irene		Messerschmidt factories. Argus; S.....	46
Snyder, John W., named as Federal land ad-		Department of justice should act against		Syria ministrators by President Truman. A.		American pro-fascists; C.....	611	Franco-Syrian differences. M. Clark; S. 301;
Barth; S.....	563	State department, United States. See United		see also E.....	636; 715
Social security		States		Szigeti, Joseph. B. H. Haggin; M.....26;	231
New Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill proposes		Sternberg, Fritz		Szold, Henrietta, death. M. Lowenthal;
a broadened program with strengthened		Argus's views on German post-war admin-	335	S.....243; see also EP.....	200 health provisions; EP.....	615	istrators; C.....499; see also.....
President Truman's message on unemploy-		Inflation in Europe; S.....16;	100
ment compensation; E.....	637	Why the Nazis fight on; S.....	278
Who are the opponents of the Murray-		Stettinius, Edward R., Jr., See United States
Wagner-Dingell bill; G. Sartain; S.....	691	— State department
Soldiers. See United States Army		Stevens, Peter
Song to remember, a. J. Agee; MP.....	166	Murphy will out; the arrests of J. Le-
Soong, T. V. See China		maigre, Duvelout and J. Rigaud; S.....	97
Sophie, J. W. Krutch; D.....	24	Stewart, Margaret
South, the		Labor meets in London; S.....176;	235
Upsurge of progressive action. J. A. Dom-		see also EP.....199; E.....
browski; S.....	244	Stilwell, General Joseph W.
South America. See Latin America		To command the Tenth army in the Pacific;
Southern conference for human welfare		Stone, I. F.	710
Fosters the growth of progressive sentiment		Alcoa in wonderland: the decision in the in the south; S. Domrowski; C.....	244	government's anti-trust suit; S.....	322
To give dinner in honor of Justice H. L.		Anti-Russian undertow at San Francisco;
Black; EP.....	348	S.....534; see also 478; 501;
Southern electoral reform league		531; 560; 561; 589; C.....631;	706
Seeks to unseat 69 poll-tax congressmen		Army and the communists, the; S.....	238
charging their election was unconstitutional.		Behind the labor shortage; S.....63;
J. M. Morse; S.....	385	see also E.....
Southern tenant farmers' union		Crima conference, the; S.....174;
Fight congressional order to the FSA to		see also E.....	169 liquidate the Delmo homes project; EP.....	402	Deportation case of H. Bridges to be
South, center, the. J. Agee; MP.....	657	argued before the Supreme court; S 350;
Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist		Diez committee resurrected; S.....	714
republics		Farewell to F.D.R.; S.....436;	35
Spain		see also 429; 430; EP.....432;
Allied planes reported to have sunk six		434; 435; 497; EP.....	504
Spanish ships bringing supplies to Nazi		Fight against the FEPC; the; S.....	687 garrisons in French ports; EP.....317;		Federal and textile prices hearings before see also EP.....	318	the Smith committee; S.....406;
Ambassador Armour to seek explanation of		see also EP.....	115
weekly arrivals of Nazi agents; EP.....	318	Fumbling with I. G. Farben; S.....7;
And the San Francisco conference; EP 402;		see also EP.....	143
see also Ct.....488; 501; EP.....503;		Mediocre leadership at the San Francisco
531; EP.....586; EP.....587; EP.....614;	711	conference; S.....	506
Aznar, Manuel, new minister to Washing-		Problem of trusteeships, the; S.....561;
ton; EP.....	405	see also 478; 511; E.....	533
Backbone of the Catholic fascist bloc in		State department orders arrest of six men
Europe and America; EP.....	475	for making use of confidential department
Cortes meeting in Mexico; EP.....57;	90	documents; S.....666;
see also.....		see also 667; E.....	683
Don Juan issues manifesto condemning the		Supreme court decision in the Associated
Franco government; EP.....	348	press case; S.....	714
Franco ask for declaration of war on Japan		Stranger and San Francisco; S.....589
in hope of gaining a seat at the San		Truman and the State department; S. 637;	633
Francisco conference; EP.....347;	475	see also EP.....
see also EP.....		UNRRA: why its work lags; S.....378;	406
Franco creates a "council of the realm" to		see also.....	142
choose his successor if the necessity		United Nations: the Pell affair; S.....203;
arises; he stresses Spanish monarchist		see also EP.....	295
tradition; EP.....	682	Voting procedure in the Dumbarton Oaks
French foreign minister asks the		security council; S.....	295
Allies to demand Franco's abdication in		Wallace versus Jones; S.....89;
favor of a democratic government; EP.....	614	see also E.....116; 117; 146;	262
Future of the Spanish republic. J. Negrin;		EP.....197; EP.....	478
S.....4; see also EP.....	1	What the San Francisco conference must	257
Gonzalez severs relations; Cuba may fol-		accomplish; S..... low.....	157	Stratton, the. J. W. Krutch; D.....
Guest from Spain, a. Rivero Gil; Ct.....	416	Strikes. See Labor
Inter-American conference may call for a		Strong, Anna Louise break with Franco; E.....200;		Polish land reform, the; S.....122
see also EP.....170; EP.....234;	267	Strunsky, Sheba
Invites Republicans to return; EP.....	475	Appeals for clothes for the people of liber-
Lago Caballero, F., freed from German		ated Europe; C.....	259 prison; EP.....	530	Comments on "Austria: test for the coalition"
Laval, P., seeks refuge; EP.....530;		by E. K. Winter; C.....680;
see also EP.....	614	see also.....	591
Negrin, Juan, arrives in the United States		Subasich, Ivan. See Yugoslavia for a conference with Spanish Republi-		Sullivan, Judge Philip L. See Montgomery cans in this country; EP.....587;		Ward company
see also EP.....		Summers, Clyde, refused admittance to the Places an order for the Aluminum com-		practice of law by the Illinois supreme pany of Canada; EP.....	635	court; EP.....	682
Political arrests and killings increase despite Franco's amnesty announcements;
EP.....586; see also E.....	625
Prieto, L., and the June 10 liberation;
EP.....57; see also J. EP.....	348

T

TVA. See Tennessee valley authority
Taft, Senator Robert A.
Opposes the establishment of a permanent FEPC with enforcement powers; EP.318;
see also C.....	288
Tariffs
President asks for renewal of the trade agreements act; the need for tariff reductions; E.....	375
Senate finance committee eliminates the section on tariff cuts from the reciprocal
trade act; EP.....	662;
see also EP.....	711
Taxation. See Finance, public
Taylor, George W. See War labor board
Taylor, Mrs. Recy
Committee formed to seek punishment of gang who raped her; EP.....	59
Tempest, the. J. W. Krutch; D.....165;
see also.....	309
Tennessee valley authority
Record of D. E. Lilienthal as chairman.
B. C. Shelton; S.....544; see also.....	563
Theater. See Clark, M., Krutch, J. W.,
Marshall, M., for revivals
Thin man goes home. the. J. Agee; MP.....	230
Thomas, R. J. See Labor unions
Three caballeros, the. J. Agee; MP.....	166
Thunderhead, son of Flicka. J. Agee; MP.....	314
Tito (Broz, J.). See Yugoslavia
Tomorrow the world. J. Agee; MP.....	110
Toscanini, Walter
Comments on the visit of Prince Humbert to Bologna; C.....680; see also E.....	505
Toumanova, Tamara. B. H. Haggin; S.....470,	609
Trade. See Business
Trade agreements
Economic charter of the Americas, the.
A. Brenner; S.....267;
see also EP.....	261;
President asks for renewal of the trade
agreements act; E.....	375
Reciprocal trade-agreements act endorsed by a narrow margin in the House Ways and means committee; EP.....587;
see also EP.....	614
Senate finance committee eliminates
the section on tariff cuts from the reciprocal
trade act; EP.....	662;
see also EP.....	711
Wallace, H. A., urges passage of trade agreements act; E.....	476
Tree grows in Brooklyn, a. J. Agee; MP.....	192
Trieste
Yugoslav-Italian dispute, the. I. F. Stone;
S.....	589
Trio, J. W. Krutch; D.....438; 52;
see also EP.....	291
Truman, Harry S.
Administration:
And the State department. I. F. Stone;
S.....637; see also EP.....	633
Announces cabinet changes; E.....	616
Appeals for the continuation of the FEPC on a permanent basis; E.....	663
His message on unemployment compensation; E.....	637
Record of his first month as president.
A. Barth; S.....	563
Supports a salary increase for Congress;
EP.....	662
Portrait. M. Marshall; S.....438;
see also EP.....	432; 436; 520
Trusts. See Monopolies
Tudor, Anthony. B. H. Haggin; S.....	609
Turkey
Enters the war on the allied side. C. G.
Bolté; S.....	239

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
U		Why its work lags. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	378;	Orders arrest of six men for making use of confidential document documents. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	666;
UAW. See United automobile workers of America		You must have something that will fit. R. La Palme; Ct. . . . .	516	see also 667; E. . . . .	683
UNRRA. See United nations relief and rehabilitation administration		United nations war crimes commission		Murphy, R., his relations with J. Le-maigre-Dubreuil and J. Rigaud, French collaborators. P. Stevens; S. . . . .	97
USSR. See Union of soviet socialist republics		Concentration-camp atrocities and the guilt of the German people. Argus; S. . . . .	517;	Program for Germany. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	635
Ubico, Jorge. See Guatemala		See also EP. . . . . 433; EP. . . . .	474;	Should start an educational campaign on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . .	264
Udell, Edith		509; 510; EP. . . . . 530; C. . . . .	537;	Why E. R. Stettinius should be replaced. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	633
Postwar military conscription; C. . . . .	427;	Crimea conference fails to reach accord on punishment of war criminals. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	174	see also EP. . . . .
see also 210; 246; C. . . . . 315;		Dr. Goebbels talks to himself. J. Bornstein; S. . . . .	486;	United States supreme court. See Supreme court, United States
330; C. . . . . 399; C. . . . . 400; C. . . . .	428	Hurst, Sir Cecil, resigns from chairmanship; EP. . . . .	58;	Unknown battle, the. J. Agee; MP. . . . .	110
Uhl, Alexander		see also EP. . . . . 142;	203	Unseen, the. J. Agee; MP. . . . .	469
Testament against fascism	72	Legal aspects of trials for war criminals. R. Vamberg; S. . . . .	567	Up in Central Park. J. W. Krutch; D. . . . .	165
Ullman, Robert J.		Legal case against Hitler, the. R. Lemkin; S. . . . .	205;
Voting procedure in the United nations security council; C. . . . .	611	Legalistic quibbling delays trials; EP. . . . .	586
Unemployment. See Labor		No leniency for the nazi industrialists. M. Hirschberg; S. . . . .	648;
Union democratic. national. See Brazil		see also E. . . . . 648;	635
Union of soviet socialist republics		Pell affair, the. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	203;
American lend-lease shipments reduced following V-E day; E. . . . .	588	Report by R. H. Jackson; E. . . . .	635;
And Austria		see also	648
Renner government. E. K. Winter; S. . . . .	591;	United States
see also C. . . . .	680	Argentina: American recognition of the Farrell regime. A. Haden; S. . . . .	444
Russia's unilateral action in sponsoring a new Austrian provisional government; EP. . . . .	530	And China: American war supplies and Chinese politics; E. . . . .	236
And China: Revolt reported in Sinkiang; background of Russo-Chinese dispute over this region; EP. . . . .	586	And France. See Franco-American relations
Russia fears the rightist shift of the Chungking government; EP. . . . .	475	And Great Britain: Britain fears American competition in the export market. K. Hutchison; S. . . . .	147;
And Czechoslovakia: Czech-Soviet relations unaffected by the issue of Carpatho-Russia; EP. . . . .	114	British criticism of this country. K. Hutchison; S. . . . .	177;
And France: Franco-Soviet pact, the. C. A. Micaud; S. . . . .	150	And Latin America: Post-war economic relations. A. Brenner; S. . . . .	261;
And Japan: Japanese troops move to Manchuria to meet possible Russian attack; EP. . . . .	613	And Spain: Ambassador Armour to seek explanation of weekly arrivals of nazi agents in Spanish cities; EP. . . . .	318
Russia denounces its neutrality pact with the Japanese; E. . . . .	403	Break with Franco now! F. Kirchwey; S. . . . .	475
Strained relations with China affect possibility of Russia's entry into the war with Japan; EP. . . . .	475	France appoints M. Aznar as minister to the Soviet Union; E. . . . .	405
And Poland: Arrest of sixteen Polish leaders, the. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	534;	Mission of P. J. Hurley; EP. . . . .	475
see also EP. . . . .	709	Shall America help Russia to rebuild? E. . . . .	588
British war office refutes charge that Red army halted its drive on Warsaw for political reasons; EP. . . . .	29	Army: And national-service legislation; E. . . . .	31;
Crimea conference to discuss the problem; EP. . . . .	188;	see also	63
see also	292	Conscientious objectors and the case of H. P. Weber; EP. . . . .	171
Ironing out the creases. Low; Ct. . . . .	508	Lifts the bars against the communists. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	238
New Polish government, the; EP. . . . .	710	Post-war conscription. J. S. Nollen; S. . . . .	287;
Pravda attacks Mikolajczyk as anti-Russian; EP. . . . .	198	C. . . . . 315; 330; C. . . . .	399;
Russia asks a seat for the Warsaw government at the San Francisco conference; EP. . . . .	373	C. . . . . 400; C. . . . .	427;
Russian press censorship. E. Seavard; S. . . . .	415	Summers, C., conscientious objector, barred from practice of law by the Illinois supreme court; E. . . . .	682
And Rumania: Russia acts unilaterally in effecting government changes; E. . . . .	319	War department issues an orientation fact sheet on fascism; EP. . . . .	502
Bars entry of Catholic priests; Soviet clergy seen meeting clerical requirements. . . . .	101	Wise up, civilian! R. Fleisher; S. . . . .	207
Expresses suspicions of allied use of German officers in positions of authority in Germany; EP. . . . .	586	Commerce, department of: Wallace, H. A., named by Roosevelt to replace J. H. Jones as secretary. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	116;
Levering attacks Pope Pius as an appeaser; EP. . . . .	318	Stone; S. . . . . 89; see also E. . . . .	116;
Opposes the veto formula for the world security organization; EP. . . . .	633;	117; 146; EP. . . . . 197; EP. . . . .	262
see also EP. . . . .	661	Congress. See Congress
Oumansky, Constantin, death. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . .	115	Lend-lease: Hearings before the House foreign affairs committee; EP. . . . .	170
Political warfare in Hungary and Germany	417	House debate on renewal of act; E. . . . .	320
Relations with the western powers. F. Kirchwey; S. . . . .	684;	Shipments to Russia reduced following V-E day; E. . . . .	588
see also 478; 501;		Navy: King, Admiral E. J., urges a large post-war fleet; EP. . . . .	402
531; 534; 560; 561; 589; C. . . . .	631	Post war: Control of economic pressure groups. S. Chase; S. . . . .	39
Russian view on the problems of colonies and trusteeships. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	561;	Full employment; EP. . . . .	61;
see also	560	see also E. . . . . 477; E. . . . .	559;
Russo-German war. See Russo-German war		EP. . . . . 586; 593; EP. . . . . 634; E. . . . .	664;
Seeks three votes in the proposed general assembly of the United Nations; E. . . . .	375;	Peace-time military conscription. J. S. Nollen; S. . . . .	210;
see also 295; EP. . . . .	373	C. . . . . 287; C. . . . . 315; 330; C. . . . .	399;
Unions, labor. See Labor unions		C. . . . . 400; C. . . . .	427;
United automobile workers of America		Will we return to isolationism? R. Niebuhr; S. . . . .	42;
Start = book club for union members. M. Marshall; S. . . . .	20	State department: And America's international responsibilities; E. . . . .	32;
United mine workers. See Coal		Dooman, E. H., expresses allied policy toward Japan. Pacificus; S. . . . .	128;
United nations conference on international organization. See World war — San Francisco conference		see also	128;
United nations relief and rehabilitation administration		Grew, J. C., and the soft-peace-for-Japan clique. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	666;
Lack of shipping space cuts food shipments to Europe sharply; EP. . . . .	30;	see also 667; E. . . . .	663
see also EP. . . . .	128
Seeks Spanish ships to carry relief materials to Europe; EP. . . . .	197
Suspends relief program for Albania; EP. . . . .	503
We can help to feed Europe; E. . . . .	532

V

Valley of decision, the. J. Agee; MP. . . . .	554
Vamberg, Rustem
Legal aspects of trials for war criminals; S. . . . .	567;
see also	486
Vandenberg, Arthur H.
Attacks Yalta settlement on Poland; E. . . . .	292
Offers a plan for post-war international order; E. . . . .	59;
see also	479
Van Kaa, Herbert
Arms and the peace; C. . . . .	399;
see also 210; 246; C. . . . .	315;
330; C. . . . . 400; C. . . . .	427;
Vargas, Getulio. See Brazil
Vatican. See Roman catholic church
Vercors. See Bruller, Jean
Veterans, war
And the San Francisco conference. C. G. Bolte; S. . . . .	351
Artificial limbs for the disabled. E. M. Maisel; S. . . . .	271
Bradley, General O., succeeds General F. T. Hines as head of the Veterans administration; EP. . . . .	662
House committee to investigate the Veterans' administration; EP. . . . .	374
Negro, and the G. I. bill of rights; EP. . . . .	402
Rankin, J. E., seeks to discredit critics of the Veterans administration; E. . . . .	616
Villarreal, Gualberto. See Bolivia
Vinson, Fred M. See Federal loan administration; War mobilization, office of Violliis, Andrée
Battle of the Rhone, the; S. . . . .	179
Von Papen, Franz. See Germany
Voorhis, Jerry. See Monopolies
Voulgaris, Admiral Petros. See Greece

W

W.L.B. See War labor board
Wages. See Labor
Wagner-Murray-Dingell full employment bill. See Labor — Post-war
Wainer, Samuel
Vargas in modern dress; S. . . . .	277
Walk hard. M. Clark; D. . . . .	24
Wallace, Henry Adger
Calls for the enactment of a full-employment national budget; EP. . . . .	2;
see also E. . . . .	664
Named by Roosevelt to replace J. H. Jones as Secretary of commerce. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	89;
see also E. . . . .	116; 117;
146; EP. . . . .	197; EP. . . . .
Urges passage of trade agreements act; E. . . . .	476
War crimes. See United nations war crimes commission
War department, United States. See United States — Army War effort
Conscription. See Selective service manpower
House and Senate fail to agree on a manpower bill; EP. . . . .	234;
see also EP. . . . .	291; EP. . . . .
May-Bailey work-or-fight bill; E. . . . .	144
National-service legislation; E. . . . .	31;
see also	63
Office of price administration. See Price administration, office of Office of war mobilization. See War mobilization, office of Prices. See Business
Production and labor shortages. I. F. Stone; S. . . . .	63;
see also E. . . . .	31
Strikes. See Labor
Taxation. See Finance, public
War food administration. See War food administration War labor board. See War labor board War, European
America strikes across the Roer in big offensive; EP. . . . .	233;
see also	266
And the policy of unconditional surrender; EP. . . . .	86;
see also 91; EP. . . . .	141
Battle of the Rhone, the. A. Violliis; S. . . . .	179

British-Canadian drive toward the Rhine. C. G. Bolté; S.....	173	Washington square; zoning law amendment urged to prevent erection of skyscrapers around famous New York park; EP.....	318	Germany. See Germany — Post war
Damage inflicted on German industrial centers; EP.....	474	Wavell, General Viscount. See Great Britain — Anglo-Indian relations		Inflation in Europe. F. Sternberg; S.....	16
German offensive in Belgium, the; failure of the allied intelligence services, the; EP.....2; see also EP.....30;	34	Weber, Henry P.; court-martialed for refusal to drill; EP.....	171	Japan. See Japan — Post-war
Germans lack manpower to stem both American and Russian advances; EP.....	317	Wechsler, James A.		Land reforms in eastern Europe; EP.....	234
Germans seen preparing to fight in the southern national redoubt. C. G. Bolté; S.....	407	Lewis and the coal wage conflict; S..... 353; see also E.....263; EP.....	432	Plan for international order offered by A. H. Vandenberg; E.....59; see also.....	479
Germans will probably fight delaying action around Cologne while their troops withdraw to the east bank of the Rhine; EP.....233; see also.....	266	Welles, Sumner		Politics of world security, the. G. Kirk; S.....	120
Italy:		New hope for the Jewish people; S.....511; see also.....	561	Soldier's view, a. L. E. Holt; C.....	83
Capture of Bologna; activity of the partisans; EP.....475; see also E.....	505	Wheeler, Burton K.		V-day and revolution. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....304; see also C.....555; EP.....613,	614
Juncture of Russian and allied forces imminent. C. G. Bolté; S.....481; see also E.....	505	Condemns Russian claims to Polish land east of the Curzon line; EP.....	86	Prisoners:
Kesseling replaces von Rundstedt as commander of the German army in western Europe. J. Joesten; S.....	354	When strangers marry. J. Agee; MP.....	395	Concentration-camp atrocities and the guilt of the German people. Argus; S.....517; see also EP.....474; 481; 509; 510; EP.....530; C.....537; 579; C.....	680
Oder and Rhine crossings, the. C. G. Bolté; S.....294; see also E.....	345	Wherry, Kenneth S. See Business — Prices		German treatment of, reveals open violation of the Geneva convention; EP.....	374
Patton's forces cross the Moselle west of Coblenz; EP.....	317	White, John W.		San Francisco conference:
Role of air power in the allied offensive against Germany. C. G. Bolté; S.....	266	Fascist bridgehead in Bolivia; S.....	333	Admission of Argentina. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....507; see also EP.....402; E.....417; E.....444; 501; EP.....502; 531; 559;	637
Roosevelt as strategist. C. G. Bolté; S.....	434	Torture in Argentina; S.....248; see also EP.....	234	And full employment. I. F. Stone; S.....478; see also EP.....	634
Ruhr front collapses, the. C. G. Bolté; S.....	379	Whitney, Vincent H.		And the Trieste crisis. I. F. Stone; S.....589	589
V-E day; E.....529; see also EP.....	530	Citizens' army, a; C.....400; see also 210; 246; C.....287; C.....315; 330; C.....399; C.....427; C.....	428	Anti-Russian undertow. I. F. Stone; S.....534; see also 478; 501; 531; 560; 561; 589; C.....	706
Who are the partisans? M. Bracker; S.....	273	Wide prospect, the. R. Jarrell; P.....	222	Choosing the seat of the new international organization. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	617
Why Germany lost. H. A. DeWeerd; S.....	671	Wiley, Alexander		Delegates admit that an inter-allied council should have been created to prepare for meeting. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	617
Why the Nazis fight on. F. Sternberg; S.....	100	Opposes passage of trade agreements act; E.....	476	For a big-power peace. F. I. Schuman; S.....479; see also.....	473
See also Russo-German war		William and Mary college		International bill of rights. S. Welles; S.....	511
War food administration		Student paper censored for publication of an editorial advocating racial equality; EP.....	199	Mediocre leadership. I. F. Stone; S.....	506
To be headed by C. P. Anderson; E.....616; see also.....	378; 406	Williams, Aubrey		Oil and the Arab delegation. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....	617
War information, office of		Senate refuses to confirm his appointment as head of the Rural electrification administration; E.....	349	Polish issue, the; E.....292; see also EP.....373; Ct. 508; 534; 589; EP.....709; EP.....	710
Davis, E., testifies before House committee on need of continuing bureau's European activities. C. G. Bolté; S.....	690; see also EP.....	Wilson, Walter		Reactionary leadership of the American State department. I. F. Stone; S.....	633
War labor board		Words from G. B. Shaw on war and peace; C.....	258	Russia and the west. F. Kirchwey; S.....684; see also 478; 501; 531; 534; 560; 561; 589; C.....	706
House appropriations committee denies its jurisdiction over agricultural laborers; EP.....	711	Winged victory. J. Agee; MP.....	24	Russia asks a seat for the Warsaw government; EP.....	373
Refuses to adjust the Little steel wage formula; EP.....	235	Winter, Ernst Karl		Spanish issue, the; EP.....402; see also Ct.....376; Ct.....488; 501; EP.....503; 531; 559; EP.....586; EP.....587; EP.....614;	711
Second hold-the-line report; EP.....	402	Austria: test for the coalition; S.....591; see also EP.....530; C.....	680	Trustships. I. F. Stone; S.....561; see also 478; 511; E.....533; 560; EP.....	710
Taylor, George W., named chairman; EP.....	290	Wireless. See Radio		Veto, the; EP.....633; see also EP.....	661
War mobilization, office of		Wise, Sidney		Voting procedure in the security organization; E.....375; see also 295; EP.....373; 531; C.....	611
Byrnes, J. F., favors national-service legislation; E.....31; see also.....	63	Will Franco fall? S.....	484	What it can accomplish. P. E. Corbett; S.....482; see also E.....473; E.....588; Ct.....	713
Vinson, F. M., indorses the full-employment bill; EP.....634; see also E.....	664	Without love. J. Agee; MP.....	395	What to do with Germany and Japan. I. F. Stone; S.....	478
War, Pacific		Witton, Catherine J.		Winds up its work; its achievements evaluated; EP.....	709
Account of a campaign. Major; C.....	499	Announces the formation of an organization in Massachusetts affiliated with the National citizens political action committee; C.....	83	World court, the. E. F. Kirchwey; S.....	641
Allied strategy for the final phases. C. G. Bolté; S.....	639	Wolseley, R. E.		World labor in attendance. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....536; see also E.....235; 304	264
American naval officers seen planning landings on the China coast; EP.....	613	Comments on J. Agee's article on atrocity films; C.....680; see also.....	579	Yalta and San Francisco. F. Kirchwey; S.....201; see also.....	264
B-29 raids on Japan; EP.....318; see also EP.....	585	Workers' defense league		Unconditional surrender; EP.....86; see also.....	91
Carrier-based air attacks on Japan, the. C. G. Bolté; S.....	202	Urges the passage of the FEPC bill without the Taft amendment; C.....	288	War crimes. See United nations war crimes commission
Effective national government in China is essential to an early victory; E.....	533	World court. See World War — San Francisco conference		Wounded woman speaks, a. M. F. Translated from the Yugoslav by E. Sharin; P.....	96
Great Britain's role. J. Fromm; S.....	409	World trade union congress. See Labor unions
How long will it last? C. G. Bolté; S.....	239	World war		Y
Iwo Jima campaign, the; S.....202; see also.....	239	Crimea conference:		Yalta conference. See World War — Crimea conference
Japanese reported withdrawing troops from China in preparation for American landings; EP.....	662	And France; E.....169; see also EP.....198	198	Young, Consuelo C.
Liberation of Manila, the; EP.....	142	And Poland. I. F. Stone; S.....174; see also EP.....86; EP.....198; E.....	292	Urges support for the federal-aid-to-education bill; C.....287; see also C.....	258
Luzon landing, the. C. G. Bolté; S.....	62	Attacked by the German propagandists. Argus; S.....	250	Yugoslavia
See also EP.....	85	Issues that will be fought at San Francisco, the. F. Kirchwey; S.....	264	And the Trieste crisis. I. F. Stone; S.....	589
Map attack against Japan proper? E.....	533	Military decisions. C. G. Bolté; S.....	173	Churchill defends the policy of the British government toward Tito; E.....	58
News from Manchurian front stresses Japan's hopeless position; EP.....	557	Rumania: first test of the Yalta decisions; E.....	319	Contributions asked for relief ship. L. Adamic; C.....	139
Okinawa campaign, the; EP.....373; see also EP.....585; 639		This is what we voted for. I. F. Stone; S.....174; see also.....	169	King Peter dismisses Premier Subasich; EP.....	58
Philippine campaign almost at an end as Americans complete the occupation of Mindanao; EP.....	585	What policy will Roosevelt carry to the meeting? E.....	143
Problems of redeployment; E.....	533	Yalta and San Francisco. F. Kirchwey; S.....201; see also.....	264
Roosevelt as strategist. C. G. Bolté; S.....	434	Dumbarton Oaks conference:
Russia denounces the Soviet-Japanese neutrality pact; may fight in the Pacific; E.....403; see also EP.....475; EP.....	613	And world federation. W. T. Parth; C.....	555
Stiwell, General J. W., to command the Tenth army; EP.....	710	Soviet position on voting procedure in the security council. I. F. Stone; S.....	295
War, world. See World war		State department should start an educational campaign on the world security proposals. F. Kirchwey; S.....	264
Warren, Avra M.		Suggested improvements in the plan. R. Niebuhr; S.....	382
Becomes director of the Office of inter-American affairs.....	157	What hope for small powers? P. Malles; S.....	241
Warren, Earl. See California		Post-war reconstruction:
Washington letters (articles by I. F. Stone)		America's international responsibility. R. Niebuhr; S.....42; see also E.....	32
7, 35, 146, 174, 203, 238, 295, 322, 350, 378, 406, 436, 478, 506, 534, 561, 589, 637, 666, 687		Anglo-American differences. K. Hutchison; S.....	65
		Bretton Woods monetary plan, the; EP.....171; see also 237; EP.....289; EP.....290; E.....348; E.....431; EP.....	661

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject. The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

A

PAGE

- Abrams, Charles; R ..... 724
Adams, Mildred; R ..... 576
Advertising smoke screen, the; B. Clark; B. 107
Aesthetic adventure, the; W. Gaunt; B. 698
Against the current; the life of Karl Heinzen.
C. Wittke; B ..... 163
Age of thunder; F. Prokosch; B. 368
Aladdin's lamp; G. Munson; B. 677
All embarrassed; W. Steig; B. 256
American chronicle; R. S. Baker; B. 677
American education under fire. V. T. Thayer; B ..... 393
America's far eastern policy. T. A. Bisson; B ..... 280
America's role in the world economy. A. H. Hansen; B ..... 452
Angel in the forest; M. Young; B. 547
Apartment in Athens; G. Wescott; B. 312
Apel, Willi, and others
Harvard dictionary of music, the; B. 659
Are men equal? H. A. Myers; B. 456
Argentine republic, the; Y. F. Rennie; B. 548
Armistice, 1918. H. R. Rudin; B. 78
Artist in Iowa. D. Garwood; B. 282
Arvin, Newton; R. .... 548
Athley, Isabella W.; R. .... 462
Auden, W. H.
Collected poetry; B ..... 605

B

- Baker, Ray Stannard
American chronicle; B ..... 677
Balkan background; B. Newman; B. 254
Balkan federation: A history of the movement toward Balkan unity in modern times. L. S. Stavrianos; B ..... 19
Ballad and the source, the; R. Lehmann; B. 422
Barnouw, A. J.; R ..... 161
Barzun, Jacques
Teacher in America; B. .... 520
Bates, Ralph; R. .... 22, 161, see also correction, 228, 191, 281, 494, 522, 548, 724
Baudelaire, A. criticism; J. D. Bennett; B. 78
Bell for Adano, a; J. Hersey; B. .... 606
Bennett, Joseph D.
Baudelaire, A. criticism; B. .... 78
Bentley, Eric Russell; R. .... 78, 135, 163
Bentley, Gertrude Eades
Shakespeare and Jonson: their reputations in the seventeenth century compared; B. 310
Berrien, William; R. .... 419
Best plays of 1943-44 and the year book of the drama in America, Edited by Burns Mantle; B ..... 78
Beveridge, William H.
Full employment in a free society; B. 251
Bible and the common reader, the; M. E. Chase; AN ..... 522 Bisson, T. A.
America's far eastern policy; B. .... 280
Risson, T. A.; R. .... 23, 108, 255, 311, 522, 627
Black boy. R. Wright; B. .... 390
Black widow. R. W. Thorp and W. D. Woodson; B ..... 254
Bogan, Louise; R ..... 454
Bonsal, Stephen
When the French were here; B. .... 280
Borgese, G. A.; R. .... 654
Bornstein, Joseph; R. .... 78, 226, 340
Botkin, B. A.
Treasury of American folklore, a; B. 447
Bourke-White, Margaret
They called it Purple Heart Valley; B. .... 50
Bowers, Claude G.
Young Jefferson, the; B. .... 307
Brainstrom, C. Brown; B. .... 106
Brandt, Karl D.
Reconstruction of world agriculture; B. 458
Brazilian literature. E. Verissimo; B. .... 419
Briefco, Olga
Cocks and bulls in Caracas; B. .... 494
Brines, Russell
Until they eat stones; B. .... 23
Bromfield, Louis
Pleasant valley; AN ..... 464
Brown, Carlton
Brainstrom; R. .... 106
Brown, Ralph Adams; R. 189, 280, 393, 677, 702
Burt, Struthers
Philadelphia: Holy experiment; AN ..... 464
Butler, Charles Edward
Cut is the branch; B ..... 605

C

- Caldwell, Erskine
Tragic ground; B. .... 134
Can democracy recover? L. Marlio; B. .... 578

- Cannery row. J. Steinbeck; B. .... 75;
see also ..... 131
Capitalism and slavery. E. Williams; B. .... 226
Chaim Weizmann, statesman and scientist.
Edited by M. Weisgal; B. .... 50
Chamberlain, Eli; R. .... 19
Chase, Mary Ellen
Bible and the common reader; AN ..... 522
Chase, Stuart
Democracy under pressure: Special interests vs. the public welfare; B. .... 224
Chase, Stuart; R. .... 564; see also R. .... 489
China among the powers. D. Rowe; B. .... 255
China to me. E. Hahn; B. .... 108
Chinese labor movement, the. N. Wales; B. 162
Christman, Henry
Tin horns and calico; B. .... 366
City of trembling leaves, the. W. Van T. Clardel; B ..... 702
Clark, B.
Clark, Blake
Advertising smoke screen, the; B. .... 107
Clark, Walter Van Tilburg
City of trembling leaves, the; B. .... 702
Clausen, Paul
Satin slipper, the; AN ..... 452;
see also ..... 363
Coaching roads of old New England; their inns and taverns and their stories. G. F. Marlowe; B ..... 393
Cocks and bulls in Caracas. O. Briccio; B. 494
Cohen, Morris R.
Preface to logic; a; B. .... 134
Coleman, McAlister; R. 107, 134, 190, 227, 340
Collected poetry. W. H. Auden; B. .... 605
Colly, Maurice
Land of the great image, the; B. .... 546
Colonial agents of the southern colonies, the. E. Lonn; B ..... 702
Colum, Mary M.
From these roots: the ideas that have made modern literature; B ..... 135
Comfort, Alex
Power house, the; B. .... 368
Completion of independence, the, 1790-1830. J. A. Krout and D. R. Fox; B. .... 189
Conant, Roger, biography. Shipton, C. K.; AN ..... 522
Conover, and his world. H. Kester; B. 340
Crowley, Bartlett, and H. W. Williams, Jr.
William Sidney Mount; B. .... 51
Cradle will fall, the. S. Seley; B. .... 466
Croce, Benedetto
Politics and morals; B. .... 310
Crossroads of two continents. F. Gross; B. 392
Crying at the lock. A. Rumsey; B. .... 163
Cunningham press
Comment on F. W. Dupeue's review of "Land of unlikeness" by R. Lowell. H. Duncan; C. .... 259; see also R. .... 159
Cut is the branch. C. E. Butler; B. .... 605

D

- Daniels, Josephus
Wilson era, the: Years of peace, 1910-1917; B ..... 22
De la Torre, Lillian
Elizabeth is missing; B. .... 676
Democracy under pressure: Special interests vs. the public welfare. S. Chase; B. 224
Devil's share, the. D. de Rougemont; B. 188
Dodgson, Charles L., biography. F. B. Lennon; B ..... 458
Dorson, Frederick
History of music in performance: The art of musical interpretation from the renaissance to our day; B. .... 659
Douglass, Lloyd C.
Robe, the; B ..... 279
Dubin, Joseph W.
Green star, the; B. .... 367
Duffield, Marcus; R ..... 50, 366, 420
Duncan, Harry
Comments on F. W. Dupeue's review of "Land of unlikeness" by R. Lowell. C. Duncan; C. .... 259; see also R. .... 159
Duncan, Kunigunde, and D. F. Nichols
Mentor Graham: The man who taught Lincoln; B ..... 253 Dupeue, F. W.; R. .... 159;
see also C. .... 259, 225, 464, 421, 605
Duranty, Walter, and M. Loos
Return to the vineyard; B. .... 283

E

- Earhart, Mary
Frances Willard, from prayers to politics; T. B. .... 190
Economic order and religion, the. F. Knight and T. Merriam; B. .... 280
Efron, David, G. Soule, and N. T. Ness
Latin America in the future world; B. .... 191
Einstein, Alfred
Mozart: His character, his work; B. 285, 630
Elizabeth is missing. L. de la Torre; B. .... 676
End of all men, the. C. F. Ramuz; B. .... 163
Engelman, Uriah Zevi
Rise of the Jew in the western world; B. 701
England in the eighteenth-century: Toward a social basis for freedom. H. M. Lynd; B ..... 310

- Ensor, R. C. K.
Miniature history of the war, a; B. .... 522
Essays in musical analysis: chamber music. D. F. Tovey. With a preface by H. J. Foss; B. .... 285; see also ..... 371
Eulau, Heinz; R. .... 135
Europe free and united. A. Guérard; B. .... 654
Everson, William
War elegies; B ..... 605
Ezekiel, Mordecai; R ..... 251

F

- Fergusson, Harvey
Home in the west; B. .... 227
Fighting liberal. G. W. Norris; B. .... 675
Fischer, Markosha; R. .... 384
Fisher, Vardis
Golden rooms, the; B. .... 163
Five young American poets, third series, 1944. New directions; B. .... 159
Fleisher, Wilfrid
What to do with Japan; B. .... 311
Folded leaf, the. W. Maxwell; B. .... 466
Forman, Harrison
Report from red China; B. .... 338
Fox, Dixon Ryan, and J. A. Krout
Completion of independence, the, 1790-1830; B. .... 189
France
Toor's new guide to Mexico. F. Toor; B. .... 366
Frances Willard, from prayers to politics. M. Earhart; B ..... 190
Frankenstein, Ernst
Justice for my people; B. .... 701
Fraser, Benjamin
Germany between two wars; B. .... 226
French revolution, the. J. M. Thompson; B. 452
From these roots: the ideas that have made modern literature. M. M. Colum; B. .... 135
Frost, Robert
Skease of reason, a; B. .... 464
Full employment in a free society. W. H. Beveridge; B ..... 251

G

- Garwood, Darrell
Artist in Iowa; B. .... 282
Gaunt, William
Aesthetic adventure, the; B. .... 698
Generation of journey. J. Sloan; B. .... 605
Germany, a winter's tale. H. Heine. English version by H. Salinger; B. .... 163
Germany between two wars. L. Fraser; B. 226
Ghostly lover, the. E. Hardwick; AN ..... 522
Gide, André
Hamlet: Edition bilingue; B. .... 456
Ginzburg, Benjamin; R ..... 224, 700
Gluck, Sheldon
War criminals: Their prosecution and punishment; B ..... 51
Godden, Rumer
Take three tenses: A fugue in time; B. 394
Gold and the gold standard. E. W. Kemmerer; B ..... 189
Golden rooms, the. V. Fisher; B. .... 163
Gordon, George
Shakespearean comedy and other studies; B. 50
Gordon, J. King; R ..... 492
Graham, Mentor, biography. K. Duncan and F. Nichols; B ..... 253
Green star, the. J. W. Dubin; B. .... 367
Greenberg, Clement; R ..... 51, 256, 396, 469
Gross, Felix
Crossroads of two continents; B. .... 392
Guérard, Albert
Europe free and united; B. .... 654
Guérard, Albert; R ..... 22, 367, 452
Guns for Tito. L. Huot; B. .... 420
Gunther, John
Troubled midnight, the; B. .... 283

H

- H. D.
Walls do not fall, the; B. .... 421
Haberman, Helen
How about tomorrow morning? B. .... 550
Hagen, Victor
South America called them; B. .... 281
Haggin, B. H.; R. .... 285, 371, 527, 582, 630, 659
Hahn, Emily
China to me; B. .... 108
Hamlet: Edition bilingue. Traduction nouvelle d'André Gide; B ..... 456
Hansen, Alvin H.
America's role in the world economy; B. 452
Hardwick, Elizabeth
Ghostly lover, the; AN ..... 522
Harvard dictionary of music, the. W. Apel and others; B ..... 659 Havek, Friedrich A.
Road to serfdom; B. .... 489, 564
Heine, Heinrich
Germany, a winter's tale. English version by H. Salinger; B. .... 163
Heinzen, Karl, biography. C. Wittke; B. .... 163
Herman Melville: Selected poems. Edited by F. O. Matthiessen; B. .... 225
Hermens, Ferdinand A.
Comments on F. W. Dupeue's review of his book, "The tyrants' war and the people's peace"; C. .... 83; see also C. .... 84

	PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Hertz, Frederick		Lowell, Robert		Our American neighbors. Prepared by the Nationality in history and politics; B.....	460	Land of unlikeness; B.....	159;	Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American	494
Hersey, John		see also C.....	259	affairs; AN.....
Bell for Adano, a; B.....	406	Ludwig, Emil		Our jungle diplomacy. W. F. Sands, in col-
Hill, F. F.; R.....	658	Moral conquest of Germany, the; B.....	701	laboration with J. M. Lalley; B.....	22
History of music in performance: the art of		Lynd, Helen Merrell		P musical interpretation from the renaissance		England in the eighteen-eighties: Toward a		Paine, Thomas, biography. W. E. Woodward;
to our day. F. Dorian; B.....	659	social basis for freedom; B.....	310	B.....	723
Home in the west. H. Fergusson; B.....	227	M		Paine, Thomas, selected works. Edited by
Hook, Sidney; R.....	108, 280, 393, 603	MacLennan, Hugh		H. Fast; B.....	340
Hopi way, the. L. Thompson and A. Joseph;		Two solitudes; B.....	227	Palinurus
B.....	282	McWilliams, Carey; R.....	456	Unquiet grave, the; B.....	187, 200
House in Clewe street, the; B.....	702	Maiden voyage. D. Welch; B.....	462	Patients have families. H. B. Richardson; B.....	282
How about tomorrow morning? H. Haberman; B.....	550	Maki, John M.		Paul, Elliot
Howard, Robert West		Japanese militarism: Its cause and cure; B.....	627	I'll hate myself in the morning and Summer
Two billion acre farm; B.....	392	Marlio, Louis		in December; B.....	16
Huot, Louis		Marlowe, George Francis		Pepper, from the. C. H. Woodward; B.....	103
Guns for Tito; B.....	420	Coaching roads of old New England; their		Philadelphia lawyer; B.....	1
Hutchinson, Keith; R.....	76, 189, 226, 310, 366, 452, 489; see also R.....	inns and taverns and their stories; B.....	393	Perry, Ralph Barton
I		Marsh, Donald Bailey		Puritanism and democracy; B.....	603
I'll hate myself in the morning and Summer		Taxes without tears; B.....	628	Philadelphia lawyer. G. W. Pepper; B.....	134
in December. E. Paul; B.....	163	Marshall, Margaret; R.....	75, 131	Philadelphia: Holy experiment. S. Burt; AN.....	424
Intelligent America's guide to the peace, an.		134, 187, 220, 253, 447, 279, 546, 652;	675	Phoenix and the tortoise, the. K. Rexroth;	461
Edited by S. Welles; B.....	79	Masque of reason, a. R. Frost; B.....	464	B.....
Irving, Washington, his western journals.		Matthiessen, F. O.; R.....	22	Pipe night. J. O'Hara; B.....	652
Edited and annotated by J. F. McDermott; B.....	283	Maxwell, William		Plainville, U. S. A. J. West; B.....	368
It's always tomorrow. R. St. John; B.....	22	Folded eaf, the; B.....	466	Plastic art and pure plastic art. P. Mondrian.
J		Mentor Graham. The man who taught Lin-		Edited by R. Motherwell and H. Holtz-
Japanese militarism: Its cause and cure.		coln. K. Duncan and D. F. Nichols; B.....	253	man; B.....	396, 469
J. M. Maki; B.....	627	Merriam, Thornton and D. F. Knight		Pleasant valley. L. Bromfield; AN.....	464
Jefferson, Thomas, biography. C. G. Bowers;	307	Economic order and religion, the; B.....	280	Poems. J. B. Shank; B.....	605
Jensen, Vernon H.		Merton, Thomas		Politics and morals. B. Croce; B.....	310
Lumber and labor; B.....	281	Middle span, the. G. Santayana; B.....	548	Power house, the. A. Comfort; B.....	368
Joseph, Alice, and L. Thompson		Miller, Arthur		Pratt, Theodore
Hopi way, the; B.....	282	Situation normal; B.....	50	Miss Dilly says no; B.....	283
Joyce, James		Million homes a year, a. D. Rosenman; B.....	724	Preface to logic, a. M. R. Cohen; B.....	134
Stephen Hero. A part of the first draft		Miniature history of the war, a. R. C. K.	522	Prokosh, Frederic of Portrait of the artist as a young man.		Mishnure, Virginia; R.....	282	Age of thunder; B.....	368
Edited by T. Spencer; B.....	106	Miss Dilly says no. T. Pratt; B.....	283	Prosperity. We can have it if we want it.
Justice for my people. E. Frankenstein; B.....	701	Mission of the university. J. Ortega y Gasset.		Report from the. C. H. Forman; B.....	338
K		Translated by H. L. Nostrand; B.....	108	Public debt, the. W. Withers; B.....	200
Kahl, George M.		Moats, Alice Leone		Puritanism and democracy. R. B. Perry; B.....	603
Tobias Smollett: Traveler-novelist; B.....	628	No passport for Paris; B.....	724	R
Kemmerer, Edwin W.		Mondrian, Piet		Ramuz, C. F.
Gold and the gold standard; B.....	189	Plastic art and pure plastic art. Edited by		End of all men, the; B.....	163
Kendrick, Alexander R.....	384;	R. Motherwell and H. Holtzmann;	396, 469	Yellow magic: the story of penicillin; B.....	522 see also R.....	419	B.....		Reconstruction of world agriculture, the. K.
Kennedy, Gail; R.....	520	Moore, B. Mitchell; R.....	227	Brandt; B.....	458
Kennedy, Van Dusen		Mount, William Sidney, biography. B. Cow-	282	Rennie, Ysabel F.
Union policy and incentive wage methods;	495	drey and H. W. Williams, Jr.; B.....	51	Argentine republic, the; B.....	548
Kesten, Hermann		Mozart: His character, his work. A. Einstein;	630	Report on the Russians. W. L. White;	319
Copernicus and his world; B.....	340	B.....	285, 582,	B.....	384, 419
Knight, Frank, and T. Merriam		Munson, Gorham		Return to the vineyard. M. Loos and W.
Economic order and religion, the; B.....	280	Mystics, Shelley Smith		Duranty; B.....	283
Koestler, Arthur		Myers, Henry Alonzo		Phoenix and the tortoise, the; B.....	421
Yogi and the commissar, the, and other		Are men equal? B.....	456	Richardson, Henry B.
essays; B.....	723	N		Patients have families; B.....	282
Krout, John Allen, and D. R. Fox		Nathan, George Jean		Rise of the Jew in the western world. U. Z.
Completion of independence, the, 1790-	189	Theater book of the year, 1943-44, the;	78	Engelman; B.....	701
1830; B.....	189	Nationality in history and politics. F. Hertz;	460	Risad, from the. W. White; B.....	456
Krutch, Joseph Wood; R.....	254, 310, 676	B.....		Roane, Marianne
L		Ness, Norman T., G. Soule, and D. Efron	460	Years before the flood; B.....	628
Laidler, Harry W.		Latin America in the future world; B.....	191	Robe, the. L. C. Douglas; B.....	279
Social-economic movements; B.....	492	Neurologist's point of view, the. I. S.		Roger Conant - a founder of Massachusetts.
Land of the great image, the. M. Collis; B.....	456	Wechsler; B.....	494	Rojas, Ricardo
Land of unlikeness. R. Lowell; B.....	159;	Newman, Bernard		San Martin, knight of the Andes; B.....	576
see also C.....	259	Balkan background; B.....	254	Romance of English literature, the. Edited
Latin America in the future world; B.....	191	Nichols, D. F., and K. Duncan		by W. J. Turner. Introduction by K.
D. Efron, and N. T. Ness; B.....	191	Mentor Graham: The man who taught	253	O'Brien; B.....	454
Lattimore, Owen		Niebuhr, Reinhold; R.....	30, 188, 280, 310	Root, Waverly
Solution in Asia; B.....	311	No passport for Paris. A. L. Moats; B.....	704	Secret history of the war, the. Two vol-
Lavin, Mary		No traveler returns. H. Shoskes. Edited by	366	umes; B.....	161; see also correction.....	228
House in Clewe street, the; B.....	702	C. Riess; B.....		Rosenberger, Coleman; R.....	723
Lebowitz, Martin; R.....	456, 494, 547, 723	Normano, J. F.		Rosenman, Dorothy
Lehmann, Rosamond		Spirit of Russian economics, the; B.....	135	Million homes a year, a; B.....	724
Ballad and the source, the; B.....	422	Norris, George W.		Rougemont, Denis de
Lennon, Florence Becker		Fighting liberal; B.....	675	Devil's share, the; B.....	188
Historia through the looking-glass; B.....	458	Noves, Charles E.; R.....	255, 628,	Rowe, David
Letters of Thomas J. Wise to John Henry		O		China among the powers; B.....	255
Wrenn: A further inquiry into the guilt		O'Hara, John		Rudnik, Harry R.
of certain nineteenth century forgers.		Pipe night; B.....	368	Armistice, 1918; B.....	78
Edited by F. E. Ratchford; B.....	47	One America. Edited by F. J. Brown and		Ruml, Beardsley
Lidov, Arthur; R.....	282	J. S. Roucek; B.....	578	Tomorrow's business; B.....	76
Vigil of a nation, the; B.....	180;	Open city, the. S. S. Mydans; B.....	283	Rumsey, Adeline
see also 324; 359; C.....	471	Ortega y Gasset, the. Translated by	108	Crying at the lock; B.....	163
Lindt, Peter M.		H. L. Nostrand; B.....		S
Schriftsteller im exil; AN.....	109	O		St. John, Robert
London music in 1888-889. G. B. Shaw; B.....	371	O'Hara, John		It's always tomorrow; B.....	283
Lonn, Ella		Pipe night; B.....	368	San Martin, knight of the Andes. R. Rojas;
Colonial agents of the southern colonies,		One America. Edited by F. J. Brown and		Sands, William Franklin, in collaboration
the; B.....	702	J. S. Roucek; B.....	578	with J. M. Lalley
London Mary, and W. Duranty		Open city, the. S. S. Mydans; B.....	283	Our jungle diplomacy; B.....	22
Return to the vineyard; B.....	283	Ortega y Gasset, the. Translated by	108	Santayana, George
Lorwin, Lewis		H. L. Nostrand; B.....		Middle span; B.....	548
Time to plan; B.....	548	O		Satin slipper, the. P. Claudel; AN.....	452;

PAGE		PAGE		PAGE
Secret history of the war, the. Two volumes. W. Root; B.....161; see also correction.....228		They called it Purple Heart Valley. M. Bourke-White; B.....50		War criminals: Their prosecution and punish- ment. S. Glueck; B.....51
Security in the Pacific. Report prepared by the Institute of Pacific relations; B.....724		Thirty poems. T. Merton; B.....159		War elegies. W. Everson; B.....605
Selected work of Thomas Paine, the. Edited by H. Fast; B.....340		Thompson, Laura, and A. Joseph.....452		Waring, P. Alston; R.....392
Seley, Stephen.....466		Thompson, J. M.....282		Wars I have seen. G. Stein; B.....339; see also.....697
Cradle will fall, the; B.....466		Thomson, Virgil.....527		Wechsler, I. S.....494
Senior, John; R.....458, 495, 522, 628		Musical scene, the; B.....527		Wedge, the. W. C. Williams; B.....421
Shank, Jon Beck.....605		Thorp, Raymond W., and W. D. Woodson.....254		Wedgwood, C. V.....161
Shakespeare and Jonson: Their reputations in the seventeenth century compared. G. E. Bentley; B.....310		Three who loved. E. Morris; B.....227		William the silent; B.....161
Shakespearean comedy and other studies. G. Gordon; B.....50		Through Japanese eyes. O. D. Tolischus; B.....522		Weizmann, Chaim, symposium on his life and work. Edited by M. Weisgal; B.....50
Shaw, George Bernard.....285; see also.....371		Time to plan. L. Lorwin; B.....548		Welch, Denton.....462
Shields, Murray, and D. B. Woodward.....700		Tin horns and calico. H. Christman; B.....366		Wescott, Glenway.....312
Shipton, Clifford K.....522		Tobias Smollett: Traveler-novelist. G. M. Kahrl; B.....628		Apartment in Athens; B.....312
Roger Conant — a founder of Massachu- setts; AN.....522		Tolischus, Otto D.....522		Plainville, U. S. A.; B.....652
Shoskes, Henry.....366		Tom Paine: America's godfather. W. E. Woodward; B.....723		Western journals of Washington Irving. Edited and annotated by J. F. McDer- mott; B.....22
No traveler returns. Edited by C. Riess; Situation normal. A. Miller; B.....50		Tomorrow's business. B. Ruml; B.....76		What to do with Japan. W. Fleisher; B.....311
Sloan, Jacob.....605		Tor, Frances.....366		When the French were here. S. Bonsal; B.....280
Generation of journey; B.....605		Torre, Lillian de la.....676		White, Morton G.; R.....134
Smollett, Tobias, biography. G. M. Kahrl; B.....628		Tovey, Donald Francis.....371		White, Walter.....456
Snow, Edgar; R.....180; see also 324, 359; C.....471		Essays in musical analysis; chamber music. With a preface by H. J. Foss; B.....285, 371		White, William L.....384, 419
Social-economic movements. H. W. Laidler; B.....492		Musical articles from the Encyclopedia Britannica. With a preface by H. J. Foss; B.....285, 371		Whitman, Walt, selections from his poetry and prose. Edited with an introduction by S. Sillen; B.....215
Solution in Asia. O. Lattimore; B.....311		Tragic ground. E. Caldwell; B.....134		Wild, Elizabeth; R.....366
Soule, George, D. Efron, and N. T. Ness.....191		Treasure of American folklore, a. B. A. Bodkin; B.....447		Willard, Frances, biography. M. Earhart; B.....190
Latin America in the future world; B.....191		Trilling, Diana; R.....163, 227, 283, 312, 394, 422, 466, 522, 550, 606, 628, 702		William Sidney Mount. B. Cowdrey and H. W. Williams, Jr.; B.....51
South America called them. V. W. von Hagen; B.....281		Trilling, Lionel; R.....47, 106, 215, 390		William the silent. C. V. Wedgwood; B.....161
Spirit of Russian economics, the. J. F. Nor- mano; B.....135		Troubled midnight, the. J. Gunther; B.....283		Williams, Eric.....226
Stavrianos, L. S.....19		Two billion acre farm. R. W. Howard; B.....392		Williams, Hermann Warner, Jr., and B. Cowdrey.....51
Balkan federation: A history of the move- ment toward Balkan unity in modern times; B.....19		Two solitudes. H. MacLennan; B.....227		William Sidney Mount; B.....51
Steig, William.....256				Williams, William Carlos.....421
All embarrassed; B.....256		U		Wedge, the; B.....421
Stein, Gertrude.....339; see also.....697		Union policy and incentive wage methods. V. D. Kennedy; B.....187, 220		Wilson era, the: Years of peace, 1910-1917. J. Daniels; B.....22
Steinbeck, John.....131		Unquiet grave, the. Palanurus; B.....187, 220		Winter sea, the. A. Tate; B.....464
Cannery row; B.....75; see also.....131		Until they eat stones. R. Brines; B.....23		Withers, William.....255
Stephen Hero. J. Joyce. A part of the first draft of Portrait of the artist as a young man. Edited by T. Spencer; B.....106		V		Public debt, the; B.....255
Stewart, Maxwell S.; R.....280, 311, 338, 548, 724		Vamberg, Rustem.....419		Witte, Carl.....163
Strangers in India. P. Moon; B.....495		Defends his review of "The tyrants' war and the people's peace" by F. A. Her- mens; C.....84; see also C.....83		Against the current: the life of Karl Heinzen; B.....282
T		Vamberg, Rustem; R.....254, 460, 701		Wood, Grant, biography. D. Garwood; B.....282
Taft, Philip; R.....281, 495		Verisimo, Eric.....419		Black widow; B.....254
Take three tenses: A fugue in time. R. Godden; B.....394		Brazilian literature; B.....419		Woodward, Donald B., and M. Shields Prosperity — We can have it if we want it; B.....700
Tate, Allen.....464		Victoria through the looking-glass. F. B. Lennon; B.....458		Tom Paine: America's godfather; B.....723
Winter sea, the; B.....464		Vigil of a nation, the. Lin Yutang; B.....180; see also 324, 359; C.....471		Wright, Richard.....390
Teacher in America. J. Barzun; B.....520		Wallace, Henry A.; R.....307		Black boy; B.....390
Thayer, V. T.....393		Walls do not fall, the. H. D.; B.....421		Wyller, Albert C.; R.....51
American education under fire; B.....393		Walt Whitman, poet of American democracy. Selections from his poetry and prose. Edited with an introduction by S. Sillen; B.....215
Theater book of the year, 1943-44, the. G. J. Nathan; B.....78				Y
				Years before the flood. M. Roane; B.....628
				Yellow magic: the story of penicillin. J. D. Ratcliff; B.....522
				Yogi and the commissar, the, and other essays. A. Koestler; B.....723
				Young Jefferson, the. C. G. Bowers; B.....307
				Young, Marguerite.....547
				Angel in the forest; B.....547

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 6, 1945

NUMBER 1

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIAL

Avery's Last Stand

ARTICLES

Future of the Spanish Republic by Juan Negrín

The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté

Fumbling with I. G. Farben by I. F. Stone

Britain—Sixth Winter by Keith Hutchison

25 Years Ago in The Nation

Tomorrow the Movies. I. Hollywood International by John Grierson

Two Terrorists on Trial by Gerold Frank
In the Wind

POLITICAL WAR

Yenan, 1945 by Pacificus

Inflation in Europe by Fritz Sternberg

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Distrust of Brains by Jaques Barzun

Whose Powder-Keg? by Eli Chamberlain

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

Briefer Comment

Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch

Films by James Agee

Music by B. H. Haggin

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 97 by Jack Barrett

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARK

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Shape of Things

1 THE NEW YEAR OPENS WITH ONE HOPE IN every mind: that out of the struggles ahead will come unity 3 among the nations of the anti-fascist coalition. The war will go on, probably with increased fury and losses; no one today would dare venture the predictions of early peace that 6 flooded the press and air waves in the late fall. But even 7 this dark expectation would be more tolerable if we could 9 believe the armies were fighting their way toward a fair 11 prospect of security and freedom. It is the inner political struggle—the struggle that has spilled blood on the streets
12 of Athens, the struggle symbolized by our continued recog-14 nition of the fascist dictatorship in Spain—that makes the 14 future seem so menacing at the start of 1945. On another page of this issue we print an address by Juan Negrín, last Prime Minister of the Spanish Republican government. This statement seems to us to highlight most sharply, both in itself and in the circumstances that surround it, the meaning of 15 that inner struggle. Dr. Negrín was to have spoken from 16 London to the great mass meeting at Madison Square Garden called by the Nation Associates on Tuesday of this week. He was refused facilities to broadcast by the British 20 government, and as we go to press, on the day the meeting
22 is to be held, it seems certain he will be unable to speak.
24 Fortunately, the text of his address came in by cable and will 24 be read at the meeting. It deserves a wide hearing. If the 26 treatment of Spain has been a test of democratic purposes ever since 1936, the treatment of Dr. Negrín is an indica-27 tion that those purposes have not yet altered. A fuller com-28 ment on the meeting will appear in these pages next week.
Meanwhile we commend to the close attention of our readers the vigorous and magnanimous protest of Juan Negrín.

★

HITLER'S NEW YEAR'S SPEECH MUST HAVE seemed tedious indeed to those who had become accustomed to earlier thunderous addresses. Not even in naming the Jews did he raise his voice to its customary pitch. The impression he gave was distinctly that of a tired man. But nothing could be more harmful to our military effort than to conclude from this external symptom that the war is approaching its end. Hitler announced that the war would go on into 1946, and the new attack launched by Field Marshall von Rundstedt, this time against the American 7th Army, should serve as a warning against taking the Führer's threat too lightly. That he would exploit to the utmost the contradictions and failures of Allied policy in the liberated countries was to be expected. But he took particular advantage of certain statements about Germany to prove to his people that they had no other choice but to fight to the end, even if the entire country is destroyed. Here the need for more active Allied political warfare becomes evident. That does not mean we must alter our decisions to make Germany pay for its crimes and make Germany repair all the damage it has caused. On the other hand, it is imperative that no Allied government think of subjecting all Germans to the same brutal treatment to which the Germans have subjected millions of Europeans—Jews and non-Jews—during the past year. Not from the United Nations but from their still beloved Führer can every German expect the final destruction of his country, whether it happens in 1945 or later.

✱

THE ALLEGED FAILURE OF THE INTELLIGENCE services on the eve of the German counter-offensive stemmed not from lack of information but from inability to interpret it correctly. It is sometimes overlooked that we have the same difficulty in regard to political problems. In the days of the Murphy era, our State Department surely had a great deal of information about what was going on in North Africa and inside France. But it dismissed the De Gaullists as an extremist minority and General de Gaulle himself as a good soldier with too many ambitions and without any substantial following or sense of political reality. Of De Gaulle's "incapacity" to deal with high problems of policy we had proof in the results of his last visit to Moscow. On the other hand, Prime Minister Churchill, unless his Ambassador in Athens is the most snobbish of snobs, must have had information about what was going on in Greece. But his passion for kings and for reactionary solutions to contemporary issues led him to read intelligence reports wrongly and to minimize the influence of those "ruffians" whom he insulted in the House of Commons and with whom he met in Athens a few days later to find a way out of the terrible mess he and his generals had created. The entire handling of the movements of resistance in Europe shows the same inability to read intelligence reports intelligently.

✱

THE DISAPPEARANCE OF PAPANDREOU AND HIS puppet government, which the dynamics of the Greek situation have long made inevitable, constitutes an important step toward Greek unity, and the retirement of the King, for which the left has been working for years, is a most significant event. As we go to press, there is still no hint from Athens as to the probable composition of the new Cabinet. The Regent, Archbishop Damaskinos, is reported, however, to have consulted the E. A. M.'s moderate leader Alexander Svolos. The E. A. M., whose demands include the key ministries of War and of the Interior, is understood to be agreeable to the choice as Premier of George Kafandaris, an elderly politician of the old regime but one who has shown comprehension of the people's movement. Meanwhile General Scobie, at the close of a conference with the E. A. M.'s representatives, has expressed optimism about an early end to the Anglo-Greek strife. It is to be hoped in any case that General Scobie will recognize that the military and political aspects of the Greek problems are inexorably bound together. If he insists that the E. L. A. S. be disbanded and disarmed while the rightist bands—the Security Battalion and the Mountain Brigade—still remain potent factors and before satisfactory guaranties are given for a fair plebiscite and early general elections, then he will needlessly prolong the agony of Greece. If, on the other hand, he allows a comprehensive solution—one that respects the will of the Greek people—to work itself out on both the political and military planes, there will indeed be cause for optimism, in spite of the grotesque and provocative comedy enacted by Mr. Churchill in Athens.

✱

HENRY WALLACE'S LAST SPEECH BEFORE vacating the office of Vice-President was worthy of the man on whom liberal hopes for the future are pinned. In an address before the American Statistical Association Wallace recommended enactment of a full-employment national budget along the lines of the Murray bill discussed in last week's Nation. The outgoing Vice-President compared the bill with similar measures now under discussion in England and Australia, emphasizing "public responsibility for maintaining a high level of general purchasing power." The essential idea, Wallace said, "is that the federal government is ultimately responsible for full employment and can discharge its responsibility only by planning in advance to synchronize all of its programs with the programs of private enterprise so that the whole national income will be maintained at the full-employment level." The bill would provide for sufficient government investment each year to fill the gap between planned private investment and the volume necessary to create jobs for all. Wallace stressed the international as well as the domestic importance of the Murray bill; the United States is the world's largest market, and unemployment here would undermine world price levels and trade. It would be fortunate, indeed, if Wallace were to take over the Department of Commerce in the new Roosevelt Administration and operate it in the light of these policies.

✱

WHEN BOSTON BITES A BOOK IT IS NOT NEWS, but when a Boston judge dismisses a charge of obscenity and, in the bargain, says that policemen and detectives and judges of the Municipal Court, including himself, are not qualified to pass on the literary value of books, it is worth honorable mention. A clerk at the Dartmouth Book Stall was haled into court for having sold a copy of Erskine Caldwell's "Tragic Ground" after the Watch and Ward Society had complained about it. The detective who arrested the clerk cited a passage in the book about a woman being with a man who was naked to the waist. Judge Elijah Adlow of the Municipal Court was not impressed. He cited by comparison "some of the dancers at some of the shows in town" who continue to be unarrested. He then asked the detective if he had read "Anthony Adverse" or "Gone with the Wind." Detective Blake replied that he had not, whereupon Judge Adlow observed, "That's the trouble with the Police Department. They haven't a big enough library." He went on to say that it "is not for me or for you to try to establish the literary tastes of the community." To be sure, he could not help indulging in a little literary criticism himself. He said that "Tragic Ground" was a dull book—"one you would have to chain yourself to a chair to read"—but he can hardly be blamed for exercising any reader's prerogative. We are glad, incidentally, to learn that legislation is to be introduced at the next session of the Massachusetts legislature by which the book and not the clerk who sells it would be on trial. If Boston must make its periodical sallies into censorship, let it pick on the author or the publisher and not the clerk who sells a book. The author and the publisher may at least be presumed to have read it.

✱

CANADA'S DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS is the counterpart of our State Department. It is a pleasure, therefore, to report that its new ambassadorial appointments to the United States and Mexico, which take effect this month, show vision and democratic insight. The new ambassadors are young career men of distinguished record and liberal outlook. Both are distinctively Canadian. Neither bears the slightest resemblance to the stuffed-shirt or school-tie diplomat. Lester B. Pearson succeeds Leighton McCarthy in Washington. He is competent, active, and blessed with a sense of humor. He has held important posts in Ottawa and London, and since coming to Washington as Minister-Counselor in 1942, has assumed several important positions in UNRRA and other United Nations committees. Hugh Keenleyside entered the diplomatic service in 1928, the same year as Pearson. Previous to that he had had a distinguished academic career as a teacher of history in British Columbia and in Syracuse and Brown universities. He served in the Canadian legation in Tokyo, rose to be Assistant Secretary of State for External Affairs in Ottawa, and at the time of his new appointment was acting chairman of the Canadian-United States Joint Board of Defense. The appointment of a liberal, top-career diplomat to the Mexican embassy suggests that Canada is gaining a new appreciation of its role in inter-American affairs.

Avery's Last Stand

IN MOST surface details the latest episode in Sewell Avery's sitdown strike against the United States government resembled his previous performances. This time, it is true, he yielded possession of his open-shop fortress without physical resistance. After a three-and-a-half-hour debate with the army major directing the occupation, he walked out unescorted. Otherwise the scenario was largely unaltered. Once again he had stubbornly defied War Labor Board directives which had been unanimously indorsed by the industry members as well as by the public and labor members of the board. Once again his intransigence provoked a walk-out of Montgomery Ward employees. Once again he jeopardized the whole structure of war-time mediation machinery. Once again the President and part of the army had to take time out from the war to quell Sewell Avery's rebellion.

As in the case of John L. Lewis's succession of coal strikes, the repetitiousness of Avery's tactics may have destroyed the ardor of some of his initial backers. Even the Union League Club diehards must find his behavior a trifle monotonous; many of the editorial writers who championed his earlier stand—in the months preceding the national election—are now less disposed to picture him as the last guardian of the American way. Although Mark Sullivan continues to view the government's procedure with alarm, even his prose has lost much of its springtime passion. To a large part of the United States, it seems, Sewell Avery is becoming an old bore with an obsession.

The familiarity of the Avery formula, however, does not minimize the importance of the issue. Moreover, in several vital respects the current incident differs from preceding chapters. These new factors may also explain why a lot of Avery's sympathizers have cooled.

For one thing, the clash occurred at a time when American armies were engaged in their bitterest and bloodiest fighting of the war. This was an unpropitious moment for anyone to renew a private war with the government. Secondly, in the current showdown, the payment of back wages owed to Ward employees was as basic a cause of the dispute as the celebrated maintenance-of-membership issue. Heretofore Avery and his legal mouthpieces have valiantly insisted that they were battling for a sacred American principle, that maintenance of membership was a violation of the rights of free men, that they could not yield without permitting the enslavement of their employees under union tyranny. The merits of that argument have been thoroughly exploded by now; but at least it could be couched in pretty phrases by public-relations men.

The strike of Ward workers in Detroit, however, highlighted the disclosure that Avery was no less tenacious in resisting wage rulings of the WLB than in challenging its maintenance-of-membership order. Directives calling for increases in substandard wages had been systematically ignored. The union had fought vainly for payment of several hundred thousand dollars in back wages accumulated since the board's decision was handed down. As William H. Davis, WLB chairman, pointed out, the wage-stabilization program is doomed if it is carried into effect by employers only when wages are frozen and flouted when the board attempts to adjust inequities. Mr. Davis also observed that Avery was now apparently using the maintenance-of-membership bogey for the prosaic business of thwarting a wage increase awarded by the WLB. With this revelation Avery's heroic stature shrank a little further; the odor of sweatshop methods became more distinct.

The government clearly had no alternative except seizure. Failure to act would have wrecked the WLB. It would have shattered labor confidence in that tribunal and invited a wave of strikes, affecting plants engaged directly in war production as well as civilian enterprises. Despite the insistence of some so-called left-wing C. I. O. leaders that their members will refrain from strikes regardless of provocation, no realistic labor observers believe this restraint would have been widely imitated if Avery's defiance had succeeded. The whole foundation of industrial peace rests on employer as well as employee compliance with WLB directives.

Labor unrest, growing out of delays in board procedure and strict application of the Little Steel formula, has already achieved explosive proportions in some places. One effective management sitdown strike against the board could lead to wholesale disruption on the home front.

We do not see how the federal court in Chicago, to which the government has appealed for an injunction restraining Avery from interfering with the seizure and requesting a declaratory judgment on the legality of the government's action, can resist the logic of the government's case. In the last Montgomery Ward dispute these issues never reached judicial settlement because the Justice Department was seemingly reluctant to run even the slightest risk of defeat. It is now clear that the issues must be settled to avoid future management rebellions. It is difficult to visualize how they can be decided in Avery's favor without creating chaos in the relations between government and labor.

Unfortunately many newspapers, having plainly lost sympathy with Avery's crusade, appear unwilling to damn him with the righteous indignation they once bestowed upon John L. Lewis. But the mildness of their current comments is at least indicative of how much ground Avery has lost. His record of distinguished disservice in World War II has been too dismal for even his best friends to contemplate. His pious sermons against the closed shop have been exposed as a camouflage for the shabbiest kind of wage chiseling. He has achieved a peculiar form of immortality in World War II: he is the only employer who has occupied the United States army on so wide a front and in so many engagements. Few people will envy him that glory.

Future of the Spanish Republic

BY JUAN NEGRIN

TONIGHT I am breaking my long silence on the Spanish cause. For I am not one of those who feel that this cause should be allowed to die with the shameful episode that precipitated the occupation of our entire national territory and the subjection of our people without conditions, helpless and manacled, to those confederates of Hitler and Mussolini who won for themselves the distinction of being the first quislings.

I have seen fit to speak out because we are now entering the decisive period in which the conduct of Spaniards, and also in part the attitudes of our friends, will determine the future of the Republic and, I might say, the very future of Spain. Until this moment, I thought it better to keep silent. My silence was self-imposed and not the result of any suggestions whatsoever, much less of any pressure, which I would never for a moment have tolerated.

I have kept silent because I did not want to add fuel to the political bickerings within the Spanish emigration. For to have agitated or tried to ventilate outside of Spain certain questions which the Spanish people alone are competent to decide would have stimulated the misunderstandings that are unhappily a feature of exile and that so easily degenerate into personalities and back-fence squabbling. This is bound to happen in exile when there is missing that great balance wheel of democracy which is the constantly exercised judgment of the people. There are some among us who feel that politics should be conducted on the level of dedication and that the ultimate goal of the man in public life is the common good. In the pursuit of this end it is advisable to take account of and avoid the frustrations and resentments that tend to develop among those whom the defeat has robbed of home and country in the great present-day diaspora of the Spanish people. To do otherwise would amount to diverting our energies from the war itself.

I have kept silent so as to center attention on the struggle against the Axis, on the outcome of which the destiny of Spain depends as much as that of any other country. For without a clear-cut victory over the Axis there would be no Spanish cause, nor would there be a Spain either, for long. The Nazi, victorious, would not only enslave their enemies, but like Saturn with his children, devour their satellites.

I have kept silent so as to be able the better to labor for the day when we the Spaniards may share with the victors in the victory for which we have sacrificed as greatly as any others. And my silence, far from signifying inactivity, was rather, by the force of circumstances, a prerequisite to securing for Spain a rightful participation in the eventual triumph of the Allies or at least to fending off the fate of being served up as a sacrificial victim in the great defeat of the Totalitarians.

Alone we fought. For three long years we stood alone, completely alone, save for the glorious participation of the volunteers of the Brigades. During those years it fell to Spain to lead the fight against the Axis and their acolytes, the rebellious military of our country.

In September, 1939, the direction of the war fell to other hands. We were prevented from mixing in it because there was still that strange determination to go on ignoring the true character and meaning of the Spanish conflict. Whether we liked the course events were taking or not, we were obliged not to interfere or even get involved any more than was necessary to stand up for our rights. This was the only way that we could hope to be heard when we had to be heard, or service from us was required.

Today things have changed. The war is nearing its end. The death agony of the enemy may drag on, but final defeat is unavoidable. The setbacks of the moment can be likened to the mauling a gladiator gets when he is over-confident and careless in the face of the dying monster's last convulsions.

The Spanish problem is no longer the noli me tangere—the great untouchable unmentionable of Allied diplomacy. Those who a few months ago were playing up to various little chieftains of the Spanish factions today cast them off disdainfully.

What I am asking is that the situation of Spain be clarified so that, after the final destruction of the Axis, we can avoid being relegated to the corner of the vanquished by the very people who brought about our defeat. And so that we may avoid the interferences by remote control and the disguised efforts of supposed friends acting unofficially; for they could handcuff the will of our people and block the peaceful transition from praetorian tyranny to the legal regime of liberty, tolerance, and democracy that was established by the constitution voted into being by the Spanish people in 1931.

Since as long ago as July, 1936, the government of the Spanish Republic has considered itself without interruption in a state of war with the Axis powers. It has been in fact at war with Germany and Italy from the moment when they provoked the military rebellion, made us the first victims of what was later to be called internal aggression, and then topped off their crime by invading our country with regular units of their armies and air forces. In March of 1939 the government only just managed to escape from a trap laid to assassinate its members or turn them over to the mercies of the rebels. The events of those weeks in 1939 were all part and parcel of the development of the conspiracy called Non-Intervention, which no one has qualified with such harshness and discretion as Sumner Welles in his "The Time for Decision." The February coup d'état against the Republican government was a part of the major design of Non-Intervention. So were the handing over to Franco a few weeks before of our island fortress of Minorca and the whole treacherous campaign of defeatism which, directed within the country from positions, or should I say buildings, that because of diplomatic tradition were immune to the authority of the Republic, undid our very defense mechanism in its most vital parts. But it was the Madrid coup d'état, or if you like putsch, which was the most fitting epilogue to the crude and tragic farce that was Non-Intervention.

On abandoning Spanish soil, as the result of this putsch, the government of the Republic proclaimed its legitimacy, and on arriving a few hours later in France reaffirmed it, together with the determination to fight on endlessly until it could bring about the reestablishment of the Republic which it considered overpowered, subjugated, but still very much alive.

From March to September, 1939, I never ceased admonishing and even importuning those whom my warnings might have served that the present conflict was imminent. Even more, only a very few days before the outbreak I offered the French government my services as mediator to see if there was not some solution to the fatal inability to agree between those powers who two years later were at last to be brought together into an alliance by a still more tragic necessity. What might not have been accomplished if this alliance had come into existence in 1939 instead of in 1941? I was to discover afterward, when it was already too late, that regrets were felt at not having accepted my offer.

From the very beginning, my policy, which is to say the policy of the government of the Spanish Republic, was to try to convince all concerned of the absolute necessity of building the widest possible front against Germany. A front which would include even the country to which today I am speaking—the United States of America—because we knew all along that if this war was ever to be won the United States would have to bring in her immense power and her limitless resources. The sorry truth seems to be that our persuasive abilities were not very potent and that our means of action were still less so, but the day will come when it will be proved and accepted that in this crisis in history we did absolutely everything that it was in our power to do.

But the conflagration came anyway. Our position I made clear at once—by personal overtures to the Allied governments and also by a public statement to world opinion. I called upon our fellow-Spaniards to rally to the war and to enlist wherever their services would be accepted, as volunteers. By tens of thousands they came forward. They offered their lives, these Spanish Republicans, and won undying glory at Narvik, in Syria, at Bir Hacheim, in Tunisia, in Normandy, at Paris, with the guerrillas of the French maquis, on the steppes of Russia, in a hundred other places. The magnitude of their effort, of their sacrifice, is well known in the navies, the merchant marines, the armies and air forces of the Allied nations and well known among the paratroops and the intelligence services also.

Here and now let me tell you that the Spaniards of the Republican emigration who volunteered to fight in Allied ranks outnumber many times—I repeat, many times—the mercenaries recruited in Spain by the gunmen of the Falange for the Blue Division that was sent to fight in Axis ranks against the Russians.

On the day of Pétain's capitulation I left France for Great Britain. I did not go in search of refuge, of asylum, for the man who is determined to carry on the fight never feels himself a refugee, never. I went to England because I wanted my physical presence to symbolize my loyalty and our loyalty to the country that then was the only champion of the common cause. And to demonstrate the faith we had in her when not too many shared it.

Spain is not, and never has been, neutral. For Spain has never let up for one second in this war. Spain is a belligerent, the first belligerent; with us this war is now going into its ninth year! Of course when I say Spain I mean the real Spain, the Spain of the Spanish people, represented by the institutions of their Republic, and not the Spain that is a mere geographical reference and that is today an occupied country precisely as Norway and Holland are occupied countries, as Belgium and France were until a few months ago.

It is in the name of this true Spain that I am speaking to you, her American friends, so as to assure you that the Spanish people are ready and able to handle their own affairs, on condition that we are let alone, on condition that our hands are not tied, on condition that we are not subjected to pressures and maneuvers from without. We do not ask for—and please get this—we do not ask for and we do not want intervention by other governments or armies. We have had two centuries of experience with foreign interventions and from them a bitter memory of all that they have cost us. And for the last of these interventions, that one that by supreme sarcasm was so hypocritically labeled Non-Intervention, we are still paying. Nor do we draw any comfort from certain recent examples of the same kind.

We would welcome and we could be grateful for the sympathy, the help, the collaboration of friends. But the intervention of power—No! Roundly no! We would only ask that no obstacles be placed in our way and that no aid be extended surreptitiously to the enemies of the Republic with arms so subtle that they cannot be matched by the meager means at our disposal. No, no intervention, please! All we ask is that the screws not be put on us to hold us down and that our future not be denied us.

But if there exists a disposition to repay the grave insult that was done to justice and to the rights of people in the recognition of Franco, six years ago, then the thing to do is to break with this regime on the simple grounds that it violates the expressed will of our people and is an outrage to human dignity.

Oh, I know that the bickering among Spanish Republicans has been a source of concern to many among you. And I have no desire to diminish the importance of these disagreements, for they offer direct support and comfort to the rebels. And they are pointed to by the solicitous enemies of the Republic to predict its instability in an eventual future.

But, as for our friends, let them calm their fears! Disagreement is a phenomenon common to every democracy, and one which is aggravated among exiles by the sting of misery and failure which all of us carry within ourselves. And then, too, when politicians are removed from the constant observation of the people, they run a little wild.

But let me ask you something, you Americans? Do not disagreements take place in all democracies, even sometimes in the midst of a war? Now, if the Spanish Republic were a totalitarian regime, there would be no disagreements; they would be smothered by repression and terror. We are liberals and democrats, and because we are we have got to try to overlook the spots that mar the beauty of our system and maybe clean them up or at least touch them up.

But let our friends rest assured that when the moment comes we will all of us prove capable of surmounting our animosities and our discords as we did in 1936 when the war broke over us. And rest assured also that there will be in Spain a stable, tolerant, and progressive republic, a republic without vengeance, grounded on a sweeping amnesty like the one pledged by our government during the war, with the unanimous approval of the parliament and the people, not an amnesty full of tricks and traps like those proclaimed by Franco. Our republic will be strong because it will be built upon, and cemented by, the will of the Spanish people. Because strong, it will be generous, and its generosity will draw its inspiration from the humane traditions of our people. It will bring about a nation-wide reconciliation. For without reconciliation there can be no future for the Spain that is to play her part in the creation of the new world of peace, liberty, and progress.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

HEREWITH some reflections on 1944 and resolutions for 1945:

The last three weeks gave the old year a bad name, and it departed unwept. The new year arrived without cheers, in my vicinity at least, and it must have been the same in the important places of the world at that moment—Bastogne, Rochefort, the Danube north of Budapest, Mindoro, the air over Milan, the jungles of Burma. I never knew a more restrained jubilee. The only toast was a grim one—Confusion to the enemy!—and it was heartfelt, for there were several young veterans and service men in the room.

Which illustrates the well-known fact, difficult of comprehension by the new "other half" of the world, the group that's not been in service: the farther you are from the fighting, the more you worry about the war. The best New Year's Eve I ever had was in Cairo two years ago. A hobbling Scot, a damaged Irishman, and I on crutches had a fabulous dinner at the Auberge du Turf, topping it with brandy from Cyprus that tasted like anti-freeze solution just drained from somebody's radiator. We loved it, and went back to the hospital, where the Scot produced a secret bottle of rye and we sat on the bed of a Georgia flier molesting him with a quietly maudlin version of "Auld Lang Syne," the top part taken by the pretty young night nurse. This gaiety in the face of pain and death—one of our best friends in the ward had just had his second foot amputated—was not matched in New York last week-end, and I found myself like an old bore pining for the company of Hector Thomson, Pat Hickey, Georgia Claxton, and the pretty night nurse, whose name I have forgotten.

Why shouldn't the military critics pick a Ten Best of the Year list, like the theatrical fellows? Viewing 1944 impartially, and with an admitted leaning toward the grotesque in war, one would single out:

The Red Army all year, for engaging the bulk of the German divisions, inflicting the heaviest casualties, carrying forward the greatest offensives.

The first six days of the Russian summer offensive, in which five major fortresses, including Vitebsk, were reduced.

Alexander's Italian spring offensive, combining forces from the main front and from the Anzio beachhead, which smashed and tricked the Germans below Rome and liberated that city without a battle inside its limits.

The invasion of Western Europe, for which the keen analyst Marshal Stalin provides the best citation: "One must admit that the history of war does not know any such undertaking so broad in its conception, so grandiose in its scale, and so masterly in its execution."

The one-two operation on the right flank of the beachhead when General Bradley broke through and General Patton swept out into the clear.

The remorseless, bitter advance of the British and Canadians on the left flank at Caen, which made this possible.

The British reduction of Walcheren Island, finally opening Antwerp.

The air-borne delivery of troops to Arnhem and the stand the Red Devil paratroop division made there (with an implied criticism of the operation's planners: because they sent a boy to do a man's job—a British critic said last week it was Eisenhower's fault for not following through on the ground with ten divisions, but I've heard an American criticism of Montgomery because he allegedly said he could handle it without American help. This illustrates the difficulty of getting intelligence in war time; also of being a military critic, if you place honesty above chauvinism).

The United States Strategic Air Force in Europe, especially for the week in February when it broke the back of the Luftwaffe.

The United States Marine Corps, especially for Saipan, Guam, and Peleliu.

The United States Pacific Fleet, especially Task Force 58, for the whole year, highlighted by the great victory in the Second Battle of the Philippine Sea.

The Japanese offensive in China, which cut the country in two and probably forced a revision of our Pacific strategy.

The German recovery in the fall, especially the December counter-offensive. A British infantry captain said, "They died very well, the Germans, as well or better than in 1940. There seems to be a good many of them left."

The bravery of American doughfoots in meeting the counter-offensive, especially at Bastogne, St. Vith, Stavelot.

The performance at year's end of some American pilots in Burma, who shattered a Japanese supply column by buzzing it and dispersing its vehicles (elephants) into the jungle.

I see the list numbers fifteen. It was a big year.

Nobody ever reads the communiqués, printed in six-point type, which is probably why there has been no public outrage over the recent batch from Rome. They are issued at Allied headquarters, and lately they have included a section called "Land Forces, Greece," starting off thus: "Good progress was made in liberating further districts in Athens." So in history the Americans bear equal responsibility with the British for killing Greeks. Consider this notice a call for public outrage.

My New Year's resolution is to have more resolution and make fewer predictions. Let us therefore neither support nor condemn Mr. Stimson for his statement that the German counter-offensive will shorten the war. It is surely enough that it has been held, that General McAuliffe said "Nuts," that General Patton successfully swung his army through a 90° change of advance, that progress toward the Meuse has been halted, that the drive to Liège has been cut off. The chances of nipping off the salient, destroying a dozen or so of the best German divisions, and therefore really shortening the war now seem slim. The terrain is bad, the lateral communications are worse, the enemy is determined to hold his gains. His aim of relieving pressure on the Aachen and Saar fronts has been achieved; plans for our winter offensive are certainly gone askew. The enemy has achieved what must have been his primary objective: to gain time, time for training new divisions, time for vengeance weapons to do further work, time in which political squabbles can further disunite the United Nations and give the enemy his only chance for a negotiated peace. Our abiding resolution for 1945 must therefore be to support our armed forces by refusing to become disunited, thereby contributing to the toast of the young veteran: Confusion to the enemy.

Fumbling with I. G. Farben

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, December 29

ANYONE who thinks that supervision of German industry could prove effective in preventing renewed war preparations would do well to make a study of the operations of the Alien Property Custodian in the last war and in this one. We failed miserably to prevent key German American firms from slipping back into German hands after the last war and we are failing again. If we do so poorly in supervising German concerns in the United States, is there much chance that we would do any better in supervising German concerns within the Reich?

Woodrow Wilson warned Congress on May 30, 1919, "The German chemical industry was and may well be again a thoroughly knit monopoly, capable of exercising a competition of a peculiarly insidious and dangerous kind." Just how dangerous and insidious has been demonstrated by revelations made since Pearl Harbor of the part played by I. G. Farben, directly and through its American subsidiary, General Aniline and Film, in restricting the production in this country of a long list of basic war materials, from aluminum and magnesium to synthetic rubber and dyestuffs.

But not long after Wilson's warning, in that very same year, the Germans laid the foundation for their comeback in the dyestuff, chemical, and drug markets of the Western Hemisphere. Our first fatal step was the licensing of Kutfro-Pickhardt and Company to resume imports from the Badische Company, one of the firms in the Reich which later formed I. G. Farben; import licenses were granted although the Chemical Foundation established by Congress held the enemy patents under which these same products could have been manufactured in this country. The second fatal step was the sale by Wilson's Alien Property Custodian of the plant and patents of the German Bayer Company, another member of the I. G. Farben family, to Sterling Products. The Sterling company promised faithfully never to permit the return of these assets to a German concern, and the Alien Property Custodian, in authorizing the sale, found "no trace of German influence—near or remote—in the company." Within a year Sterling had secretly undertaken to pay the parent Bayer company in Germany 50 per cent of its profits on Latin American drug sales.

Post-war revelations have made Mr. Roosevelt even more keenly aware of the danger than was Woodrow Wilson. The President has pledged himself on several occasions never to permit the return of seized German patents and other properties to German control. His Alien Property Custodian, Leo T. Crowley, has declared that he is faithfully carrying out these policies. In the first annual report under government management of General Aniline and Film, I. G. Farben's $70,000,000 American subsidiary, Crowley said "it was the government's policy that the company never should return to German ownership, German control of operations, or German influence." Yet the fact is that General Aniline and Film and its sales agent, General Dyestuffs Corporation, are being operated as closely as possible under their old pre-war policies, that the leading figure in their management is Ernest K. Halbach, a lifelong American employee of I. G. Farben and its predecessors, that this management is thwarting the President's policies and wishes, and that Halbach has been drawing $82,000 a year in salary and bonuses for his work in these now presumably publicly owned corporations.

You will be hearing more of Halbach. Some mysterious compromise is being worked out by the government to pay him for his controlling shares in General Dyestuffs, although these shares were seized and his bank accounts blocked under the Trading with the Enemy Act. Halbach's father before him was employed in the German chemical industry. Halbach himself is American born, but has worked for American affiliates of German chemical concerns ever since 1899, when he became an office boy for Pickhardt and Kuttroff, the first firm to begin reestablishment of the old German ties after the First World War. Halbach attended conferences with I. G. Farben officials in Europe in the summer of 1939 before the outbreak of war. When war began, Halbach took over the controlling stock at $100 a share, though the asset value was about $500 a share. Conditions attached to the sale prevented its resale to interests unfriendly to I. G. Farben, and it was seized by the Alien Property Custodian in June, 1942.

Through Sullivan and Cromwell, Halbach is now suing for the return of this controlling stock on the ground that the purchase in 1939 was a bona fide transfer to an American citizen. Interestingly enough, John Foster Dulles of Sullivan and Cromwell is listed in the first annual report of the Alien Property Custodian as one of the A. P. C.'s consultants. Sullivan and Cromwell are also counsel for the Schröder banking interests of London and New York, leading collaborators in helping the Nazis before the war to obtain strategic raw materials in Europe and to circumvent the anti-Nazi boycott in America. It was through the backing of the Schröder banking interests that Victor Emanuel, the New York financier, was able to get control of Aviation Corporation and Standard Gas and Electric in the '30's. Emanuel now dominates the boards of directors appointed by the Alien Property Custodian to manage General Aniline and Film and General Dyestuffs. Leo T. Crowley, who resigned as Alien Property Custodian last year after these ties were first disclosed by this correspondent in PM and The Nation, was recently reelected to his $75,000-a-year job as head of Standard Gas and Electric. His former deputy and successor as Alien Property Custodian, James E. Markham, was reelected at the same time as a director of Standard Gas, a job for which he is paid $4,850 a year while drawing $10,000 a year in salary from the government.

This whole situation cries out for Congressional investigation. No one knows, for example, who were the unnamed customers for whom the Schröder bank in London bought 300,000 shares of stock in Cord Corporation in August, 1937, enabling Emanuel to take control and reorganize the concern as Aviation Corporation. This is a key war concern, and a very profitable one. No one knows why these unnamed customers—all of them—suddenly decided to sell these shares late in 1939. No one knows the circumstances of the sale or the interests to whom the sale was made, or how it happens that so huge a block of stock was sold without bringing any change in the management.

Much is unknown, but a little has leaked out. We do know that on receipt of cables from I. G. Farben after the war began Halbach at once took steps to take care of Farben's old Latin American outlets. We know that General Aniline and Film tried to sell its controlling stock to General Dyestuffs to avoid seizure but that the Treasury blocked the sale. We know that after General Dyestuffs was taken over, Halbach was retained by Colonel Louis Johnson, the West Virginia corporation lawyer and former assistant Secretary of War whom Crowley appointed president of the concern at $75,000 a year. We know that Colonel Johnson insisted on keeping Halbach on even after many protests from within the office of Alien Property Custodian, that Halbach was ostensibly paid $36,000 a year but that a few weeks ago the government learned he had actually been drawing $82,000 a year in salary and bonuses.

We know that the Emanuel-dominated managements of these two interlocking companies and Halbach have succeeded in preventing the government from voiding the old cartel contracts with I. G. Farben, and that they have thwarted the program by which the President and Sumner Welles promised to help Latin American countries to replace old Axis-controlled drug and chemical firms with new firms owned by their own nationals. We know that after a behind-the-scenes struggle within the Office of the Alien Property Custodian the replacement division of the office was abolished, and that in Brazil and Mexico General Dyestuffs is dealing with men and firms suspect by reason of old ties to I. G. Farben.

The most amazing aspect of the story as it is developing is the government's embarrassment over its own fatuity. If there were reasons to block Halbach's accounts and seize his stock, one would think the same reasons would dictate his removal from any position of influence with the old I. G. Farben firms. But Halbach can go into court and point to the fact that for two and a half years he has virtually run General Dyestuffs under government management, and he can point to the advisory position on dyestuffs to which he was appointed shortly after Pearl Harbor by Sidney P. Weinberg of Goldman, Sachs, as evidence of his reliability. He can, that is, if he wishes to subject himself to public cross-examination. The whole case calls for the most drastic kind of shake-up—a new Alien Property Custodian and new managements in both General Aniline and General Dyestuffs. No one accuses Emanuel, Johnson, Crowley, or Markham of Nazi sympathy. But whatever their intentions, the activities of the present and past Custodian and the managements tend in but one direction. As one exasperated subordinate protested in a private memo to Markham, "We might in fact just be doing a nice job of holding this market for the Germans."

Britain—Sixth Winter

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

WHEN I arrived in England, it had just become clear that the hopes raised by the swift rush of the Allied armies through France and Belgium were premature, that no early collapse of Germany could be expected, that the discomforts, the shortages, and the strains of war must be endured for months to come. Moreover, it was apparent that the capture of the "rocket coast" had not ended the dangers of war for the civilian population; southern England was still within range of the enemy's vengeance weapons and faced continued desultory bombardment. Disappointed but not discouraged, certain that victory was only postponed, Britons were bracing themselves for the sixth winter of war.

The watchword was still "austerity," a word which summarizes with characteristic understatement the whole process of stripping the civilian economy as nearly as possible to the bare bones. Statistically, its meaning is made plain by the very impressive White Paper on Britain's war effort published at the end of November. But it is only when cold figures are translated into terms of actual human experience that they acquire life and meaning.

According to the White Paper, total personal expenditure on consumption, reduced to pre-war prices, is only 79 per cent of what it was in 1938. In the non-food categories the fall is much more striking: clothing and dress materials, 55 per cent; boots and shoes, 73 per cent; furniture and furnishings, 23 per cent; hardware, 33 per cent. When I read these figures I see them expressing Britain's desperate shabbiness. Houses groan for paint, furniture for new covers. A broken cup becomes a minor tragedy; it cannot be replaced except, possibly, by thick, plain-white "utility ware." New furniture is reserved for the bombed-out and newly married couples; second-hand furniture commands huge prices, as do second-hand clothes, which can be bought without coupons.

"Mend and make do," say the posters, and even well-to-do men go around with patches on the elbows of their business suits. Women, with great ingenuity, turn and remodel their own and their children's clothes. My English sister-in-law sported a very handsome housecoat, which she had made from an oddment of curtain brocade, until the pre-war zipper, taken from another garment, refused to function. That again was a tragedy, for zippers can be neither obtained nor repaired.

Service and spare parts for household equipment are very hard to come by, and for this reason many electrical appliances are out of commission for the duration. At the home in which I stayed the refrigerator broke down, and it was a month before an electrician could be found to make the simple repair needed to set it going. Cleaning is a problem, with soap rationed and the supply of household brushes and brooms, according to the White Paper, reduced to less than half the 1935 quantity.

This is what austerity means in terms of keeping the home together. So far as food is concerned, the caloric values are adequate, and there is a sufficient if not ample supply of the protective foods, but the diet is apt to be monotonous. The housewife who attempts to give an appearance of variety to her family menus has no easy task. And shopping is a long and weary business when everything must be carried home and one must wait in queues for any off-ration extras such as fish.

To return to the White Paper: in the table showing imports of raw materials my eye is caught by an item of professional interest. In 1939, 423,000 tons of newsprint were imported; in 1943, 95,000 tons—less than a quarter. Domestic production is only 15 per cent of 1935. One has to see the sadly attenuated British newspapers and experience the difficulties of buying them to appreciate these figures. When I first reached London I found it hard to keep up with the news, for I could neither arrange for the daily delivery of the papers I wanted nor buy them at the newsstands. The Times and the Telegraph, I was told, had long waiting lists of would-be subscribers, and the same situation prevailed with the leading weeklies—the New Statesman and Nation and the Economist. Eventually, after a direct appeal to the circulation manager of the Times, I was permitted as a special courtesy to obtain a daily copy of that paper.

Here, then, are some indications of the costs to the civilian economy of Britain's mobilization of man-power and resources for war, a mobilization begun more than five years ago and steadily intensified until the present moment. The details of that mobilization and of the achievements it has made possible, as given in the White Paper, have been widely publicized, and there is no need to repeat them here. It is sufficient to emphasize that of the gross national product less than one-third is available for private consumption, and that of the labor employed in the manufacturing industries only one-fifth is now working for the home market.

It is a matter for argument whether the White Paper justifies the claim of Brendan Bracken, Minister of Information, that "the total war effort of the population of Great Britain per head is greater than that of any other belligerent." Such implied comparisons are invidious and irrelevant. What does matter is that Britain's effort has been whole-hearted and full-muscled and one which neither defeats nor victories have slackened or discouraged.

Many people in Britain, while not making light of their own hardships, are aware that the lot of the occupied and liberated countries is infinitely worse. The British diet may be dull, but it is ample to sustain health and energy, and when the Food Ministry announced extra Christmas rations it received thousands of letters protesting any increase while the needs of the liberated countries remained so great. Fuel may be short, but it is possible to keep at least one room in each dwelling fairly warm; railroad and bus travel is exceedingly uncomfortable much of the time, but the service is maintained.

Visitors from shivering and hungry Paris find London a paradise. Londoners, on the other hand, look across the Atlantic rather enviously. The tales of travelers and homesick American soldiers about the bright lights and plenty of American cities lose nothing in the retelling. "Is there any rationing in America?" I was frequently asked. "Are there any shortages?" I did my best to talk convincingly of the scarcity of butter, shoes, cigarettes, and gasoline, but had to admit that our shortages were partial and intermittent rather than total.

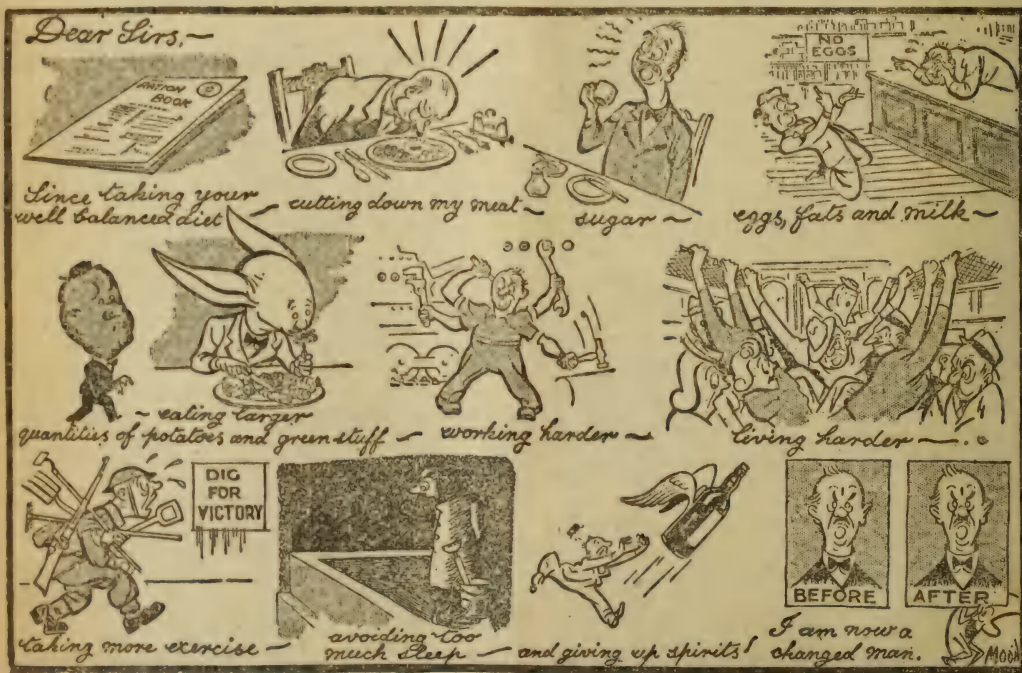

It has been America's great good fortune that its staggering productive capacity has made possible both a gigantic output of war material and the maintenance of a comparatively high level of civilian consumption. It has been its greater good fortune that, except for Pearl Harbor, its soil has been immune to enemy attack. The fact that Britain has been in the front line for five long years has meant constant interference with production and the diversion of a great deal of man-power to civil defense and the carrying out of essential repairs. The White Paper does not mention the number of industrial establishments damaged in enemy raids, and while I have been given the figures, I am not allowed to publish them. But I can say that they make Britain's productive effort still more impressive.

The White Paper does report, however, that up to August 31, 1944, 57,298 civilians had been killed by enemy action and 136,116 seriously injured. I read these figures thinking of the once pretty girl whose face is now hideously scarred by splintered glass; or of the friend who, on A. R. P. duty nearby, saw his home demolished by a direct hit and knew that the old servant and the two friends to whom he had given shelter could not hope to survive. When I note that 202,000 houses in the United Kingdom have been totally destroyed or damaged beyond repair and that an additional 4,328,000 have been damaged more or less seriously, I see this figure in concrete terms. It means homeless people sleeping in rest centers, people living in the one corner of their home which they have managed to make comparatively weatherproof, families uncomfortably doubled up with relatives. It means twisted and burnt remnants of furniture the purchase of which represented long years of scraping and saving; it means cherished collections of books and pictures gone forever.

Nor do the statistics of casualties and damage cover the sum total of human suffering in a country subjected to air attack. When one notices how few children are to be seen in London's streets and parks, one thinks of how many heart-aches, how much lost security, can be implied in the word "evacuee." The breaking up of homes, the long separation of parents and children, the difficulties of adjustment among strangers, however kind—these are war costs which no White Paper can possibly assess.

After five years it still goes on. In early September a government spokesman declared triumphantly that the danger of air raids was over for all practical purposes. The Luftwaffe, struggling to defend its homeland, seemed unlikely to be able to regain the offensive sufficiently to renew the blitz in its original form. The capture of the bases in northern France and Belgium had, it was thought, ended the flying-bomb menace which had given southern England so nerve-racking a summer. This optimism proved premature. Within a few days robot bombs again started to come over, though not in anything like the same numbers as before. German ingenuity had found a method of launching them from planes, and some managed to penetrate the highly efficient defenses and scatter death and destruction in the wide target area.

The Ministry of Health says that the nation is healthier than before the war

Courtesy the London Sunday Dispatch

Simultaneously a new menace developed, against which there appeared to be no defense and for which no warning could be given. Southern England began to get accustomed to sudden loud explosions followed by a long rumble. Nothing was said in the press, and if you asked for an official explanation you were told "gas-main explosions." But everybody talked about them, and everybody knew that V-2 had arrived, the real rocket bomb which travels through the stratosphere and descends at a speed greater than that of sound. The noise of its bursting is therefore the first warning; the after-rumble is caused by its rush through the last few thousand feet of air registering on the ear after its contact with the ground.

People took V-2 surprisingly calmly. Nearly everybody said that it was much more bearable than V-1, which created a minute or two of suspense between the time its approach was first heard and the cutting-out of its motor. Then followed, for all within a wide radius, an interval of interminable seconds before the explosion came. When this experience had to be endured many times a day, as it did at the height of the buzz-bomb terror, even the stoutest nerves were lacerated. A friend of mine who fought in France during the last war and had been in the thick of the 1940-41 blitz as a civil-defense officer told me that he had found buzz-bombs much harder to take than any other form of sudden death he had faced.

When one hears a V-2 one is safe; those who are killed never know what hit them. But to the imaginative it is not a pleasant sensation to be awakened in the middle of the night by one of these masterpieces of science and to lie thinking of the unlucky ones who were underneath and wondering where the next one will strike. Unable to get to sleep again, one goes on to consider what it would be like if such missiles began to fall, not occasionally and at irregular intervals, but every few minutes. And that, one realizes, is the kind of bombardment we must anticipate if we are weak and foolish enough to permit another war. At such moments Dumbarton Oaks does not seem a very impressive feat of statesmanship.

The difficulty lies in transmitting experiences of this kind to those out of range. Even in Britain outside the area under fire there is a distinct difference in attitude. In one way the immediate danger is exaggerated; people in safe districts feel that to go to London is a perilous and foolhardy adventure. Yet they are somehow detached emotionally from the experience of their countrymen in the danger zone and a trifle complacent about it; they cannot fully grasp an ordeal which they do not share. How, then, can one make New York and Chicago understand?

25 Years Again "The Nation"

PREMIER CLEMENCEAU'S statement in the Chamber of Deputies, on December 23, regarding the proposed Allied policy toward Russia does not differ in substance from previous declarations of French statesmen on that subject, nor, in general, from the policy which the Allies have all along pursued. There is to be neither peace nor compromise with the Soviet government; Russia is to be hemmed in as by a barbed-wire fence; and the Poles, Rumanians, and other peoples whom Russia has attacked or may attack are to be aided. Wherever Bolshevism shows itself, there the Allies will join in resisting it.—January 3, 1920.

THE EXTRAORDINARY MELODRAMA which the world has been witnessing in Fiume during the past few months seems to have taken a turn toward farce. . . . The world needs a guaranty of immunity not only from civil strife but also from further D'Annunzio proclamations.—January 10, 1920.

LAST SUNDAY the country was treated to the interesting news that the impending revolution in America had been nipped in the bud. "Red Raids Smash Revolutionary Coup"—so ran the headlines. As many as twenty-five rifles and four bombs were captured in the entire state of New Jersey alone, and of 675 prisoners in New York, 201 were held and the rest released. Girls fourteen, sixteen, and seventeen years of age were arrested in various places as criminal anarchists, and women were sent to the overcrowded Ellis Island quarters, although the acting Commissioner of Immigration protested that it was neither decent nor sanitary to have more women there. The total number of arrests in this most spectacular of "red" raids thus far will probably be not less than 6,000.—January 10, 1920.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES had again joined in the game of making additional Socialists and increasing the popular unrest by once more refusing a seat to Mr. Victor L. Berger [Socialist, Wisconsin] on the ground of his "disloyalty" during the war. . . . The attempt of the Assembly of the State of New York to shut out the five Socialists who were elected last November has evidently disturbed a great many people who hitherto have watched with apathy or satisfaction the increasingly lawless attempts to coerce opinion in the United States.—January 17, 1920.

THE SITUATION IN GERMANY is one of uncertainty and menace. While Berlin and the other areas of disaffection are quiet under the menace of Noske's guns, the quiet can be counted upon to last only so long as these guns are held in readiness.—January 24, 1920.

THE CALIFORNIA dark horse has moved to the front in the Presidential race about a month before the scheduled time. Mr. Hoover's candidacy has received a tremendous impetus.—January 31, 1920.

Tomorrow the Movies

I. HOLLYWOOD INTERNATIONAL

BY JOHN GRIERSON

IF, AS many believe, the basis of international relationships is in course of drastic alteration, industries trading in foreign parts must examine the nature of this change. I am told, for example, that Bretton Woods must inevitably revolutionize the fishing industry in Canada because multilateral agreements preclude bilateral agreements and we can no longer "sneak behind," say, the back of Newfoundland: meaning, I take it, that the race is no longer exclusively to the strong or the smart. In the case of the fishing industry the situation calls, it is said, for a revolution in production and distribution methods which, by improving the product and meeting a real and not spurious taste, will give it greater international validity.

The analogy between films and fish should not be lightly dismissed. I could cite the case of the people of London, whose taste has been so perverted over the years that if they ever tasted a fresh fish they would certainly reject it as rotten. Both films and fish are obviously fields of illusion where standards, however widely accepted, may yet be false. The test, however, should not be the taste but the well-being of the consumer. What is called for in fish I shall now forget and consider instead, the economic relations of the film industry, the nature of its past bilateral and even unilateral arrangements, and the effect of the multilateral pressure which will presently be put upon it by nations with their own standards of nutriment.

The film has always been an international traveler. It had no trouble with national barriers when it was silent, and even now titles, dubbed-in voices, and foreign-language versions can give it an extensive market outside its country of origin. Where, as in the case of American films, the home market takes care of the cost of production, the costs of conversion are not a considerable obstacle. In any event, the English-speaking world provides an international market in itself. Of all films, those of American origin have been the most widely circulated, partly because of their style and the enterprise of their salesmen, but mostly because of the economic advantage of their very large home market. The American producer has been able to command directors, actors, and writers from all over the world and so to provide pictures with international appeal. Even when he has been most American, he has had large enough funds to produce a highly polished, chromium-plated account of his country's material progress; and this, in the years gone by, had its special attraction for less privileged peoples.

TRADE FOLLOWS THE PICTURE

To what extent this American film empire can be maintained is another matter. Great Britain has always envied the strength of the American film industry, not least because of the vast propaganda support it gave to the sale of American products. The persistent champion of English film production has not been the industry itself, which in the distribution and exhibition fields does very well out of American films and is allied at many points to American companies, but the British Board of Trade, which is concerned with the trade that follows the picture. England's protective policy has therefore been different in kind from that of countries like Germany, Italy, Spain, and the Soviet Union. These latter had specific political ideas to protect from the anarchic impact—as they no doubt conceived it—of Hollywood values. England, however, has been primarily concerned with building up an exportable product which would share screen space abroad with American films and fly the flag of England over incidental automobiles and bathtubs. Sir Alexander Korda, Carol Reed, Michael Powell, and other good British producers would of course hardly think this a sufficient account of their production motives; but it would be safe to say that the clerks of Whitehall have had more to do with the formulation of long-time film policy than the producers.

The relationship between the government and the industry is different in England from here if only because the industry is coming from behind in international competition and has needed government help. Britain has for a long time required American operators in the United Kingdom to carry a specific proportion of British product. And the government has entered boldly into an analysis of the kind of British film most likely to serve British interests abroad. As a result it has given special encouragement, not to the small budgeted film, which on the whole tends to be very English, but to the sometimes denatured million-dollar type for which international markets are an economic necessity. It has observed with great equanimity the expenditure of very large sums during the period of experimental growth, on the good ground that only by trial and error can the larger showmanship be learned. Even in the midst of war, large quasi-experimental sums are being found.

The relative strength of the British film industry is certainly greater today than it has been for years. A very large proportion of British buying power has been combined under A. J. Rank, a miller of great wealth who has only recently gone into the film business; and the same group of interests has announced its intention of progressively buying into theater and distribution systems across the world, particularly in the dominions and colonies. A different official attitude toward the industry might not so easily have allowed the large combination of buying power in the hands of one man or approved such expensive production schemes at the present time; and public opinion might be unfavorable if there were not good assurance that Mr. Rank's great venture was going to be in every sense a national one.

The strength of this new buying power is reflected at present in new and more effective arrangements for the distribution of British films in the United States. The fact that, in general, the British market constitutes the margin of real profit in American film production has at last been turned into a strong bargaining weapon. This is not to say that British films will be any more successful than before—that depends on the drawing power of the films themselves—but it is important that the distribution machinery of the United States is being increasingly engaged for films other than American.

This development is only one among many likely to affect American policy in the international field. The old days of easy monopoly have gone: in England, because of its special need for markets, but also in every country which has come to appreciate the power of the screen and has its own national interests to serve. There is a growing tendency everywhere to encourage home production. Increasing attention is being paid to the effect of American films on the mind of the people and to their relation to native philosophies and needs. On the one hand, foreign countries want Hollywood to include more native themes in its schedules of production; on the other hand, they are becoming more sensitive about the handling of such themes. In nothing is the spectacular growth of propaganda consciousness better demonstrated.

Obviously, Hollywood will require a new approach in its international operations. In the past its salesmen have done very well for it. The need tomorrow may be for representatives who can go behind the mere problem of sales to the problem of international relations and build up, as statesmen try to do, those genuinely good relations which are based on common interests.

RELATIONS WITH CANADA

One might generalize in this regard from the situation in Canada, a country of 12,000,000 people which provides as great returns to the American film industry as all of South America with a population of 75,000,000. The tastes in entertainment of Canadians are much the same as those of people south of their border; because of the connection with England an English film will perhaps do 5 per cent better in Canada, relatively, than in the United States, but this is a small difference. By and large, Canadians like the same stars, the same story line, and the same evaluations of character and issue as other Americans; Canada's own share of Hollywood stars, directors, and writers is considerable, and no one there or here knows the difference.

It might seem, therefore, that the American film could circulate as easily and happily in Canada as in its own country. But such an assumption on the part of the American film industry would be lacking in foresight. Canada is an up-and-coming nation. It feels that it has a tremendous future. It is already, it thinks, one of the greatest of the "middle" nations, and its huge agricultural and industrial output during the war and its contribution in fighting power support its claim. Inevitably, therefore, Canada is giving consideration to its place on the international screen. It certainly cannot leave its reputation entirely in the hands of the newsreel editors in New York and the producers in Hollywood, who might be so shortsighted as not to think of Canada at all.

Canada's attitude toward American films may well be an example to other countries, especially those whose native film industries are of limited strength. The natural good-will existing between Canada and the United States has made it possible for Canada to secure from cooperative discussions as much as if not more than a protective system and a competitive film industry could have given it. The Canadian content of American newsreels in Canada has been increased in recent years to a point near to satisfactory, and, just as importantly, the Canadian content in American and world newsreels has also been increased. American distributors in Canada are not only cooperating well with the government in the presentation of the nation's war effort but making it a matter of policy to obtain for Canada its measure of film representation. As a result one series of Canadian-produced short films, "The World in Action," enjoys worldwide circulation—incidentally, it is the only foreign series now shown regularly in American theaters. American companies, moreover, include numerous Canadian films in their travel talks, science films, and the like.

In addition to this cooperation in the matter of newsreels and short films, Hollywood has over the war years produced three major Canadian films and used Canadian backgrounds for others as part of an earnest attempt to provide a quid pro quo for a very useful market. Like the Hollywood productions for South American markets encouraged by the State Department, this marks the beginning of a new and responsible policy toward foreign fields. The development of such a policy would be facilitated if countries like Canada would not only bring political pressure to bear on Hollywood and London but establish machinery for the encouragement of stories and plays that would of themselves command the attention of producers.

Of course in every country there will always be some who want to see a native feature industry established and who consequently demand protective quotas. But the international field tends to be kept clear for Hollywood and London by the fact that feature production imposes tremendous financial burdens, especially for a country with a small population. It is all the more difficult for a country which is not protected by the barrier of a different language and which lies within easy reach of the pull of American salaries and other attractions.

It seems clear that the American film industry has come to the most difficult period in its long international career. Its problems reflect the foreign problems of statesmen and demand a new and high degree of international knowledge and good-will. Concessions here and lobbyings there, such as the cruder exponents of international commerce may propose, will not suffice. Hand-outs, however well-intentioned, do not please sovereign peoples, and there is a sure law of diminishing returns on political pressure when applied by great nations. International success in a sphere of influence so extensive as that of films will demand finally, as in the political sphere, considered and creative cooperation in the pursuit of common values and common ideas. Great nations with superior means of production must be expected to take the lead in this matter.

It is not certain whether Hollywood and London have gone far enough in equipping themselves for this new and considerable task, although progress has been made. Hollywood is more politically conscious today than it ever was. Many of its principals are engaged in war duties of importance and know what it is to serve the state. But this may not be enough. Closer contact needs to be established with the body of international knowledge in Washington; and it is the best of news that this is now being deliberately furthered by a scheme for installing government film specialists abroad. There is certainly room for a diplomatic force which will not just support Hollywood sales power but will supply systematic information to Hollywood producers on the larger considerations governing their foreign trade. It may be that Hollywood needs an institute of international affairs through which producers, directors, and writers can study the relationship of their films to the wider and more difficult world in which they will operate after the war. There are clearly other levels of consideration than those of buying and selling, and neither Hollywood nor London will be able to ignore them.

[This is the first of a series of four articles. The second, Pictures Without Theaters, also by Mr. Grierson, will appear next week.]

Two Terrorists on Trial

BY GEROLD FRANK

Jerusalem, December 23 (by cable)

WITH the police investigations virtually concluded, the trial of the youthful terrorists Aliahu Hakim and Ephraim Ben Zuri for the murder of Lord Moyne is expected within a fortnight. The feeling here is that the execution of the two men, both members of the small but vicious Stern gang, is inevitable: they have admitted going to Cairo to kill Moyne, and in Egypt the penalty for murder is hanging. The only question now is what political significance can be given to the trial.

Hakim and Ben Zuri will be tried before a tribunal of five civilian judges sitting in a civilian court under martial law. The proceedings will be conducted in Arabic with translations in Hebrew—the prisoners refuse to speak anything else—and in English. The public will be admitted to the trial by ticket. The prisoners have announced that they will conduct their own defense, as members of the Stern group have done in the Palestine courts. However, Hakim's father has said that while he recognized that his son committed a reprehensible deed, bringing shame and tragedy to all Palestine, he could not, as a father, have peace if he did not do all in his power in his son's behalf. He has therefore asked the well-known Jerusalem attorney, Asher Levitsky, to go to Cairo to defend the young men. Levitsky has not disclosed whether or not he will accept the case.

If the prisoners handle their own case, some idea of their defense can be gained from the books they have requested from the Egyptian authorities and are now studying in their cell. These include the Bible, a modern revolutionary history of Egypt, the Egyptian penal code, a volume by Beilinson which describes Italy's freedom fighters of 1815-17, and the Peel report.

Speculation about the trial revolves around two points: First, who if anybody backs these terrorists? Is some other country using them as pawns in an anti-British game. Second, the background and political program of the terrorists, who, it must be remembered, belong politically to the extreme right-wing nationalists and are denounced as "fascist" by the Labor Party, which constitutes the majority of the Jewish electorate in Palestine. It is believed that the prisoners will attempt to use the trial as a rostrum from which to proclaim to the world what they consider Great Britain's betrayal of its promise to Zionism. The harangues of other prisoners tried in the military courts here have been given the fullest publicity in local anti-labor newspapers.

What the prisoners say may have a bad effect on emotional Jewish youngsters in Palestine, but it must be emphasized that Zionists do not see this as another Sacco-Vanzetti case. Terrorism is abhorred here on political as well as humane grounds. The prisoners do not represent Palestine; yet they serve to highlight Palestine's grievances.

In the Wind

RALPH G. CARPENTER, director of the New Hampshire Fish and Game Department, in an interview with the Concord Daily Monitor and New Hampshire Patriot on December 1, offered the following suggestions for the economic reabsorption of World War II veterans: (1) "A few of them might well hunt and raise porcupines, commonly known as quill pigs, if they have the ingenuity to find a market for their meat." (2) "Yankee shrewdness, coupled with vision and patience, might well create a new and profitable market for quill pens, which once were the only kind used in signing official documents. Quills from ducks have been used in the past, but it is quite possible that turkeys' quills, white or black, might be used if the idea were properly cultivated."

A GENTILE BUSINESS DIRECTORY is being compiled in Chicago. The letterhead of the promoters bears this motto: "Millions of Gentiles Banded Together to Preserve the Gentile Way of Life, Gentile Business Ethics, Gentile Educational Systems, Gentile Moral Standards." The address is in the heart of the financial district.

CAPTAIN LUCIEN A. DUMAIS, a French Canadian from Montreal, has recently returned to London after nine months' work with the French maquis. He was one of seventy Canadians who parachuted into different parts of France to help organize resistance to the Germans prior to the Allied invasion. He said it was "exciting work, but too much administrative detail."

FESTUNG EUROPA: The Nazi propaganda machine in Norway has abandoned its campaign to convince the people that the forced evacuation of the northern part of the country was a "flight from Bolshevik terror." The stories of the evacuees are so uniformly unfavorable to the Germans that they have been ordered not to talk. The penalty is death. . . . A report from Prague has it that the wives of the S. S. men have been supplied with revolvers and hand grenades.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Yenan, 1945

BY PACIFICUS

AMERICAN newspapers virtually ignored the two-week session of the Second People's Congress held at the beginning of December in the bustling terraced city of Yen-an, nerve center of the Communist-led Border Regions of North China. Their boycott, maintained in the face of daily broadcasts by the Yen-an transmitter, recalled their earlier silence on Marshal Tito's Yugoslav Partisans.

There can be little doubt that the actions stemming from the congress will make a deep imprint upon political and military developments in 1945, even beyond the Border Regions with their, at present, 90,000,000 inhabitants. It is not too rash to predict that before the year is out Yen-an, and not Chungking, will be the center of military and political power in China. It will gain this position through the superior ability of the Yen-an forces, which have fought an anti-fascist war in an anti-fascist manner, to exploit the opportunities offered by the changed military situation.

The Generalissimo's recent house-cleaning is a sign that he recognizes how fundamentally the situation has changed. Previously he had believed that he would be rescued from his military and political predicament when the Americans landed somewhere along the southern coast to drive the Japanese out of China as a prelude to an attack on Japan proper. This, he thought, would enable him to deal simultaneously with the Communist-led Eighth Route and New Fourth Route armies. His hopes were deflated when the Japanese, influenced by their severe shipping and naval losses, launched a major campaign in South China to open a north-south railroad and were so successful that a landing on the China coast appeared less inviting to the Americans.

Additional Japanese naval losses off the Philippines changed the whole strategic concept of the Pacific war. Early in 1944 Admiral Nimitz had stated that he intended to strike for a Chinese port in order to attack Japan in China. After the Philippine naval battles Admiral King told Forrest Davis of the Saturday Evening Post that we could now attack Japan directly. This change in strategy means that the ejection of Japanese troops from China will probably follow rather than precede an invasion of Japan proper. In consequence, a weakened Chungking will have to depend for a longer time on its own resources, plus the small amount flown "over the Hump."

Japan's fighting power will inevitably diminish during 1945. The comparative ability of Chungking and Yen-an to exploit the opportunities thus opened will be a test of their strength—of their popular support, their military resources, and their administrative and organizational ability.

That Yen-an recognized the immediate possibilities was made clear at the congress. Lin Tsu-han, chairman of the Shensi-Kansu-Ninghsia Border Region, formerly a colleague of Sun Yat-sen and recently one of the negotiators with Chungking, told the delegates, "Fascism is at the point of collapse; victory for the democracies is already in sight." With that perspective the Congress devoted its self-critical efforts to mobilizing the people's strength for the final liberation of China.

Behind the entire discussion was the conviction that an improvement in living standards was basic to the solution of all other questions. The keystone of such improvement was held to be agrarian reform, which as put through in the Border Regions has increased production and decreased tenant-landlord strife. Rents have been reduced, in stages, from 50 or 60 per cent of the crop to 35 or 40 per cent, but at the same time the landlord has been guaranteed his rent. And since taxes have also been reduced, his position has not been worsened. Furthermore, his lessened income from tenantry has tended to push the landlord into becoming an agricultural producer himself or investing in the small local industries which the government encourages by keeping them tax free and guaranteeing a minimum profit.

The government's intention to improve the lot of the tenant and small peasant and at the same time to retain the support of the landlord was evident in the remarks of Mao Tse-tung, chairman of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, at the opening session: "Rents have been reduced," he said, "in every area, but in certain places less has been achieved than in others. Cases still occur of nominal but not real reductions. On the other hand, in some cases rents have been reduced too much, and no attention is paid to the payment of rent after reduction. Both . . . tendencies must be corrected." Nan Han-chen, head of the Finance Department of the Border Government, revealed that less than half of the expenses of the government is met by taxes. The rest is contributed by agricultural and industrial production carried on by the army and the government. In order to ease the tax burden further a progressive agricultural tax is being tried in three counties as a prelude to wider application.

The Communists reiterated their resolve to limit themselves to one-third of the places on administrative bodies. The only known exception to the rule is the Yen-an Municipal Council, seventeen of whose forty-seven members are Communists. One of the seventeen is the Japanese Communist Shisuo Koji, who is active in the Japanese People's Emancipation League headed by Susumu Okano. Among the non-Communist members twenty-one are non-partisan, five are Kuomintang members, two are Protestants, and one is a Catholic.

Speaking to the congress on the subject of political collaboration, Mao Tse-tung said:

The basis of anti-Japanese national salvation is the national united front. In liberated areas this expresses itself first of all in the "one-to-three system," under which all classes and all parties and groups cooperate. Some have done good work in this field, but some have not, and the experiences of every area should be appraised.

Communists must frequently deliberate and hold meetings with other parties and non-party groups. The aim is to break down barriers, clear away misunderstandings, and correct any bad relations, so that all will cooperate in administration and public work. Anyone who takes part in the representative council's work or performs other public duties, will be respected and hold the post with authority, no matter what party or group he belongs to.

This policy of encouraging the emergence of non-Communist—but not anti-Communist—leadership, together with the policy of conciliating landlords, has tremendously broadened the base of the Yen'an regime. While the Communist Party remains the regime's hard core, an increasing number of other interests are coalescing around it, and the Communists have had to modify their sectarian character.

One of the most important decisions of the congress was to increase the numerical strength of the regular forces of the Eighth Route and New Fourth Route armies—as distinguished from the irregular or partisan forces—from 475,000 to 650,000, and to plan a further increase as the Border Regions are able to support it and arms can be obtained. Mao Tse-tung called also for other improvements, though the fighting qualities of the Yen'an troops long since aroused the enthusiasm of foreign observers, among them Colonel Evans F. Carlson of the Makin Raiders:

Old areas must replenish the losses of their original armies. New areas should expand the number of troops furnished as economic conditions permit. But whether expanding or replenishing, areas must not increase the financial burden of the people. This point must be carefully kept in mind. Otherwise, we shall fail.

The internal unity of the army is very important. Our Eighth Route and New Fourth armies have always relied on the solidarity of officers and soldiers to win our glorious victories. But some of the military habits of the Chinese war lords still persist among our troops. Bad relations between officers and soldiers, such as betting, cursing, neglecting food supply or soldiers' diseases, not using patient education and persuasion in correcting the mistakes of soldiers, punishing freely, and even such wrong attitudes as insulting and shooting deserters, etc., must be thoroughly rooted out in 1945.

As a result of basing its military strength on a rising standard of living and the people's increasing participation in the government, the Yen'an regime has been able to retake from the Japanese areas inhabited by 88,000,000 Chinese—about one-fifth the population of pre-war China. During the last year it recaptured parts of the strategic peninsula of Shantung containing 5,000,000 people. In contrast, Chungking has not only lost territory but has seen tens of thousands of its soldiers—150,000 in North China alone—go over to the Japanese.

The growing strength of Yen'an plus the changed military situation in the Pacific presents Chungking with very difficult alternatives. Shall it grant the Communist demand for a genuine coalition government based on agrarian reform and political democracy, or shall it look among the collaborationist followers of Wang Ching-wei for support against the Communists? Needless to say, the latter course would almost certainly bring on a civil war which would indefinitely delay China's progress toward prosperity and independence.

Inflation in Europe

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

THE economic reconstruction of Europe after the military collapse of Nazi Germany will be at best extremely difficult; if Britain and America continue the policies they have followed thus far, the results may be disastrous. One of the worst dangers facing every European country after the war is inflation; and Anglo-American policy in the liberated regions has encouraged its start and its growth.

Concerning the situation in Italy, Marcello Soleri, Minister of Finance in the first Bonomi government, declared, "Everything is scarce in Italy but paper money." The condition of the currency is a nightmare; it worries responsible people in the Allied Commission and the Italian government even more, if possible, than the shortage of food. The Anglo-American administration, however, is largely to blame. The value of the lira in relation to the dollar has been set far too low—100 lire to $1. Under the Germans the purchasing power of the lira was a great deal higher.

Anne O'Hare McCormick wrote in the New York Times:

Italy is obliged to accept an imposed rate, which has had the same effect as if the American government suddenly reduced the value of a dollar to 20 cents. Prices immediately soared to meet the new rate and are rising steadily beyond it, so that they are exorbitant even for an American with his one-cent lira. The Italian with an income of 1,500 to 3,000 lire, which represents a fair average for the lower middle classes, might just as well be unemployed as try to exist on his earnings.

In other words, the growing inflation has already reduced a large part of the Italian middle class to indigence; they can no longer live on their salaries, and their savings have been almost wiped out.

The rise in prices has been incomparably greater than the rise in wages. George Baldanzi of the C. I. O., who recently spent some time in Italy, has reported cases of Italian workers who were paid $6 a month. This, he said, was less than they got under the Nazis or the Fascists. The inflation, however, is a good thing for the rich landowners, who by means of the black market have boosted the prices of the necessities of life. Enrichment of the upper classes, impoverishment of the urban middle class, destitution of the workers, sharpening of social antagonisms, intensification of the class struggle—all these developments are reported by experienced observers of the Italian scene.

One might think that the Allies would have learned something from their experience in Italy, but all the evidence indicates that they have not. The press reports that in the occupied part of Germany the value of the Reichsmark has been set at 10 cents. England and America did not at first agree on this rate. The London Economist comments—not in its political section, significantly enough, but under Business Notes:

It is now known that there was a distinct difference of opinion between the British and American governments on the issue. The British Treasury would have preferred rates of about 25 marks to the pound or about 6 marks to the dollar, which would probably have represented an undevaluation of the mark of between 30 and 40 per cent. The American Treasury got its way, and the new rate must be regarded as the first part of the Morgenthau plan to be applied to Germany. To impose a certain degree of undervaluation on the enemy's currency is only reasonable, but to exaggerate to this extent is to make inflation in Germany quite certain.

The Economist is right. An exchange rate of 10 marks to the dollar will cause severe inflation in Germany. Before the outbreak of the war the mark was worth about 40 cents. It has since depreciated somewhat, even as the dollar in the United States; the Nazis, however, by rigorous rationing and price control, have kept prices in Germany fairly stable, especially those of the necessities of life. If the value of the dollar in relation to the mark is now increased 300 per cent—if, in other words, the mark is arbitrarily reduced to 25 per cent of its former value—prices will rise 300 per cent.

One might say, "Why not? The Germans must pay the penalty of defeat, and part of it is the breakdown of their price structure." I have even heard it said that those who protest against such a policy favor a "soft peace" for Germany, and that the devaluation of the mark will mean a "hard peace." The fallacy of this becomes obvious if we consider for which classes of the population a 300 per cent inflation would be hardest, and for which it would be good business. Italy has already shown us the answer. In Germany, as in Italy, such a sharp devaluation of the currency would be a heavy blow to the workers, since wages would not rise nearly so fast as prices. The white-collar employees would also be hit. It would again be the big landowners and the big industrialists who would profit.

The lesson of Italy is as plain as day, but apparently we refuse to learn. Very well there is another lesson in the German inflation of 1920-23, which followed the same pattern; those who suffered were the workers and the middle class; the Junker landowners and the big industrialists made huge profits.

We should also realize that the effects of a German inflation would not be confined to Germany. It is proving very difficult to keep the Italian inflation localized in Italy; it would be utterly impossible in the case of Germany. No one can be so naive as to believe that the reduction of the German mark to one-quarter of its value would have no effect on adjacent countries. With the first step toward inflation in Germany, all efforts to maintain the value of the currency in France, Belgium, and Holland would be wrecked.

In this connection another fact is very important: every day brings reports that the Nazis are making preparations to go underground, setting up organizations to carry on the political war after the military defeat. Alvarez del Vayo has shown us how the Nazis are trying to establish bases in Spain and South America, but what they will require even more is a foothold in Germany itself. A German inflation brought about by the action of Britain and America would give the Nazis a vast store of political ammunition. One can well imagine the arguments of the illegal pamphlets with which they would try to influence the people. They would point out that as long as they were at the helm the mark was stable and prices were not too high, but that after the defeat all their labors were undone by the inflation which Britain and America forced on Germany.

The devaluation of the mark to 10 cents—in the face of strong British opposition—has thus far had only limited economic effect, for only a small part of Germany has been occupied. It is therefore still possible to change our course. However, great pressure from the American public would be necessary, after so stupid a beginning, to bring about a change. And to exert the necessary pressure, American public opinion would have to realize that fixing the value of European currencies is not merely a technical financial problem but one of great political importance. Every American can understand what would be the consequences in this country of a change in the value of the currency. If there were a sudden increase of 300 per cent in prices here caused by arbitrary devaluation of the dollar, the American people would rise up and sweep out of office those who were responsible. Similarly, fixing the value of the currency is a question of vital interest to the entire population of Europe. And it should be remembered that if America and Britain introduce inflation in Germany it will spread over the whole Continent.

The American administration claims that it wishes to help Europe attain economic stability and follow a middle course in politics. But if, in spite of its experience in Italy, in spite of the lessons of the former German inflation, it continues its present policies, it will undermine Europe's economy and heighten its social and political tensions. It will thus prepare the ground for revolution.

RIGHT OF ASYLUM

"Don't compromise me. I am a democrat."

Drawing by Rivero GH

BOOKS and the ARTS

DISTRUST OF BRAINS

BY JACQUES BARZUN

EVER since Andrew Carnegie supplied the country with public libraries, the public has thought of millionaire munificence as endowing learning. This has hardly been true for twenty years. There have been vast outlays for brick and mortar, for memorial halls which could be named after the donor, but these were already anachronisms. The universities had physically expanded up to and beyond their legitimate size; what they now needed was the means to support living talent. They still need it, but unfortunately for higher learning the typical bequest is one of $30,000 for cancer research. I have no love of cancer and no jealousy of medicine, but this sort of gift does nothing for higher learning. It springs from a sympathy grounded in animal fear, leaving untouched the duty to train young minds that are still free from the deadly scorpion. Taking at random a recent announcement of gifts to one institution and analyzing it, I find that of $69,900 the bulk was earmarked for medicine, chemistry, engineering, and allied sciences; a small fraction went to history, public law, business, and occupational therapy; and an anonymous donor assigned $10,000 to research in syphilis. If we count the subjects, the ratio is two to one in favor of serving animal needs—and the distribution of cash makes it more like 150 to 1.

We meet again our national faith in facts and our distrust of mind. This might be a permissible choice if it did not also amount to a mistrust of men. We think the American way respects ability and trusts in individual initiative—it may be so, but not in education. A glance at the policies of the great educational foundations will make my meaning clear. All of them naturally feel a serious responsibility in administering their vast resources. They want to avoid mistakes and they would like to see results. Nothing could be more proper, were it not that the word "see" is ambiguous, and that since the money must be given out ahead of performance, a safeguard is found in carefully planned "projects" which look as if pregnant with results. The seeing eye naturally jumps to the concrete, the familiar; and the upshot is an unfortunate subsidizing of measures instead of men, coupled with a strict accounting of "progress," of work published, in short, of "results."

I say unfortunate because I am persuaded that it is not the way to lay out money and get the most out of it. If we are agreed that the funds are meant for education, scholarship, science, art, wisdom, and good teaching—one foundation is for the advancement of teaching—then the only safe and profitable thing to do is to cast the bread upon the waters, to invest the money in men—men and women—not in things, not in projects, and not under control.* What do

I mean by "things"? I mean the secretarial apparatus, the mimeographed paper, the steel filing cabinets, of which the granting authorities are usually lavish, while they are exceedingly "careful" about awards to human beings. When I am despondent I see in my mind's eye an endless row of steel files reaching, dark green, to the moon: they are filled to bursting with records and tests and graphs, and upon each one sits the pale ghost who filled it in return for his stipend. "For the same money"—to use the vulgarest standard—he might have been a scholar, a critic, a poet, or simply an educated man, a thoughtful citizen and capable parent, with no other "purpose" in view than his own and his country's good. Which, I wonder, is the truer execution of the testator's billion-dollar bequest?

I might add that when I am despondent I do not necessarily exaggerate; perhaps I only see more vividly and comprehensively. I happen to know that it costs one foundation $1,200 a year to maintain a young man who is working with great knowledge and fervor at musical composition based on new scales and instruments. Well, at the institution where he works are whole attics filled with discarded tests once part of a great piece of educational research. Counting all the wasted typing and man-hours of drudgery, one attic's worth would keep the musician in funds for ten years. Double his grant and he might achieve his results in less time, certainly with less wear and tear. The great obstacle to this obvious improvement is that the educational tests were tangible, undeniable "facts," though useless; whereas a piece of strange music or even an instrument bristling with stops and keys seems dubious, insubstantial, hardly fit for listing in an Annual Report.

And so the rich subsidies of education are frittered away in schemes. I have on my desk an Evaluation Study of a whole college—$10,000; a report on Freshman exploratory work—$30,000 a year for five years; a test on "forms of thinking" conducted at a school of education—$27,000; a project on "approaches to history"—$10,000 renewed for three years; a comparative examination of methods of conducting field work—$100,000. The printed mass takes up the room of a good set of Poe's works or the "Three Musketeers" with all its sequels. It cost eyesight, adrenaline, and the social investment of dozens of college educations before the first of these thousands of useless pages could even be penned. And do not think that it is one man's biased view that puts their value so low. Go to the very institutions where each "project" was undertaken and look for its "results." They are non-existent. The very memory of the deed has been forgotten, and of all those who received the handsome report fresh from the press I am perhaps the only one who has kept it. Its use, if any, now, on this printed page of mine, as an example of How Not to Do It.

* The American Council of Learned Societies and the Guggenheim Foundation should be excluded from this generality. They work on the principle I advocate and their experience justifies it.

My contention is that even if the chances of choosing good men were purely those of interviewers' luck—and it may be put as low as one error in two—the return in twenty years would thoroughly condemn the present practice. There is something twice delusive about the current method, for what it amounts to is the invariable choice of men whose minds run to papery accomplishments, and I do not mean men who will write books. I mean our old friends the fact-finders, who "study conditions," devise tests, and evaluate processes. The work of one young man I know is before me, and it concludes after the most harrowing survey of data that personnel maladjustments—he means students in trouble—are due to emotional disturbances. The author is ambitious and hard-working, a good money risk, ideal foundation fodder. Encouraged by the system, he has mastered the technique of this artificial "success," and he gaily helps his elders waste the precious life blood of learning that money could become.

WHOSE POWDER KEG?

BY ELI CHAMBERLAIN

IF THE Balkan countries are left alone they will succeed in forming a Balkan federation, to their own and Europe's advantage. A series of informing books on Balkan matters, of which Miss West's "Black Lamb and Grey Falcon" may be singled out as excellent of its kind, has brought enlightenment on Balkan problems but has not dispelled the inveterate view that the Balkans are a congeries of primitive peoples whose outstanding characteristic has been their mutual hostility and whose principal employment has been that of dragging into their quarrels those advanced states which have sought to keep a beneficent eye upon them. Even groups and individuals who have promoted schemes for pacifying the Balkans have done so with the aloof superiority of a Lady Bountiful, taking little notice of the real needs of the political minors for whom they wished to act.

But recent events have raised questions in the minds of even superficial readers of war news. In all the Balkan countries under German occupation there arose strong resistance movements which combined an extensive program of internal reform with the immediate goal of liberation. In each country a smaller resistance movement, usually with the word "national" in its title, professed hostility to the Germans but manifested even greater hostility to its liberal competitor. The support which the Western Allies extended to the liberal movements was grudging and inadequate. The support which they extended to the small "nationalist" groups was much more substantial, despite the fact that the "nationalist" leaders, notably Abas Kupi in Albania, Mihailovich in Yugoslavia, and Zervas in Greece, were also in contact with the Germans, who were willing to support such groups as an economical device for combating the larger resistance movements. Despite both German and British support of the "nationalists," the liberation movements have prevailed, most unexpectedly perhaps in the case of Enver Hoxha's L. N. C. in Albania, most spectacularly in the case of Tito, and against the most determined opposition in the case of Greece's E. A. M. Without outside interference the progress of the liberation movements would have been speedier and less costly.

The remarkable thing about these movements is the identity of their goals and their ability to secure the cooperation of diverse political parties for the attainment of these goals. Between the disparate movements also relations have been cordial. Strains are to be expected on questions of territorial claims—the perennially vexatious questions of Macedonia, western Thrace, northern Epirus-southern Albania, the Kosovo area. In each case the liberation movements have affirmed their countries' rights to disputed areas, but it has been the nationalist groups which have made most capital with extravagant irredentist claims. It is not unreasonable to expect that the parties involved, if they are not pushed about by outside pressures, will be able to evolve amicable settlements. Yugoslavia and Bulgaria are advocating an autonomous Macedonia, to be incorporated into a Balkan federation. Greece is reluctant to yield its Macedonia to such a solution, but if its foreign policy is unhampered Greece too may be expected to reach an agreement with its neighbors.

A thoughtful and timely study of federation movements in the Balkans, dedicated, significantly, "to the peoples of the Balkans who in fighting fascism today make possible their federation tomorrow," has just appeared. This is L. S. Stavrianos's "Balkan Federation: A History of the Movement Toward Balkan Unity in Modern Times" (Smith College Studies in History, Volume 27, 75 cents). There have been a number of previous studies of Balkan federation, particularly in connection with the series of Balkan conferences held in the early 30's for the stated purpose of achieving Balkan rapprochement and eventually Balkan federation. But these works are fragmentary; the merit of Professor Stavrianos's work is that it comprehends the entire subject, and not merely as a diplomatic jigsaw but with the lives and interests of the peoples involved kept steadily in view.

The year 1914 marks a break in the motivation of the drive for federation. From the eighteenth century until that year much diplomatic intrigue and many speeches and brochures were devoted to schemes for Balkan federation. Detailed and critical study of each reveals that none arose out of popular conviction or was calculated to meet popular needs, but that all were contrived to promote some nationalist interest, usually independence or territorial aggrandizement. The great powers and Balkan statesmen alike used federation as an effective slogan when it served their current purposes to do so, and discarded it when other devices seemed more efficacious.

After 1914 agitation for federation became a genuine expression of people who desired it for its own sake, for the benefits it would bring to the people directly affected, and not as a means to some remoter political end. Two groups devoted themselves to the cause:

(a) Liberal intellectuals, journalists, professional men, who hoped that by educating public opinion they could induce Balkan governments to settle their differences, establish closer relations, and eventually unite in a federation. They attained their apogee in the four Balkan conferences of 1930-33, which they organized under the auspices of the

"WHY not government by Gallup Poll?
... This highly informative book is the devastating answer for your fascist friends."
—STERLING NORTH, New York Post.

What Our People Think

BY WILLIAM A. LYDGATE

Editor of the Gallup Poll

"REAFFIRMS FAITH IN DEMOCRACY"

"I liked this book a lot. It told me a lot about ourselves; it reaffirms my faith in the democratic form of government. It proves one thing conclusively—that the opinion of the people is truer, more honest, and by far much more advanced than anything any single person or group of persons has to offer. It shows that America, in spite of wars and politicians, is going forward."—Philadelphia Inquirer.

"TRUSTWORTHY"

"The most trustworthy report of the views of the well-known Man in the Street that it would be possible to get together."—Boston Herald.

"INSPIRING"

"Inspires the reader with confidence in the intelligence and common sense of the average American. . . . Mr. Lydgate deserves the thanks of the public."—Hartford Courant.

$2.50, at all booksellers

THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY
432 FOURTH AVENUE NEW YORK 16

To Be Schooled in the Best Thought Produced by the Social Science of Our Age—Marxism—Read and Subscribe to # Political Affairs

JANUARY CONTENTS

The Study of Lenin's Teachings.....	Earl Browder
The Crisis Is in Britain—
Not Only in Greece!.....	Eugene Dennis
An Estimate of the Military Situation.....	Robert Thompson
China Needs Democracy and Unity.....	Mao Tse-tung
Two Conventions of Labor.....	Roy Hudson
The C. P. A.—Our Most Indispensable
Weapon.....	John Williamson
The Constitution of the U. S. S. R.—
Guarantee of Democracy.....	P. Tumanov
Universal Military Training.....	Carl Ross
The People Won in Texas!.....	David Carpenter

BOOK REVIEWS:

A Perversion of I. L. G. W. U. History.....Rose Wortis
For a Deeper Understanding of China.....Frederick V. Field

20¢ a Copy. Subscription $2.00

Political Affairs is a magazine of, by and for American labor, for genuine progressives and forward-looking people in every walk of life who seek authoritative, scientific analyses of political issues and problems as they unfold in the national and world arena. Political Affairs, like its predecessor, The Communist, is edited by Earl Browder, and is the leading journal of Marxist thought and opinion in the United States. Subscribe today!

NEW CENTURY PUBLISHERS

133 Broadway

New York 3, N. Y.

Universal Peace Congress. Their scheme was based on the League of Nations and collective security, and when these collapsed, Balkan conferences and Balkan entente collapsed with them.

(b) Left-wing movements, such as labor and agrarian parties. Since the end of the nineteenth century Socialists and Communists had been promoting, in word and deed, the notion of a federation of Socialist or Communist states. The agrarians, for their part, sought to attain a romantic and somewhat utopian "Green International" of peasant commonwealths. These leftist organizations, both industrial and agrarian, reached their height in the revolutionary period after 1918, when Stambolisky was in power in Bulgaria, when Radich was the uncrowned king of Croatia, and when Communist parties were strong in urban areas. But in each of the Balkan countries left-wing movements were crushed by dictatorships.

In the liberation movements arising during the present war, however, these left-wing parties have again become active; they are in the ascendancy among the Partisans of Yugoslavia, the Fatherland Front of Bulgaria, the Democratic Front in Rumania, the E. A. M. in Greece, and the L. N. C. in Albania. And they have revitalized the federation movement, with the result that it is now stronger and nearer realization than at any time in the past. It is this fact which makes Professor Stavrianos's book so timely and so significant. The book should be read by all who profess a concern for the post-war security of the Balkans and of Europe and who at the same time use the resources of the democracies to frustrate democracy in the Balkans. The history of 150 years demonstrates that the prerequisite for Balkan federation and peace are, first, democratic regimes in the Balkans and, second, a system of collective security. There can be no enduring peace among the Balkan states or between the Balkans and the rest of Europe if the anti-democratic pre-war regimes are restored.

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

IT IS INTERESTING NEWS that the United Automobile Workers have established a book club which will distribute books at moderate cost to members of the union who are interested. The New York publishers Reynal and Hitchcock have been retained as consultants and advisers on technical and professional matters; the selection of books will be made by the Educational Department of the union. Six books will be distributed annually.

The Labor Book Club, as it is to be called, will not be a "left" book club. The selections will include popular novels as well as serious books on national and international affairs. It is assumed that workers, when they do read, read the same sort of books that other people do. This seems to me a sensible assumption. The statement of Reynal and Hitchcock, when it speaks of the "potentially vast market" the Labor Book Club may tap, makes the further assumption that workers are not primarily readers of books. This also is true, I think. By and large, most people, including workers, read magazines instead of books.

The Labor Book Club, it seems to me, is bound to increase the number of book readers. This is generally, and rather loosely, considered a "good thing." I see no particular virtue in reading a book like "Forever Amber" instead of a serial in the Saturday Evening Post. It's not necessarily true that the person who begins by reading "Forever Amber" will eventually get to "War and Peace." But there's always a chance of it, especially among the young, and the Educational Department of the U. A. W. has an opportunity, which is almost frightening, to mold the taste of a large number of readers. The job of selection will be difficult and delicate—and fascinating as well. The Educational Department won't get very far if it doesn't give the members of the Labor Book Club what they want, or think they want—the distinction is important. They will want to read what's popular, and though good books are often popular, popular books are even more often bad. It is probably true that bad books drive out good, but I'm still wide-eyed enough to believe that at a certain point in the development of a reader, good books drive out bad. And by way of a footnote, I hope the Labor Book Club won't be confined permanently, as it probably will be at first, to current books.

Anyway, I shall be extremely interested in the selections of the Labor Book Club, of which the first six are to be announced this month.

FRANK ROSS PRODUCTIONS informs me that "The Robe," which F. R. P. is going to produce in Technicolor, has now sold more than a million and a half copies, "making the property" (my italics) one of the "greatest of great American best-sellers." What the devil does "great" mean anyway? I am informed further that for every 100 persons who have read the book, 67 are waiting to read it, and that it is exerting a powerful influence on the lives of thousands.

"It is the intention of Frank Ross and Mervyn Le Roy," says the letter—which, if you must know, is mimeographed except for the address—"to keep faith in every possible way with this ever-widening public. For that purpose Mr. Ross has budgeted over $4,000,000 to produce the picture."

I can't quote the whole letter. Suffice to say that Frank Ross Productions wants my advice on casting the film—and will I please send in suggestions.

Frankly, Mr. Ross, I haven't read the book, and I think I'll wait for the picture. Meanwhile, you have given me a new slant on the American—and Canadian—people. They are obviously made up of (1) those who have read "The Robe" and are now absorbed in deciding, en masse, who should play Marcellus, Demetrius, and Diana; (2) those who are reading "The Robe" and mustn't be disturbed; and (3) those who are waiting to read "The Robe" and have gone to war or are working in munitions factories just to pass the time until they can get hold of a copy.

SHAPE OF THINGS TO COME: Our Famous Corset Salon, always with an eye to the future, has been lifting the bosom and tapering the waistline for months.—Advt. . . Judging by the success of "Harvey," what this country needs is a good six-foot rabbit. . . I notice someone is bringing out a book on the problem teacher. It's about time.

Coming

IN EARLY ISSUES OF THE NATION

JOHN GRIERSON'S article in this issue is the first in a series of four articles—TOMORROW THE MOVIES—on the development of the motion picture as a social force. His second article, PICTURES WITHOUT THEATERS, will appear next week. It will be followed by HOLLYWOOD GOES TO WAR and IS HOLLYWOOD SWINGING LEFT? by DOROTHY JONES, former head of OWI's Film Reviewing and Analysis Section, who in these articles speaks for herself.

✱

STUART CHASE in the next issue contributes the last of three articles from his forthcoming book, "Democracy Under Pressure." This article, WAYS AND MEANS, discusses what can be done to curb the pressure groups and end the recurring deadlocks which are growing so disastrous for us all.

✱

A CHINESE SCHOLAR, who must remain anonymous, has written an analysis of education in China today which shows how political corruption and reaction impinge upon the minds of children through a school system designed to promote faith in feudalism and distrust of democracy.

✱

SIDNEY HOOK, noted American social and political philosopher, joins issue with T. S. ELIOT on the latter's conception of culture, society, and religion.

Convenient Order Form

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

Please enter my subscription for the period indicated below. I enclose $..... or, Bill me ☐

☐ 1 YEAR $5 ☐ 2 YEARS $8 ☐ 3 YEARS $11

Name.....

Address.....

City..... Zone..... State.....

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 per year extra.

1-6-45

BRIEFER COMMENT

Nationalism or Peace

WE MIGHT AS WELL start with a truism: Josephus Daniels is eminently likable. He is modest: if he praises his own administration of the navy, it is in legitimate self-defense. I could detect but one case of egocentricity in the latest volume of his autobiography, "The Wilson Era: Years of Peace, 1910-1917" (Chapel Hill, $4). In 1916 California was the pivotal state. It went to Wilson, because Daniels had expanded the naval establishments at Mare Island and San Diego. A touching expression of faith in the potency of the pork barrel.

Daniels's great hero is Bryan, to whom he pays a heartfelt and really fine tribute. Wilson he respected, admired, and even loved; but Wilson at his most democratic, when he swept aside court etiquette at the White House, claimed to be "merely a gentleman." Bryan and Daniels were just folks.

Like Bryan, like Wilson, Daniels was an obstinate and thoroughgoing neutral. But they were not alone: Daniels quotes words of Theodore Roosevelt's which the fiery Colonel would have preferred posterity to forget: "I am not passing judgment upon Germany's action [the invasion of Belgium]. I admire and respect the German people. I am proud of the German blood in my veins." So far so good; but he proceeds: "When a nation feels that the issue of a contest in which, for whatever reason, it finds itself engaged will be national life or death, it is inevitable that it should so act as to save itself from death and perpetuate life." Teddy was right: there is no law for the true national-ist. We shall have to choose between nationalism and peace.

For Daniels the snakes in the grass were House, Lansing, and Page. He makes a good case for his own attitude. He was ready to abandon neutrality in the defense of principles; but what House, Lansing, and Page urged and secured was an alliance with Great Britain. So the crusade for democracy was from the first entangled with "my ally, right or wrong."

Well worth reading, this book—and not merely because it is pleasant and chattily informative. Bryan and Daniels stood for a large and thoroughly sound element in our people. They love peace, and are willing to organize for peace; but they would prefer isolation to imperialism, power politics, and diplomatic intrigue. That element is still with us. It will never guarantee a peace concocted in secrecy and imposed by a new Axis. It were unrealistic to ignore that basic fact.

ALBERT GUERARD

Washington Irving's Western Journal

ON HIS RETURN from Europe in 1832, after seventeen years abroad, Washington Irving said, "I come from countries lowering with doubt and danger, where the rich man trembles and the poor man frowns—where all repine at the present and dread the future. I come from these, to a country where all is life and animation." His eagerness to extend his knowledge of America led him to join a government commission on a visit to the region then newly set apart for the Indian tribes, in what is now Oklahoma. His "Journal" of that trip is here presented as an item in the American Exploration and Travel Series, meticulously edited by John Francis McDermott (University of Oklahoma Press, $3.50). Its chief interest to readers of American literature is that it furnishes a comparison with its author's "Tour of the Prairies," which he worked up from these notes. It is revealing to watch Irving, the inveterate lover of the picturesque, transform his French guide and buffalo hunter into the comic servant of European tradition, into a pale imitation of Gil Blas. As a result of being so saturated in literary allusions, Irving missed the chief opportunities afforded by this experience for fresh and lively creation of actual frontier types. Mr. McDermott makes this point tellingly, and urges that greater authenticity attaches to Irving's journal than to his finished book. But the journal itself is very fragmentary, though it does add to our social history some details of frontier customs as well as the day-to-day account of a company of Western rangers, robustly casual and unmilitary in their behavior.

F. O. MATTHIESSEN

A JOURNAL OF LIBERAL OPINION

The CHRISTIAN REGISTER A UNITARIAN MONTHLY

STEPHEN H. FRITCHMAN, Editor

Religion and the Liberal Churches, Education, Domestic and International Affairs,
Poetry, Reviews.

Recent Contributors

LION FEUCHTWANGER
JOSEPH E. DAVIES
ROCKWELL KENT
MAX LERNER
JOHANNES STEEL
LEVERETT SALTONSTALL
PHELPS PUTNAM
LOUIS ADAMIC

LEWIS O. HARTMAN
JAMES LUTHER ADAMS
FREDERICK MAY ELIOT
A. EUSTACE HAYDON
FRANCIS MacMAHON
SIDNEY HILLMAN
GENEVIEVE TAGGARD
HOWARD FAST

Subscribe Today — $1.50 for 12 issues

25 BEACON STREET • BOSTON 8, MASS.

Memoir and Opinion

BY FAR THE GREATER PART of "Our Jungle Diplomacy," by William Franklin Sands in collaboration with Joseph M. Lalley (Chapel Hill, $2.50), is taken up with Mr. Sands's lively, fragmentary, and very opinionated recollections of his career as a United States diplomat in Panama, Guatemala, and Mexico. This material, the author alleges, warrants and sustains a brief but violent and quite unbalanced attack on almost the entire tradition of American foreign policy. Some of the points can be reached and reinforced from other positions; yet in this present book they appear as ill-supported observations. Mr. Sands, were he a Briton, might perhaps be thought to suffer from an Indian liver. At least, his disequilibrium of temper is easily recognized when he writes of President Wilson's aid to Carranza as follows: "Mr. Wilson's repugnance to retail political murder prompted him to provide the guns and munitions for two decades of wholesale murder, robbery, and civil war." There are many remarks as extravagant as this. Needless to say, Mr. Sands has reactionary views on the Mexican Revolution, which he fallaciously interprets as largely a succession of racial phenomena, and as an event which might have been prevented by Mr. Thompson, a former American ambassador, had he not been stupidly dismissed. At least, Mr. Sands, in a characteristic passage, tells us that when Madero appealed to Thompson for help against the dictator Díaz, the American ambassador concluded his reply with the words, "As long as I remain in the embassy there will be no revolution." For this reason, Mr. Sands declares, Thompson's dismissal "was a decision that would ultimately affect the lives and deaths of millions of human beings." On page 239 he says, explicitly, that the chief fruit of American jungle diplomacy is the "disastrous war" in which we are now engaged. He is explicit, again, when he declares that our promotion of the Panamanian revolution of November 3, 1903, provided the Japs with pattern and inspiration, and apparently cause, for the seizure of Korea in February, 1904. One had hitherto thought of that event as part of the conflict of Russian and Japanese imperialism, which had already reached a state of war in February, 1903. The vigilant specialist in Central American affairs may pick up some few particles of useful knowledge from this book, but it is too idiosyncratic to have political value for the general reader. As a volume of memoirs it offers some entertainment.

RALPH BATES

Japan's "New Order"

SINCE MANY JOURNALISTS were included among the civilian Americans interned by the Japanese in Asia, their published accounts are beginning to add up to an informative library on conditions in the "co-prosperity sphere." These conditions, as outlined by Russell Brines in "Until They Eat Stones" (J. B. Lippincott, $3), were not so good more than a year ago; undoubtedly, they are much worse now. New aspects of the life of American internees in Manila and Shanghai are described by Brines, who covered much the same itinerary as Royal Arch Gunnison. He is at his best in handling the observed data in the Philippines and the Shanghai area. While his further appraisals of conditions and policy in the lands of Southeast Asia, in North China and Manchuria, and in Japan proper are not without occasional errors of detail, they add up to an unusually comprehensive picture of what Japan has been doing in these occupied territories since 1941. Those who are curious about the subject may read the last half of this work with considerable profit.

T. A. BISSON

MOTION PICTURES

20TH CENTURY FOX PRESENTS

MOSS HART'S

WINGED VICTORY

Produced by DARRYL F. ZANUCK

Directed by GEORGE CUKOR

On the Stage:

NICHOLAS BROTHERS - Gil Maitson

Extra! JACK DURANT

Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

A Daring Picture on a Hush-Hush Subject!

TWO CITIES FILMS presents

MR. EMANUEL

starring

FELIX AYLMER

with

GRETA GYNT and WALTER RILLA

Opening Saturday, January Sixth

Brandt's GOTHAM B'way and 47th St.

"One of Hollywood's finest achievements!" . . .

Rose Pelwick, N. Y. Journal-American

Twentieth Century-Fox

presents

A. J. CRONIN'S

THE KEYS OF THE KINGDOM

Directed by JOHN M. STAHL

Produced by JOSEPH L. MANKIEWICZ

Now Playing RIVOLI B'way at 49th St.

STAGE PLAYS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (in association with Jack H. Skirball)

JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL

The FRANZ WERFEL - S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY - Staged by ELIA KAZAN

LOUIS CALHERN — OSCAR KARLWEIS

MARIANNE STEWART — HAROLD VERMILYEA

MARTIN BECK THEATRE—45th Street, West of 6th Avenue

Evenings at 8:30 Mats. Thurs. &amp; Sat. 2:30

MICHAEL TODD presents BOBBY CLARK IN

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT &amp; DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT with GEORGE GIVOT — PAUL HAAKON — WILBUR EVANS

SONGS BY COLE PORTER

MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway

MATS. Wednesday and Saturday, 2:30

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

ROSE FELD'S little sketches about Sophie Halenczik were not what most people thought of as typical New Yorker material. At least, however, they did not appear out of place when one found them in the New Yorker's pages, and it seemed reasonable to suppose that a dramatization on which the author collaborated would exhibit some equivalent of the quality which made them acceptable to readers who were sophisticated in either the good or bad sense of that unsatisfactory word. In the light of any such expectations, however, "Sophie" (The Playhouse) is simply incredible, for it turns out to be a kind of "Abie's Irish Rose" in which the tale of a love affair between the scion of an old American family and the daughter of a Czech immigrant is told with all the subtlety of Miss Nichols's masterpiece. For all I know it may find and please a large audience, but if it does, that audience is not likely to include many of Sophie's admirers in her former incarnation.

Already this season we have been given abundant opportunity to study the methods of the dramatizer and to compare plays with the novels or short stories from which they were taken. At least one adaptation, "The Late George Apley," is an extremely skillful job. One or two are reasonably satisfactory, one or two are passable despite the fact that a certain diffuseness in the material and a certain tendency of the action to wobble uncertainly indicate clearly enough that the story was not originally conceived in the dramatic form. But we have had nothing else which had suffered so disastrous a transmogrification as this of "Sophie" into hokum of the most obvious sort. No doubt part of the explanation lies in the fact that in no other case did the dramatizer undertake to deal with material which furnished him with so little that could be translated directly into dialogue or action.

Those who have read the original sketches will remember that their method is exceedingly indirect. Sophie is an industrious and useful servant. To her mistress, who tells the tale, she appears slow, stubborn, inarticulate, and of dubious intelligence. But occasionally she drops some remark concerning some acquaintance or some member of her family, and, after persistent questioning, she yields a fantastic story—about the suitor whom she dismissed because she suspected the virility of a man too careful of his digestion; about her son who doubted the responsibility for an illegitimate child until she invented a tall tale about the birthmarks hereditary in the family; above all, about her pride in being an American. But none of the events is ever brought directly before our eyes, and none of them ever ceases to have the vagueness of distant, not quite comprehended things. The Sophie in the kitchen is real; the Sophie who conducts with great competence a highly complicated private life is a legendary figure in whom one hardly believes and concerning whom, therefore, almost anything seems at least as credible as anything else.

In the play, on the other hand, we are led directly into Sophie's own house and presented with her adventures in detailed as well as concrete form. Katina Paxinou, the Greek actress, plays the heroine, not as a slow-moving peasant but as a matriarch of Mediterranean vivacity; and the director has filled the stage with the incessant noise and bustle of a George Abbott farce. Several of the incidents are recognizable in outline as drawn from the original sketches, but once the veil of indirectness has been discarded they cease to be either interesting or credible, and a sad attempt has been made to bolster them with half that repertory of gags which ceased to be standard a quarter of a century ago—including that about a postman who takes a personal interest in his clients' mail and that involving a vast potter about a chamber pot which Sophie considers a proper ornament for the front hall as long as it is tastefully concealed in what, I believe, used to be called a "commode."

If Miss Feld thought this play a reasonable dramatic equivalent of her sketches, then the fact suggests a curious commentary on the writer's gift and the extent to which writers themselves do not always understand what they have done. If she merely stood by while her work was mistreated, then it suggests a sad commentary on the price authors sometimes pay for the willingness to permit attempts at commercial exploitation. In any event, one moral is clear. The dramatizer who selects a story to work upon should assure himself either that it can be lifted pretty directly to the stage or that, if it can't, he knows how to recapture some of its quality in a different form.

THE UNITIES and the proprieties of the classic stage are disrespected with a vengeance in the current Harlem production, "Walk Hard" (the American Negro Theater). And yet the play, acted with skill and enthusiasm, has "punch" and, sometimes, elements of good drama. "Walk Hard" is not, as it now stands, in a class with "Anna Lucasta." If it is to be brought to midtown, it will need rewriting and polishing. It wants more unity and integration. A young Negro boxer is the too tenuous link between a number of different problems, one of which is his own psychological difficulties when faced with the others. The young boxer, a serious-minded, wholesome boy, is bewildered by his encounter with the uncomprehending and vicious world. He is exploited by racketeer boxing managers, and he inevitably runs afoul of "Jim Crow." In addition to its indictment of the world of small-time professional boxing, "Walk Hard" is a protest against "Jim Crow" and a challenge to combat it. Then, too, a certain amount of love interest is woven into the play. Unfortunately it is neither altogether a psychological study nor altogether a social document; it is not powerful drama either. It would be a more effective production if it pulled in fewer directions at once and if its realism were less vulgar. Foul-mouthed plug-uglies and drunken whores may make for local color, but in the theater suggestion often goes farther than the real thing. In spite of its shortcomings, however, "Walk Hard" is an interesting play, and the American Negro Theater deserves to be encouraged.

The A. N. T., in its program, solicits contributions to its building fund. Certainly its present installation is singularly bad. Seated squarely behind a thick pillar in the A. N. T.'s cellar theater, I found it very hard to follow the action on the tiny stage. The A. N. T. is a tax-exempt organization and, I should say, worthy of support. (The address of the A. N. T. is 104 West 136th Street, New York.)

M. G.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

WHILE I was watching "The Keys of the Kingdom," and for a few days afterward, I liked it quite well for its sincerity and for what then seemed its reasonably clean effort to present a hero whose heroism is moral. As I think it over, much of the sincerity and of the ethics seems beefy, uncomfortable, love-your-fellow-mannish, and in general rather uninteresting. I think it cheap to convince the audience that a priest's a male for all that by giving him a sweetheart, then knocking her off in order to provide him with manly rather than godly reasons for spending the rest of the show in a cassock. The relationship between the priest and a handsome mother superior is unusual for films and brings a couple of good scenes, but I disliked its being fed the audience as a sort of loveless love interest. It seems a little weak, for that matter, to spend most of your two hours in China in order that those who can't take their moral conflicts, such as they are, neat can always chase them with something pleasantly exotic. I wonder, too, why I thought Gregory Peck a particularly gifted actor. Now, it seems to me that he probably has talent, in a still semi-professional stage, and that I was moved and misled rather by his newness, his unusual handsomeness, and his still more unusual ability to communicate sincerity. There are, however, some fully unquestionable pieces of acting—a beautiful one by Sir Cedric Hardwicke, a good if broad one by Vincent Price, a disciplined, highly charged one by Rosa Stradner, and I imagine a good one by Edmund Gwenn; I can't wholly like or trust my judgment of the sort of mellow old man he plays here. Actually, I suppose it's a pretty good movie all around, but I feel about it as I might if I were given the original novel, bound in veal, for Christmas, and felt I had to read it with care. I am, incidentally, getting a little tired of seeing movies thought of as "religious" which carry not much more religious meaning or insight or adventurousness than a bourgeois's good intentions at New Year's. Not that priests would be by any means necessary to a good religious picture. I can't help noticing that they have never yet been shown on the screen at their real business, public or private; just as screen lovers are seldom shown to be capable of love.

"Winged Victory" has some briskly interesting and well-assembled material about the training and testing and rejecting phases of Air Force life. Aside from that I suppose it is all right, but I don't enjoy having anyone try to persuade me, so cheerfully and energetically, that the Air Force personnel is without exception composed of boy scouts old enough to shave. "Here Come the Waves" is an almost totally negligible musical, which does, however, involve Bing Crosby, Betty Hutton (in a double role), and Sonny Tufts. I would enjoy Crosby even if he did not amusingly kid Sinatra, and probably even if he did nothing but walk across a shot; I may begin to tire of Betty Hutton's violence some day, but I haven't yet; and though Sonny Tufts's work is almost wholly composed of "natural" mannerisms, I think most of them natural and entertaining. "Can't Help Singing" miscarries Deanna Durbin, a Jerome Kern score, and a trip across North America in 1849. It seems to me this could have been a beautiful and gay picture; unfortunately it is made without much feeling for either beauty or gaiety. "Music for Millions" so uses Margaret O'Brien and Jimmy Durante and June Allison and Jose Iturbi and a symphony orchestra and God only knows how many dollars as to get close to the least good possible out of any of them. "Hollywood Canteen" tempted two Albany bank presidents each to buy $10,000,000 (ten million dollars) of war bonds in order that one might "stand in" for Errol Flynn and the wife of the other for Bette Davis at a "Proxy Premiere" in that city. Buy a war bond and a ticket to the show—the proceeds go to the real Hollywood Canteen—but take care to invest in a bar of nose candy on your way through the lobby.

IS RELIGION A DETERRENT TO CRIME?

Facts and figures disprove the accusation that the American public school is "godless," and show that religious instruction in the classroom is no guarantee of a solution for the crime problem. For a fully documented, statistical analysis of this important question, read

"Catholic Education and Crime," by L. H. Lehmann,

in the JANUARY issue of

"THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE"

— Edited by a group of Former Roman Catholic Priests —

Factual, carefully-documented information on the aims and activities of the Roman Catholic Church

Subscription Only $1.00 A Year (10 Issues).

Canada and Foreign, $1.25. Single Copies, 15 Cents.

SEND ALSO $2.00 for Special Combination Offer of the two timely books on the Catholic Church:

✎ "CRUX ANSATA—AN INDICTMENT OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH," by H. G. Wells, and "BEHIND THE DICTATORS," by L. H. Lehmann.

AGORA PUBLISHING CO.,
229 West 48th Street,
New York 19, N. Y.

- ☐ For inclosed $1.00 send me a year's subscription for "THE CONVERTED CATHOLIC MAGAZINE," beginning with the January, 1945, issue:
- ☐ I am adding $2.00 for combination offer of "CRUX ANSATA" and "BEHIND THE DICTATORS."

Total $.....

Name .....

Address .....

City (and Zone No.).....State.....

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

PROKOFIEV's new Sonata Opus 94 for violin and piano, which Szigeti played at his Carnegie Hall recital with Harry Kaufman, is Peter-and-the-Wolf-ish, and therefore pleasant to listen to once but not interesting to hear a second time. Once is enough also for Stravinsky's Duo Concertant (1932), in which the method that produces amusing results in the gay Gigue produces a horrid distorted lyricism in the serious movements. For the first time in my experience Szigeti, who was in top form, played with a pianist who had musicianship and vitality comparable with his own; and it was wonderful to hear (Kaufman is, then, a third ensemble pianist, in addition to Rupp and Balsam, whom the New Friends might have engaged to play sonatas with Szigeti instead of Arrau). And it was astounding all over again to hear what Szigeti does with Bach's A minor Sonata for unaccompanied violin—to hear, that is, the illusion of eloquence and power created in this arid music by the eloquence and power of the performance.

I heard part of the broadcast of Eugene Istomin's performance of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 with the New York Philharmonic, and admired his sensitive treatment of music and instrument. The treatment of the music was in fact too sensitive: Istomin has a tendency to linger too long over the ends of phrases, possibly out of sheer excess of the warm musical feeling that is evident in his playing.

Victor's one set (980; $5.75) for January offers excerpts from Puccini's "La Bohème," recorded—presumably before the war—by Albanese, Gigli, and others with the Milan Scala Orchestra under Berrettoni. They comprise the two popular arias and final duet from Act 1, Musetta's aria from Act 2, the farewell and the quartet from Act 3, the Rodolfo-Marcello duet and the final scene from Act 4. As I have had occasion to mention before, Puccini was my first love in opera, but now I cannot endure the excessive sentimentalities and archnesses of this music, which moreover lend themselves to the stylistic mannerisms of Italian tenors and sopranos that make them even worse. These "mannerisms" flourish luxuriantly in almost every phrase that is to be heard in this new set; as for the singing apart from style, Albanese's voice is fresher and lovelier than it is today, Gigli's is very beautiful when it is not straining for iron power in high notes; Tatiana Menotti's is the tremulously shrieking soprano that apparently is bred for in Musettas; and Afro Poli's is quite a good baritone. The conductor's job in this performance, as in most performances of this opera, is merely to follow the great singers in their extravagances humbly—which Berrettoni does.

On a single disc (10-1121; $.75) is a Prelude and Fugue in E minor by Bach (Novello II, 44; Peters Book 242, 88) played by E. Power Biggs on the Baroque Organ in the Germanic Museum of Harvard University. I find the Prelude as uninteresting now as I did when I listened to it played by Commette on Columbia 14273-D, and the Fugue only a little more impressive. Biggs plods through them in his usual four-square fashion; the reverberant recording occasionally does not reproduce the polyphony clearly.

On another single (11-8695; $1) are the Mad Scene and Death of the Miller from Dargomizhsky's "Russalka," sung by Chaliapin with Pozemkovsky, tenor, and an orchestra under Steimann. Except for Chaliapin's singing it is a very poor performance; and even his singing does not make the music interesting. My copy of this record has very noisy surfaces.

Of the two remaining singles, one (11-8696; $1) offers a rather tasteless medley of bits of Strauss waltzes by Johann Sr. and Jr., Eduard, and Josef, well performed by Goehr with the London Philharmonic. The other (11-8694; $1) offers the Prelude and Menuet from Debussy's early Suite Bergamasque, music which I don't care for even when it is well performed, as it seems to be by E. Robert Schmitz.

CONTRIBUTORS

JUAN NEGRIN, Prime Minister of the Spanish Republic, is at present in exile in London.

KEITH HUTCHISON, associate editor of The Nation, has just returned from a three months' visit to England.

JOHN GRIERSON is head of the Canadian Film Board and a recognized authority on documentary films.

GEROLD FRANK is war correspondent in the Near and Middle East for Overseas Press, Inc.

JACQUES BARZUN is an associate professor of history at Columbia University. Among his books are "Race: A Study in Modern Superstition," "Of Human Freedom," and "Culture in the Democracy."

ELI CHAMBERLAIN is the pseudonym of a writer closely in touch with Balkan affairs.

5 Magazine Combinations that will save you money!

• THE Nation

with Harpers Magazine $6.50
You save $2.50

with Consumers Union $7.00
You save $1.50

with Harpers Magazine
and Consumers Union $9.00
You save $3.50

with Free World $7.50
You save $1.50

with Saturday Review $8.50
You save $1.50

THE NATION BY ITSELF

1 Year $5 1 Years $8 1 Years $11

All club combinations listed run for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

Mail This Order Form Today

1-6-45
The NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.
I want to subscribe to the following magazine combinations:
.....
.....
.....
I enclose check ☐ Please bill me ☐
NAME .....
ADDRESS .....
CITY ..... ZONE...
STATE .....

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better jobs in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.

MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ♦ ♦ ♦ 29 LANGUAGES Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

"HEAVEN AND HELL"

The most definite teaching on the certainty of immortality and on the life hereafter is to be found in the Writings of famed scientist, philosopher, theologist and statesman. His book on HEAVEN AND HELL, FROM THINGS HEARD AND SEEN, may be obtained by new readers at the introductory price of five cents.

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG

SWEDENBORG FOUNDATION, INC. Room 1636, 51 East 42nd St., New York 17

Letters to the Editors

The "Digest" Protests

Dear Sirs: Permit me as one of the editors of the Reader's Digest to correct the statements in your editorial of December 2 which referred to the report of the Magazine and Newspaper Committee of the National Council of Teachers of English. Your editorial relied on figures from that report, and entirely ignored the fact that the report was rejected by the Executive Committee of that association (vote five to two) because it was unreliable, unscientific, and lacked objectivity. As to the very figures you quoted, the Executive Committee's analysis says: "This array of percentages is confusing."

From these misleading percentages your editorial concludes: "To give the effect of presenting a cross-section of American thought, a substantial proportion of the 'hotbed' articles were planted in other periodicals first, and then reprinted by the Digest."

The facts are that in two and a half years—from January, 1942, through June, 1944—out of 1,095 articles, those devoted to economics, government and politics, industrial relations, and international relations numbered 155. Out of these, 41 articles were first created through the cooperation of editors of other magazines with editors of the Digest, were published elsewhere, and later reprinted in the Digest.

Thus, 41 out of 1,095 articles, less than 4 per cent, dealing with so-called "hotbed" subjects, were reprints from other magazines of articles created by the Digest. Your total certainly does not give this impression.

Even of the 4 per cent, very few of the articles were controversial in character.

One expects The Nation not to accept inaccurate material from a subcommittee report so biased that it was rejected by the parent body.

FULTON OURSLER

Pleasantville, N. Y., December 6

[We find nothing to correct in our editorial comment. Mr. Oursler, interestingly enough, uses different years and in his analysis a criterion somewhat different from that used by the committee of the National Council of Teachers of English. Yet he admits that 26½ per cent of the Digest articles devoted to economics, government and politics, industrial and international relations were "created through the cooperation of editors of other magazines with editors of the Digest." If we substitute the harsher term "planted" for its euphonious equivalent, we find that there is virtually no disagreement between "the facts" as cited by Mr. Oursler and the "misleading percentages" cited by the committee of the National Council of Teachers of English—certainly not enough to affect the conclusions of the editorial. The fact that the Digest published 1,040 articles outside of this controversial area and that none of these were "planted" seems to us to be largely irrelevant, as was the action of the Executive Committee of the National Council. Regardless of possible minor inaccuracies, the committee has performed a useful service in calling attention to the extent to which the Digest is not a "digest" but a staff-planned publication whose planning, by Mr. Oursler's own admission, affects the contents of other magazines as well as the Digest itself.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Facts of Life

Dear Sirs: I was interested in reading the letter of John W. Scoville in your issue of November 30, in which he espoused the principle of laissez faire. I wish to remind Mr. Scoville that the automobile industry, to which he is attached, would never have been able to develop to its present proportions without the subsidization of highway building by government and taxation by government for such purpose.

When the first concrete highway was built in Detroit, there was opposition because of the burden placed upon the taxpayers, which would benefit only a small proportion of the people. Years later an appropriation by the state of $50,000,000 for highways was opposed on the same ground. Since then hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent by government in highway construction in America, and the other day Congress adopted a post-war highway program which will eventually cost $3,000,000,000. Without the constant improvement of the highways to meet the changes in automobile design and engine power the automobile industry would never have been able to expand.

Without the construction by government of air ports and government regulation of air transportation the aviation industry would be stifled for many years to come.

The Chrysler Corporation, with which Mr. Scoville is connected, some years back undertook a program of eliminating lead poisoning among its employees and did quite a thorough job of it, to the benefit of the workers and of the corporation and, incidentally, of the whole community. No one would accuse the Chrysler Corporation of being dictatorial, or bureaucratic, or even paternalistic, because it undertook this program of controlling lead poisoning.

But in the city of Detroit there are many square miles of dilapidated buildings with filthy alleys and unsanitary food-provision houses and markets which propagate rodents and spread disease. Now suppose someone were to suggest that the public markets and provision houses which cover large areas be placed in concrete buildings and concrete cellars, converting most of the

Invest NOW in a

WRITING CAREER

Buy U. S. War Bonds First — then
Invest in Your Own Future

The Magazine Institute, a private school owned and operated by successful writers and editors, offers practical, personal training in writing for magazines. You work in your own home, in spare time. Every assignment is returned with detailed criticism.

FICTION OR NON-FICTION

You may concentrate on either short story or article work, or you may experiment with several fields. The Magazine Institute training is not a textbook course but a series of fascinating writing tasks which lead to the actual preparation, under editorial direction, of short stories, articles, feature stories, whatever you are best fitted to do.

FREE CATALOG

Send TODAY for our free catalog which tells all about opportunities in magazine writing.

THE MAGAZINE INSTITUTE, INC.
Dept. 01-C, 50 Rockefeller Plaza,
Rockefeller Center, New York 20, N. Y.

Please send me your free catalog. This inquiry is confidential and no salesman will call on me.

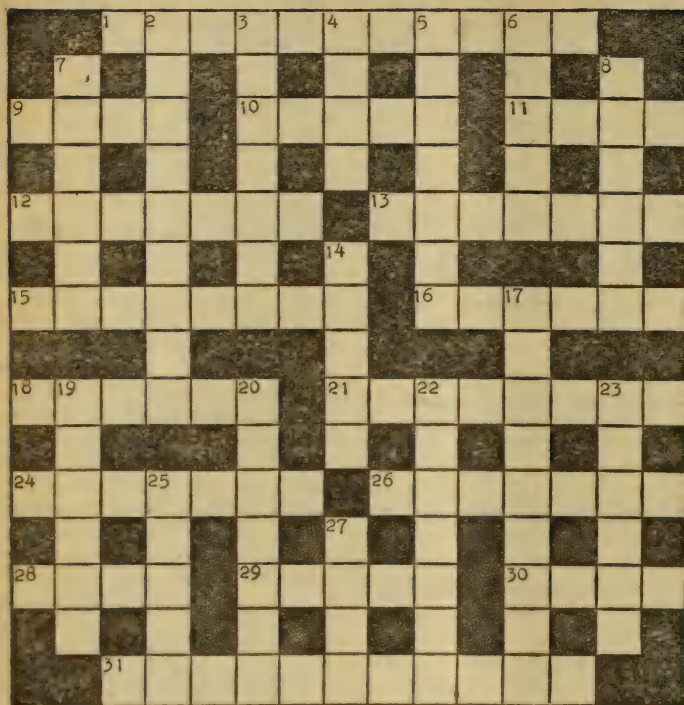

Name .....

Address .....

City..... Zone..... State.....

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 97

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Political vessel that is sometimes at sea, though it never goes to sea (three words, 4, 2 and 5)
- 9 Read it, and digest the contents
- 10 "---- I did it. Boy!" (Shakespeare)
- 11 The work is in the soup
- 12 Andiron
- 13 Confer with the government official at tea
- 15 Banter, or what poor wine becomes
- 16 Where no life is found, according to Thomas Hood
- 18 "Those who want ----- things are nearest to the gods" (Socrates)
- 21 Can't be found, and no superimposed copy taken
- 24 The butcher would find more than one in the hedge
- 26 Costers follow form closely
- 28 Carriage suggesting what might admit it
- 29 Built-out window
- 30 "Windows of the soul"
- 31 He doesn't care what happens, as long as it doesn't happen to him

DOWN

- 2 A homely spouse
- 3 Mechanical music maker
- 4 Puffed himself up to resemble the bull, in the fable
- 5 Seems rather a precarious grip to get on a 250-pound wrestler
- 6 They give the poor workman cause for complaint

7 Tin ear (anag.)

8 He may not know his weight to an ounce, but he knows his way to announce

14 "Love seldom haunts the breast where learning lies, And ----- sets ere Mercury can rise" (Pope)

17 Since he always spelt it this way, should we assume that the Bard couldn't spell his own name?

19 Wind harp

20 Plant a good deal used in fencing

22 A draggle-tail

23 "To know, to -----, to love, and then to part, Makes up life's tale to many a feeling heart" (Coleridge)

25 Dropped and picked up with facility by a Cockney

27 The unmarried state, in short

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 96

ACROSS:—1 CLERGYMAN; 6 PIPIT; 9 EMOTION; 10 CATALPA; 11 PAN; 12 TICKET; 13 ADAM; 15 CHEERING; 16 CORNUT; 18 FOMENT; 20 FORTRESS; 23 TASK; 24 DRAGON; 25 GAS; 28 RAIMENT; 29 ENGRAVE; 30 ANGER; 31 CONCORDAT.

DOWN:—1 CHEAP; 2 ENOUNCE; 3 GLITTERING; 4 MENACING; 5 NICHES; 6 PUTT; 7 PALADIN; 8 TEAM-MATES; 14 MONTENEGRO; 15 CAFETERIA; 17 JOE GREEN; 19 MISSING; 21 ENGLAND; 22 CRITIC; 26 SCENT; 27 PEER.

land of those markets to parks for the benefit of residents in a blighted area surrounding these markets; it would be deemed by Mr. Scoville paternalistic, autocratic, and an interference with private enterprise.

Suppose the obsolete warehouses and factory buildings along the river front, which no longer depend on water transportation, were condemned by the city and the land replotted for residential purposes and converted from an ugly front door to a beautiful park and residential area; that also would be an interference with private enterprise according to Mr. Scoville's theory.

But suppose the automobile industry enters the field of prefabricated houses and discovers that a market for such houses in large enough numbers to insure mass production requires government condemnation of the ugly, filthy, insanitary areas in the cities, and the replotting of such areas into home districts within parks to be rented to tenants or sold on long-term payments. I am quite certain that the automobile industry would not consider government intervention in such activities an unwarranted extension of governmental prerogatives any more than it does government appropriations for the construction of highways.

HARRY SLAVIN

Detroit, Mich., December 18

The Moyne Incident

Dear Sirs: Here is one reader who did not like your editorial on the "Lord Moyne incident."

You shed tears over the death of the British beer baron, forgetting that the British will exact a terrific penalty for that one killing. You forgot entirely that the brave men who will pay with their lives for that incident acted to call our attention to the long-continued acts of murder being perpetrated by Nazi-minded British colonial officials. When the British closed the doors of Palestine to innocent men, women, and children who were attempting to escape from Nazi Europe, they became guilty of murder.

Please don't whitewash British criminals who are attempting to use the "Moyne incident" to justify past and future murders. It is our duty to insist that our government act to compel the British to remove Nazi-minded officials from Palestine. If we acquiesce in the British betrayal of Palestine, we only pave the way for future betrayals on a larger scale.

LEWIS I. DUBLIN

Brooklyn, N. Y., December 6

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 13, 1945

NUMBER 2

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- National Service Again 31
We're in to Stay 32
Break with Franco Now! by Freda Kirchwey 33

ARTICLES

- The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 34
The Resurrection of Dies by I. F. Stone 35
10 Years Ago in The Nation 36
Tomorrow the Movies II. Pictures without Theaters by John Grierson 37
Production First by Stuart Chase 39
Will America Back Out? by Reinhold Niebuhr 42

POLITICAL WAR

- How to Lose Friends in France by Jules Moch 44
Letter from Rome 45
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 46

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- An International Episode by Lionel Trilling 47
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 48
Briefer Comment 50
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 52
Art by Clement Greenberg 52
Music by B. H. Haggin 53

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

- CROSS-WORD PUZZLE No. 98 by Jack Barrett 55

Editor and Publisher
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor
J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor
I. F. STONE

Literary Editor
MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor
J. MITCHELL MORSE
Business Manager
HUGO VAN ARX

Music Critic
B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic
JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Advertising Manager
MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL
LOUIS FISCHER

JONATHAN DANIELS
REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Shape of Things

THE GERMANS HAVE BEEN COUNTER-ATTACKING not only in the west but in the east during the past week, and in both theaters they have had a considerable measure of success. The fighting around Budapest has been exceptionally bloody, even for the bloody eastern front, and the Germans have made a large-scale attempt to relieve the encircled garrison of the city—surely not through any sense of wanting to preserve Budapest's ancient buildings. Whether or not the attempt succeeds, it serves to emphasize once more the extraordinary recuperative powers of Germany, and the strength which the Wehrmacht still commands. It serves further to emphasize a fact too often neglected by many individuals among the western Allies: that the bulk of the German power is concentrated on the eastern front. The Red Army still bears the brunt of the battle against our common enemy; and, although victory may come from either east or west, the German general staff is forced to mass most of its impressive defensive strength in the east. Surely this battle for Budapest, gateway to Austria and the southern approaches to the Reich, demonstrates the falsity of the charge that the Russians drove into southeastern Europe solely for political reasons. General Dittmar, in fact, now reveals that the Germans expected the chief Russian offensive in this region last summer, and were completely crossed by the offensive on the central front. As for the parallel charge that the Red Army stopped before Warsaw for political reasons, the official summary of "Land Warfare in 1944," issued by the British War Office, states flatly that "German resistance hardened, and a counter-attack launched by fresh reinforcements halted the advance of the Red Army." Russian soldiers are also dying in this most bitter phase of the war against Germany.

✱

THE MOMENT OF OPTIMISM THAT FOLLOWED the retirement of the King of the Hellenes vanished in an instant last week when the new regent, Archbishop Damaskinos, asked General Plastiras to form the long-awaited unity government. British advices had pictured Damaskinos as sympathetic to the EAM and genuinely desirous of reaching a democratic solution in Greece. But instead he has inflicted a renovated dictatorship upon his unhappy country, one that seems to have the full backing of British bayonets. Plastiras, one-time anti-monarchist leader, was recently brought out of a long exile by the British. Now, as he announces his intention of imposing General Scobie's terms on the "rebels, by force if necessary," the British action no longer appears quite as disinterested as it did at first. The EAM cannot, of course, participate in the new cabinet under present conditions and an early plebiscite, which seemed possible a few days ago, has become a forlorn hope. After weeks of bitter fighting against British regulars reinforced by Greek rightist bands—the Security Battalion and the Mountain Brigades—the ELAS, hopelessly inferior in matériel and equipment, has withdrawn from Athens. The bulk of Greece, however, remains under the administration of the EAM and it will not be forgotten that even the Germans were unable to subjugate the hinterland.

✱

THE SETBACK ON THE WESTERN FRONT HAS rendered acute the problem of shipping space and, following Anglo-American conversations in Washington, a revision of previously agreed schedules is believed to be in prospect. In this matter military considerations of course are paramount but they in turn involve many political and economic factors. What, for instance, is the minimum volume of supplies that we can afford to ship to the liberated countries? It has been stated that the Anglo-American High Command has decided to restrict such supplies to the amount necessary to prevent disease and civil disorder. But in Italy the meager allotment made available is not sufficient to meet even this requirement, for Mrs. Luce tells us that Italians are "literally dying of cold and starvation before your eyes by the thousands." Months ago Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Churchill agreed that the Italian bread ration should be raised to 300 grams daily—a far from extravagant amount—but this proposal has not yet been put into effect. According to the State Department, the shipping situation is responsible. In France, Belgium, and the liberated portions of Holland the situation is not much better and, as a result, manpower which could be put to work for the Allied cause is being wasted. France, given some preliminary aid in the form of fertilizers, farm machinery, and raw materials, could not only feed itself but produce urgently needed goods such as textiles, of which there is an acute world shortage although plenty of raw cotton is available in this country. If French estimates that one ton of strategic imports for their factories would mean a ten-ton gain in war materials are correct, there is obviously a strong case for diverting some shipping space to a purpose of such immediate concern to Allied victory.

✱

FREDERICK C. CRAWFORD, FORMER PRESIDENT OF the National Association of Manufacturers, recently went to France expecting to find that the country was suffering acutely. But one glance at the Ritz in Paris, with its well-painted rooms, its big brass door-knobs intact, and its new silk curtains, disillusioned him. Obviously the French workers had been living well during the Nazi occupation and so it was no surprise when "a fine conservative Frenchman" told him that if it had gone on a little longer the French "would have settled for things as they were." Anxious to win the support of the French working classes, Mr. Crawford explained, the Germans primed the economic pump by setting an exchange rate which "filled the pockets of the German soldiers with money" and encouraging them to go out and spend it. This resulted in a quick turnover of consumer goods and led to a boom "that brought apparent prosperity to the working classes." In Belgium, too, Mr. Crawford said, "business was above normal" during the occupation and "cruelty was reserved only for those who entered the underground against the Nazis." Clearly, there is no need to get too excited about that since, according to this highly qualified observer, in both France and Belgium "the underground is composed largely of Communists, young people, and underworld ex-convicts." Why haven't the many able American correspondents in Europe given us this information before? Because, says Mr. Crawford, the censorship of news distorts the European picture and on the subject of distortion he obviously speaks with unique authority.

✱

HENRI BONNET'S ARRIVAL IN WASHINGTON AS the first ambassador of liberated France brings to a close a dismal period in Franco-American relations. The last official ambassador from France, Henri-Haye, represented not the French Republic, our ally from the start, but the ignominious Vichy regime at the service of the enemy. After our rupture with Vichy, our failure to admit the reality of the Fourth Republic during its early days in Algiers reinforced the erroneous impression that Americans were disdainful of the struggle for freedom of the very people who were the first to recognize our own war for independence. When, at long last, our government granted full recognition to General de Gaulle, we had the bad grace to send Jefferson Caffery as our first ambassador to Paris. Mr. Caffery, if his record in Cuba and in Brazil is any indication, is about as little qualified as any man could be to understand the spirit of the new French revolution and to keep our government well informed about France. But the presence in Washington of Henri Bonnet, one of France's leading liberals, a man with a distinguished record of service in the cause of intellectual freedom both in the League of Nations and out of it, seems, in a sense, to provide some compensation for the damage.

✱

GOVERNOR DEWEY'S ANNUAL MESSAGE TO THE New York state legislature had a mildly progressive flavor, suggesting to some observers that his experiences as a Presidential candidate had convinced him of the need to attract liberal voters. He announced, for instance, the appointment of a committee to study revision of the formula on which state aid to education is based, thus opening the door for a more generous allotment of funds to the schools. He also proposed to increase funds for public housing and emphasized public works as a means of combatting unemployment in a way that brought him a solemn rebuke from the New York Times. However, as the American Labor Party has pointed out, after holding office for two years, his policy on social questions is still in the main to suggest committees to study what action should be taken rather than to recommend actual measures. His most sensational proposal—that the state should undertake the completion of the St. Lawrence seaway and power project if the federal government failed to act—was greeted by both friends and foes with some cynicism. "Some Republicans," reports the New York Times Albany correspondent, "regard Mr. Dewey's stand as 'smart politics' since it would give them the 'liberal' side of a power issue, and would make it difficult for the Democrats to nominate Senator James M. Mead of Buffalo as their candidate for Governor in 1946." Buffalo interests are opposed to the St. Lawrence project, which they fear would adversely affect their trade, and Senator Mead voted against it on December 12 last year. However, even more vehement opposition has been expressed by up-state Republican leaders. The power interests have yet to be heard from; probably they don't take the proposal very seriously.

✱

IN DECLARING THAT JIM CROW AND THE CLOSED shop were incompatible under the law, the California Supreme Court has put to shame the equivocal decision on the same issue handed down recently by the United States Supreme Court. In contrast to the federal tribunal's weak statement that "discriminations based on race alone are obviously irrelevant and invidious," the California court declared flatly that such discrimination affects the fundamental right to work for a living and is therefore "contrary to the public policy of the United States and this state." The California decision, which was unanimous, held that when a union has attained a monopoly of the supply of labor by means of a closed shop, such a union occupies a quasi-public position and assumes corresponding obligations—notably that of upholding the principles of the Fifteenth Amendment. Obviously, certain dangers are inherent in the California decision. Labor-baiters will undoubtedly try to extend the "obligations" assumed under the closed shop in such a way as to weaken or destroy trade unionism as such. But if organized labor expects continued public support in its campaign for closed shop contracts, it should take immediate voluntary steps to open its ranks to all workers, without regard for race, religion, or political affiliation.

✱

CARLTON J. H. HAYES' PRO-FRANCO SENTIMENTS have undermined his formerly high professional reputation. Eighty of his fellow historians, hailing from thirty colleges and universities, recently objected strenuously to the official nomination of the former Ambassador to Spain as president of the American Historical Association. His election, they stated, in a petition presented at the Association's annual meeting in Chicago two weeks ago, "would constitute, in the eyes of the public, an endorsement by the history profession of his friendly attitude toward the Franco regime." After heated debate the petitioners secured a secret ballot, with the result that 110 votes were cast for Hayes and 66 protest votes for Sidney B. Fay of Harvard University. And so Hayes became the first historian to be honored with the Association's presidency by less than a unanimous vote. The man who has gone on record as believing that universal schooling has served "to dispel rather than to forward the Enlightenment," may be expected to bring as little glory to the presidency of the Association as he did to the office of Ambassador to Spain. The action of his liberal colleagues is sufficient answer to the State Department-inspired article in the December issue of Harper's which attempts to whitewash Hayes' pro-Franco record. It is welcome demonstration, also, of the fact that academicians, when sufficiently provoked, take their political responsibilities seriously.

National Service Again

NATIONAL-SERVICE legislation, again asked for by the President in his annual message to Congress, must be considered from three points of view. The first is its effect on the morale of the armed forces; this, to us, is the most weighty argument in its favor. The second is its effect on the morale of labor. Last year the President asked for national service but only as part of a broader program designed to stabilize the cost of living and to eliminate the profits of war. National service failed of passage with the rest of this program. This year the President's request is coupled only with an affirmation of his past pledges on the post-war economy—full employment, aid to small business, elimination of monopolies and cartels, development of more "TVA's," expansion of foreign trade, and a broader public-works program. We should think that it would be wise at least to couple national service with action to raise substandard wages. The hearings last year on the 65-cents-an-hour resolution showed how many American workers, despite talk of high wages, are making less than enough for a decent minimum living standard.

The third point of view from which national service must be considered is that of productive efficiency. So far the President has failed to make out a case for its necessity. This is true even in the limited field of the 4-F's. We favor legislation enabling the government to force 4-F's into war industry, but we do not see why new legislation is needed. We are puzzled by the new selective-service order which provides for induction into the armed forces, without privileges, of 2-A's and 2-B's who quit war work. We fail to understand why the order was not extended to cover 4,000,000 4-F's. It seems to us that selective service today has ample power to force these men into war work. Were the 4-F's left out of the order to provide an additional argument for national service?

We note in the report to Congress of James F. Byrnes, Director of War Mobilization and Reconversion, the statement, "The truth is that our soldiers at the front today are not short of ammunition and supplies as a result of any production failures." We note also his statement, "Several hundred thousand workers would fulfill the requirement of critical war production." Mr. Byrnes has closed racetracks, a ludicrously belated action. He has courageously ended agricultural deferments. He has asked immediate action on 4-F's. He and the President also want national-service legislation. "Because the war economy has matured," Byrnes reported, "because the labor supply is tight and relatively inflexible, moving enough workers to the right plants at the right time takes intensive effort on the part of all agencies." But the power to compel labor to move from one plant to another is only one phase of this "intensive effort on the part of all agencies." We cannot agree with the President that national service alone would insure having "the right number of workers in the right places at the right times." That takes competent organization. It takes planning. It takes a control of all factors of the productive process, labor included, that has yet to be exercised by either the army procurement services or the War Production Board. In the absence of such competent over-all direction the mere addition of compulsion to the handling of labor might make a bad situation worse.

The first tendency of a military man is to apply compulsion, but there are tight situations in which a little thought is more important than the power to command. The army has from the first resisted planning of the war effort. One need only glance at the Mead committee's report of last December on accumulation of surpluses in order to see how much could be done in the production and man-power picture with a little more brains and a little less brass-hat stubbornness. Entirely too little progress has been made in centralizing and standardizing procurement. "There is no reason known to the committee," its report says, "why there should be different sizes and specifications for towels, blankets, sheets, artillery, and hundreds of other items." All this means waste of labor, time, and materials.

Much of the labor shortage is in skilled labor, and much of this in turn is due to the downright stupidity of the army and selective service in drafting men with irreplaceable skills who are more useful in industry than in uniform. The Mead committee made a survey of the use to which "certain highly skilled experts" were put after being drafted into the army and found most of them "landed in clerical positions or in other places where their creative ability and training were wasted." The committee reported that war-production shortages were due "to a substantial degree to the precipitous drafting of men from industry, in many cases some time before they were actually needed in the armed forces." We do not oppose national service if the need for it can be proved and some assurance can be given of competent direction. We look to Congressional hearings on new national-service legislation to provide that assurance. Without it we may merely find ourselves wasting more manpower than before.

We're In to Stay

SEVERAL events in the past two weeks have thrown into high light the serious differences that have developed among the United Nations. The announcement of a new Greek Cabinet under General Plastiras failed to halt the fighting between the EAM forces and the British troops of General Scobie. In Lublin the National Liberation Committee proclaimed itself the rightful government of Poland and received, as one might expect, the quick recognition of the Soviet Union. Less expected was the refusal of both the British and the American government to break with the London Polish government in exile. Meanwhile the British press swung in behind the London Economist in its attack on the "hypocritical" and "irresponsible" American criticism of British policies in Europe, and the Stars and Stripes issued a moving appeal to put aside dissension between Allies as once more the bugles sounded for battle. Over the week-end the President gave a frank appraisal of Allied disharmony.

There is no doubt that American coolness toward our fighting allies has reached an acute stage. While liberals have stormed against the Mediterranean maneuvers of England's imperialistic Prime Minister, the Hearst press and its friends to the right and the left have practically called for a declaration of war on the Soviet Union. Liberal internationalists and isolationist diehards are paradoxically drifting into the same camp. This is a serious state of affairs, dangerously reminiscent of the swing of American opinion after the last war. Once more liberals are becoming disillusioned and suggesting that the United States will be asked to approve an international organization which sanctifies the predatory decisions of the great powers against their neighbors. "Perfectionism no less than isolationism or power politics," as Mr. Roosevelt said, "may obstruct the paths of international peace."

This perfectionism has Europe worried and may even account for some of England's, Russia's, and France's latest moves. Mr. Stettinius's statements on Italy and Greece have been lauded as gentle rebukes to England: they may equally be regarded, as Dr. Niebuhr suggests elsewhere in this issue, as a Pilate-like washing of our hands as we look askance at Europe's troubles. And if the American government has a basic disinterest in Europe's future, then the big powers of Europe are going to look out for their own security without taking America into account. Power and not a regard for the rights of peoples will then be the chief consideration. England will guard its interests, its very national existence, by keeping in repair its lanes of empire and by building, if possible, a bloc of friendly nations in Western Europe. France, not casting off its traditional alliance with England, will back Russia's eastern claims in return for Russia's assistance vis-à-vis the threat of Germany. Russia will secure friendly neighbors on all its borders and extend its sphere of influence as far as necessary—but no farther than necessary—south and west. Altogether, this spells no pattern of durable peace but rather a scheme of uncertainly balanced power. In the past such a scheme has not prevented wars. It is not likely to prevent wars in the future. In fact, with Europe in its present revolutionary state, the attempts to suppress popular movements are almost bound to produce a state of civil war from which European civilization may never recover.

It is with such a likely European future in prospect that we should reconsider our current preoccupation with Italy, Greece, and Poland. Our attitudes tend to run from shocked disapproval to realistic indorsement according to our ideological partisanship. Our attitudes imply a physical and moral aloofness from which we may judge these power policies without being involved ourselves. Even liberal internationalists enjoy a sense of spiritual isolation from Europe's mess. We wish to state our position quite positively: The eradication of that covert isolationism is the most critical problem which American liberals face today. The full participation of the United States with England and Russia in a responsible concern for the future of Europe is not only the sole hope for the survival of Europe's forces of liberation and for the utter destruction of fascism; it is the sole hope for the survival of our own democracy. The President's statement seemed to suggest a more definite American concern in the affairs of Europe: "We cannot deny," said Mr. Roosevelt, "that power is a factor in world politics any more than we can deny its existence as a factor in national politics. But in a democratic world as in a democratic nation power must be linked with responsibility and obliged to defend and justify itself within the framework of the general good."

Now if this statement is more than fine words it means that the United States will join its power as a great democracy in a responsible manner with the power of other members of the United Nations. We shall "use our influence to the end that no temporary or provisional authorities in the liberated countries block the eventual exercise of the people's right freely to choose the government and institutions under which, as free men, they are to live." And it is to be hoped that the power of the United States will be so exerted before and not after the fate of the people of Italy, Greece, and Poland is settled by the unilateral action of a single great power.

We cannot say that we are altogether confident that the newly picked State Department "team" is prepared to play this daring and powerful role. Nor can we feel too hopeful that the American people appreciate the actuality of global unity. If we are beyond the horse-and-buggy days we are not yet out of the era of steamships; oceans still mean distance. Today a sphere of isolated security is just as anachronistic as a sphere of influence; both ideas stem from thought modes of yesterday which this war has utterly shattered. Perhaps liberals had better even suspend their tears for the forces of liberation in Europe and begin to think a little more realistically of the future security of America. Then both European and American democracy may benefit. For our concern for America will take us to the very heart of Europe's problems. And our full participation in the common action of the United Nations is not only the sole guaranty of the rebirth of freedom in Italy, Greece, and Poland but the sole guaranty of the post-war freedom and security of all peoples throughout the world. We had better begin soon.

Break with Franco Now!

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

THE mass meeting called by The Nation Associates last Tuesday to demand the end of diplomatic relations with Axis Spain was a tremendous success. Backed by a dozen labor and civic organizations, it drew some 16,000 people to Madison Square Garden in New York to hear a group of speakers give not only their opinion of the fascist regime in Spain but a penetrating analysis of the effect our continued recognition of Franco would have on world opinion and on the hope of a decent, democratic peace. But such a rally, however successful, is effective only in the degree to which it stimulates further action. We know that. And so, while we are gratified by the enthusiasm it generated, our real interest is in what flows from it.

For the time to act is now; just now. At an earlier period, appeals for a break with Franco would have been met by assertions that our military position would be endangered if his regime were not treated as a neutral—even as a friend. At a later period the Franco dictatorship, no longer even allegedly useful but an obvious menace to our future plans, particularly in the New World, may be supplanted by a Spanish version of Prince Humbert and Badoglio, or, perhaps, of King George and Papandreou. Spain has ringers for these characters ready to hand. If such a shift is made Spain will be in for a new bitter struggle, and its friends will be left to shout their grief and disapproval at an accomplished fact. Now is the time to act. Franco is left with nothing to lean on except the German agents that infest his land and the diplomatic support of Britain and the United States. A change is in the wind; anyone with a sensitive nose can detect it. It is up to those of us who realize the importance of a democratic Spain to a democratic world to see to it that the change meets the wishes of the Spanish people.

This is what Dr. Juan Negrín said in the remarkable address which the British Foreign Office refused to allow him to broadcast to the Madison Square Garden meeting. The cabled text was read there and published in last week's Nation, but I want to recall a few lines of it here:

I am speaking to you, our American friends, to assure you that the Spanish people are ready and able to handle their own affairs, on condition that we are let alone, on condition that our hands are not tied, on condition that we are not subjected to pressures and maneuvers from without. We do not ask for it—please understand this—we do not ask for and we do not want intervention by other governments or armies. Two centuries of experience with foreign interventions have left a bitter memory in Spain, so costly have they been for us. For the last of these interventions, the one that by supreme irony was so hypocritically labeled Non-Intervention, we are still paying. Nor do we draw any comfort from certain recent examples of the same kind elsewhere.

We would welcome and we would be grateful for the sympathy, the help, the collaboration of friends. But the intervention of powers—no! Emphatically no! We only ask that no obstacles be placed in our way and that no aid be extended surreptitiously to the enemies of the Republic with arms so subtle that they cannot be matched by the meager means at our disposal. We only ask that the screws be not put on and that our future be not denied us.

This, of course, outlines our job: to insist upon a break with Franco; to insist that the Spanish people be given a chance to determine their fate, free from "pressures and maneuvers from without"; to provide sympathy, help, collaboration as the friends of democracy in Spain.

No single course of action or organization will be sufficient to bring this about. The thousands at last Tuesday's meeting promised with one voice to back Senator Coffee's resolution, which he has already reintroduced in the new session, demanding a break with Franco. It is certain, too, that the cooperating organizations will throw their weight behind this first, most necessary and tangible move. There cannot be too much pressure or pressure from too many sources. Not one committee, but thousands of citizens organized in many groups, will show our legislators the breadth and insistence of the demand that America redeem as far as possible its past mistakes in dealing with Hitler's Generalissimo in Spain. We hope readers of The Nation in many parts of the country, through the various organizations to which they belong, will hold rallies to make their demand for a break vocal and united.

In connection with the meeting last Tuesday the Nation Associates has launched an organization, The Friends of the Spanish Republic, which plans to initiate an active campaign of public education on a nation-wide scale. A bulletin will be issued and speakers made available to lead public discussions of the questions involved. Nation readers will be kept informed of the progress of the committee's plans. The Madison Square meeting sampled the strength of American democratic opinion that has not forgotten the infamy of the Spanish war. Its aftermath must be the decisive mobilization of that opinion against the last bastion of world fascism.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THE true outcome of the German counter-offensive into Belgium is not expected to be known until this article appears in print, or perhaps not until a week later. Official Washington, rudely awakened by the rude refusal of the enemy to lie doggo, has been taking a dim view of the western front since a not too Merry Christmas dispelled the dismal hope that the German blow might yet prove a bust. An un-Happy New Year of slowly progressing Allied counter-measures and German outbreaks on other sectors did little to restore the mists of bright wishing.

The Pentagon Building was never as sanguine about the German disaster of late summer and fall as was Allied Headquarters, but it was still pretty cheerful until the turn of the year or thereabouts. Then saner counsels within its walls prevailed—counsels which it is this department's unhappy duty to report were consistently declaring that the Germans were still potent for aggression, but which were cried down by more optimistic and less informed superiors.

As noted, it will probably not be known for some days what the outcome will eventually be: German recoupment and fresh thrust onward, retirement to the old line, or settlement at something like the present position—about half the original salient? Beyond that, the bearing on total western-front strategy and dispositions will not be known for some time longer. But already enough is known to show that the Allies have suffered a grievous reverse. The German claim of 50,000 American casualties may be taken at the usual discount; but the battles of Bastogne, St. Vith, and Stavelot were not fought without loss. More serious in the long run is the extent to which Allied plans for winter operations were upset. Armies from the two previously active sectors were diverted and thrown into the battle to channel the German blow straight to the west, where it could do the least damage. These operations were very well executed, especially in the case of the Third Army in the south: whatever staff officer arranged the switching of those divisions from an eastward to a northward advance, over poor and winter-bound roads, deserves special medals. Nevertheless, the transfer of so many divisions weakened the Saar and Aachen fronts, allowing a considerable German advance on the first and aggressive patrolling on the other.

Thus the Allies lost the initiative everywhere in the west and the Germans have been calling the turn. Our arrangements have been made temporary, at times rather desperate, as a result. Rundstedt, far from scrambling back out of the Ardennes salient when Allied counter-attacks bit in, continued funneling fresh troops in from Germany, and dug in hard: laying all the minefields and defensive fire points the First Army had never laid in the same region. The Luftwaffe, hoarded to good effect, brought up to pre-D-Day strength and above by thorough measures of production and pilot-training, had a princely New Year's Day raiding Allied airfields in France, Belgium, and the Netherlands, catching the air forces with their pants down nearly as far as the First Army's on December 16. Then the weather went foul again, grounding the Allied planes during the important days of counter-attack from north and south last week. As the week closed, the enemy had been able to concentrate troops and armor in several sectors, and threats were still alive to the French corner behind the Saar-Palatinate sector, to Liège, to Maastricht, and even to Antwerp. This is not to say that any of the threats will materialize; but they were there, and some of them may still be there. Thus far had the Allies been taken between wind and water in less than a month.

Some of the Germans' success must be attributed to their superior armor and their excellent employment of that important arm. The Tiger tank's 88-millimeter gun and the Panther tank's 75-mm. can penetrate the best current American tank, the Sherman, at 2,500 yards; the American M-10 tank destroyer, with a 3-inch (about 75-mm.) gun using special armor-piercing cap ammunition, had difficulty in Normandy destroying a Panther at 150 to 200 yards—in one case, three hits on the upper front hull ricocheted off, one on the lower front hull penetrated. Their tanks are comparatively more silent than ours, the noise-discipline of their crews superior. They are perhaps more skilled in the camouflage of tanks than any other modern army. A combat report from the United States XIX Corps, published in the Military Review of the Command and General Staff School at Fort Leavenworth, adds this description of the German tank-infantry team:

Before the shock of the [tanks'] guns discharged at close range and the garden-hose spray of machine-gun bullets had even taken full effect, German infantrymen were over the hedgerow and into the field, dogtrotting through to the next with great determination and courage. They knew where they were going and went there fast. . . . [The tanks] used long bursts of their rapid-firing machine guns to discourage guests. If pressed at all, they shot flares which brought down their own artillery and mortars on their flanks. Their handling of their tanks was bold and sure.

The grim truth seems to be that today, after five and a half years of war, the Germans are still ahead of the western Allies (we don't know so much about the Russians) in many important branches of warfare. It is no great consolation to think that they are losing the war regardless. We still have not developed a dual-purpose (anti-aircraft and anti-tank) gun as good as the German 88; we still lag one step behind in the fire-power and armor of our tanks; our tactical doctrine, particularly in the bold employment of the tank-infantry team, leaves much to be desired (with the great exception of Patton's sweep out of Normandy); we tend to estimate future requirements of men and weapons on the basis of local factors in the most recent campaign, ignoring potential factors of the next campaign (e.g., the Army's cut-back in tank and heavy artillery production after the mountain fighting in Tunisia; the Navy's cutback in pilot-training after last year's low Pacific rate of attrition).

This criticism in no way detracts from the very great performance of most of our commanders and fighting men, but it lends some weight to the German complaint that we defeat them by manufacturing large amounts of metal and then dropping the metal on their heads. This was a good way to try to win the war—good because it saved life—but now we see there is no short cut to crushing a valiant and resourceful enemy. The price of victory is not only treasure but blood. In a real sense, the Germans have played into Eisenhower's hands by fighting west of the Rhine, where eventually they may be destroyed. But it will now take bloody fighting and a good deal more subtlety and flexibility to destroy them.

The Resurrection of Dies

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 4

IF THE N. C. P. A. C. and the C. I. O.-P. A. C. get up from their beds and walk, there is still a chance to do something about the sudden passage by the House of the Rankin resolution making the Dies committee permanent. No vote for continuing the work of this committee has ever been so narrow. A shift of eleven votes would have defeated the Rankin resolution. Twenty-three Democrats were absent when the vote was taken, and a majority of these are either hostile to the committee or amenable to party discipline. A motion to reconsider might lead to the defeat of the Rankin resolution. Such a motion has been offered by Hook of Michigan, a long-time foe of the Dies committee.

A second test of strength will come on the question of handing over the Dies committee records to this new standing committee. Cochran of Missouri pointed out that this would require passage of a resolution by the House. The parliamentary maneuver by which Rankin got his resolution before the House was bold and clever but vulnerable. He appended it to a routine resolution making the rules of the Seventy-eighth Congress those of the Seventy-ninth, and both the manner of the amendment and its content were so unprecedented as to provide a fulcrum for skilful counter-attack. It was, as McCormack of Massachusetts pointed out, the first time in the history of the Republic that a permanent investigating committee had been established by either house of Congress. That such a committee should be established without prior consideration by the Rules Committee, without hearings and full discussion on the floor, must impress many in the House as hasty and irresponsible. Not the least of the questions left undiscussed and unanswered concerns the legislative recommendations the Rankin resolution authorizes the new standing committee to make. Until now, as Cochran pointed out, legislation of this character has been passed upon by the Judiciary Committee. How is jurisdiction to be divided between them?

If the Rankin resolution cannot be recalled or a retreat forced on the question of the Dies records, an organized fight can produce results in the personnel picked to man this new permanent committee. The Democratic members of the House Ways and Means Committee are a standing committee on committees and will pick the majority members. Two of the fifteen Democratic members of the newly organized Ways and Means Committee, Doughton of North Carolina, the chairman, and Dingell of Michigan, did not vote on the Rankin resolution. Of the thirteen who did, seven voted against the resolution, six for it. It would seem that Dingell, who is from Detroit, where the C. I. O. is powerful, could be depended on to take an anti-Dies position. Doughton, as a leading House Democrat, ought to be amenable to party discipline if the House leadership presses the matter. Even if Doughton, like many of the Southern Democrats, is pro-Dies, there should be a majority on this committee prepared to pick personnel that could be trusted to go after genuinely un-American activities instead of terrorizing progressives and New Dealers, and to handle hearings with fairness and propriety.

Local and regional P. A. C. units and other labor and progressive groups should go to work at once on the Democratic members of the House Ways and Means Committee. The seven who voted against the Rankin resolution deserve praise and help. They are Gregory of Kentucky, Lynch of New York, Forand of Rhode Island, Wasielewski of Wisconsin, Eberharter of Pennsylvania, King of California, and Anderson of New Mexico. Interviews might well be arranged with and protests sent to the six who voted for the Rankin resolution. They are Robertson of Virginia, West of Texas, Mills of Arkansas, Camp of Georgia, Cooper of Tennessee, and Maloney of Louisiana. If there must be a permanent committee, the best bet for chairman would seem to be Eberharter, who has been a member of the Dies committee for a little over a year and has displayed intelligence and courage in fighting its abuses. He pleaded strongly against the Rankin resolution and declared that if the Dies committee carried on its work along past lines it would "lead to disunity" and continued dependence "on passion, prejudice, and unreliable matter."

Organized action by labor and liberal groups will prove effective if brought to bear when the new committee asks for funds. Three hurdles will have to be surmounted by the committee. The first is the Rules Committee under Sabath; the chairman and a number of his colleagues have long been critical of Dies methods. The second is the Accounts Committee under Cochran of Missouri, who led the fight on the floor against the Rankin resolution and told one newspaperman today, "They won't get a dime if I have anything to say about it." If pressure were successful in persuading these committees to hold hearings, those hearings would provide an excellent forum in which to place on the record the whole story of the Dies committee's abuse of fair play and decent procedure. The third hurdle in obtaining funds would be the House itself, which must vote the appropriation.

In organizing to fight continuation of Dies tactics, an asset is the fact that four members of the committee, including the chairman, are among the missing in this new Congress, three of them having been defeated at the polls. The four men who took their places all voted against the Rankin resolution. The N. C. P. A. C. and the C. I. O.-P. A. C. ought to make it their business to analyze the vote on the Rankin resolution in the fullest detail, and to organize pressure in home districts wherever possible. The Democrats voted 150 to 70 against the Rankin resolution, and it may be useful privately to consult party leadership in the House on any steps to be taken against the 70. The Republicans voted 137 to 34 in favor of the Rankin resolution, and it would be excellent if steps were taken not merely to make some of the 137 uncomfortable but to support the 34 against reprisal by party leadership.

The word "on the hill" today was that at least two of these 34 Republicans, Herter of Massachusetts and Luce of Connecticut, were to be punished by Minority Leader Martin. Herter wanted to be on the Appropriations Committee, Luce on the Foreign Relations Committee. I doubt whether Luce would be productive of much good on that committee, but I also doubt whether she would be any worse than any other candidate likely to be picked by Martin. Luce at least deserves some credit for her vote, as do her fellow-Republicans, including (strangely enough) Dirksen of Illinois and Lemke of North Dakota, who also voted against the Rankin resolution. It was not at all strange, however, to find Joseph Clark Baldwin of New York, Bender of Ohio, La Follette of Indiana, Wolverton of New Jersey, Ham Fish's successor Bennett, and Mrs. Frances P. Bolton of Ohio among the Republicans who declined to vote blindly as a matter of Republican party discipline for a resolution put by a Mississippi poll-tax Democrat. Progressives may well raise the question in Republican districts whether the G. O. P. in the House is to be led by Rankin of Mississippi.

I suspect it was Jerry Voorhis of California to whom Cochran referred when he told the House that the Dies committee in recent years had become a one-man investigation committee. Cochran said the situation on the Dies committee had become so bad that "one member of the committee came to me and said he had asked for the names of the employees of the committee of which he was a member." Cochran said this bewildered Dies committee member wanted to know what salaries were being paid and what duties performed by the various employees of the committee. "He, a member of that committee," Cochran declared, "said he was denied that information." This sounds like Voorhis.

Two excellent book-length studies of the Dies committee are now available, one by William Gellerman, the other by Brother August Raymond Ogden. Labor and liberal organizations would do well to assign a special committee to familiarize themselves with both, and use the ammunition they provide in the legislative strategy here discussed. It would be tragic if progressives permitted Rankin's swift parliamentary coup to floor them. A permanent inquiry in the Dies manner would be the greatest single weapon American crypto-fascism could wield for disunity and reaction.

10 Years Again "The Nation"

JAPAN'S ACTION in abrogating the Washington naval treaty marks the end of the first serious attempt at the international restriction of armaments.—January 2, 1935.

FATHER COUGHLIN, in launching the National League for Social Justice, carefully avoided saying anything about a new political party. . . . That Father Coughlin should not be explicit about his intentions is in keeping with his mentality. He is not the explicit kind of person. . . . After reading and hearing many of his speeches I am struck by their technical similarity to those of Hitler. These, too, are vague and emotional. Carefully analyzed, they do not read as radical as they sound. . . . More nearly than any demagogue in America he has the formula for a fascist party, a semi-radical program which is "safe" on the labor question, which guarantees the profit system, and which appeals simultaneously to agriculture, the middle class, and the big employer.—RAYMOND GRAM SWING, January 2, 1935.

BACKED BY a high-powered propaganda machine which is capitalizing the desperate hopes of elderly men and women, the Townsend plan proposing a pension of $200 a month for all persons over sixty is sweeping the country. . . . It would be difficult not to treat the Townsend plan as a joke if it were not such a serious matter for so many.—M. B. SCHNAPPER, January 9, 1935.

BATON ROUGE, LOUISIANA, December, 1934. The state legislature is in session for the fourth time this year. The summons went out Friday for a meeting Sunday night, December 16, which anywhere else would trumpet an emergency. Here it meant simply a new maneuver by Huey Long. . . . At five minutes before nine Huey arrives noisily with his bodyguard. . . . Thirty-five bills are acted on in seventy minutes, thirty-four approved, one shelved. This was the pace at the last session, and no doubt will be the pace so long as Huey's machine holds together. Two minutes for a law; this is dictatorship.—RAYMOND GRAM SWING, January 9, 1935.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH: Vardis Fisher, "We Are Betrayed"; James Hilton, "Lost Horizon"; Joseph Wood Krutch, "Was Europe a Success?"; John Strachey, "Literature and Dialectical Materialism"; Norman Thomas, "Human Exploitation"; Rexford Guy Tugwell, "The Battle for Democracy"; Thornton Wilder, "Heaven's My Destination."

THE THEATER SEASON: "Accent on Youth," "Anything Goes," "Dark Victory," "Gold Eagle Guy," "Life Begins at 8:40," "Merrily We Roll Along," "Ode to Liberty," "Page Miss Glory," "Personal Appearance," "Petrified Forest," "Post Road," "Rain from Heaven," "Revenge with Music," "Sailors of Cattaro," "Small Miracle," "The Children's Hour," "The Distaff Side," "Valley Forge," "Within the Gates."

Tomorrow the Movies

II. PICTURES WITHOUT THEATERS

BY JOHN GRIERSON

SEVERAL years ago, when it was difficult to get theater bookings for documentary films, producers of documentaries in England noted that there was "more seating capacity outside the theaters than inside them." Accordingly they began to distribute their films to schools and colleges, churches, service clubs, and community centers, and to organize a new kind of film service for group audiences brought together by their professional, social, or academic interests. This use of the non-theatrical film in England, the United States, Canada, and elsewhere is the most important happening in the film world in the past fifteen years. It has come about without any considerable help from the theatrical film industry but has had strong support from governments. As a result there has occurred a rough demarcation of spheres of operation. The film industry, interested primarily, if not exclusively, in entertainment, has abandoned to others a field in which a vast contribution can be made to the advancement of agriculture and industry, health and welfare, national and international cooperation.

The industry should not, however, be blamed for this. "Theater" is its business, and to its credit it has progressively learned to combine good theater with material and themes of public account—in the newsreel, in certain types of documentary films, in feature films themselves. The deliberate use of the film for instruction and interpretation, with "theater" only incidental, is, properly, the concern of professional educators and public servants, of those, that is, who are under license or contract or examination in the matter of public responsibility.

The English documentary group did not invent the non-theatrical use of films, but they were the first to organize it according to plan. Even before the development of sixteen-millimeter, or substandard, projection, the agricultural departments of many countries were using films to promote technology on the farm, finance departments were showing pictures of natural resources to encourage the flow of capital, and tourist departments were presenting "scenics," with accompanying lectures, for prospective travelers. It was all pretty haphazard, but it showed that specialized groups of a thousand and one kinds, all the way from the learned societies to the stamp collectors, were a ready-made audience for films which served their interests, and that film makers devoted to the public service had potential allies in every government department, national association, state authority, trade union, and cooperative which had at heart the educational progress of its constituents. Thus the independent film maker did not need the financial support of Joinville, Neubabelsberg, Elstree, or Hollywood. He had only to forget the bright lights of the marquee, the attraction of the studio contract, and school himself in the normal humilities and anonymities which are expected in the pedagogue, the priest, and the public servant. If the English documentary people got along faster, it was because they made up their minds sooner.

In the development of the non-theatrical film one point of great significance should be noted—namely, that this development has been determined not by educational, social, or other cultural needs per se but by the need of governments and public utilities to give an account of their stewardship or to secure the cooperation of the public in their plans. The information thus provided, if it does fulfill educational, social, and other cultural requirements, does so indirectly. The better operators in the documentary field have realized this from the beginning, and I have the best reason to know how single-minded and untiring they have been in directing the immediate or "political" need to larger educational and cultural ends. I am not forgetting the number of films provided for schools by Encyclopedia Britannica Films in America and Gaumont British Instructional in England and by units in France and other countries. Created to supplement the existing teaching curriculum and based on the idea that educational systems will one day pay for films as they now do for books, they have made considerable progress, in spite of the poverty and unimaginativeness of school budgets.

A government's use of educational films is not "propaganda" in the ordinary sense. Certainly we cannot impose on a government the duty of planning the national effort without giving it the means of informing the people what it is doing and of obtaining their support. This is generally admitted today in every country except the United States, where, or so it appears to the outsider, the fear of the partisan political use of information services looms very large in the public argument. It is true that government departments might use their information systems to defend incompetence or improperly to exaggerate achievements, but such practices have been progressively deplored as public information systems have discovered their proper relationship to public education and public persuasion. In this regard, the sense of responsibility of ministers and public servants alike has grown remarkably. Watchful congresses, parliaments, and presses have unquestionably made their special contribution to this result.

When I say that political necessity is a primary source of educational films, I mean a political necessity other than partisan. Let me illustrate from Canada, where the non-theatrical circulation of films has so grown in three years that the annual audience outside the theaters is now certainly larger than the population. Canada has perhaps gone even farther than England in the mobilization of specialized audiences and the considered production of films to meet their needs; and all this has been accomplished through the initiative of the government and with the support of all the political parties. But that support has not been given out of any special interest in education, or films, or art. If I asked baldly for money to film "the work of Canadian artists" I doubt that, in time of war, I would easily get it. On the other hand, "national unity" is a matter of great concern to every party in Parliament. Not one of them but would bless an effort to show the land and the work and the people of one part of Canada to the people of every other part and especially to homesick Canadians in France and Italy. So we have made three color films on the painters of Canada. I had a message from France the other day which said that when a film on Tom Thompson and the northern landscape and bush he painted was shown to Canadian soldiers in France, "there was not a dry eye in the house."

This alliance with political necessity has a great deal to do with the vitality and the future of education and of art. The film on Tom Thompson's paintings is none the worse for having a job to do in creating national unity and giving homesick soldiers a glimpse of their native land. A film, like any other work, discovers new energies when it knows it is going places. I shall only say of the Canadian national production schedule that its contribution to education and art is derived almost entirely from the "political necessities" intrinsic in rehabilitation and reconstruction, health and welfare, agricultural instruction and rural sociology, labor-management relations and the reconversion of industry, regional planning and industrial research for full employment, and questions of that kind. To go deeply into any one of these considerable matters is to discover the basic interests of the citizen and therefore the basic materials for the proper exercise of his imagination. The problem of industrial morale, for example, was never to be solved by patriotic ballyhoo or even by pointing the finger of scorn at the absentee. It required a local and intimate consideration of the conditions governing wages and work, housing and transport, health and recreation. Workers had to be given a dramatic appreciation of the relationship of their immediate task to the national effort. In connection with women's labor, there had to be special consideration of day nurseries and of the opening hours of beauty parlors. So with each and every one of the political necessities I mentioned. They provide new patterns of associations and ideas and therefore, potentially, new patterns of dramatic statement.

Where this approach has been made, the documentary film has prospered. It is an approach that works, and it will work even better as education realizes its close creative relationship with political and social development and as the film makers realize that political necessity does not exclude, and may well encourage, the possibility of art. One can cite the repute of the British documentary group in both educational and aesthetic circles and the beginning of something of the same repute for the much younger Canadian group. Nor were "The River" and other important American documentary films the less remarkable for being created in the public service. A wave of documentary films is sweeping over many countries today. If, as I suggest, its motive force is not the incidental interests of education or art per se but political necessity, it is not likely to be stopped. And its importance in international relations must be recognized.

The picture I see in Canada is of audiences gathering all over the country, in schools, village halls, factories, trade-union halls, to study the various perspectives of their work and citizenship. There are women who want to know about nutrition; there are groups interested in country libraries or larger school districts; there are people who want to see how distant communities are facing the common problems of health and housing, town planning, and the rest. I note, as a producer, that there is no end to the professional and civic matters they wish to know more about. I note that the service of traveling projectors moving from village to village, begun by the federal government, is now a cooperative service carried on by provincial authorities, national associations, trade unions, cooperatives, and service clubs, and that the federal government could not control this widespread interest in civic understanding even if it would.

This picture I see in Canada is already, I know, matched in Great Britain, and there are signs that it will be progressively matched in France, Holland, Belgium, South Africa, Australia, Norway, and Sweden. Certain of the South American republics have also been studying these developments and are likely to see the opportunities offered by them. The appointment of Jean Painlevé as Film Commissioner of France and of Joris Ivens as Film Commissioner of the Dutch East Indies, both "documentary" men in the sense I have described, is significant for the future of this type of film.

Its prospects in the United States are difficult to assess at present. There is a very large non-theatrical audience sprawling somewhat haphazardly across the country, much of it dedicated to the service of an old-time pedagogic curriculum which, one imagines, is often distant from the living requirements of citizenship. On the other hand, the country is rich in film libraries, which receive eagerly everything other nations have to show. The educational film work of the various departments in Washington has not been so inconsiderable as many assert. Though there has been no coordination of the government's whole interest in films, the Departments of Agriculture, the Interior, the Treasury, and Labor, the Mines Bureau, the OWI and the OSS, have made large contributions in the fields of technical and civic interest. And they have inspired still more. It is unthinkable that the United States should be behind in a field for which it is so brilliantly equipped.

I cannot imagine any more important development in international communications than the arrival of the various nations at similar educational techniques through the examination of social needs, for they are thereby creating common audiences for common considerations. By and large Canada's problems with respect to housing, safety in factories, public health, and regional planning are not different from those of the United States, and there is no reason why we should not plan our production schedules together and each have the advantage of a larger and more thorough program. It appears certain that we shall presently get down to such common schedules in many fields, and I have no doubt that Britain will want to come in, and France, and others too.

It is only simple sense that a country should make records of its achievements from which other countries may learn. England, for example, has much to teach other countries about the operation of labor-management committees. The United States has much to teach about regional planning and the use of building materials, about household economy, about plumbing. Smaller countries may have something to offer in the field of medical or industrial research, prenatal care, or physical fitness. Even the Eskimos may contribute from their superior knowledge of how to survive in the Arctic.

Some of us who have devoted our working lives to this aspect of international exchange have long thought that national propaganda, as such, was of secondary importance. We have thought, for example, that England was only partially appreciating its international responsibility when it kept inflicting on the world its pretty pictures of the Horse Guards parade and the leisure of the English countryside. Fortunately this parochial and insufficient policy is passing. In the United States, too, if one may judge from the medical series sent out by the State Department, the national approach to international communication may presently be abandoned.

The UNRRA, the ILO—or whatever international labor organization succeeds the ILO—the contemplated international education initiated by the Conference of Education Ministers of the United Nations, provide machinery for the international exchange of the living materials of social progress. And the peoples of the world are already inundating the foreign offices of the United Nations with requests for such information. It would seem, in fact, that the old complacent concept of exchanging "culture" is being succeeded by something else. All over the world people are demonstrating that they are interested in the same essentials of food and housing and health. It is inevitable, therefore, that the information and educational services and the films which speak for them should get down to the same simple but lively realities.

[This is the second of a series of four articles. The third, Hollywood Goes to War, by Dorothy Jones, will appear next week.]

Production First

BY STUART CHASE

WHAT can be done to curb the pressure groups and end the recurring deadlocks which are growing so disastrous for us all?

Various partial remedies have been proposed. None of them is a cure-all, but Americans should be grown-up enough by this time to stop looking for cure-alls. The first remedy that leaps to mind is legislation. "There ought to be a law." There is now no federal legislation regulating lobbies. Sixteen states have adopted laws requiring lobbies to register and furnish financial statements, but lobby laws generally contain no satisfactory definition of what constitutes legitimate lobbying.

Publicity could be a powerful safeguard. There are always some Washington newspapermen who take their responsibility seriously and expose Me First campaigns whenever they can. These reporters need the vigilance of a detective, the adroitness of a lawyer, and the courage of a crusader. They may lose their social popularity or even their jobs; they run a constant risk of libel suits. Some of them meet the test, but there is room for far more publicity.

Organizations of consumers and white-collar workers can accomplish a good deal. Kenneth Crawford calls them "the most hopeful developments of the last few years." Here is a point where the individual citizen can lend a hand, joining consumer groups and cooperatives. Two recent developments have given the consumer movement a great impetus—first and chiefly, the OPA, with its ceiling prices and encouragement to customers, housewives, and plain citizens; second, those labor organizations which have acted as gadfly to the OPA. The cost-of-living figures of the C. I. O. were severely criticized on technical grounds, but the effect of their publication was to express a strong political demand for price control.

The OPA is an example of government representation for an economic group, even though that group comprises the entire population. In practice it is people in the lower brackets that receive most protection, as they should. Whenever the government is able to give an economic group legitimate representation—as the Farm Security Administration represented marginal farmers—it forestalls the organization of a lobby.

Controlling Monopoly

Turning to the urgent problem of controlling monopoly, what methods do we find have been proposed for that? We have seen many examples of how uncontrolled monopolies, whether of business men, workers, or farmers, can seriously hurt modern communities. If some folks refuse to produce, other folks are going to suffer. Even if the goods can be spared, the purchasing power cannot. If restriction of output is widespread, the whole economy begins to lose its balance.

Furthermore, as pointed out earlier, inflexible prices and other monopolistic practices might well make it impossible to get full employment through compensatory fiscal devices. As fast as the government closed the dollar circuit, the monopolies could open gaps in it again. This might result in an uncontrolled inflation, as the Treasury threw its dollars into a bottomless pit.

William L. Batt, head of S. K. F. Industries, president of the National Planning Association, and a high official of the WPB, delivered a solemn warning to fellow businessmen:

Business will largely determine the size of the [post-war] demand, depending on whether it goes on a high-priced line or a low-priced line. I have already indicated, in advancing the program of more goods for more people at lower prices, that the National Planning Association believes the tendency of business must be toward lower and lower price levels.

Mr. Batt in effect comes out for the dollar-watch formula—one excellent remedy for the worst evil of monopoly. Wherever monopolies jack up price levels, choke off demand, block the machines from running, they should be blasted out of the way. Where they aid the machines to run better, they should be encouraged. In the case of a power grid, a monopoly helps the machines; a tangle of competing transmission lines makes no sense. But if the power grid is so controlled as to restrict its service and charge high rates, a little competition may have to be introduced, such as the "yardstick" of the TVA.

A given monopoly should not be condemned because it is a monopoly, but rather on the basis of its actual effect upon the economy. Regular monthly publication of the percentage of output to capacity in a monopolistic enterprise would furnish an eloquent prima facie index of whether or not it was slowing down the machines.

Useful and Harmful Monopolies

A careful study should be made of monopolies that have no excuse for being except greed and of those that are technologically justified. The first can perhaps be broken up by Thurman Arnold's type of sausage grinder, under the Sherman Act, and forced back into the field of free competition. I say perhaps, because some may be too big to be broken up without excessive social damage. The second type—which have some real justification—can legally be regulated, like other activities affected with a public interest. How? Here are some suggested methods:

1. Make them register their agreements with public authority and generally conduct their operations in a goldfish bowl.

2. Have public authority fix their prices or profits, as in the case of public utilities.

3. Operate yardsticks, like the TVA, to hold their prices in line. Here is where some of the war plants—say, the aluminum factories—might come in handy.

4. Encourage cooperative associations to compete with them. This has been very effective in Sweden, where the electric-light-bulb trust was broken.

5. Encourage little business to compete by making capital cheap, or by giving little business priorities in operating war plants, or both.

6. Revise the patent law so that great corporations cannot tie up an industry in perpetuity, entangling all newcomers in the hopeless barbed wire of infringement suits.

7. Enforce output quotas by public authority in cases where a monopoly shows signs of going quietly to sleep at 50 per cent of capacity.

8. Require the federal incorporation of companies.

Finally, and as a last resort, if a monopoly cannot be brought to serve the public interest by any of these regulatory methods, the government should take over full control.

There seems to be no escape from this logic. We might put it in the form of a syllogism: Monopolies restrict output. Irresponsible restriction of output is intolerable in modern societies. Therefore monopolies must be controlled. The only legitimate power to do this is the state. The alternative would seem to be an increasing rigidity, until the economy cracked apart. At which point, in not a few modern countries, a dictator has taken over, and the state has intervened in far more unpleasant forms. People who insist that we must have fewer monopolies and at the same time less government interference seem to be arguing in circles.

Same Medicine for Unions

Labor unions are in effect monopolies in the labor market. They prevent wages from falling according to the unfettered play of supply and demand. If the unions manipulate the wage structure in the interest of restriction of output, preventing the performance of work which needs to be done or crowding two men on a job which one can readily do, public opinion may come down on them harder than on big business monopolies. Unions as well as business men need to apply the dollar-watch formula. By keeping wage rates reasonable they can often earn more annual take-home pay.

If organized labor will identify its own interest with that of the public, it has an unlimited future. This does not mean singing patriotic songs and letting collective bargaining slide. It means getting behind a program to hold the national income around $150,000,000,000, and employment around 57,000,000 jobs. It means working with the Committee for Economic Development, if that committee has a similar objective, or with the National Association of Manufacturers, or the veterans' organizations, or with anyone traveling that road. It means getting behind measures for social security, medical care, broader education facilities, and decent housing, for all Americans. It means lining up for pure food and drug laws, grade labeling, better standards for consumers. It means carrying forward some of the exciting new techniques for adjusting workers and their work.

Labor-Management Committees

The labor movement usually moves through three stages. The first stage is to form a union where there was none before. Leaders are fighters. Management fights back.

The second stage is collective bargaining. The union has been accepted as bargaining agent for the workers. Leaders are negotiators; most of the tough babies have gone. The tussle around the bargaining table is about which side gets the biggest slice of a fixed pie. Labor tries to get more wages; management tries to get more profits.

The third stage is joint action by workers and managers to increase output, improve quality, reduce waste, and so make a bigger pie to divide. The consumer gets into this division.

The war has suddenly plunged thousands of plants, employing millions of workers, into stage three. Managers are sitting down with union representatives in an attempt to increase production and quality, and hasten the destruction of the Axis. There are now labor-management committees in more than 5,000 plants. They should be continued after the war.

Why Workers Work

The unions also have an opportunity to join with the industrial psychologists in solving the cardinal problem of factory work. As it stands, it is an unnatural way of life. "The sharp regular daily division between work and play is a condition that must have been virtually unknown throughout the long ages of pre-factory history," says Barbara Wootton in "Lament for Economics."

The studies of the Western Electric Company at their Hawthorne plant, made over a fifteen-year period, throw a flood of light on what makes workers work. It is not primarily money; it is not nicely spaced rest periods, or the intensity of the lighting, or short hours, or a dandy gymnasium and ball field. It is the sense that the worker is important to the plant, that he belongs, that society has a place for him. Give him that and his output curve goes through the roof!

The unions are the logical people to initiate, support, and push forward these new techniques. They are the logical people to work out a practical plan for an annual wage, whereby the employee may accept a lower hourly rate in return for a secure annual income. The C. I. O. steelworkers are proposing such a plan as I write. A number of concerns have already adopted it in a limited way. I think it is probably as inevitable as collective bargaining. The principle is simple: Would you rather get $20 a day for 100 days in the year, or $10 a day for a full 300 days?

Family-sized Farms

Most individual farmers do not believe that their interests should surpass those of any other group, or that they should be able to hold up Congress for special dispensations at will. They believe that they have had a tough break in the past—true; and will have another after the war unless someone gives them a hand—again true. But if they are going to depend for that help on the farm bloc in Congress and the Farm Bureau Federation, they had better exert some rank-and-file control over them.

A long-range reform would correct the situation in Congress which allows a minority of citizens to control a majority of Senators. A more immediate measure would be to divorce the Farm Bureau Federation from the County Agents' offices. As the only authorities which could do this are Congress again and the Department of Agriculture, the outlook is not any too radiant.

The best referent for the "American way" is not the little business man, a comparative newcomer, but the family farm, which started just back of Plymouth Rock in 1620. The skids are under it now, with the Farm Bureau and the Associated Farmers lined up for the big commercial outfits. If the family-sized farm is to be saved, together with the way of life it stands for, some pretty strong medicine is needed.

The Farm Security Administration, or something like it, must continue to encourage self-reliance by helping the small farmer to help himself. Furthermore, the small farmer will need cooperatives on both sides of him—cooperative buying of fertilizers, feeds, farm machinery; cooperative marketing to protect him from the organized middlemen. He must also have access to conservation programs where he can join with his fellow-farmers up and down the creek to hold and enrich his soil. He cannot go it alone. For agriculture as a whole, as I said before, the biggest single reform would be the war demand carried over into the peace by full employment. When workers have jobs, farmers have prosperity.

The Constructive Note

I have touched on only a few of the remedies proposed for a better ordering of pressure groups after the war. What is needed even more than remedial plans at this stage is competent analysis, an authoritative survey to show who is responsible for what in this humming, complicated power age. But most of all we need a realization that our personal interest is bound up with the national interest.

In April, 1944, a group of fifteen business men, fifteen labor leaders, and twenty farm leaders signed a joint statement for the National Planning Association at Washington. They agreed that if soldiers return to sell apples, "we will have lost the war." No economic group, they said, is self-sufficient; all depend upon each other. The terms "Business," "Labor," "Agriculture" lose their capital letters and become "We, the people," when we realize that "all the millions of us are consumers." Each of the three groups then made a separate statement, and I would like to quote from them.

We of the Business Committee recognize that management is dependent upon labor to man the machines and provide new capital from its savings. We recognize the principle of collective bargaining as a sound and fair American principle. We also know that what most men and women want for the future is a sense of security against unemployment, sickness, and destitute old age, together with a feeling of participation. . . .

We of the Labor Committee recognize that labor is dependent upon management to furnish the over-all "know how," to organize technical and commercial research . . . and to attract from private savers the new capital necessary to a sound and growing economy.

We of the Agricultural Committee in turn recognize that agriculture is dependent upon business and labor; that there cannot be profitable markets for our products except as the rest of the nation prospers, and has the means to buy.

Among the business men were David C. Prince of General Electric, Beardsley Ruml, Guy Emerson. Among the labor men were Clinton Golden, Walter Reuther, Robert Watt. Among the agricultural men were Thad Snow of Missouri, Donald Murphy of Wallaces' Farmer, Allen B. Kline of the Iowa Farm Bureau. I cannot remember anything like this ever happening before. There seems to be no ulterior motive. The gentlemen have apparently come to the sensible conclusion that it is best to hang together, as the problems of the post-war world climb up the sky like thunderheads.

European nations—or better, the continent as a whole—will have to be planned to survive at all after the devastations, migrations, shortages, property entanglements, of this war. It is even proposed that the United Nations should delegate a commission to direct the German economy for an indefinite period. Britain, owing to its bombed cities and its staggering loss of foreign investments, must manage its economy for many years. Russia of course will be planned to the last thumbtack. Only in America will conditions be favorable for maintaining a wide area of free enterprise, with planning confined to a few key points. We have the time, and the margin of national resources, to continue our institutions with a minimum of change—provided the American people unite in a program to level out the business cycle, underwrite a high level of employment, and bring monopolies under control; which means, at bottom, provided the American people learn to discipline themselves.

[This is the last of a series of three articles taken from Mr. Chase's forthcoming book, "Democracy Under Pressure," a report to the Twentieth Century Fund.]

Will America Back Out?

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

AERICAN liberal and progressive opinion is not playing a very creative role in the rapidly deteriorating international situation. The liberal and labor circles of Britain have been critical primarily of the policy of their own government. That is the true function of the critical minority in any nation, though the natural tendency everywhere is to be unduly critical of other peoples and to be self-righteous in estimating the policy of one's own nation. Liberal opinion in America has not fulfilled the true function of a minority in recent months. Either its criticism has been directed primarily against Russia and Britain upon the tacit or explicit assumption that American policies stand on a higher ground, or it has followed the old line of fellow-travelers and assumed the basic virtue of Russia. Both of these positions betray a lack of critical vigor and failure to comprehend the complexities of the international situation.

The crisis in Greece points to an understanding at Teheran—assigning Greece to the British sphere of influence—which the Russian government seems to be scrupulously honoring but which the Communist Party in Greece is not bound by. Greece thus points to two difficulties in the European situation. One is that no better solution than the division of Europe into spheres of influence seems to have been arrived at. The other is that the ideological instruments in Russia's possession enable it to extend its sphere of influence beyond the boundary assigned to it in any international agreement. This raises the specter of a Russia-dominated Europe, a specter responsible for the note of hysteria in Churchill's policies.

Pro-Russian liberalism in America does not estimate this problem realistically, feeling that the Russian policy of supporting the radical resistance movements is ideologically more correct than the general tendency of the Western world to support conservative governments in Europe. It is perfectly correct to condemn the Western policy not only because of its lack of democratic justice but also because of its futility. The more the West plays that game the more pawns it throws into Russian hands. The Russians would have to possess a superhuman disinterestedness not to avail themselves of the advantages which our policy gives them. But it is wrong to assume that Russia can unify the Continent or give it economic health. There are two reasons why it cannot do so. The revolutionary forces on the Continent which Russia can and does use as instruments of its policy are actually weakened by the general knowledge that they are such instruments. Conservatism has sufficient moral and political resources in Western Europe to prevent the Russian domination of the whole of Europe. If present tendencies continue, many a liberated nation may actually sink into anarchy or civil war because of the impossibility of uniting the nation on a radical policy oriented, in fact or supposedly, toward Russia. The second reason why Russia alone cannot bring peace to the Continent is that Britain and, covertly, America will not submit to such a solution. In other words, a sphere-of-influence solution of the European problem will lead to another war, no matter whether the West or Russia dominates Europe. Neither side has sufficient strength to prevent the other side from seeking to challenge its domination. Even if a sphere-of-influence solution were rigorously maintained in the sense that each side scrupulously refrained from poaching on the territory of the other, Europe could find no final peace upon that basis. Naturally if the present tendency to undermine agreements which have assigned various spheres to Britain and Russia prevails, the coming peace will be even more short-lived. It will, in fact, not outlast the war fatigue. There is thus no hope in a Russia-dominated peace and no justification for a liberalism which gives Russia uncritical support either because the critic is spiritually bound to Russia, as the real fellow-travelers are, or because the critic is outraged by the conservatism of Western policy.

On the other hand, that liberalism is equally inadequate which assumes that America has a vantage-point of international virtue from which it can survey, and be offended by, the power politics of Russia and Britain upon the Continent. Such a liberalism merely proves that it is unable to discern the hidden realities of international politics while it fastens its eye upon the obvious facts of Russia's policy toward Poland and Britain's policy toward Greece. The fact is that America's threat to international accord is more subtly expressed and more difficult to apprehend than the policies of Russia and Britain. This is not the fault of any American statesman but inherent in the total situation. In the first place, our power is primarily economic rather than political; and economic power is always less obvious. We are outraged by what we call the power politics of the European nations, but the European nations recall that the aviation conference broke down because we refused to allow any international checks to be placed upon our air power. At every turn, while we assume an air of injured innocence, the world is wondering just how we will use the tremendous preponderance of economic power which we undoubtedly have. It must be observed furthermore that we are, naturally enough, more inclined to throw our weight around in the economic sphere because we lack the political points of contact to do so in the political sphere. The very sense of frustration of a nation which has preponderant military power in the hour of crisis and preponderant economic power after the crisis but none of the political pawns used by other nations is a hazard to America's continuing responsibility in the community of nations. For it produces that nice mixture of nationalistic and idealistic isolationism which the other nations fear.

This brings us to the second hidden source of America's threat to world peace—our potential isolationism. We may pride ourselves upon our explicit defeat of isolationism in the last election, but Europe can still not be sure that we will remain in the peace. The hazards are still very great. There is the geographic fact that we are not a European nation as the other two great powers are, and even the liveliest imagination does not completely overcome geographic limitations. There is the historical fact that we do not need a system of mutual security as obviously or as immediately as other nations do, and that we have not been shaken to the foundations of our national life as they have been. There is the constitutional hazard that one-third of the Senate can still frustrate the will of the majority of the American people. All these hazards and several others which might be mentioned make it uncertain that America will remain in the peace—and therefore tempt the other nations to take such precautions as seem expedient. Consideration of such hazards gives at least partial justification for the Russian desire for unilateral security and also for the British desire to establish some vantage-points upon the Continent which will prevent Russia from dominating it exclusively.

Some of our international idealists are outraged by the fact that the Russian and British policies upon the Continent have increased the difficulty of getting even such a minimal accord as the Dumbarton Oaks agreement passed in the Senate. They forget that the Russian and British policies are partly the outgrowth of apprehensions about the possibility of such an accord becoming the fixed policy of America in the first place. Furthermore, the very high-sounding and moralistic inferential criticisms of the Russian policy toward Poland and of the British policy toward Greece expressed by Secretary Stettinius, and hailed by some liberals as proving the virtue of our position, have increased European apprehensions. We applaud the virtuous sentiment that every nation should be allowed to choose its government freely and that boundaries should be changed only by mutual consent. But Europe detects in these sentiments a new isolationism, coming out of the very heart of an Administration which had presumably defeated isolationism. I think Europe is right; for we washed our hands of all detailed decisions in Europe through the statements of the Secretary of State. We did this after probably having agreed to them in principle at Teheran; but we found it unwise from the standpoint of domestic politics to abide by the Teheran agreement. We are telling Europe that we do not like what they are doing, but the very vagueness of our criticism is a symbol of our withdrawal from Europe. These statements have driven the otherwise prudent and circumspect British weekly, the Economist, to a furious attack upon our policies.

The vicious circle is complete. Our policy, or the lack of certainty about our future policy, prompts Europe to action which increases the danger of the American errors of omission. The fear of our isolationism and of the unilateral expression of American economic power drives European powers into unilateral policies of security, which in turn make our isolationism more probable.

We could not get out of this vicious circle by deciding to become both more responsible and more imperialistic and carving a section out of Europe as our sphere of influence. There are no historical presuppositions for such a policy; and in any event it would not solve the problem of Europe and the world. Nor can we get out of the circle merely by pious criticisms of Europe and implied threats of withdrawal. We could get out of the circle only if we had a program for Europe and the world which would offer economic health and political stability, which would ally rather than alienate the harassed and disquieted masses of Europe, and which would prevent the domination of Europe by either Russia or the West. This does not mean that a new Wilsonian program would save us. It would have to be more realistic, and certainly more economic, than that. America lacks sufficient stakes in Europe on the present level of economic and political policies. It could find them only on a much higher level. It is not likely that the higher level will be achieved. This will not be the mistake of this or that statesman, though a very great statesman can occasionally create a higher level of policy than the available political resources seem to warrant. The difficulty lies in our whole historical situation. The wealthiest democracy and wealthiest nation on earth has too many immediate aims for the maintenance of its economic power and too many illusions about the possibility of maintaining "free enterprise" in a pauperized world to give the leadership needed for a sane solution of the world's problems.

The American failure is, of course, no greater, but also certainly no less, than the failure of the other nations. The fact is that the resources for a creative approach to the global problem are lacking in every nation. Britain clings desperately to its imperial and political resources because of its very consciousness of weakness in the economic realm. America exploits its economic power the more obviously because it lacks both political experience and instruments of world political power. Russia is still suffering from the fear of the capitalistic world, a fear which is partly justified by past events and partly the product of Communist dogma. Its Communist universalism has disintegrated, moreover, into a Russian nationalistic fervor and will to power.

We are living in a tragic age in which the available moral and political resources are not sufficient for the task in hand. We can now only hope for an approximation of the needed solution. Even that will elude us if Americans fail to understand their own contribution to the failures and errors of our time. For in that event disappointed American idealists will again play into the hands of American cynics. Already liberal criticisms of Britain and Russia have an ominously similar accent to those which the Chicago Tribune peddles daily in its columns.

Britain's Role in Europe

A British policy that was openly and blatantly hostile to the forces of the left would put this country in the position of Metternich rather than that of Palmerston and without any Holy Alliance to support us.

This is the last role that Britain should hope to play. If we are to take sides, our side is with the liberals. Britain is a democracy. It is a stronghold of freedom. . . . What interest has such a community with kings and princes? What interest has it in bringing back the old discredited forces which nowhere resisted the advance of Hitlerism and have done nothing since to turn the invader out?

A Britain radical in mood and liberal in foreign policy has a great role to play in Europe. Britain, friend of royalists and reactionaries, has none.

(The London Economist on "The Greek Disaster.")

How to Lose Friends in France

BY JULES MOCH

Paris, December 21, 1944

THE average Frenchman, the man on the street, fails to realize to what extent the American people, under the deft, tenacious, and vigorous leadership of President Roosevelt have won a triple victory over themselves; first, by freeing themselves of the concept of neutrality; secondly, by changing the concept of "cash and carry" to that of "lend-lease"; and, thirdly, by sending their sons to fight and die on a continent so distant and, in a sense, so secondary for them.

There has been a tendency here to magnify certain minor incidents growing out of the exuberance of American soldiers, so different from the reserve of the British. The ready cash which Americans displayed in North Africa created an uneasiness among Frenchmen, who were too much inclined to hold the visitors responsible for the black market and the spread of vice. Again, I think the French were wrong to impute to the Americans imperialistic designs on Indo-China, the French West Indies, and Dakar, and seek some confirmation of their suspicion in the slightest gesture and the most insignificant word. But if I voice the mea culpa of my compatriots in these matters, I ask Nation readers to search the collective conscience of their countrymen.

American misunderstanding of French psychology has proved costly during this war. Many expensive mistakes have been made which cannot be repaired, but it is not too late to correct certain errors still being committed. The State Department placed its money on Darlan and Giraud, and lost; it bet against De Gaulle and lost again. It believed that there would be a split between France and the committees of national liberation set up in London and Algiers; it was wrong. It rectified its position finally by giving up the idea of establishing an AMG in France, which would have been catastrophic for Franco-American friendship, and recognizing General De Gaulle's Provisional Government.

Recently the American government has dealt another blow to Franco-American friendship by its handling of German prisoners and its disposition of the prizes of war. German prisoners taken by the Americans receive the same food and clothing as American soldiers—that is, they are fed and clothed much better than French civilians. I know that this is in accordance with recognized international conventions, but to the long-suffering people of France it seems unjust.

Americans can still afford to fight this war as good sportsmen, but the French are fighting it in hate. American civilians have never been in the front line. They have not even known the terrors of a blitz or the senseless destruction of V-1 and V-2. And neither America nor England has known enemy occupation with its massacres and its deportations. Can Americans understand the full meaning to Frenchmen of the fact that one Frenchman out of every fourteen has been deported? In many circles there is not a single family that does not mourn some member who has been killed or has disappeared, that does not tremble for the fate of relatives herded into cattle cars and shipped to camps where death is dealt out wholesale in gas chambers and electric pools. Can Americans measure the hate which Frenchmen of all classes and opinions feel today for the Germans?

"For two years I haven't had a morsel of chocolate for my children," a father said to me. "The Americans give it to their Boche prisoners." The reasoning may be too simple, but it expresses an almost universal feeling. Moreover, the French feel that the Allies now have almost enough prisoners to be in a position to threaten the Nazis with reprisals and to force them to stop killing those foreign hostages who have miraculously survived the lugubrious convoys of deportees. Surely the French and Russian martyrs will not be saved by giving German prisoners warm clothes, chocolate, and cigarettes.

Prizes of war, according to the American high command, include orders for goods placed by Germany with French industry but not delivered at the time of the liberation. Though the need in France for these very goods may be desperate, the French government cannot obtain possession of them or distribute them. For example, at a time when clothing tickets were no longer honored and no shirts were available for Frenchmen except on the black market, where they cost fifty times their pre-war price, a large stock of shirts originally destined for the Wehrmacht remained impounded as a prize of war.

On one occasion the poorly armed soldiers of the French Forces of the Interior, struggling to drive the Germans from the pockets of Lorient, St. Nazaire, and La Rochelle, were prevented from appropriating a stock of abandoned enemy arms because these arms were considered prizes of war. In the hands of F. F. I. members they would have saved American as well as French lives. But the Americans refused to release them.

Equally galling to the French was the case of the overcoats made by a collaborationist manufacturer for the German army. As winter approached, men of the F. F. I. were fighting on the western front in ragged uniforms, without sweaters, wearing sandals or sabots on their feet. They would have liked to cover their rags with the seized overcoats; and they would have liked to wreak that much revenge on the collaborationist. Impossible; the coats were prizes of war. The American authorities ordered the manufacturer to complete the consignment and then distributed the coats among German prisoners. The average Frenchman was outraged, not only because the poilus had to go without coats while German prisoners were warmly clad, but because the affair made it seem that collaboration was its own reward.

Such incidents may be of minor importance, but they touch Frenchmen in the quick. And piled one upon the other, they are undermining the traditional Franco-American friendship.

Letter from Rome

[The following letter was recently received from Italy by a person well known to The Nation.]

DEAR M—: It is not without emotion that I sit down to write you after such a long silence. And it is with a lightening of the spirit that I get ready to type without the need for paraphrasing, allusions, coded postscripts, and all that inconvenient and dangerous baggage that the fascist malefactors obliged us decent folk to carry—though this was one of the smallest of the many crosses which bowed us down. The hurricane has passed, or rather we have touched the bottom of the abyss into which we were thrown, and the astonishing thing is that we are still alive.

Now for the facts. All my efforts to leave this unfortunate country were interrupted by the outbreak of war, which found me with one foot out and one foot still in. I thought then that to get out with one foot, cutting off the other, would have made me helpless. So I remained. Was I wrong? Even today I can't say. Anyway I stayed here, and feeling that I couldn't keep my hands in my pockets but that it was my duty to fight the malefactors who were ruining not only us but the whole world, I began a double life—not an easy one, I assure you. We anti-Fascists have "lived dangerously," as the Duce used to preach. A double life—the irreproachable functionary on one side, and the saboteur, the conspirator, the fighting anti-Fascist on the other. It was necessary because the sad truth was this: to free Italy and the world from Nazi-Fascism we Italians had to lose the war, and therefore each one of our acts had to lead to that goal. With this concept quite clear in my mind I gave myself over entirely to the work. Privation, poverty, hunger, danger, all had to be met day after day, hour after hour, if thereby I could hasten by a single hour the collapse of Nazi-Fascism; it was the certain duty of every civilized man to do so. I had to rent my house, sell my organ, live in the house of my in-laws, and give up mountain climbing and everything else so that I could save money for the resistance movement. Then began the harsh task.

Production, railroads, the handling of strategic materials—all gave an opportunity for obstructionism and sabotage. It was a dangerous game, requiring a good deal of shrewdness and ability. The incitements of the Anglo-American radio did not fall on deaf ears. I could tell you of hundreds of tons of glycerine diverted for the manufacture of explosives. The same for steel and iron. And there was much disorganization of repair work. Orders sent by mail—to relieve the over-burdened telegraph, of course—were written perhaps not too clearly so that it often took six months to get something done that should have been done in one. Many ruses were necessary to avoid suspicion and to prevent the ruin in one day of the labor of months.

The liberal movement which had its origins in the old Justice and Liberty groups fitted my ideas like a glove and I entered it. I made good use of my official railway pass to do propaganda work in all parts of Italy, to distribute clandestine leaflets, to collect funds and food for the party men, for the persecuted, for the imprisoned, and for the patriot bands. There were the Jews to help. There were documents to be falsified, refugees to be sheltered, food to be provided without ration cards, and hidden persons to be protected. How many fake documents were issued in my name as a functionary of unquestioned integrity! It was in this field that we made our first slip. A man was arrested who carried one of these false identification cards. Before the police confronted us with each other, what acrobatics we had to perform to get together on our stories! The affair ended miraculously with my release as a dupe of unpardonable irresponsibility who had allowed himself to be fooled by a Jew into attesting an unproved identity. And to think that if the police had only gone to the trouble of examining the general registry they would have found dozens of such identifications under my name!

In order to let the Allies know how and with what the Germans were supplying the front, we furnished daily reports on German railway movements—the type, quantity, and destination of shipments—and indicated the vital points in the north that should be bombed to stop them. This had the further aim of reducing to a minimum the deaths of civilians and damage to cities and monuments. Every day certain secret radios would broadcast. Can you realize how hard it was to organize all this and keep it going under the eyes of the S. S. and the Fascist police?

The Allies were a little slow in catching on at first; then they saw the effects and believed in us. Every once in a while someone slipped, and we heard no more from him. Arrested, tortured, shot? There followed anxiety without end and fearful difficulties to overcome in reestablishing the interrupted contacts. Sleepless nights, with ears tensed for the motor of a car stopping in our street, for the sound of a footstep heavier than usual on the stairs. Police? S. S.? Leaving one's house, roaming from hole to hole to cover one's tracks, cold, hungry, miserable, one's wife sought by the police, one's in-laws arrested as Jews. My wife hid first in a convent, then worked as a maid in various houses in Rome, with false papers showing her to be an évacuée from a town occupied by the Allies. Her last service was in the house of old P. B., who had been released after eight months in the Regina Coeli jail for anti-Fascists.

On the night of September 9, 1943, a bomb destroyed my house completely. You remember my house motto, "Open to the sun and friends"? It was an Italian bomb, dropped by Fascist plane the night after the armistice.

When on June 4 we got our first view of American tanks, it was barely in time. We were exhausted and could not have held out any longer. Another ten days and we should have been gone—deported or dead.

Instead, we are still here, but not all of us. Too many of the best of us are missing at roll call. We who now remain must now rebuild. Shall we succeed? In the beginning we must, above all, fight against the Fascists. Let all who have lived outside this hell remember: the Fascists are the number one enemy; the Nazis are number two. The Germans would not have been able to carry out their infamies against Italy had not the Fascists, fortunately a small minority of Italians, helped them. The Fascists, paid by the Germans, spied upon us real Italians, denouncing, imprisoning, torturing, shooting. And these same Fascists today, with amazing cynicism, seek to disguise themselves, to mingle with the Allies, to save their disgustingly acquired positions. To clean house, we need an honest government composed of honest men who will not deviate by a millimeter from the right path, which is to root out fascism—a process only in small part political, in great part educational.

First of all our people must again be made honest, diligent, and decent. You know the old saying, "Italy is made; now we must make the Italians"? Today it would be more correct to say, "We must first make the new Italians; later we can think of making Italy." This task will take decades. I shall certainly not live to see it finished.

There is much need for understanding between us and the Allies. For more than a month I have been working here on the railroads with R. A. F. officials, and you should see how they gape when I tell them about what we have suffered and how we Italians fought on their side. They are particularly amazed at the atrocities. "We thought it was only propaganda," they say. The other day I invited them to a little party—very little, since I am now so poor—where they spoke with men, women, and girls who in all modesty and sincerity told them of the tortures inflicted by the S. S., of the massacres carried out by these human beasts. The R. A. F. people could not believe their ears. When we speak of our plans for reconstruction and for sincere collaboration with them, they are at first uncertain but little by little are persuaded. We have to make them realize that in Italy there is still many a sane and serious man who wants to learn from them but from whom they may also have something to learn. In this way, through better understanding, we shall be able to accomplish a more rapid reconstruction and to create a new life based upon the principles of honesty, work, and freedom.

In overcoming all obstacles and the ruin of the war, we shall be reborn. Meanwhile the Germans are gone, I call myself again G— S—, and I am married to a Jewish girl. You can't realize what it means to be able to write freely so simple a sentence!

G. S.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

BEFORE dawn on December 16, just as Marshal Rundstedt opened his offensive with a terrific artillery barrage at the spot where Germany, Luxembourg, and Belgium meet, another notable event took place where Germany touches Switzerland—"a sensational illegal crossing of the frontier." That was the expression used by the local Swiss paper, the Sankt Galler Tagblatt, when it reported the affair two days later.

A border station near the small Swiss town of Borgen was aroused at four in the morning by the approach of nine persons—two men, two women, and five children—who explained that they had fled from Germany and hoped to find asylum in Switzerland. The conventional questioning brought out that both men were directors of the well-known Messerschmidt company, which manufactures fighter planes for the Luftwaffe in plants scattered all over the country. Their names were kept secret by the Swiss officials—"it could not be ascertained," the report said, "whether Professor Messerschmidt himself was one of them"—but the rest of the story was less carefully guarded. The St. Gall paper was therefore able to inform its readers that the two families had motored from the city of Eisenach, had abandoned their car in the neighborhood of the border, and had crossed the border at night on foot. The reason for their flight—and also the basis for their claim to the right of asylum in Switzerland, was a future danger to their lives. They admitted that up to the moment of their flight they had been in perfectly good standing with the German authorities and had had nothing to fear. But by virtue of their comprehensive view of the German situation, they could see the defeat of the Reich inexorably drawing nearer. At the moment of defeat, they said, they would certainly be threatened in life and limb. And because of this approaching danger, they appealed to Switzerland for the right of asylum.

The affair turned out badly for the directors and their wives. In compliance with a recent decree designed to prevent war criminals from finding a haven in Switzerland, the border station consulted the federal government in Berne. Within forty-eight hours the government decided that the children could remain—children always have the right of asylum—but ruled against the parents. In the first place, it said, a possible future danger to life is not the same as an effective present danger; and, in the second place, this precise type of refugee is politically unwelcome. The Berne government therefore ordered the two directors, with their wives, to be sent back across the border as undesirable foreigners. One day later the Sankt Galler Tagblatt rounded out its earlier account with the laconic statement: "The two directors of the Messerschmidt airplane factories who tried to cross the Swiss frontier and were refused admission as undesirable aliens were arrested by German customs officers and transported under heavy guard from the Blumberg customs station to Waldshut, Baden, where the Gestapo took them over."

Whether this was a satisfactory outcome is a not uninteresting question. It is possible, for example, that if the two directors had been allowed to remain in Switzerland they might have become a source of much valuable information for the Allies. But that need not now be considered. At the moment the incident on the Swiss border is noteworthy for the light it throws on the general situation behind the Rundstedt offensive. We do not know whether the two Messerschmidt directors had an idea that the offensive was impending, although it is probable that they did. In any case they were in a position to get a good over-all view of the situation, and they demonstrated most dramatically that to them it looked hopeless.

There is no reason for us to see it any differently. Painful as was the recent setback at the front, it has not altered the fundamental fact that the Reich is consuming itself—swiftly, progressively, and without gaining any compensating advantage. A wastrel can draw down his bank account from $100,000 to $10,000 and then to $1,000, and still show no difference in his manner of living. He can keep up his old style until his last dollar is spent. And as long as the Germans still have some capital in the form of man-power they can mount offensives in their old style. It remains true, nevertheless, that their capital is being hopelessly diminished.

BOOKS and the ARTS

An International Episode

LETTERS OF THOMAS J. WISE TO JOHN HENRY WRENN: A FURTHER INQUIRY INTO THE GUILT OF CERTAIN NINETEENTH-CENTURY FORGERS. Edited by Fannie E. Ratchford. Alfred A. Knopf. $7.50.

LIFE pulls itself together every now and then to demonstrate with the precision of a practiced pedagogue that art is more literally accurate than we usually believe. Thus, ten years ago, when interest in the detective novel was reaching new heights, two young Englishmen, Carter and Pollard, brought out their "Enquiry into the Nature of Certain Nineteenth Century Pamphlets." The immediate purpose of the "Enquiry" was to demonstrate by the standard devices of detection that some fifty rare Victorian first editions were rank forgeries and to show that the forger was none other than Thomas J. Wise. But since the perpetrator of the wonderful swindle was the prince of British bibliophiles, the creator of the incomparable Ashley Library, and since the science of Victorian bibliography had been undermined by the dean of Victorian bibliographers, it is clear that the ultimate intention of the "Enquiry" was to establish the correctness of the detective-story imagination—that is, to make it more possible than ever before to suppose that the Great Seal had been stolen by the Lord Chancellor himself and that it was the saintly Master of Snubnose who had pickled the Senior Wrangler's corpse in the college buttery.

And now in the midst of the heightened interest in Henry James, life again takes its pedagogic chalk in hand and gives us Fannie E. Ratchford's "Letters of Thomas J. Wise to John Henry Wrenn." Although the bulk of the book is devoted to the business communications which Wise sent to a notable client and victim, the chief interest of the volume lies in Miss Ratchford's long introduction, which undertakes to extend the Carter and Pollard accusation to include personages no less eminent than H. Buxton-Forman and Sir Edmund Gosse. These friends of Wise, Miss Ratchford undertakes to prove, not only accepted and advertised the bogus "editions" but actually assisted Wise in their manufacture. The case against Buxton-Forman is substantial, the case against Gosse less so, but I am not so much concerned to weigh the evidence as to suggest that Miss Ratchford's book constitutes a corroboration of Henry James's imagination. It is, in effect, a Henry James novel in the raw.

Speaking of Wise, Miss Ratchford quietly refers to his "superb holdings of Shelley, Byron, Browning, and other favorites," and that word "holdings," so casually naturalized from the language of the bank and the stock exchange, gives us our clue. We are in the world of "The Spoils of Poynton," in which things of virtue become objects of virtu and have their price in hard cold cash. In this world "association value" can be measured to the shilling. Here the early obscurity of a famous poet is a great creator of value because of the smallness of his first editions. But association and scarcity are not enough to create the value of the auction room: beyond these there is the actual literary value of the work, the value as it is created by readers, critics, and scholars. For the investment to be sound there must be a true spiritual value in the object that is bought. And this the collector can estimate very accurately. He does so by means of a faculty we call taste. The notable thing about taste is that the possessor of it can judge spiritual values without being in the least affected by them. We expect that beauty and truth must always have their good effect; but James, like E. M. Forster after him, was inclined to associate taste with crude possessiveness, as in the character of Mrs. Gereth, the owner of Poynton, or even with repressive cruelty, as in Gilbert Osmond of "The Portrait of a Lady." It is worth noting that Wise's letters express scarcely an idea or real emotion about his literary commodities other than ideas and emotions of ownership and price; and he presumably supposed that Mr. Wrenn of Chicago did not expect them of him. This, then, is the world, which James knew so well, of the muses safe in the museum, of the acquisitive emotions at play among the spoils of creation.

Not the least Jamesian element in Miss Ratchford's story is her manner of telling it. An earlier book of hers on the Brontës brought its whiff of the fierce feminist emotions of "The Bostonians," what with its relative indifference to the gentle Emily, its vindictive, even cruel, scorn of brother Branwell, its passionate defense of Charlotte in her least attractive moments, and its wonderful explanation of Charlotte's death: "she died of pregnancy complicated by a cold." But now one must think of Miss Ratchford as a kind of more vehement Henrietta Stackpole, the dour little American nationalist of "The Portrait of a Lady." For Miss Ratchford works the "international theme" to its limit. If American book dealers bought the forgeries and passed them on to American customers, it follows for her that "the forgeries seem to have been fabricated for the particular benefit of Americans." She finds it not without sinister significance that Sir Edmund Gosse was Librarian of the House of Lords. The fraudulence of Wise as a single individual she can see as merely personal, but confronted with a conspiracy of three, she remarks that the affair changes from "an individual crime to a national scandal." The exposition of a scandalous and shocking matter would seem to call for objectivity and tact, but Miss Ratchford produces her evidence with a shrill moral vehemence whose journalistic point and patriotic propriety Miss Stackpole would have understood.

And a conspiracy of guilty Englishmen naturally requires the Jamesian "innocent" American. Miss Ratchford gives him to us in Mr. Wrenn, whose admirable collection—for Wise sold him many fine items in addition to a complete set of the forgeries—is now in Miss Ratchford's charge at the University of Texas. Mr. Matthiessen, in his book on James, questions the veracity of Adam Verver, the millionaire collector of "The Golden Bowl," for Mr. Matthiessen feels that American millionaires of the early century are not adequately represented by Maggie Verver's gentle and aesthetic father. I think that Verver is sufficiently substantiated by figures like George Peabody and Spencer Trask, whatever we may think of the full significance of their chivalric idealism, but John Henry Wrenn will also serve to justify James's accuracy of observation. A banker and broker is not generally a likely model of innocence, but with a conspiracy of clever Englishmen besetting him, with one of them his trusted and false friend, for Wrenn said that his connection with Wise was "one of the richest and most satisfying experiences of his life," can a man be granted anything less than what Bertrand Russell called "the superior virtue of the oppressed"? Poor man, he sought the unction of life in literature, and Wise, who was not only a bibliophile but also a dealer in essential oils, sold it to him, throwing in a few forgeries but also one of the richest and most satisfying experiences his customer ever had.

James, who loved to meditate on the relation of money to spirit, would perhaps have judged that Mr. Wrenn bought well, and James would surely have found pleasure in noting Miss Ratchford's wry pride as she hints the distinction of the Wrenn collection in owning the only complete set of the great Wise forgeries.

LIONEL TRILLING

NOTES BY THE WAY

By MARGARET MARSHALL

GETTING INTO A THEATER these days requires as much forethought and planning as a minor D-day. But by dint of luck and persistence I have managed, within the last two weeks, to see three shows. I was a paying guest—the term is well chosen—at "Harvey" and "The Seven Lively Arts." "On the Town" I saw as Mr. Krutch's delegate, and ■ report is in order. The seed of "On the Town" was contained in Jerome Robbins's excellent ballet "Fancy Free," which has been such a hit at the Ballet Russe. It has grown, thanks to the eager and tender care of a number of talented people, into a full-blown musical which has charm and freshness and the gaiety generated when a group of amateur professionals put their heads together. It has to do with three sailors on twenty-four hours' leave in New York who set out to find the Miss Turnstiles of the month (Miss Subways to you). They find her of course and a great deal else, including two other girls, the Museum of Natural History, a round of night clubs, the subway itself, and Coney Island. Nedick's in Times Square is their rendezvous. In the course of their tour they turn up more than enough local color, amusing conceits, songs, gay sets, and ingenious ballets to fill an evening.

The three sailors, to begin with, are wonderfully cast. They simply look like any assortment of three sailors you might sight on Broadway, and they speak directly to the feeling one has these days about boys in sailor suits far from home, out on ■ lark, and only by some unlikely chance mixed up in anything so major as ■ world war—for better or worse the innocent cut of ■ sailor's togs belies his reputation both in love and war.

The book is satisfactory, not least because it is free of the senseless complications in which most musical-comedy books get entangled—to be disentangled only at the cost of boredom and embarrassment. This one can be picked up or laid aside as the singing and dancing require, and it is brightly written. It has, strictly speaking, no plot, only a series of incidents and scenes which serve to bring the boys and girls together.

Leonard Bernstein's music is adequate and apropos, but not extraordinary. The specialty numbers are better than the straight songs, with the mild exception of "Lucky to Be Me." Though no one of the dance numbers is as good as the original ballet, the dancing in general has the same qualities that made "Fancy Free" so delightful. It is light but firm, and clean in line. It is the expression of a lively intelligence, and its humor is integral and authentic. Here is modern dancing, and, I might add, indigenous American ballet, which makes use of old skills as well as fresh attitudes and is quite free of the awful pretentiousness which makes most expositions of "the modern dance" excruciating.

Sono Osato's exotic appearance adds an ironic fillip to the broadly amusing conception of Miss Turnstiles; and her easy skill, based on years of ballet discipline, is just what Mr. Robbins's free and fanciful choreography calls for. The two other girls, Nancy Walker and Betty Comden, have their own quite different charms. Miss Comden, by the way, is the co-author of the book—with Adolph Green, who takes the part of one of the sailors.

I HAVE BEEN TRYING vainly to get some information about Jean Bruller, who was revealed some time ago to be the author of "Silence of the Sea," one of the books issued by the French underground publishers, Les Editions de Minuit. Even people who had lived steadily in France for years before the war had never heard of him. "Silence of the Sea" was a strange little book. To many people it smelled of collaboration. It was highly praised in some quarters as a piece of writing, though it struck me as rather strainedly restrained. A few weeks ago Life printed a "Plea for France" by M. Bruller, which was merely strained. It had in a word the feverish simplicity of people who write for dear Life. In a foreword the author was described as a young illustrator, which left me just where I was before.

I can't say even now that I've found out who Jean Bruller is. But I was given a rather anti-climactic turn the other day when I happened to look at the book I had been using for weeks as a writing board. I had chosen one of those large thin books designed for children, and it happened to be the American edition, published in 1940, of André Maurois's "Fatapoufs and Thinifers," translated by Rosemary Benét and illustrated by—Jean Bruller. It's an amusing book and the illustrations are clever. The story ends to be sure with collaboration between the Fatapoufs and Thinifers, who have been wrangling for years over an island; and Maurois is considered to have followed an extremely equivocal line politically. But M. Bruller's drawings are quite harmless, and I'm convinced, pending further evidence, that he is simply a young illustrator who turned to writing for the French underground press, wrote a book which had a great success abroad, and is now, perhaps to his own surprise, an author. When I read "Silence of the Sea" I assumed for some reason that it had been written by an old hand. Perhaps that is why its opaque prose seemed to suggest sinister meanings. What

The Most Challenging Work Of Our Time—

THE PHILOSOPHY OF AMERICAN HISTORY

By MORRIS ZUCKER

Whose Historical Field Theory, If Valid, Must Revolutionize Thought In History As Did COPERNICUS In Astronomy, DARWIN in Biology, And EINSTEIN In Physics!

The Historical Field Theory—

The THEORY:

The historical methods of modern and classical writers are subjected to critical analysis, while the entire range of Civilization supplies the material for this theory. In its pages are dissected the vitals of the methods of Beard, Nevins, Schlesinger, Robinson, Cheyney, Boudin, Beer, etc. Also the classical theories of Buckle, Guizot, Macaulay, Symonds, Grote, Gibbon, etc. . . . Dialectics as taught by Hegel and Marx are presented in a thorough-going, understandable fashion . . . Like the sociological theories of Boas, Goldenweiser, Sorokin and others . . . Dewey's philosophical objections to the possibility of establishing history as science are debated point by point . . . The physical theories of Planck, Einstein, Heisenberg, Lodge and Eddington, in their philosophical implications, contribute to the formulation of the Historical Field Theory . . . A complete work in itself, 694 pages.

Periods In American History—

Its APPLICATION:

Beard wrote that the United States had produced "no large philosophic view of America in a world setting." This work is his answer. For now, from the very beginning the reader becomes aware that a new Science of History is being created. From the colonial policies of Spain, France and England to the creation of the Federal government; from the rounding out of national boundaries through the industrialization to the Second World War, the reader discovers a never-suspected inherent coherence. Laws, principles and social forces which are so often over-ride the improvisations of man are disclosed. The special Theory of the Continuing American Revolution here developed is of tremendous significance, and will stand forth as Dr. Zucker's most significant contribution to the analysis of our history. The final chapter which deals with the course of American history for the next twenty years by projecting established social laws in a given field, is a fitting climax to a great scientific achievement . . . A complete work in itself, 1070 pages.

Nobly conceived and executed, in this work history emerges from the status of an art to assume the rank of a science. The effective social forces of a period and the laws of historical motion are presented in definitive form. The Philosophy of American History consists of two separate and complete volumes: the Historical Field Theory and the Periods In American History—the theory and its application. It is a penetrating, vital, factual work. The style, while analytical, is warmly human. Many of its incisive sentences will become the current phrases of the next generation. Because prediction based on established laws is the essence of science, you will discover an almost irrefutable answer to the most pressing questions of these times.

What will be our economic, social and political development? What their world repercussions? Is a third World War inevitable? The entire philosophy of history is crystallized in the final chapter: "The Next Twenty Years in American History."

The digest on the left tries to give you some cue to the contents of these two masterful volumes. It can be but an inkling. Inspect these works at your bookstore. You'll realize at once what a grand climax 25 years of patient study and reflection has achieved. Every scholar, statesman and student of current problems will find the Philosophy of American History an indispensable addition to his classic library—to read, re-read and refer to again and again. Cloth bound, price $4.50 each volume; $8.50 for both. At your Bookstore now, or write to

ARNOLD HOWARD
PUBLISHING COMPANY, INC.
Long Island City 3, N. Y.

disturbed me may have been merely the opaque prose—and thinking—of a young, over self-conscious writer.

A HEADLINE in the New York Times for December 18 read as follows: "U. S. Role in Greece Limited to Succor." One way or another the Times can usually be depended upon to tell all.

BRIEFER COMMENT

Of Shakespeare's Comedy

THE LATE GEORGE GORDON, professor of poetry at Oxford, was a scholar and a gentleman after the English fashion—which means that the scholarship was persistently played down. The Oxford University Press has just issued a small volume called "Shakespearian Comedy and Other Studies" ($2.50), composed of little discourses sometimes no more than three or four pages long, and the writing is always charming in that carefully casual style which has become part of the manner expected of top-ranking members of the British academic world. Poking gentle ridicule at the Meredithian and Bergsonian theories of comedy, which are too solemn to find simple fun other than embarrassing and too moralistic to know what to make of our affection for comic rascals, he chats entertainingly about the Shakespearian clowns and Shakespearean exquisites, who inhabit a comic world of their own. "A theory of comedy, or of comedy par excellence, which relegates, and is bound to relegate, most of Shakespeare's comic world to an appendix stands clearly," he says, "on too narrow a basis, at any rate for English use." If Professor Gordon had not been so definitely committed to that apologetic and fragmentary tentativeness which is part of his manner he might have proceeded to formulate a theory of his own. He might, for instance have asked us to consider the possibility that there is a comic catharsis as well as a tragic one, and even that, as some believe, Aristotle himself discussed it in a portion of the "Poetics" now lost. As it is he rests content with perceptive hints and shrewd obiter dicta. Speaking of "Love's Labor's Lost" as the first of a group of plays in which young gentlemen or ladies attempt to live in a kind of Utopia for exquisites, he says: "Every College in this University was originally such an attempt . . . Sooner or later . . . the God of Marriage erects his straggling monuments—and we tumble into a world of taxes, and villas, and perambulators. To every Academe its North Oxford." Part of the joke is that Shakespeare always sees what is coming though his creatures do not.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Whys and Wherefores

EVEN MARGARET BOURKE-WHITE, whose perceptive talent manifests itself better in her photographs than in her text, is concerned about the fact that the G. I. soldier does not know what he is fighting for. In "They Called It Purple Heart Valley" (Simon and Schuster, $3) she tells about her battlefield roving in Italy and notes that American troops were unable to discuss, and uninterested in discussing, the whys of the war. Politically she found them illiterate as compared with Russians, British, Chinese. This vaguely disturbed her, and was not subject to the sharp pictorial analysis at which she excels. She did realize that men who were doing challenging jobs, such as the fliers in Cub planes acting as artillery spotters, needed no whys and wherefores because they were enthusiasts at their jobs. Not so the man in the forward foxholes; he was an automaton, condemned to risk death for no deep reason that he knew.

Oddly enough, a young man named Arthur Miller sees the problem with more penetrating eyes in "Situation Normal" (Reynal and Hitchcock, $2). I say oddly, because you ordinarily wouldn't expect much of a war book from a youth employed by Hollywood to visit training camps in the United States and absorb atmosphere for a movie. Yet Mr. Miller's is a provocative piece of work. He too noticed that the men did not know what they were fighting for. They did not correlate their battle with that of any of our allies. Just before lunch, in one camp, a lieutenant gave the men their daily five minutes of orientation, droning off news bulletins until he bogged down in the Russian situation. Then he said, "You don't want to hear any more of this, do you?" and finished with a discussion of what a millimeter is.

Mr. Miller thinks there is one thing which his movie must do: "It has got to make sense." He means that it must do what the army fails to do—give some point to the sacrifice of men's lives. And he realizes this is not only for the benefit of the men fighting in the front lines but also for the men who will come home after the war and find themselves suddenly and devastatingly without orders, without a goal.

MARCUS DUFFIELD

A work of historical importance—one of the essential documents for evaluating the current Chinese crisis—

CHINA'S NEW DEMOCRACY

By Mao Tse-tung

"No document more important than China's New Democracy, by Mao Tse-tung, the revered Chinese Communist leader, has emerged from that nation since the beginning of the war. It is unquestionably the most significant contribution to the foreign understanding of the problems and perspectives of our Far Eastern ally available to us . . .

"China's New Democracy reaches the English-speaking public just as the Chinese nation faces the sharpest test of its history. If we thoroughly comprehend the lessons which Mao Tse-tung here teaches us our efforts to support those policies which will result in a regeneration of China will be immeasurably strengthened."

—Frederick V. Field in Political Affairs, Jan., 1945

Price 25 cents

At your bookshop or:

NEW CENTURY PUBLISHERS

832 Broadway

New York 3, N. Y.

Chaim Weizmann

THE SEVENTIETH BIRTHDAY of the outstanding Zionist leader of this generation has prompted a symposium on his life and work under the title of "Chaim Weizmann, Statesman and Scientist" (Dial, $3.50). The volume is edited by Meyer Weisgal; the various essays are written by a very distinguished list of authors, including Dorothy Thompson, Thomas Mann, Freda Kirchwey, Ludwig Lewisohn, Maurice Samuel, Norman Angell, Sholem Asch, S. N. Behrman, Stephen Wise, and many others. Justice Felix Frankfurter writes the introduction.

Merely as a "success story" the career of Weizmann is unique. A Russian Jew educated in Germany, he first came to prominence in Britain as a scientist whose discoveries in microbiology led to scientific advances which helped Britain win the First World War. Dr. Weizmann's scientific eminence contributed directly to his career as a statesman, for it gave him the prestige and, some say, the bargaining power which made it possible for him to commit Britain through the Balfour Declaration to the policy of a Jewish homeland in Palestine.

But Weizmann's career is more than a success story. It is the embodiment of one of the great political ideas of our time, of an idea which has been dwarfed by the magnitude of the world crisis but which is yet relevant to it. The Zionist idea and hope seemed fantastic to many Jews and Gentiles. The logic of history, the sacrifices of thousands of Jews, and the statesmanship of men like Weizmann have gradually brought the idea to the point of historical realization. These essays in honor of a man illumine all facets of the idea and the movement of which he is the most distinguished spokesman.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Trail Blazer

IT MAY BE SAID SOME DAY that a signal achievement of plain, ordinary scholarship was to have discovered an American tradition of middle-class art. An instance is provided by "William Sidney Mount," a book composed of a catalogue, an essay, and notes, by Bartlett Cowdrey and Hermann Warner Williams, Jr. (Columbia University Press, $5). Mount founded the American school of genre painting, borne on the wave of Jacksonian populism; and he drove one of the nails into the coffin of the historical school and the grand manner. Dutch models inhibited as well as encouraged his naturalism; yet his example and style, whether known directly or through influences, must have nourished Eakins and Homer in their beginnings.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

War Criminals

AFTER WORLD WAR I the German war criminals were tried, at the suggestion of the Reich, before the German Supreme Court at Leipzig. Out of several hundred six were convicted, and most of them mysteriously "escaped." The lesson taught by these strange trials must not be allowed to go unheeded after this war. In his brilliant and timely book, "War Criminals: Their Prosecution and Punishment" (Knopf, $3), Sheldon Glueck of Harvard University expresses the view that the débâcle of justice at Leipzig contributed a large share to the Nazi policy of brazen lawlessness in the conduct of the present war. He advocates an International Court for important war crimes. Such a tribunal would strongly express the common interests and the growing unity of the family of nations. Highly noteworthy is his list of war criminals, which includes political chieftains also. Glueck convincingly argues that in the German and Japanese conception of "total war" there is little difference "between the intimidating plottings and schemings of the von Rippentrops, the von Papens, the Franks, or the cruelties and criminal responsibilities of the notorious S. S., or the leaders of the 'Japanese Black Dragon,' and those of the traditional military officers." Thus Clodius, the German negotiator and promoter in the scheme of economic conquest, who was captured in Rumania, could be held responsible. It is to be hoped that Glueck's list of war criminals will be adopted by all the United Nations.

The book is a great scientific achievement and deserves wide reading not only by the jurist but by the layman. Glueck presents his case vigorously, but he never allows passion to interfere with his considered judgment. With a mind broad and unbiased enough to grasp the great human issue involved he pleads for justice. "The homes and factories of Europe and Asia laid waste by Axis aggression and greed are the least of the human possessions to be restored; the most precious thing to be salvaged from the ruins is man's hard-won heritage of justice through law."

ALBERT C. WYLER

CONCERTS

NEW SERIES BEGINNING MONDAY, JANUARY 13—6 Pairs of Concerts

STOKOWSKI JAN. — 15-16, 29-30
FEB. — 12-13, 26-27
MARCH 12-13, 19-20

H. Y. CITY SYMPHONY
Single and Subscription SEATS NOW At Box Office — 99c — $1.20 — $1.80
N Y City Center, 131 W. 55th St.

MOTION PICTURE

20th CENTURY-FOX PRESENTS

MOSS HART'S WINGED VICTORY
Produced by DARRYL F. ZANUCK
Directed by GEORGE CUKOR

NOW PLAYING ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

STAGE PLAYS

THE THEATRE GUILD presents (in association with Jack H. Skirball)

JACOBOWSKY and the COLONEL
The FRANZ WERFEL - S. N. BEHRMAN COMEDY — Staged by ELIA KAZAN
LOUIS CALHERN — OSCAR KARLWEIS
MARIANNE STEWART — HAROLD VERMILYEA
MARTIN BECK THEATRE—45th Street, West of 8th Avenue
Evenings at 8:30 Males Thurs. & Sat. 2:30

MICHAEL TODD presents
BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE
by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
MAJESTIC THEATRE, 54th Street, West of Broadway
Matinees, Wednesdays and Saturdays, 2:30

RED CROSS plasma is saving the lives of hundreds of wounded soldiers and sailors. But thousands of additional blood donors are needed. Give a pint of blood to save a life.

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD-
KRUTCH

ONE of the gentlemen prominently connected with "Oklahoma!" recently remarked in my presence that his show got its best notices the morning after a certain other period musical piece had opened on Broadway. Inevitably—and in this case unfairly—something of the sort happened when "Sing Out, Sweet Land!" had its première at the International Theater—invariably because it also is a musical entertainment celebrating the American past, unfairly because it is in no sense an imitation of "Oklahoma!" and because it is a delightful thing in its own right.

No doubt the success of the Rodgers-Hammerstein opera did suggest that there might be a public for something which could manage to exploit the folk and popular music of our past, but the boldly simple idea that songs, some familiar and some not very well known, might individually be given theatrical treatment without any attempt being made to weave them into an opera, turned out surprisingly well. To call "Sing Out, Sweet Land!" a pageant is unfortunately and most incorrectly to suggest something slow and stodgy. It does, on the slenderest of threads, string a score of songs, from a Puritan hymn through "Oh, Susannah" and "Frankie and Johnnie" on down to "Yes, Sir, She's My Baby." But these songs are not merely sung; they are also acted, and danced, and pantomimed in so spirited and resourceful a fashion that they furnish a very lively as well as rich evening of a sort which I think Broadway is going to find a great deal more to its liking than I should have been willing in advance to suppose it would find anything that remains as faithful as "Sing Out, Sweet Land!" remains to its original intention.

On the program the show is described as "by Walter Kerr." There follows, however, a list even longer than usual of credits for staging, musical arrangement, choreography, and so on, and the result is to leave the conscientious critic supposing that this is one of those cases where credit should go, not to any one individual, but to the happy cooperation of a dozen—including the members of a large cast of extraordinarily talented performers. What little story there is revolves about the figure of a minstrel who seems to have taken on some of the attributes of Johnny Appleseed, and who wanders through time and space from the days of Puritan dominance on down to the present, crossing the Oregon Trail, riding down the Mississippi River, and reaching even a night club of the roaring twenties. As a story it is not much, and on the few occasions when it is compelled for a few minutes to carry the show the show comes its nearest to breaking down. But fortunately these moments are few as well as brief. For the most part song and dance succeed song and dance with breathless vigor. And what songs many of them are! Nearly all the earlier ones, I could not help noting, are astonishingly gay, and they remain so until the wailing of the spirituals and the blues, the hysteria of ragtime and jazz, make their rather late entrance. "Oh, Susanna," I must confess even at the risk of seeming naive, seems to me a far better tune than any that Kern or Gershwin or even Berlin ever wrote.

Alfred Drake, formerly the male star of "Oklahoma!" plays the role of the wandering singer and carries with easy, informal grace the heaviest burden of singing. There are also a very promising young lady named Alma Kaye and an admirable comedienne known as Bibi Osterwald. But it is Burl Ives, the singer of folk songs, who very nearly steals the show. He gives to his audience that rare delight one always feels when one watches any man do the thing he seems to have been born to do. When he sings "Blue-Tailed Fly" or "Foggy, Foggy Dew" he does it as a bird takes to the air or a duck takes to the water. Aristotle, who rather floundered about in search of illustrations for his contention that happiness for any creature consists in having an opportunity to fulfil its predestined function, ought to have heard Mr. Ives bring a song to life without seeming even to try.

"Trio" (Belasco Theater) got a good deal of preliminary and inappropriate notoriety because of the fact that owners of New York theaters feared possible legal action against a play whose central character has made a Lesbian victim of a young protégée. Actually it is grimly moral in tone, completely inoffensive in manner, and the occasion for a quite remarkable performance by the French actress Lydia St. Clair. That the play remains consistently interesting while at the same time failing to achieve the impact one feels it might have is due, I think, to the fact that the author lacks the courage to make it the tragedy it is trying to be. The central figure is undoubtedly the older—and very sinister—woman. She is by far the most real as well as the most striking figure, and at the end we know both that she is going to hang herself and that that is what she inevitably would do. But the author, as though afraid to risk so unpleasant an ending, tries to shift our interest to the healthy boy and girl who, we are assured, will live happily ever after. The result, since these young people are not really very interesting in themselves, is merely to spare us the full force of a tragedy which we no longer want to be spared.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

THERE are two sorts of provincialism in art. The exponent of one is the artist, academic or otherwise, who works in an outmoded style or in a vein disregarded by the metropolitan center—Paris, Rome, or Athens. The other sort of provincialism is that of the artist—generally from an outlying country—who in all earnestness and admiration devotes himself to the style being currently developed in the metropolitan center, yet fails in one way or another really to understand what it is about.

The late Marsden Hartley, about whom I wrote several weeks ago, was a provincial of this latter sort. And so was the Russian, Vassily Kandinsky, who died two weeks ago in Paris at the age of seventy-eight. They were quite different as painters but both were alike in being provincial. Hartley failed to understand the School of Paris because he really lacked culture. Kandinsky was learned and at ease in his learning, and was one of the first, if not the first, to get an intellectual purchase on post-cubist painting, yet he failed in the end to understand it in practice. (Kandinsky and Hartley were further alike in that they both came to post-impressionist painting through German expressionism, which seemed to make post-impressionism more accessible to non-Latin outsiders.)

Kandinsky began as a disciple of the Jugendstil, then joined the Blaue Reiter, and finally developed a species of impressionism-cum-fauvism which under the indirect influence of cubism and the experiments of Malevitch dissolved into outright abstract art. It was during these movements of transition and search that Kandinsky's painting reached its heights, to decline almost steadily thereafter. His best work remains those paintings in fluid contour and gauzy color that he executed between 1909 or so and the early twenties (the heroic period of the flowering of cubism which also saw such non-cubists as Matisse and Chagall at their best).

The abstract or—as Kandinsky himself called them—"concrete" paintings he turned out from the middle twenties represent a misconception, not only of cubism and its antecedents, but of the very art of putting paint on canvas to make a picture. Like many a newcomer to a situation, seeing it from the outside and thus more completely, Kandinsky was very quick to perceive one of the most basic implications of the revolution cubism had effected in Western painting. Pictorial art was at last able to free itself completely from the object—the edictic image—and take for its sole positive matter the sensuous facts of its own medium, reducing itself to a question—purely on canvas, not in the observer's consciousness—of non-figurative shapes and colors. Painting could become like music, an art contained in its own form and thus capable of infinitely more variety than before—at least in theory. But Kandinsky erred in assuming that this newly won freedom exhausted the meaning of the cubist revolution and that it permitted the artist to make a clean break with the past and start all over again from scratch—something which no art can do without losing all sense of style.

In point of practice Kandinsky merely exchanged one past for another: that of Renaissance-Paris painting for the woefully meager one of the art nouveau of his youth and peasant decoration (already once joined in the Jugendstil). He rejected what to my mind is a prior and perhaps even more essential achievement of avant-garde art than its deliverance of painting from representation: its recapture of the literal realization of the physical limitations and conditions of the medium and of the positive advantages to be gained from the exploitation of these very limitations. Kandinsky, in principle, seems to have paid ample homage to the new awareness that easel-painting takes place on a flat, continuous, finitely bounded surface, but he lacked an intuitive grasp of the consequences of these facts in actual practice. As if in reaction against his earlier "liquescent" style, he came to conceive of the picture überhaupt as an aggregate of discrete shapes; the color, size, and spacing of these he related so insensitively to the space surrounding them—that which Hans Hofmann calls "negative space"—that this remained inactive and meaningless; the sense of a continuous surface was lost, and the picture plane became pocked with "holes." At the same time, having begun by accepting the absolute flatness of the picture surface, Kandinsky would go on to allude to illusionistic depth by a use of color, line, and perspective that were plastically irrelevant. Last but not least, the consistency of his paint surface and the geometrical exactness of his line seem more appropriate to stone or metal than to the porous fabric of canvas—this stricture also applies to Mondrian. But it is not so much that Kandinsky's methods led him to paint bad pictures as the fact that academic reminiscences crept into them at almost every point other than that of what they "represented." And only a sense of style acquired from closer contact with the School of Paris would have insured him against such reminiscences, or at least against their discordant quality.

As a result of his failure to acquire a modern sense of style, Kandinsky remained an insecure painter. A somewhat similar insecurity operated in Hartley's case, which drove him, too, to eclecticism. The stylistic and thematic ingredients of Kandinsky's later work are as diverse as the colors of Joseph's coat: peasant, ancient, and Oriental art, much Klee, some Picasso, surrealist protoplasm, maps, blueprints, musical notation, etc., etc. If Kandinsky's later painting has a certain uniformity, that is owed mostly to its faults; where they are absent we are likely to take a Kandinsky for a Klee. A real high style would have imposed harmony upon materials even more diverse, but Kandinsky could have developed such a style, as I have said, only by going to the School of Paris for inspiration. It remains the necessary source of the only high styles of painting our age is capable of, even as Italy remained the only such source during the sixteenth century.

The exhibition at Nierendorf's (through January 15) illustrating Kandinsky's life work, even though incompletely, makes this quite clear. For a relatively short time Kandinsky was a great painter; he was and will remain a large and revolutionary phenomenon—he must be taken into account always; yet he stays apart from the main stream and in the last analysis remains a provincial. The example of his work is dangerous to younger painters. Let them be warned by the decorations that make vacuous the halls of the Art of Tomorrow museum.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE work Tovey used as his example in his exposition of the Mozart concerto form was the Piano Concerto K.503. It is performed more rarely than some of the other great examples in the series; and its greatness is less easily perceived: I was disappointed by my first hearing of it a couple of years ago; and audiences and critics were unimpressed when Schnabel and the New York Philharmonic under Szell gave it its first New York performances recently. But listening to it as it was rehearsed and performed on this occasion I became excitedly aware of the things that had escaped my ears and mind the first time.

With this experience of the work I was able to appreciate the acuteness of some observations about it in a letter I received a year ago from a reader who owned a copy of the English Decca recording of it (wul American Decca please issue it here?); and they provided an explanation of why its greatness is not easily perceived. It is, said my correspondent, who I think had the first movement in mind at that point, "one of those works in which, as Tovey remarks, Mozart's primary interest is architectural, and whose cumulative effect is one of grandeur, sweep, and power." It also has intensity and passion, he said, which are extremely moving at certain points—for example in the recapitulation, where the piano's running figurations in the joint restatement and elaboration of thematic material are among "those subtle and exciting variations and transformations which make Mozart's concerto recapitulations so wonderful and moving." A little later he said something about the Concerto K.459 which was equally true of K.503: that the opening theme hasn't the immediate sensuous appeal of some of the themes of the other concertos, but that "this very simplicity of thematic material . . . permits a richness and variety of elaboration." But, still later, "as Tovey so shrewdly points out, it is the fact of an accepted and established idiom which makes the wit of Mozart and Haydn so pointed and gives their sallies, their developments and variations their subtlety and poignancy." In short, K.503 has one or two but not the profusion of lovely themes with which some other Mozart concertos make an immediate appeal to listeners of today; and these listeners do not have the ears and minds attuned to that "accepted and established idiom," for which Mozart contrived the work's rich and subtle elaborations, variations, and transformations of the simple thematic material in the achievement of architectural grandeur.

I also reread Tovey's essay (and now that I knew the work it was intensely moving to read this illumination of the processes of one great mind by those of another; though the contact with great critical insight and integrity also filled me with disgust and anger at the vast outpouring of critical shoddiness and viciousness by the people with space to fill and a living to earn); and it provided more detailed documentation of my correspondent's statements. "Mozart begins with a majestic assertion of his key, C major, by the whole orchestra, with mysterious soft shadows, that give a solemn depth to the tone. . . . It shows at once a boldness and richness of style which is only to be found in [his] most advanced work." But those mysterious soft shadows created after the initial radiance by delicate woodwind textures, and the second time by their wonderful shift to C minor, are subtleties which I think escape listeners of today. And from Tovey's reference to the risks of this opening I suspect he would have agreed that for these listeners there is greater immediate impressiveness in the "something more like an articulated regular theme" with which he says a symphony in the same style—e.g., the "Jupiter"—would begin.

He then describes another example of the concerto's boldness and richness of style. The first orchestral tutti carries a reiterated rhythmic figure into the dominant and to the point where it is trumpeted forth on the note G—but with the effect of being only on the dominant, still in the key of C, and with a theme in C minor following it. When this dominant of C minor is reached again in the solo portion Mozart contrives the surprise of the piano's modulation to E flat major. And when the second orchestral tutti arrives he has it duplicate the treatment of the reiterated rhythmic figure in the first tutti, even to the trumpeting of it forth on the note G—to emphasize the effect he contrives this time of its being in the dominant, its having departed from the key of C; and the orchestra's G's are in fact answered breathtakingly by the piano's reiteration of the rhythmic figure on the note B, in a further departure to the key of E minor that is the first of the series of bold modulations in the development section. And concerning the difference between the two *tutti*s Tovey observes:

There is no describing the peculiar and subtle pleasure this device gives. It depends on a delicate sense of key, but has nothing to do with the technical knowledge which enables us to name it; indeed it is certain to be keenly enjoyed by any attentive listener whose knowledge of music is the result of relish for classical works, stimulated by frequent opportunities for hearing them under good conditions. On the other hand, it is quite possible that many persons . . . having at least a concert-goer's retrospective view of musical history simply do not hear these effects at all.

The fine integration of solo and orchestral parts in the recent performances was not without occasional lack of precision in gearing (chiefly in the slow movement). And though Schnabel's playing was sheer perfection in clarity and subtlety of articulation, it lacked, for Carnegie Hall, the projective force that might have carried over to the audience the grandeur of the first movement and the delicious little jokes in the piano figuration throughout, but especially in the finale.

For the Sunday afternoon broadcast the popular Concerto K.466 was substituted; and bad balance, limited frequency range, and other faults of transmission damaged the performance I had heard at the rehearsal in Carnegie Hall.

James Agee's column on Films is unavoidably omitted from this issue. It will appear next week, when Mr. Agee will discuss the films of 1944.

CONTRIBUTORS

JOHN GRIERSON is head of the Canadian Film Board and a recognized authority on documentary films.

STUART CHASE, one of America's leading economists, is the author of "The Tragedy of Waste," "Rich Land, Poor Land," "The Economy of Abundance," and "The Road We Are Traveling."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of Christian ethics at Union Theological Seminary, is the author of "The Nature and Destiny of Man" and "Christianity and Power Politics."

JULES MOCH was a Socialist deputy and minister in pre-war France. After the capitulation he was active in the underground movement until forced to flee the country. He then became a commander in the Fighting French navy, and is now a member of the Consultative Assembly.

LIONEL TRILLING is associate professor of English at Columbia University. He is the author of "Matthew Arnold."

MARCUS DUFFIELD writes the weekly review of events, "History in the Making," for the Sunday edition of the New York Herald Tribune.

ALBERT C. WYLER, a well-known Swiss liberal, is a member of the American Society of International Law.

Midwinter Book Number

When The Nation issues its Midwinter Book Number, on Feb. 24, the early 1945 literary season will be in full swing.

Publishers wishing to place advertising in this feature issue are urged to reserve space early. Size will be restricted to 40 pages, and latecomers may not be able to obtain space on this date.

Deadlines: Feb. 9 for space reservations; Feb. 12 for copy to set; Feb. 15 for final OK's on set copy and for delivery of complete plates. For further information, telephone BA 7-1066 or write

Advertising Department

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street

New York 7, N. Y.

Letters to the Editors

Miss Cannell and Her Critics

Dear Sirs: In The Nation of September 23 you published under the heading Canard by Cannell a letter signed by five persons which purported to be a refutation of my article, France Without Law, in the August number of the Reader's Digest but was nothing but a personal attack on me. It has just been brought to my attention.

Since the publication of my article France has been largely liberated. Thousand of Americans walk the streets of Paris and "the roads of France," and my voice is no longer needed to tell what goes on there. News dispatches daily confirm the truth of everything I have written and said since I landed here on the Gripsholm last March. Everyone now knows that the Avenue Foch was not out of bounds to ordinary French civilians and that Lucien Lelong, with whom I had the honor of working, was not a collaborator but a patriot who has been maintained as head of the French couture—the dress-creation industry—by General de Gaulle's government. What they may not know is that inasmuch as the Paris couture with its attendant industries occupied before this war a place in French economy equivalent to that of the automobile industries here, helping it meant keeping thousands of French workers alive to be liberated.

If further evidence of my accuracy were required I might mention that my article The Little Gray Mice (Christian Science Monitor, May 12, 1944) is being used by our army in one of the orientation courses for the United States Army Air Corps and that the OWI is reprinting my article Paris Spring 1944 (June number of Harper's Bazaar) for Europe, Asia, and Africa.

It is obviously futile to waste precious space in refuting insinuations which events have rendered obsolete. One, however, I cannot allow to pass—that is my alleged broadcasts for the Vichy Radio. I make no secret of any of my activities. In the summer of 1941 I was asked to do some special uncensored broadcasts in English, on Women of France—under the auspices of Lucien Lelong and his couture group—in these words: "We don't want any propaganda. We would just like to say to America, 'We're still here. We're still French.'" I was advised by my friend and lawyer, a United States ex-Senator, to take advantage of this unique opportunity to help France. I worked entirely with and for French patriots. None of them has had to change his shirt; they all have their heads and their hair. I wrote my own script, especially stressing the couture effort, but I also spoke of the activities of French Red Cross workers, prisoners' wives, women running farms, fire-women, who with the help of little boys replaced the almost non-existent fire brigades. I wish everyone could have heard them. They gave a faithful week-to-week picture of life in occupied Paris. Thanks to a light style, I was able to put across much information that could, I believed, be seized by Americans less thick-headed than Germans.

In the same manner I saved the New York Times's Paris bureau from being occupied by the Nazis. When their correspondent was arbitrarily ordered back to Berlin by the German authorities, he left me in charge, asking me to keep the office open at all costs. For weeks I did so with the help of one girl secretary, sending fashion or other cables every day so that we should be counted as a functioning press bureau, which was essential to avoid occupation.

Lucien Lelong was not only my boss after I left the Times; he was my guarantor to the Germans. With other French fashion personalities, who spontaneously offered to guarantee—with their skins—that I would neither run away nor engage in political activity, he kept me out of an internment camp.

Two days before I left Paris to be repatriated last February, a codirector of a big Paris dress house, who was also a captain in active service both in the last war and in this one, wrote me: "You at least have never failed us. . . . We will forgive your leaving us only on condition that the first thing you do on landing is to secure passage on the first boat back after the war."

Though they claim to have been "in constant communication with the children of France," the signers of your letter have manifestly been misinformed on more than one point. I was there. They undoubtedly love France as much as I do. Therefore it is a pity that they have allowed their incomplete data to prevent them from employing their unquestionable literary talents in promoting that better understanding between the peoples of France and America which can only be established on truth.

KATHLEEN CANNELL

New York, October 25

The "Light Style"

Dear Sirs: It is unfortunate that anyone professing a love for France should have permitted herself to betray that love so cruelly as did Miss Cannell in the article under discussion. It is perhaps partly explained by the fact that her long association with the haute couture has given her the "light style" for which she is so duly grateful. That "light style" tends to leave much untouched and unexpressed. Surely it was in the article itself and not in her letter of self-defense written some two months later that Miss Cannell should have indicated that she was aware that there were in Paris, as throughout all France, well-organized, well-disciplined groups of "French Red Cross workers, prisoners' wives, women running farms, fire-women," etc. The F. F. I. and other resistance groups worked at all times under the most rigid discipline, and one of the many facts which can now give the lie to Miss Cannell's fancies is the magnificent action at the time of the liberation of another closely organized group—the gendarmes of Paris.

Whatever Miss Cannell's sentiments may have been or may be now concerning France, she is guilty of a great wrong. At a time when every word of what was going on behind France's closed frontiers was of the highest and gravest importance, she chose to make no mention of the fact that, despite the lack of food, the lack of fuel, the lack of clothing, deprived of all communication with the outside world, orderly bodies of French citizens were working systematically and unflaggingly to maintain their nation's inviolable equilibrium. She chose instead to give to the American public a picture of France in hopeless chaos, overrun by "foreign anarchists and killers," a France rendered unsafe, not by the Germans, but by gangs of young French terrorists. So distorted and untrue a presentation did she make that Frenchmen who were likewise there in 1943 and 1944—and to whom Miss Cannell's name is not familiar and therefore not an object

Cross-Word Puzzle No. 98

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 How to do addition sums
- 6 Period between wars, if any
- 9 The Cotton state
- 10 Epithet for the fleet
- 11 A worker in the brewery
- 12 American commandos
- 16 Caliph of the Ottoman Empire, slain by the Giaour
- 19 Too many eggs about at this time of year
- 22 It makes ants dance
- 23 A robot loses heart, having to keep the plant supplied
- 24 Feminine name, other than Rita
- 25 Beverage first produced by the Aztecs
- 26 An English spa
- 27 Not useless if it's a cigar
- 28 Rub out, modern style
- 31 Little vessel, not a little sailor
- 33 Do I eat? (anag.)
- 36 Galumphing
- 39 Usually precedes an explosion
- 40 I live on it; so do you
- 41 Put some life into
- 42 Suggestive of kernels and colonels
- 43 Spotted

DOWN

- 1 The movie attendant's beaming welcome
- 2 Classifications
- 3 Indian city from which we get dramas
- 4 Is this what a tale is woven from?

- 5 It's changeable, and sounds conceited, too
- 6 An old French peasant
- 7 Aside
- 8 Stage direction
- 13 A hermit
- 14 A taste for drink, combined with gout, doubled him up forever
- 15 A book you like will probably be this (two words, 4 and 5)
- 17 The alligator-pear
- 18 Chalets (anag.)
- 20 Littered
- 21 Beseech
- 29 Keep out of this chamber
- 30 Dressed, after a fashion
- 31 People make free with them
- 32 It checks your car's speed
- 34 Where Tom Bowling's gone
- 35 "----- door and window was adorned" (Macaulay)
- 37 The world would naturally turn on it!
- 38 The Terrible One

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 97

ACROSS:—1 SHIP OF STATE; 9 MENU; 10 ALONE; 11 OPUS; 12 FIREDOG; 13 CONSULT; 15 BADINAGE; 16 DESERT; 18 FEWEST; 21 UNTRACED; 24 CLEAVER; 26 CORSETS; 28 GAIT; 29 ORIEL; 30 EYES; 31 PHILOSOPHER.

DOWN:—2 HOUSEWIFE; 3 PIANOLA; 4 FROG; 5 TOEHOLD; 6 TOOLS; 7 RETINA; 8 BUTLER; 14 VENUS; 17 SHAKSPERE; 19 EOLIAN; 20 TREFOIL; 22 TROLLOP; 25 ESTEEM; 26 AITCH; 27 MISS.

for "personal attack"—have spoken of this article both in private and in public with something close to murder in their hearts.

KAY BOYLE

ELSA MAXWELL

JANET FLANNER

SOLITA SOLANO

MARY REYNOLDS

New York, November 6

Not the Only One

Dear Sirs: Florida's anti-closed-shop amendment was carried by a close vote; until the ballots in remote rural areas were counted, it appeared to have lost. Hence the implication in William H. Joubert's letter in The Nation of December 16 that the urban daily press was responsible is less than fair. And I particularly object to his characterization of the St. Petersburg Times as the only liberal newspaper in Florida.

I cannot guess Mr. Joubert's definition of liberal, but I can conceive of no reasonable definition that would include the Times and exclude the Miami Daily News, the St. Petersburg Evening Independent, and the Ocala Star-Banner.

The Independent, for which I wrote the editorials for eight years ending last June, has been consistently anti-Franco, anti-Munich, anti-white supremacy, anti-Ku Klux Klan, and active in warning against native fascists—including Gerald B. Winrod, a frequent visitor to St. Petersburg, against whom the Independent crusaded for three and one-half years before the Times so much as mentioned him editorially. The Independent took the lead in publicizing the Tampa Shoemaker flogging editorially in Florida, and has supported most liberal proposals. Naturally, it opposed the anti-closed-shop amendment.

The Independent, finally, was cited on The Nation's Honor Roll in January, 1939, for its editorial attacks on the Klan and on anti-Semitism during 1938. If it has occasionally taken a position to which some liberals would object—what newspaper hasn't?

Mr. Joubert's equal condemnation of the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. for not fighting the anti-closed-shop amendment more vigorously also strikes me as unfair. The C. I. O., with only 5,000 members, is without influence in Florida. The state A. F. of L. is thoroughly illiberal and racketeer-ridden, and is more energetic in fighting democracy within its own organization than in any fight for principle.

LEE MORRIS

Philadelphia, Pa., December 16

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 20, 1945

NUMBER 3

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- The Vandenberg Plan
- Monopoly in a Glass Bottle
- The Budget Message

ARTICLES

- The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté
- Behind the Labor Shortage by I. F. Stone
- 75 Years Ago in The Nation
- Lion Bites Eagle by Keith Hutchison
- China Turns the Clock Back
- Fashion, a poem by Corporal
- The Dilemma of T. S. Eliot by Sidney Hook
- In the Wind

POLITICAL WAR

- Testament Against Fascism by Alexander Uhl, Thomas Mann, G. Bromley Oxnam, and William Shirer
- South American Labor Front by V. M.
- Behind the Enemy Line by Argus

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall
- Briefer Comment
- Films by James Agee
- Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch
- Art Notes by C. G.
- Music by B. H. Haggin

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 99 by Jack Barrett

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors:

KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyrighted, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE LONG-AWAITED RED ARMY OFFENSIVE ON the central front is the best news from Europe in many weeks. The Germans were obviously prepared for the blow and had done their best to meet it last summer by counter-attacks which forced the Russians out of good positions in the Sandomierz bridgehead over the Vistula south of Warsaw. However, the tremendous build-up of Russian striking power from East Prussia to Czechoslovakia was too great to hold. The Red Army is stronger than it has ever been and is fighting on traditionally good winter ground. It may go a considerable distance before being checked, though the Germans are concentrated along a shorter line, are closer to home supply bases, and have been strengthened by new divisions obtained through the recent drastic mobilization. The Russians may be heading for Berlin along a short road, but the road will be hard. Certainly it will be as hard as the road from the west, where American and British troops are battling to stave in Rundstedt's Ardennes salient. Evidently no appreciable number of enemy troops is going to be cut off by the Allied counter-attack, and it now appears that the German offensive was successful in the primary objective of relieving pressure on the Saar and Ruhr fronts, thereby gaining time during which the Allies might divide politically. The great hope is now that military cooperation will overrule political differences and that concurrent Allied blows from east and west will eliminate the last German chance.

✱

THE MEETING OF THE SPANISH DEPUTIES IN Mexico failed to secure the necessary quorum of one hundred and is therefore incapable of making any important decisions. The actual number attending is seventy-eight. Twenty-seven other deputies, including Alvarez del Vayo and some members of the Negrín Cabinet, are at present in Mexico but have abstained from taking part because of "the non-presence of the government." The most dominant figure is therefore, paradoxically, the absent Premier, Juan Negrín. In spite of being branded as illegal and harmful to the prestige of parliamentary institutions, the Cortes meeting has stressed the widespread desire for unity among Spanish Republicans. Addresses honoring the deputies killed since the beginning of the Spanish war, although made by some speakers who had not distinguished themselves by their previous conciliatory efforts, were in effect appeals for unity, and the presence of two thousand emigrés in the big assembly hall of the Club France emphasized the common desire. Even if Indalecio Prieto has not given up hope of enlarging his Junta de Liberación, his field of maneuver has become narrower each day. Significantly, Juan Antonio Aguirre, head of the Basque autonomous government and a prominent Catholic leader, who is at present in New York, refused to give his name to any junta or government from which Negrín is excluded. The possibility of the creation of a solid Spanish Republican front appears to depend to a large extent on Negrín, and Negrín's presence in Mexico depends on the British government's ending its long delay in granting him proper facilities for leaving London.

✱

KING PETER OF YUGOSLAVIA, WHO LIVES IN A world of his own, has apparently got the quixotic notion that the divine right of kings still obtains in the modern world. It is the misfortune of Balkan monarchies that they have resisted coming to terms with today's legitimacy, that of the people. Instead they have clung to royal illusions of power which, in Northern Europe, sputtered out early in the nineteenth century. The present war, by its very nature, was bound to bring such monarchies to grief. In the words of President Roosevelt, "Ours is an association not of governments but of peoples." The plight of the royal houses of Albania, Yugoslavia, Greece, and Bulgaria proves that it is the people's will that counts. Zog is a dead letter. The people of Greece, by their heroic resistance, have succeeded in shelving the preposterous George, although the British government persists in ignoring their verdict. Now Peter, not to be so piteously undone, seems determined to tilt the windmills alone. His communiqué of January 11 is an attempt to override the engagements entered into by Dr. Subasich, his Premier. Strange way to insist on his rights as a "constitutional monarch"! One cannot help thinking how Mr. Churchill, Prime Minister in another constitutional monarchy, would react to a comparable interference from the throne. Meanwhile, word comes from Bulgaria that Prince Cyril, brother of the late King Boris and former head of the regency council, has been haled into the Sofia People's Court on charges of atrocities against Partisans and collaboration with the Germans. The hour is striking for monarchs and their defenders.

✱

ON DECEMBER 5 LAST WINSTON CHURCHILL declared in the House of Commons: "Whether the Greek people form themselves into a monarchy or a republic is for their decision. Whether they form a government of the right or left is for their decision. These are entirely matters for them." How, we wonder, will the British Prime Minister square this declaration of disinterest with the fact that on January 14 General Scobie, commander of British forces in Greece, gave his patronage to a rightist demonstration in Athens by addressing it from a balcony? To a crowd shouting for the return of the King, the general expressed the hope that the gathering "will not be without its effect on world opinion." Unless this grossly improper action is promptly reprimanded by his government, world opinion will pay little further heed to British protestations of neutrality in Greek politics.

✱

SIR CECIL HURST, BRITISH CHAIRMAN OF THE United Nations War Crimes Commission, has resigned because the British Foreign Office has either ignored or rejected the Commission's proposals for dealing with war criminals. The commission, which represents, it should be remembered, fourteen nations, recommended, unanimously, that international courts be set up for the trial of war criminals, that the heads of states—that is, Hitler, Mussolini, et al.—be tried in these courts on the same terms as their minions rather than punished, as Napoleon was, by political decision, and that the Nazis and fascists be punished not only for their crimes against other nations but for the crimes they have committed against their own nationals on the ground of race or religion. The problem is a complicated one, as everybody knows, and there is room for honorable disagreement as to procedure. The disturbing thing is that there seems to be a gentleman in the woodpile; for it appears that the person in the Foreign Office who is handling the question of war crimes—Anthony Eden being too busy—is none other than the arch appeaser, Lord Simon! Members of the War Crimes Commission may be forgiven for suspecting that Lord Simon's past must affect his present attitude. Since Lord Simon is not the only one of his kind in the higher reaches of the British government, people in general may be forgiven for the gloomy suspicion that the farcical war-guilt trials of World War I will be repeated. For our part, we find ourselves thinking of a cartoon in the current New Yorker. One gunman is introducing another to the head gangster. "Gus," he says, "I want you to meet a very old accomplice of mine."

✱

PROSPECTS FOR CORDIAL COOPERATION BETWEEN the Senate and the President have been much improved by an infusion of new blood into the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Ignoring seniority rules, the majority steering committee named Senators Lucas, Lister Hill, and Hatch to fill the vacancies caused by the forced retirement of Senators Bennet Champ Clark, Gillette, and Reynolds. Pat McCarran of Nevada, a fairly consistent isolationist who was senior to all three, received only one vote. Senator Wheeler withdrew his name when it became clear that he had no chance. Now with the whole majority representation back of the Administration's foreign policy, there is little likelihood that there will be a repetition of the conflict between President Wilson and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee of his day. The Republicans, however, have done their little bit to conserve their isolationist record in choosing Senators Bridges and Wiley to replace Gerald P. Nye and James J. Davies. Bridges, given to somewhat chauvinistic outbursts, has in general gone down the line with the President on foreign policy, but Wiley, who it will be recalled got Governor Dewey's personal indorsement during the campaign, is as case-hardened an isolationist as they come.

✱

THE NEW CEILING PRICE ON LIVE CATTLE OF $18 a hundredweight represents a substantial victory for the cattle men at the expense of the general public. It is not only well above the current market price but is nearly double the pre-war price. Part of the additional price will be met by increased subsidies; the remainder, apparently, will be provided for by a slight increase in the retail beef ceilings. But although the public will pay more for its meat in 1945 than in 1944, it will share somewhat in the OPA's satisfaction in finally achieving an effective ceiling on live cattle. For under the previous arrangement the only way in which the OPA could penalize packers who paid exorbitant prices for beef was through a withdrawal of subsidies. Since the bonus paid by the black market was often greater than the subsidies, a large proportion of the total meat supplies was lost through illegal channels. It is generally agreed that the new regulations, if rigorously enforced, should help curb the black market. Whether the supply of meat available in the urban markets will be appreciably increased is a matter of debate within the meat industry. But the prospects seem favorable. Cattle raisers will get a better price; the packers and retailers will be protected against a "squeeze" between uncontrolled farm prices and fixed retail prices; and black-market operations will more readily be brought under control. It should be recognized, however, that these gains have been won by granting the cattlemen a margin of profit which is completely out of line with the return permitted labor or other business groups under the stabilization policy.

✱

IT IS A PLEASURE TO REPORT THAT THE North Carolina Supreme Court has averted a scandal. Last July 14 William DeBerry, an organizer for the Food, Tobacco, Agricultural, and Allied Workers of America, C. I. O., was sentenced to sixty days on the road gang by the state Superior Court, on a charge of having assaulted Louise Johnston, a company-union stooge for the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Company. The prosecution didn't bother to present any evidence to back the charge. It based its argument on the self-evident facts that William DeBerry was a Negro, that Louise Johnston was white, and that the members of the C. I. O. union called each other "brother" and "sister." That was sufficient for the Superior Court. It did not satisfy the Supreme Court, which on January 4 dismissed the charge. But justice for the Negro in the South is still the exceptional thing. On September 3 six white hoodlums kidnapped and raped Mrs. Recy Taylor, a Negress, at Abbeville, Alabama. One of them, Hugo Wilson, confessed and named the others, but the Henry County grand jury refused to indict. On December 8 Governor Sparks promised to investigate, but he has not done anything thus far. A Committee for Equal Justice for Mrs. Recy Taylor has been organized, with members in nineteen states, a few white Southerners among them. It is too bad the Negro can't get justice without the aid of "agitators," Northern and otherwise. It gives the South a bad name.

✱

THE HOLLYWOOD POST OF THE AMERICAN Legion receives our congratulations on being the first in the nation to welcome a Japanese-American veteran of this war, Harley M. Oka, into its active membership. Its action does something to erase the shame of the Hood River Post's decision to remove from its honor roll of local citizens serving in the armed forces the names of sixteen Japanese Americans. The Pacific Coast on the whole, as Carey McWilliams predicted some weeks ago in these columns, is responding well to the army's order lifting the ban against Japanese Americans returning to the West Coast military area. Recently eighteen Unitarian and Universalist ministers from Washington, Oregon, and California signed a statement expressing the belief that "this order will help win the peace by renewing the confidence of people, here and abroad, white and colored, in American democracy." The statement, making reference to the loyalty of the great majority of Japanese Americans, asserts that "a grave and largely irredeemable injustice has been done to these loyal American citizens and that America owes it to herself, as well as to them, to make such reparations as are possible. The removal of the exclusion order is the first big step in that direction."

✱

THE NATION WELCOMES CAREY McWILLIAMS as a new contributing editor. He will bring to its columns a fresh and discerning appreciation of the battle for a fuller freedom that is being waged by the American people. A courageous fighter against oppression and discrimination in all forms, Carey McWilliams has become the active spokesman of groups in our community who are too often pushed around—migrant workers who follow the crops, Mexicans, Japanese Americans in and out of relocation centers, Negroes in industry and in the army. The Nation is honored in having associated with it an intelligent observer and an effective writer whose struggles for justice are stated very much in the present tense.

The Vandenberg Plan

SENATOR VANDENBERG'S proposals for reestablishing Allied unity by American action to free Europe from its fears of a future renewal of German aggression have been favorably received by most of his "internationalist" colleagues and have been accorded a warm welcome in the general press. The fact that they have been bitterly condemned by the Daily News, which sees them as a surrender to Roosevelt foreshadowing the final break-up of the G. O. P., is itself something of a commendation. Nevertheless, the Senator's record being what it is, he must not be surprised if the mouth of his gift horse is examined with somewhat suspicious care. The fervent devotion to the Atlantic Charter recently displayed by men who reviled and ridiculed it at the time of its promulgation justifies a search for ulterior motives in their utterances.

After a careful study of the Senator's address, however, we are not inclined to condemn it offhand as, to quote the Daily Worker, "a clever maneuver to divide the President's supporters." There are some obvious gaps in his reasoning, some unfortunate obscurities in his language, some evidence of the "American governess" mentality; but his central proposal merits, we believe, serious consideration.

Mr. Vandenberg is concerned over the "unilateral actions" of Moscow and London but realizes that American official silence "has multiplied confusion at home and abroad." If unity is to be restored, he suggests, American faith in the Atlantic Charter must be reaffirmed, but at the same time steps must be taken to remove the sense of insecurity which promotes such unilateral measures to achieve safety from future assault as Russia's effort to surround itself with "unwillingly controlled or partitioned states." The primary problem to be dealt with is "the fear of reborn German aggression"—a menace which the United States is as interested in scotching as are its Allies.

In order to meet this situation, the Senator proposes the immediate conclusion of a treaty between the major Allies to act together to keep Germany and Japan disarmed. With such a pact in force, the President, as commander-in-chief, could, he points out, move instantly to employ whatever force was necessary in joint action to prevent either of these powers preparing for new aggressions. "Regardless of what our later decision may be in respect to the power that shall be delegated to the President to join our military force with others in a new Peace League, . . . I am sure we can all agree that there should be no limitations when it comes to keeping the Axis out of piracy for keeps." So far, so good. But we are bound to observe that the Senator's proposal requires a good deal of elucidation.

How, for instance, is disarmament to be defined? Some people think that in the case of Germany it should mean permanent loss of control over the heavy industries of the Ruhr. Would Mr. Vandenberg be prepared to have the United States underwrite such a provision? It will be hard to draft a treaty of the kind he proposes until there is basic agreement about the terms to be imposed on the Axis nations. Again, there is the question of what body will decide what constitutes a threat of rearmament and what preventive measures should be applied. Is this authority to be lodged in representatives of the great powers, or is it ultimately to be included among the duties of a permanent international organization?

We think the Big Three at their forthcoming meeting might well put Senator Vandenberg's idea on their agenda, but let no one think such a treaty is a simple matter that can be drawn up in short order. Nor will negotiations be eased by the Senator's suggestion that once this question is settled and unity restored we shall "have the duty and the right to demand that whatever unilateral decisions have to be made in consequence of military need, they shall all be subject to revision in the light of the post-war world. . . ." This sounds like the voice of the governess. If we are to make such demands, we might start by expressing our own willingness to regard any unilateral decisions we may make, in the Pacific for instance, as equally temporary.

Again, the Senator said: "If Dumbarton Oaks should specifically authorize the ultimate international organization to review protested injustices in the peace itself, it would at least partially nullify the argument that we are to be asked to put a blank-check warrant behind a future status quo which is unknown to us." We agree that an international organization should have this authority; more than that, it should have power to pass on questions of injustice arising after the peace. But to exercise such authority effectively, the decisions of the organization cannot be subject to the veto of any great power, and all members must be willing to subordinate their national sovereignties. Are the Senator and his party now ready to accept this inescapable condition of a real international order?

IN NEXT WEEK'S NATION

Dorothy Jones of Hollywood resumes the series Tomorrow the Movies with Hollywood Goes to War.

Monopoly in a Glass Bottle

THE Hartford Empire Glass monopoly case was argued before the United States Supreme Court in November of 1943 and reargued in January of 1944. Now, a year later, the court has finally handed down its decision. Three justices—Murphy, Jackson, and Douglas—took no part in deciding the case, because the first two had been with the Department of Justice during its inception and Douglas was on the Temporary National Economic Committee when it investigated Hartford Empire. Two justices, Black and Rutledge, wrote separate opinions, differing sharply with the majority of four. This majority decision is a triumph of narrow legalism over good sense, an extraordinary piece of judicial stultification. It was written by Justice Roberts and joined in by Chief Justice Stone and Justices Frankfurter and Reed. It is a blow to effective anti-trust enforcement and a disgrace to the supposedly liberal justices who participated in it.

That such a decision should come from Justice Roberts is not surprising; he is a corporation lawyer by training, and his outlook is in accordance with his past. But Reed was a New Deal appointee. Stone wrote the decision in the Morton Salt case, which seemed to promise a new and realistic judicial attitude toward the monopolistic abuse of the patent privilege. Frankfurter has gone out of his way not to interfere with the findings of administrative bodies in regulatory and tax matters. Here, in a highly complicated anti-trust case analogous to an administrative procedure, we find him substituting his own judgment for that of the trial court. The four did, indeed, uphold the decision that the Hartford Empire Company and its associates had engaged in a monopolistic conspiracy which violated the Sherman and Clayton acts. They could hardly have done otherwise. The glass industry has long been recognized as a classic example of a patent monopoly. The evidence of the conspiracy was not circumstantial but direct and ample. "It is hard to imagine a case," Judge Frank L. Kloebe of Ohio said in his courageous District Court decision, "in which a court would have more first-hand information of what the parties did and intended than in the case at bar." The Supreme Court majority of four upheld Judge Kloebe's findings and then proceeded to emasculate the decree by which he sought to end the conspiracy. The participants are condemned for conspiracy by the Supreme Court but reinstated in the possession of its fruits.

The majority's dry and chaste recital of the bare legal facts provides an inadequate conception of the conspiracy's robust flavor. An incident recited in the District Court decision may give readers some idea of the kind of men and companies who were before the court. They had a competitor in the manufacture of one type of glass-making equipment. In 1928 they suggested that the competitor get together with them, raise his price from $9,500 to $13,500 per machine—and pay the $4,000 difference to Hartford Empire. "Now, boys," the competing firm was told, "we have made you a good proposition. . . . We will give you a month to think it over. . . . If you do not go in with us, you are going to be sued, and continue to be sued until you are out of business." When the competing firm declined to go along, a suit for patent infringement was brought under circumstances which prevented any adequate defense from being made. The suit was won and the competing firm eliminated. On one occasion, according to the complaint in the case, "the defendants Hartford and Owens at night cut a hole in the roof of the building" of a competing firm and entered the premises in order to inspect its machinery. It is not strange that the trial judge wondered why the Department of Justice limited itself in this case to a civil action, and said, "This court has not been apprised of the reason for no criminal prosecution. This unanswered question rests on the doorstep of the Department of Justice."

The heart of the glass monopoly was Hartford Empire, a patent-holding company. The government asked its dissolution; the lower court ordered a receivership instead. The Supreme Court orders the business returned to Hartford Empire. The heart of the monopoly was the leasing of glass-making machinery under restrictive provisions. The District Court ordered that in the future all such machinery be sold outright instead of leased. This was overruled by the Supreme Court. The District Court ordered the patents in this conspiracy to be made freely available without royalty payments. The Supreme Court not only modified the decree to permit collection of "reasonable royalties" but limited the machinery items on which licenses had to be granted even at reasonable royalties. These are but a few of the changes made by the Supreme Court to weaken the decree. Justice Black protested that the decree as modified left the conspirators "free, in a large measure, to continue to follow the competition-destroying methods by which they achieved control of the industry." Justice Rutledge said, "To permit these patents to remain in the guilty hands . . . not only does not deprive their owners of the fruits of their misconduct. Rather it secures to them its continued benefits."

The Budget Message

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S fourth war-time budget contained few surprises in its estimates of financial requirements for the 1945-46 fiscal year. Since our fighting services are now fully equipped and only slight expansion is foreseen in the number of men in service, the estimated outlay for war purposes is somewhat less than it was in the current year. But while the figure for probable war expenditures has been cut from $89 billion to $70 billion, "non-war" expenditures—including pensions, interest on the public debt, and tax refunds—will increase by more than $2 billion as a direct result of the war. Thus total expenditures will probably be around $83 billion, as against $99 billion during the present year.

The really significant part of the President's message, however, was the closing section, in which he set forth the Administration's views regarding post-war fiscal policy. Here, even more clearly than in his campaign addresses, Mr. Roosevelt developed the principles of a program for full employment after the war. "Full employment," he declared, "is not only a matter of immediate self-interest but also part of our stake in world stability and prosperity." To this end he indicated that the government should be prepared to spend enough in the post-war period to maintain consumer buying power at a level that will assure 60,000,000 jobs. And as a means of supporting the buying power of the public and at the same time maintaining "a policy of orderly but steady debt reduction" he suggested "the use of progressive taxes for the redemption of bonds held by millions of individual savers." As a corollary, he opposed the retention of "high taxes on the masses of consumers for general reduction of debt held by financial institutions" on the ground that such a policy would destroy purchasing power and create unemployment.

By thus coming out unequivocally for a program of maintaining full employment by the support of purchasing power, Mr. Roosevelt has focused attention sharply on the main issue in post-war policy. The conservative press has not been slow to indicate its disapproval of this section of the President's message. The essential issue, of course, is post-war tax policy. While the President wants a reduction in the taxes on the masses and would maintain fairly steep progressive taxes on corporations and the well-to-do, many Republicans, backed by large business interests and a substantial section of the press, have been urging the elimination of the corporation tax and a sharp reduction in the income tax as a means of encouraging enterprise to provide jobs. Since these same groups also want to see a rapid reduction in the national debt, they are inclined to oppose any reduction in the taxes on the low-income brackets and to support proposals for a sales tax or any levy which will take the burden off the well-to-do.

Obviously, these two conflicting theories for supporting post-war employment cannot be equally sound. And the question is far too important to be left to political pressures and party politics. Mr. Roosevelt's program is squarely based on the best economic authority available. It is entirely consistent with the economic doctrines of the distinguished British economist Lord Keynes and is designed to meet the flaws in American economic policy as set forth in the studies of wealth and income by the Brookings Institution. But the most compelling argument supporting Mr. Roosevelt's program as against that of his opponents is to be found in the history of the 1920's. The post-war policies of the Harding and Coolidge Administrations were almost identical with those now being urged by the Republicans and big business. The government debt was reduced rapidly, taxes on the well-to-do were cut sharply, business was stimulated, and the country had a period of unparalleled business confidence. But the final result, owing to the extreme dislocation of purchasing power, was the unprecedented economic collapse of the 1930's. As Mr. Hutchison points out elsewhere in this issue, British reluctance to join the United States in a coordinated program to stimulate world trade and a sound international economic policy grows out of the fear that we shall follow the same path as in the 1920's, thus bringing disaster not only to ourselves but to any country that is closely associated with us. The President's message is reassuring on this point, and should help mend the rift which has recently developed in Anglo-American relations. But the President will need the support of every forward-looking American citizen if he is to bring his program to fruition against the powerful opposition which is already forming.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THE landing on Luzon came as great good news to all Americans. There is no use deceiving ourselves about so fundamental a phenomenon as this: no matter what we thought about MacArthur—and many of us thought plenty—it was a thrill to hear that he was back. Psychologically, the Leyte landings never seemed quite like the real Philippines thing, although doubtless it would be hard to impress this on the minds of the American troops who fought there—one of them who was wounded wrote me without false gaiety that he was "about to start walking on a pair of G. I. legs."

Luzon, as the island of Manila, of Bataan, and of Corregidor, has a very special place in the story of the war, that story which is as much human as it is strategic or tactical. The road back has been incredibly long and difficult, from Tarawa in the Central Pacific fourteen months ago and from Guadalcanal in the Southwest Pacific twenty-nine months ago. The landings on Luzon are in a very real sense the culmination of what has gone before: the Owen Stanley Mountains, Salamaua, Lae, the Admiralties, Aitape, Hollandia, the Schouten Islands, Sansapor, Morotai for MacArthur's men; New Georgia, Bougainville, Santa Isabel, the Green Islands for Halsey's old South Pacific Command; Kwajalein, Eniwetok, Saipan, Tinian, Guam, Palau for Nimitz's Central Command and especially for the Marine Corps. The two great lines of force, MacArthur's and Nimitz's, converged in Leyte Gulf three months ago. There finally the American commanders in the Pacific were able to use on a large scale the fundamental strategic principle of concentration, and applied superior force on a relatively narrow front.

The lesson of Leyte has obviously been taken to heart, and there is no disposition to consider the Luzon campaign finished with the landing. We know now that these amphibious battles only begin when the troops are ashore. The Japanese have devised, through trial and error, what is probably the most effective defense against amphibious operations, in spite of their relatively limited resources in man-power and material. One cannot guard every inch of every island of a far-flung empire. So the Japanese high command tries to guess where the Americans will land and to guard those threatened shores; but it keeps a mobile force to meet us wherever we do land, because it has at least learned that American commanders, like good baseball players, hit 'em where they ain't.

Consequently recent Pacific operations have developed into a series of races: the Japanese racing to knock us back into the water before we are firmly established ashore, we racing to get established before the Japanese catch us with one foot on shore and one in the water. (The Japanese fleet would have caught us in just that position on Leyte had it not been for the brilliant intervention by the United States Seventh and Third fleets.) The same kind of race is now developing on Luzon. Again it is most likely that the Japanese will lose; but Luzon will see some bitter, bloody battles before they have finally lost.

It is likely that the Japanese will lose, not because Americans always lick Japanese or have better blood, but because in this case as in others they have superior power, superior dispositions of that power, and superior plans for its employment. The entire remaining strength of the Japanese fleet is probably not a match for the United States Seventh Fleet, which is in immediate support of the landing forces, and is certainly not a match for the Third Fleet, cruising somewhere to the northwest between Luzon and the Formosa-Ryukyu area. If the Japanese fleet offers battle, it will probably meet another defeat on a scale with that of the Second Battle of the Philippines in October, and this may well mean the end of the Japanese fleet as an effective naval force. Japanese air power has already suffered badly in the preparatory phases of the landings—a new twist to the artillery barrage of the last war, with the artillery in this case mounted on wings which take off from easily movable floating airfields. It will assuredly suffer even more as the Luzon campaign continues: reinforcement squadrons staging down from the home islands will run the gauntlet of the Third Fleet's carrier-based planes, now ranging out beyond the big airfields of Formosa to the China coast; planes remaining on Luzon when we landed, probably not more than 200, will be attacked at their bases by fighters from Mindoro, bombers from Leyte and the Palaus. Japanese ground forces on Luzon, stationed mostly in the south to guard against landings from Mindoro, will be strafed and bombed from the air as they move up to Lingayen; if they move up too rapidly, MacArthur may land in the south, or around in the west above the neck of the Bataan peninsula. Finally, the enemy will certainly make a large-scale attempt to bring in troop reinforcements, which will either be destroyed at sea by small-boat and air attack or will be killed or starved on Luzon after they have landed.

The pattern of Leyte may thus repeat itself, with variations—and this even though the enemy well knows how heavy his losses were on Leyte. Yet he can do no other. Strategic and psychological considerations too strongly demand the retention of the Philippines for him to pull out or even to attempt to cut his losses. The establishment of American air and sea forces on Luzon means very nearly the end of Japanese traffic to the East Indies and southeastern Asia, which means the end of rich war imports as well as of supplies and reinforcements for the island garrisons. It means that Formosa, keystone of the whole island empire, is directly threatened with the inevitable next amphibious step; beyond Formosa lies the Chinese coast. This in turn will necessitate renewed Japanese efforts to get traffic moving on the overland route from Manchuria to Indo-China in order to bring home the resources of Malaya and the Indies and to supply the dwindling Burmese force now blocking the Allies' India-China routes.

As for the psychological-political considerations, their weight has already been made apparent on the other side of the world, where the Germans have suffered from trying to maintain impossible military positions. For the Japanese such considerations are peculiarly potent owing to their need to save face and maintain the myth that theirs is a war of the dark skins against the white skins—a myth made extremely difficult to sustain by the large contribution of Filipino resistance forces to their country's liberation.

So, in spite of all drawbacks, the Japanese must fight hard for Luzon; and consequently, in spite of all advantages, the Allies must also fight hard. The result is inevitable, though uncertain as to date. Then, Luzon and the Philippines won, the Allies can get down to the serious business of the Pacific war—attacking Japan's true inner fortresses of strength.

Behind the Labor Shortage

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 15

THE war-production program has been a succession of critical shortages. We no sooner solve one than others make an appearance. The earliest were shortages in basic materials. The current ones are due to new and increased needs developed in battle. The most authoritative survey of these shortages was supplied last December 7 in a report on Critical Programs by Hiland G. Batcheller, chief of operations at the War Production Board. The facts presented in this report may serve to counteract some of the hysteria generated and the distortions spread by the current debate over national service. Mr. Batcheller reported that 40 per cent of the war-production program was behind schedule and that 40 per cent of the total of current critical shortages was due to a sudden increase in requirements for certain weapons and materials, 26 per cent to changes in the design or model of military weapons, 22 per cent to labor shortages, and 12 per cent to the need for new productive facilities.

There have been shortages of ammunition and supplies at the front, but these have not been due to lags in output at home. The authority for this statement is the report made to Congress by War Mobilization Director James F. Byrnes on December 30. Supply difficulties on the western front, according to the statement made on December 16 by Senator Mead, cannot be blamed on labor. "To date," Mead said, "the problem has been one of transporting supplies from shipboard and from the Normandy beaches." This does not mean that labor can afford to be complacent. New draft and production requirements will strain our industrial system to its utmost in coming months, and adequate steps must be taken to meet increased demands on machine and man-power.

The debate on national service has oversimplified the problem. To put the question as a choice between drafting or not drafting labor is to create the impression that somehow labor is at fault in these critical shortages. Actually they derive from two sources. The first is military misjudgment. Some programs have had to be sharply accelerated because military leadership was too optimistic. In some cases there was lack of experience; artillery and shell programs went up sharply after troops began to land and really fight abroad. In the case of the tank program, steadily whittled down and now suddenly increased, there was an unwillingness to learn from Russian experience and a silly disparagement of the tank. Similarly there was a tardy recognition of the value of such new devices as the rocket and the jet-propulsion engine. And over all has hung the misguided feeling, yet to be completely dissipated, that victory could be won by air power. These factors of military misjudgment are reflected not only in such critical programs as rockets, heavy artillery, and tanks, but even in so "civilian" an item as cotton duck. Cotton-duck requirements were cut sharply by the military after the winter of 1942-43; low-wage textile labor shifted to better-paying war industries; now requirements have been boosted again. The shortage of rockets, tanks, and cotton duck obviously involves more than a mere labor shortage; new facilities, design, and engineering, as well as labor recruiting, are necessary. These items cannot be obtained merely by turning the faucet of a controlled labor supply.

The second source of critical shortages also lies in a situation more complex than a simple scarcity of labor. We are operating our economy at pretty close to full capacity, and tight situations cannot be corrected by general formulas. "The immediate task," Mr. Batcheller reported, "is to tackle each of the critical programs on a 'spot' basis. Wherever we know of lagging plants we must send in practical production specialists, not general practitioners, to determine the facts, the causes, and the probable cures of production troubles." Every local situation is different. Here a shortage of labor may be due to a lack of day nurseries for working mothers; there the need may be for more buses to serve commuting workers. One tight spot may be eased by wider subcontracting; another, by shutting down some non-essential plant; a third, by transferring some contracts to another area. A cost-plus contract may have encouraged the hoarding of labor. The problems are problems of wise planning, of careful attention to detail, not simply of "labor shortages." This is what Baruch meant when he said in his report on the West Coast man-power situation in 1943, "Man-power problems cannot be solved by thinking solely in terms of labor controls. Control over production is equally important. The fundamental objective of any sound man-power program must be to bring production demands and labor supply into balance."

It is the failure to achieve this balance which accounts for many of our man-power difficulties, and this balance will not automatically be attained by passing a national-service statute. "There should be better coordination," Mr. Batcheller hinted tactfully, "between the War Production Board, the War Manpower Commission, and the services on contract run-outs or cutbacks and new contract placements. A much better job needs to be done in diverting released facilities and labor into critical plants." What he means is that army-navy procurement is still placing and canceling too many contracts without regard to the availability of facilities and man-power. The first essential is coordination of procurement services with the War Production Board and the War Manpower Commission to see that, wherever possible, cancellations are made in tight labor areas and new contracts put into loose labor areas. The military are still too uncooperative.

Liberals and labor leaders will prove badly mistaken however, if they assume that the coordination of war-production and man-power agencies will be sufficient to meet the problems which lie ahead of us. Greater control of labor will prove necessary. But it is not generally understood that greater control of labor is intimately bound up with greater control of management. The War Manpower Commission today operates a system of employment ceilings, labor priorities, and referrals to make labor available where it is most needed. But while the WMC has sufficient power today to deprive a worker of his livelihood in a critical labor area if he declines to work where he is assigned, it has no power to enforce employment ceilings against employers who choose to ignore them. The War Manpower Commission also has no power to send its labor-utilization inspectors into plants without permission of the management. These inspectors are our principal weapon against the hoarding and waste of labor. Whether we have national service or not, the War Manpower Commission or some other agency will have to be given power by Congress to enforce its labor priorities and labor-inspection system by adequate penalties against both the recalcitrant worker and the recalcitrant management.

An incident from the last annual report of the Truman committee illustrates how widely the efficient mobilization of man-power differs from the mere issuance of orders compelling a requisite number of workers to report for duty—or else. Dallas, Texas, had been declared a critical labor area in 1943 solely because of new labor requirements at the North American Aviation plant there. A subcommittee investigated and held hearings in Dallas. "The testimony established," the Truman committee reported, "that North American was not efficiently utilizing the 36,000 workers which it then had and that it could not usefully employ the additional 13,000 workers that it was requesting." A transcript was sent to the War Production Board. Charles E. Wilson, then vice-chairman, after conferences with Army Air Forces, decided that North American's peak requirements could safely be reduced by 10,000, and that no new employees would have to be hired until the next year. The result was to take Dallas out of the critical-labor-area classification and free labor in it for other war work.

Labor leaders are a good deal more aware of these facts than the War and Navy departments seem to be. Labor would be wise to avoid a hysterical debate over national service and suggest instead legislation to give the War Manpower Commission compulsory power to enforce and expand its system of labor priorities and inspection. The WMC is already a going concern; its local labor-management committees are far better informed on industrial problems than Selective Service boards. Selective Service did a poor job on occupational deferments; it would do a worse one on administering labor controls. The WMC could go into action at once. Better coordination of war agencies in Washington plus strengthened WMC committees in the field would go a long way toward easing current shortages. And the combination would provide the only framework in which an over-all national-service act could operate efficiently and fairly.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE NEW PRESIDENT'S [Grant's] anxiety to keep the peace was notorious, and has weighed heavily in his course of administration. He has already yielded much—too much—to the legislature, and he seems likely to go on until there is nothing left for him to yield.—January 6, 1870.

CONGRESS REASSEMBLED on Monday, and the principal business of both houses was the readmission of Virginia. . . . On Tuesday the debates were continued, without result.—January 13, 1870.

A MUSEUM OF THE FINE ARTS for New York. Whether the right moment has arrived to establish one will depend upon the amount of real desire for it that may be found in the community. . . . On the 23d of last November, a meeting was held in the theatre of the Union League Club to consider the question. . . . At this meeting, after speeches and resolutions, a committee of fifty gentlemen were elected to provide for carrying into effect the object of the meeting. . . . These facts appear from a pamphlet which has reached us entitled "A Metropolitan Art Museum." . . . It seems . . . that some members of the committee hope for the aid of the state or of the city. . . . But if this action of the state cannot be brought about . . . it is then to be considered whether the community includes such persons who, being both interested in the cause and able to advance it, may have aggregate power enough to establish a museum of art.—January 13, 1870.

THE VIRGINIA CASE is causing no small bitterness and excitement in Congress.—January 20, 1870.

THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT gets on. Rhode Island, Minnesota, and Mississippi have ratified it during the week, along with Kansas; and Ohio has made a beginning with its Senate. The need of it is nowhere more strikingly shown than in the Democratic proposition before the Illinois Constitutional Convention, to insert "white" in the new instrument.—January 20, 1870.

MISSISSIPPI, A STATE where hitherto, from the days when its bottom lands were first settled, down to the days of General Gillem, the Negro has been of as little importance as anywhere else in the world outside of a slaver, has just sent to Washington the first colored United States Senator. He is a Mr. Revels, a mulatto, who is said to be a man of good character and fair ability.—January 27, 1870.

Lion Bites Eagle

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

WHEN the American eagle twists the British lion's tail, it's not news, but when lion bites eagle, the cables burn and the headlines crackle. Over here, the anti-British diatribes of a minority of publishers, radio commentators, and politicians have long been accepted as one of the more unpleasant facts of life; their daily damnable variations on the theme of perfidious Albion merely bore us. And as the British seldom retorted in kind, we have been apt to conclude that they were equally indifferent. This, however, is not so. A fair percentage of the dirty cracks of McCormick et al. are reported in the British press; still more become known to influential circles through the Ministry of Information's daily summary of the American press. If the soreness thus inevitably created has not hitherto found much public expression, it is partly because of official discouragement of criticisms of the United States.

To my mind, that policy has been a mistake; plain speaking at an earlier stage could have been accomplished with better temper. Now it is loaded with a weight of accumulated resentment which makes for an exaggeration of grievances. And the American public, totally unprepared for such an outburst, in turn feels both bewildered and hurt by a bite which makes no very careful distinction between the internationalist and the isolationist wings of the eagle.

No observer who had recently been in England could, however, have been very much surprised at the outburst touched off by the Economist. When I was in London last fall it was clear that irritation at American attacks on Britain was combining with fears about future American economic and political policies to produce an explosive mixture that was bound to detonate sooner or later. In my diary for November 10 I find this record of a conversation with a liberal editor:

X thinks that the British government has been over-anxious to appease American opinion and has been too ready to assume that British opinion will remain well-disciplined and docile. But too many concessions to America were liable to cause a sudden explosion here. The British public refused to accept the view that this country had to show a humble gratitude to the United States on account of Lend-Lease. They accepted the clause in the Lend-Lease Act which said that it was designed for the defense of the United States quite literally. That was exactly what Lend-Lease had accomplished, and, on balance, taking into account the part Britain had played in the war, it was felt that America was at least as much debtor as creditor. Talk of this kind is common enough here though it finds little expression in print. Of course, it is stimulated by the Chicago Tribune's nationalistic boasting and everlasting gibes at Britain. I am afraid that a lot of resentment is being stored up which will surprise and shock America if it ever bursts forth.

It must be acknowledged that the malevolence of the isolationist press is not the only cause of irritation. Most well-informed Englishmen have learned to discount this to some extent and find it easier to bear than what is felt to be the common tendency of Americans to preach a higher form of international morality than they are prepared to practice. No doubt this is a case of the pot calling the kettle black; in the eyes of the rest of the world, hypocrisy is a characteristic of both English-speaking peoples. Similarly, another American trait which annoys the British—the tendency to regard as altruistic, actions which in fact are prompted by the instinct of self-preservation—is common enough among the British themselves. It might be much better if both nations acknowledged that their primary purpose in fighting the war was to achieve survival, and harped less on their noble motives.

The real difference between the two countries is that while both are confident of victory they are not equally confident of survival. Beneath Britain's surface irritability is a deep-rooted fear about its post-war future, about its ability to maintain itself as a first-class nation. One important ingredient in this fear is uncertainty about future American political and economic policies. Will attempts to organize a world system of collective security be wrecked once again in the United States Senate? Is America determined to yield no jot or tittle of its sovereignty? Is America willing to play a full and responsible part in the reorganization of Europe? These are questions I was asked constantly during my recent visit to England.

The fact that no one can, at present, give unequivocal answers forces Mr. Churchill's domestic critics to fight him with one arm tied. If there is to be no reliable system of international security, it is difficult to attack attempts to provide for national security on traditional lines. The British feel they came within a hair's breadth of losing the war in the Mediterranean, and until the danger of another war is eliminated, the principle of strengthening British influence in the region of the Suez Canal is not easy to assail, though it is possible to castigate Mr. Churchill's peculiar methods of making friends.

But, as the London Times has pointed out, such unilateral measures to achieve security set up a vicious circle. "American censure untempered by American proposals for constructive action encourages belief on this side of the Atlantic in an ingrained American unwillingness to accept political responsibilities in Europe. European nations, feeling more and more convinced that they will be thrown back on European resources for the upholding of their future security, take steps which still further alienate American opinion."

A similar reaction is to be observed in the economic field as the result of fears that America's enormous productive capacity may be used in such a way as to hinder rather than help the economic reconstruction of Europe. Having liquidated a large part of the assets on which it depended to compensate for its adverse balance of trade, Britain is faced with the necessity of greatly expanding its exports in order to pay for the minimum of imports without which its standard of living must decline. Consequently, Britons are alarmed when they hear much of American plans to multiply foreign sales and little or nothing about measures to achieve a corresponding increase in American purchases from abroad. They are still further alarmed by indications of American determination to dominate the world's airways and to maintain a much larger merchant marine than before the war. In the British view all this spells an attempt to export America's unemployment problem, and while in the long run they don't believe it will be successful, in the short run they see it as ruinous to their own trade.

Fears of this kind have been heightened by war-time experience. While British exports, excluding government shipments of war supplies to other United Nations, have dropped to 50 per cent by value and 30 per cent by volume of their pre-war level, it is noted that United States exports, apart from Lend-Lease, have been fully maintained. The result is complaints that American traders are horning in on British markets. The clause in the original Lend-Lease agreement, recently modified, which prevented Britain from exporting goods embodying Lend-Lease materials, or similar materials derived from domestic sources, has in these circumstances been felt to be an unfair handicap, particularly as it did not apply to materials supplied to the United States under reverse Lend-Lease.

The British government is committed to the post-war international economic policy indicated in the Atlantic Charter—a policy of razing barriers of all kinds which hinder international trade; and in this it has the official backing of the three political parties of which it is composed. But there is rather widespread support for a very different program which would involve the creation of a closed sterling area and the negotiation of bilateral trade agreements with those countries which depend on the British market. Usually such proposals are advocated as a pis aller—an alternative to a genuine American contribution to the freeing of world trade. But they have an appeal on their own merits to business men who dislike competition in general and fear American competition in particular. They have also found favor among a school of left-wingers who believe that any attempt to reestablish and enlarge multilateral trade will be on American terms. This, they argue, will mean that Britain's economy will be tied to that of America and that plans for British full employment will be at the mercy of the erratic swings of American private-enterprise economy.

These are some of the fears that haunt Britain's visions of the future. We may think them exaggerated; we may think they ascribe to the United States a responsibility which at the very least should be distributed equally among the Big Three. But let us not dismiss these fears as baseless. Britain, as a world power, will end the war relatively weakened, while America, actually, and Russia, potentially, will have greatly increased their strength. And, in particular, Britain's economie position will have been seriously undermined. It is important that these facts should be brought into the open and their implications understood. If the recent outburst of plain speaking helps to bring about this end, it will have a value outlasting any ill effects arising from its bad-tempered tone.

MOBILE CANTEN

China Sets the Clock Back*

CHINESE education since the end of the Manchu dynasty in 1905, when the old examination system was abolished and modern schools were established, has in general followed the world trend. In accordance with the people's desires, the tendency has been to discard feudalism and to strive for democracy. This development was hastened after the "May 4" or "New Culture" movement of 1919, but it has not proceeded without fluctuations. Even after the establishment of the Republic in 1911 and after the May 4 movement was inaugurated, the "Back-to-Ancient-Days" movement appeared in several provinces—in Shantung, for instance, under War Lord Chang Chung-chang, in Kwangtung under War Lord Lung Tsi-kwan, and in Hunan under War Lord Ho Chien. Only during the last six or seven years, however, has this movement been promoted in a well-planned fascist manner and on a national scale. It has three main aspects:

1. Respect for Confucianism. The movement is not an objective study of the philosophy of Confucius but an effort to present him as "the great teacher throughout the ages," and thereby "strengthen the self-confidence of China." It utilizes the Confucian emphasis on the monarchical system, the rule of the aristocracy, absolutism, subservience, and contempt for the laborer in order to maintain the corrupt feudalism of China—to help the privileged class to dominate the people, to help the ruler to train obedient people, and to prevent creative thinking and the application of scientific theories and methods. No one dares openly to oppose science and scientific education in this twentieth century, but "smart" people can arrange that only the technique of science shall be appropriated.

Feudal thinking, reinforced by a highly developed scientific technique, becomes fascism of the German, Italian, and Japanese type. The equivalent in China is the theory of "Chinese culture as the foundation, Western culture as the method." This was a popular slogan of the imperial house during the last decades of the Manchu dynasty, and it is again being emphasized by Chinese educational authorities. In his "Principle of National Independence" Dr. Sun Yat-sen speaks of "strengthening China's national self-confidence," and this part-thought from Dr. Sun's democratic doctrine is misinterpreted as belonging to feudalistic Confucian philosophy.

Chinese culture has splendid aspects not found in other cultures. The philosophy of Confucius has a special pro-fundity which is not shared by other philosophies. This only means, however, that we Chinese have a history and a culture well worth studying. We should extract the finest things from it and combine them with the finest achievements of other cultures, thus creating a richer and higher culture in which social evolution will be facilitated; merely to revive our old traditions and the old Confucianism is very dangerous. In order to prolong the days of their rule the Manchus tried the latter method. Today some people are again advocating it. Dr. Sun Yat-sen did not urge the people to "respect Confucianism" or designate Confucius the "teacher throughout the ages." His "principle of national independence" is progressive and democratic. Unfortunately, the Nanking puppet regime is not the only group that wants to misinterpret it. For more than two thousand years emperors in China used Confucianism to keep the people in subjection, and today, thirty-three years after China became a republic, there are still some people who want to make use of Confucius for their own ends.

2. Control of Thought. The same people say that liberalism and socialism are the two poisons in modern thought. China's thoughts, they say, must be unified, and only "one principle" is to be allowed—that embodied in Dr. Sun's "three people's principles," or, as they interpret it, Confucianism, especially its political and ethical doctrines. All other thoughts must be purged. (Even Dr. Sun's own progressive interpretation is not allowed.) They attempt to unify China's thoughts in the following ways:

All publications and cultural activities are strictly censored, according to the governmental unified standard mentioned above.

Students of all grades are given a "thought-unifying" examination before entering schools or colleges.

For schools and colleges of all grades the Ministry of Education has introduced a "unified" curriculum and has issued or specified textbooks; even reference books are specified and limited by the Ministry of Education.

"Indoctrination" has been adopted as the standard method of teaching. Class hours have been increased to thirty or forty a week so that students will have no time for problems outside their textbooks.

Confucian ethical doctrine, as written by Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, has been adopted as the "unified" instruction in all schools and colleges throughout the nation.

The former educational purpose of "training people to be the leaders of the nation" has been replaced by the rules of conduct of the Kuomintang Party, one of which is, "Obedi-

* This article was written in China by a Chinese scholar and brought to this country by a friend of his.

ence is the basic spirit of responsibility . . . the people must obey absolutely the orders of the government and the commands of the Leader."

All teachers are examined according to the "unified standard." The deans in charge of the conduct and thoughts of students, military-training instructors, and Scout leaders are appointed by the Ministry of Education and constantly under its supervision.

The present national examination system is as "thought-unifying" and "thought-limiting" as the Manchu system, under which, to pass the examination, it was necessary to write an essay in a traditionalized mechanical form that confined all expression of thought.

3. Gestapo-ruled Schools. All student self-government organizations have been abolished and have been replaced by the activities of the San Min Chu I Youth Corps, under the direction of the Kuomintang. Agents of the so-called "Special Service" are planted among the students and teachers, whose activities and thoughts are thus kept under close watch. If these agents report that a student or a teacher possesses "impure thoughts," his position and even his life are immediately endangered. (In Hunan University alone more than fifty students and teachers have been arrested because of "thought problems," and their whereabouts are still unknown today.) During the war most of the students and faculty members have lost contact with their homes, and their livelihood depends entirely on government subsidies. If they lose their scholarships or positions, they face immediate starvation.

Members of the "Special Service" are recruited either from the Kuomintang Party or the San Min Chu I Youth Corps. Some are induced to enter it by a special subsidy or offer of a high position; some are forced into the "Service." To all appearances, they are teachers, students, or members of the administrative staff. They usually cluster around the dean and the military-training instructors, who have received special training in the Kuomintang and San Min Chu I Youth Corps. They use all kinds of methods to gain their ends. The range and direction of their activities are based on a program secretly adopted by the Kuomintang, entitled "A Program for the Restriction and Surveillance of the Activities of Parties Other than the Kuomintang."

In the schools, therefore, no one dares discuss national or international affairs with anyone else. Students and teachers suspect each other, hate each other, and deceive each other; all live in fear. In every weekly convocation the dean or the military-training instructor speaks on Li I Lien Chi (rules of behavior, righteousness, honesty, and modesty) and on the virtues of the Generalissimo. But everyone knows that they are only putting on an act. The words they speak are not from the heart, and courtesy, righteousness, honesty, and modesty have long ago been swept overboard. This sort of "public deception" has become characteristic of all schools. On the surface, therefore, everything is very quiet. (If there are conflicts, they are caused by personal disputes between the dean and the military instructor, who use the students for their own purposes.)

These three aspects of the Back-to-Ancient-Days movement—"Respect Confucianism," thought control, and Gestapo-ruled schools—are inseparable. They represent a strongly reactionary policy in Chinese education. In its nature it is the same slave-education policy that the Japanese militarists are pursuing in occupied China. This educational policy is in effect wherever the authority of the Ministry of Education prevails. It is most thoroughly in effect, therefore, in Chungking and Sian, less so in Kunming and Kweilin. That is why teachers and students of the southern provinces prefer to work or study in Kunming. To extend its jurisdiction the Ministry of Education has changed many private colleges into national colleges and is creating many large national high schools.

This type of education has been promoted in China for several years now. Has it reached its goal of training youth to be slaves? On the surface it might appear to have succeeded, but it has encountered some basic difficulties. The reasons why it cannot accomplish its purpose are as follows: (1) The historical development and social conditions of China pointed the way to democracy. (2) Dr. Sun Yat-sen established the Republic of China on the basis of democracy. (3) Chinese education was baptized in scientific and democratic thinking by the "May 4" movement. (4) Many Chinese educators received a liberal education in America and in England; many have been influenced by liberal educators like John Dewey, Bertrand Russell, and William H. Kilpatrick. (5) Having resisted the Japanese for years, the Chinese people want a democratic China. (6) The world trend is toward democracy. (7) The authority of the Ministry of Education cannot reach the whole country, and those youths who are under its influence, though they dare not speak up, know what is what. Of course, innocent children are the ones who are most seriously affected.

Future historians will call this period the Dark Age of Chinese education. The present system is dragging China toward darkness and backwardness. The most heart-breaking thing is that education is not fulfilling its true function of promoting resistance and reconstruction, but is slowing down our war against the invader and the process of democratizing China.

Fashion

(In appreciation of Kay Boyle's Battle of the Sequins in The Nation of December 23)

Dirt and blood
Make a peculiar mud.

Mix warm blood
With foreign dirt,
Mold it into a sequined shirt;
Use a small batch
For a hat to match.

There's plenty of dirt;
We're giving the blood.
You needn't worry about supplies.
When the blood is gone,
And each of us dies,
Place a sequin on each of our eyes.

CORPORAL

The Dilemma of T. S. Eliot

BY SIDNEY HOOK

IN AN interesting essay in the New English Review entitled Notes Towards a Definition of Culture, T. S. Eliot raises some basic questions about culture, society, and religion which have provoked wide discussion on both sides of the Atlantic. The position Mr. Eliot takes on these questions challenges attention not only on its own account but as an indication that influential intellectual circles, despairing of the present and fearing the future, have turned from secular to religious solutions of the crisis of our time.

To understand and evaluate Mr. Eliot's proposals, we must begin by distinguishing the three different meanings of the word "culture" that appear in his analysis. He himself is explicit only about the first two. The first is the practice of arts and letters. The second is the anthropological concept of culture, familiar since Tylor, as a complex of institutions, techniques, and ideals—sometimes used interchangeably with the term "civilization." The third is the normative sense of culture expressed in the adjectives Mr. Eliot prefixes to it, like "superior" or "true" in contrast with "deteriorated" or "retrograde."

The mark of culture in this third sense is its organic character revealed in the functional interrelation between human activities. The complete absence of organic character may spell the end of culture. But there are various kinds of organic societies which Mr. Eliot evaluates quite differently. A head-hunting community in which the crafts of design are interwoven with its economy and a heresy-hunting community in which religion is synthesized with politics are both organic. This necessitates a purer kind of value judgment to enable Mr. Eliot to choose between them. That organic society has the best culture in which great arts and letters flourish, and in which they are integrally related by certain distinctive religious beliefs to the whole complex of social institutions. Such a culture is designated by Mr. Eliot as a "total culture."

Mr. Eliot's argument is that the development of this total culture is dependent upon a common religious faith whose values and meanings unify both the workaday and the intellectual-artistic life. The dominant social influence must be wielded by a hereditary élite, based on "transmitted aptitudes and domestic environment" and open to new recruits who meet "the sole qualification of achievement." A common faith is necessary to counteract the shattering effects upon institutions and personalities of withdrawing large areas of human life from traditional religious sanctions. For past history has shown that once a binding religious faith is loosened, "the spirit of inquiry, skepticism, and innovation" corrodes the fabric of social life. Even religion, now isolated from the rest of the cultural pattern, is disintegrated by the acids of the inquiring spirit. In time the pattern itself is threatened with dissolution, which "with the advance of liberty of thought and behavior imposes a strain upon human beings greater than the majority can bear."

Totalitarianism is one pattern of unification, but Mr. Eliot rejects it as "artificial" without explaining the term further. He recognizes it, however, as a natural reaction to the disorder produced by separating religion from the rest of culture. For Mr. Eliot a total, religious culture is the only alternative to the blight of totalitarianism.

The fundamental difficulty in Mr. Eliot's position, as I see it, is that his common religious faith, which is frankly supernatural, provides no principle of direction for the intelligent control of social change. Although he insists that we must make "fresh judgments and decisions in constantly changing situations," these judgments are in the nature of the case empirical. They cannot be derived either by logic or intuition from absolute supernatural truths, which in the Christian tradition are compatible with different empirical judgments. Despite the fact that Christianity has exercised a great influence, both for good and evil, on all societies in Western Europe since the days of Rome, the principles of not a single social system can be attributed to its dogmas. It has, however, shown itself capable of adaptation to every social system, including fascism. The source of our fresh judgments and decisions in constantly changing situations must therefore be sought elsewhere. Mr. Eliot's "common religious faith" runs the risk of having no more influence on the actual sources of these judgments and decisions than the Chaplain's prayer in Congress has on the subsequent proceedings.

Where a common supernatural faith does seem to bear on what appears to non-believers to be empirical questions like divorce, birth control, separation of church and state, the point is that such questions are decided by believers without reference to "constantly changing situations." In short, they are not treated as empirical questions at all.

This basic difficulty is almost admitted by Mr. Eliot in his further remark that a common supernatural faith must become the faith of peoples of different cultures and, "while uniting these peoples in a common brotherhood, can be contemplated in its transcendence of culture, as well as lived in the condition of each particular culture" (my italics). What specific directives can be supplied by a supernatural religious faith which must be thinned down to the vaguest phrases in order to be acceptable to Mohammedan, Confucian, and Hindoo cultures, whose members constitute the majority of the human race? Or is Mr. Eliot thinking only of a Christian world order, and an Anglo-Catholic one at that?

I pass over Mr. Eliot's notion of a hereditary élite because of its ambiguity. It is noteworthy, however, that he conceives of accessions to his élite not in terms of blood or wealth but of excellence and achievement. But if the avenues of achievement are to be kept open, it is of the utmost importance to preserve "the spirit of inquiry, skepticism, and innovation," and if fresh judgments and decisions are required for constantly changing situations, it is even more important to extend "the advance of liberty of thought and behavior." Yet all this makes for what Mr. Eliot and the neo-Thomists call "disorder." It must be controlled by a common religious faith, or else, despite certain gains, it will have the same disintegrating effects as it allegedly had on the medieval synthesis. Such control to be truly effective demands an iron grip on the intellectual life of the community. This in turn entails the existence of an organization, more centralized and powerful than the church in the Middle Ages, to determine what threatens the unity of culture and what not. No field of thought or action can be permitted to develop autonomously, for although the power of such an organization may nominally be restricted to matters of faith and morals, it alone is the judge of what concerns faith and morals. It is a foregone conclusion that the judgments of relevance will flow not so much from supernatural dogmas—which are unanalyzable abstractions that can be filled with variable historical content—as from the special interests of an ecclesiastical élite. The upshot is a variety of the very totalitarianism whose general pattern Mr. Eliot is anxious to avoid.

This, then, is Mr. Eliot's dilemma. He is unwilling to embrace current forms of totalitarianism, but his diagnosis of the causes of their rise leads him to proposals which, if enforced, would result in some kind of ecclesiastical fascism. His own account of the new total culture sounds gentle and conciliatory enough. But it is practically certain that people like him, or M. Maritain, will not administer it.

There is another alternative to Mr. Eliot's pattern of unification. This is a worldwide common faith, of a secular not supernatural character, based upon regional and international planning in economy, democracy in political and social life, and scientific method as the highest source of authority for those "fresh judgments and decisions in constantly changing situations" whose necessity Mr. Eliot admits. Its pattern of unification differs in notable ways from that proposed by Mr. Eliot. First of all, it is far less monistic. It aims at removing the disproportions between social, economic, and legal institutions but seeks no control over the free market of ideas or over manifestations of ideal culture—art, philosophy, theoretical science, and religion. It recognizes the desirability of producing integrated persons, but aside from equitably supplying the materials and the opportunity, it leaves the achievement of integration to the individual.

In general there is too much loose talk of integration and unification, and I fear that to some degree Mr. Eliot's analysis suffers from it. Unless we carefully distinguish the levels on which we should seek unification from those on which we must avoid it, we are likely to slur over the virtues, aesthetic and moral, of a rich plurality of cultural expressions. The common faith we require is limited only to beliefs that justify the social practices which insure democratic, cooperative living, peace, a decent standard of living, and an open career to intellectual and artistic talents—in other words, to what makes it possible for different human beings to live together without the plagues of poverty, war, and cultural terror. Integration on this level can be organized by intelligent social planning. But it neither presupposes nor implies integration on the plane of ideal cultural life, although the latter will naturally reflect in divers ways the new social experience. We have the right to believe, if democracy is preserved, that art, literature, philosophy, even religion, will be less constrained in a planned social-economic order than in the unplanned order of capitalism, whose "fetishism of commodities" exerts powerful, even when indirect, compulsions on the artist and thinker.

The underlying premises, whether theological, metaphysical, or naturalistic, from which different groups justify their common democratic beliefs and practices must not be subject to integration. It is enough, so to speak, that human beings live in accordance with democratic laws: it is foolish intolerance to make only one justification of the laws legal.

Integration on the level of personality is something else again. Mental and moral hygiene since the time of Plato teaches the wisdom of achieving a balanced wholeness. Yet it is also true that the torn and sick soul, like the "morbid secretions" of the oyster, to take an example from the opposite pole of creation, has often given the world pearls of great luster. We know that some geniuses have been borderline cases of insanity. We would not hesitate to lose the benefit of future geniuses of this type if we could free mankind altogether from the curse of insanity. But neuroses are too varied, and we know too little about their causation, once we strip current theories of their mythological elements, to justify any stringent, wholesale measures to prevent their emergence. Health has too often been confused with normality. According to some notions about neurosis, firemen would have to be declared neurotic about fire: they can't see a large blaze without wanting to put it out. According to some other notions, the creative life, save in the case of a few Olympian characters, demands an inner torment and compulsive drive that may appear queer or unnecessary to the happily adjusted. Freud himself regards neurosis as inexpugnable from life because it grows out of the Oedipus complex, which is transmitted through the racial unconscious; while his more sober followers interpret it as a conflict between the spontaneous expansion of the ego and the constricting patterns of social authority, and therefore an integral element of all social life.

My point is that however we gauge the value of wholeness of personality, the desire to achieve it and the choice of any particular pattern must be left to the individual as sacred ground on which society cannot trespass, although through education it can surround the individual with multiple options. Wholeness of personality is practically impossible of achievement, except by a few, in a culture whose social relations are discordant. Yet the presence of harmonious social relations is far from sufficient to guarantee it.

An integrated character is made, not born. It is the individual himself, when society provides tolerably decent permissive conditions, who plays the greatest part in the making of it. The most significant problems in the struggle for the maturity and the inward peace and freedom that define the integrated character are personal, particularly when the threat of poverty and insecurity is removed. But such problems cannot always be resolved. Who does not know individuals, some of great powers and some of small, of whom we can say with ground that in our Western society, planned or not, they will remain beset by insatiable hungers, driven by errant impulses, and lacerated by conflicting allegiances or frustrated ambitions? Nor are they all denizens of Bohemia! There is evidence that even in Mr. Eliot's total organic culture the sensitive artist and the devout Christian will continue at war with each other in his soul. For his religious faith does not well up wholeheartedly from his poetic insights, nor is it a compulsion of a mystical experience: it is the object of a deliberate will-to-believe enjoying an uneasy triumph over the scruples of intelligence.

There is no valid reason to fear that a secular, democratic, socialist order would be hostile to the development of a superior culture. Let us not forget for a moment that the racial mythology of Hitlerism and the authoritarian dialectic materialism of Stalinism are vicious Ersatz theologies; that their political systems are more theocratic than democratic; that their socialism is non-equalitarian without the adornments of an aristocracy of virtue or talents.

Mr. Eliot asks those of us who disagree with him to reflect that "a high degree of culture in an equalitarian society can only be attained if the great majority of men can be raised to a level, and kept at a level, which has never been remotely approached in the past." After reflection I am much puzzled by this. What can Mr. Eliot have in mind by an "equalitarian society"? Surely, not a society of biological equals! An equalitarian society is a democracy in which opportunities are accessible to all and in which levels of income, as an index of standards of living, are approximately the same for those who do productive labor. Is Mr. Eliot saying that before a superior culture can be achieved, not only must some people enjoy a decent standard of living, but others must be deprived of it? Why? After all, we can count on the same normal range of biological variation as a seed bed of cultural talent in an equalitarian society as in a stratified one. Specifically, what phase of culture is threatened by an equalitarian society? Why must "the majority of men" be raised to a historically unparalleled level for great science to develop, or great literature? How has it been in other societies which have enjoyed great cultures but in which the vast majority have been little more than beasts of burden? Why should the emancipation of the great majority necessarily make matters worse? Let us lay aside the parochial bias concealed in the invocation of absolute standards that eternalize the past. Once we do, there is ample reason to expect that in respect to cultural achievement an equalitarian society with present-day technological resources will at the very least come up to the high levels of non-equalitarian societies.

Because for Mr. Eliot, "Man is a rational animal," is a metaphysical, not empirical, proposition, it has no relevance to his program of social reform. Taken empirically, not all men are rational; but neither are most of them cretins or idiots. Rationality is not a timeless "essential" property of man but a natural and social power, dependent upon many other things which have a career in time. That is why men may become more rational and human through intelligent control of nature, society, history, and body-mind.

Because for Mr. Eliot, "Human personality possesses a unique worth," is a theological, not empirical, proposition, he discounts the possibilities of organizing education, after a socialist order has been won, not merely to raise the level of cultural interests but to diversify creative achievements. He overlooks the fact that the so-called average man is a social category, not a biological one. To a society that plans for freedom, the notion of the gray undifferentiated masses is utterly repugnant. The truth on this point was recognized long ago even under the distorting influences of conventional class society. "The greater intellect one has," says Pascal, "the more originality one finds in men. Ordinary persons find no difference between men." William James and John Dewey have between them elaborated the systematic basis for this insight and its educational imperatives—it is an insight that is freshly rediscovered by every teacher who has found his true vocation.

In the democratic socialist culture of the future—if it has a future, a question I have completely begged—it will be the teacher dedicated to the scientific spirit and the democratic faith, and not the priest, who will bear the chief responsibility for strengthening and enriching a common faith.

In the Wind

MAN-POWER: While the press bemoans the "exodus" of workers from war industries, the War Production Board estimates that war shortages are due to the following causes: step-ups in production schedules, 46 per cent; design changes, 26 per cent; labor shortages, 22 per cent; facilities shortages, 12 per cent. And the conservative Bureau of Labor Statistics announces that the "quit rate" in all manufacturing for August, September, and October of 1944 was lower than for the same months of 1943; also that it was lower in war industries than in manufacturing as a whole.

POLITICS: This advertisement appeared in the Savannah, Georgia, Morning News of December 19: "For Congress, First Georgia District. Vote for H. W. Shepard, White Jeffersonian Democrat, in Real Election November 5, 1946. Favors restricting the franchise to the white race. Opposes policing the world with American conscripts."

BALLYHOO: On the day we learned that the British Broadcasting Corporation, acting on orders from the government, had refused to permit Juan Negrín to broadcast his address to the anti-Franco meeting in New York January 2, a reader called our attention to the fact that the dust jackets of books from England carry a blurb for the B. B. C. that ends with these words: "The voice of Britain is the voice of freedom."

JOURNALISM: The Baton Rouge State-Times of December 20 ran Westbrook Pegler's column thus: "The Dies committee educated the public in many ways. The terms 'fellow-traveler,' 'Trojan horse,' and 'transmission belt,' all part of the Communist jargon, entered the common language, designating conspirators or dupes who col- (Continued on Comic Page)."

FESTUNG EUROPA: A Copenhagen woman, watching some new German recruits, remarked, "They're only children!" As punishment for her insult to the Wehrmacht, the Gestapo forced her to stand at attention for three hours, repeating, "They're not children, they're heroes."

[Readers are invited to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

Testament Against Fascism

ALEXANDER UHL

NOT so many weeks ago I stood on the Franco-Spanish frontier, at the little border post of Pont du Roi, where the Garonne River tears down from the Spanish Pyrenees into France. It was the first time that I had seen Spanish soil since those last tragic days of the Spanish civil war. . . .

That night, in a French hospital, I talked with some of the wounded who had come back from the Spanish border. I talked with one man whom I was sure I had seen before. At first I couldn't place him. Finally I noticed an old bullet scar on his arm, and I asked him about it. He said that he was a Cuban and that he had been wounded fighting with the International Brigade back in 1937. Then suddenly it flashed upon me where I had last seen him. I said to him: "You were once a florist, and the last time I saw you was when I interviewed you in the trenches south of Madrid. I wrote a story about you because I met you carrying a heavy jar of water to water the plants you were growing on the side of the trench. And I thought how strange it was for a man in the midst of battle to be growing flowers. You told me that you loved flowers and that that little garden was one of the bright spots in your life."

He looked at me and smiled. "Yes," he said, "that's right. I still love flowers."

We shook hands like a couple of excited schoolboys who had met after long years. And when I left him I carried with me a little feeling of shame in my heart that I had been living in comparative comfort while he had fought against fascism for seven long years, until he was lying in this bed with a fresh bullet wound in his leg to match his old scar of the Spanish war. I don't think anyone can understand this war against fascism unless he can understand that man and the determination and hope that fill him.

He was just one of many in that hospital, one of the many men who had fought for the Spanish Republic as long as they could, who had fought in the French maquis against the Germans, and who hoped now to free their own country.

THOMAS MANN

THIS war has a gloomy, unsavory pre-history, and it is the deep concern of all those who are waging the war with a moral sense that we did not truly and for all time break with this pre-history when we were forced into the war against fascism, that indeed we are ready, as soon as the opportunity is right, to tread this same path again, which leads directly to war, the path of appeasement, fostering and promoting the fascist enemy of mankind. If this concern were at all justified, it would indicate a break in our will which all our technical capabilities, all our productive forces, and all the skill of our generals would never make good. Even at this late date it may cause us to lose the war and would certainly cause us to lose the peace. . . .

It all began in Spain. There the powers of evil, in a moral and military sense, tested their war of aggression upon the cause of humanity, and the hypocritical name of non-intervention inadequately concealed the aid which we gave them and the oppressors of the Spanish people. From that point a direct road leads to the disgracefully fatal day of Munich, and to the world catastrophe of war. The Spanish Caudillo is as cruel a hangman of liberty and democracy as Hitler or Mussolini. To make common cause with him, to bolster his shaking pedestal by making treaties with him—the sworn enemy of our cause—to concede a position of neutrality to him, is equivalent to a confession before the world that we do not know what we want or that we know only too well that in secret we want the survival of fascism. . . .

G. BROMLEY OXNAM

I DESIRE the severance of all diplomatic relations with Franco Spain because I want to keep my faith, in myself and in what men are and may be. I do not want the hand of democracy made foul by clasping the hand of fascism. My sons wear the uniform of this country, one with the crossed rifles of an infantry officer and the other with the cross of a chaplain, and I am eager that they and their comrades may know that this nation fights fascism not alone of German brand but wherever it lifts its head. Let us, as a people and as a government, have done with the fascist.

I speak not only as a citizen, but also as a churchman. . . . I would not be true to myself if I did not add that whenever the church, in a blind endeavor to preserve its privileges and its property, makes common cause with fascism, allies itself with the great landlords and the military, it not only repudiates its Christ but deserves the wrath of the masses it has betrayed. In making this statement I do not mean to attack a particular church. It so happens it was the Roman Catholic church in Spain. In pre-revolutionary Russia it was the Greek church, whose voice was too often that of the Czar rather than of Christ. And if Protestant bodies anywhere become more interested in the maintenance of the institutions of religion than in permeating the community with the spirit of Christ and moving forward in those mighty endeavors that seek justice and the emancipation of men, then they will earn the rejection of the people, who know that the Kingdom of God cannot be built upon foundations of injustice.

WILLIAM L. SHIRER

I RECENTLY returned from a two months' stay in France. And I can give you this news: France, which along with Great Britain and ourselves shared such a terrible responsibility for the triumph of Franco, has changed. Frenchmen from De Gaulle on down, and including the vast majority of French Catholics, will do what they can to hasten the end of the Spanish dictator. They know that unless Britain and America intervene, Franco and his Spanish brand of fascism cannot survive the defeat of Nazism and fascism.

It was a very stirring thing to see this change in France. The other day I sat in the Consultative Assembly in Paris. It was a strange but magnificent scene. A speaker at the tribune was attacking Franco as a German stooge, which of course he always has been. And everyone in that assembly, including the conservative Catholics, and a French monk in a white robe, jumped to his feet and wildly applauded.

The people of Europe, I found, the overwhelming mass of them—the people who fought Germans at the risk of their necks and were tortured and murdered for their patriotism—are determined to have an end with fascism—everywhere. These people are stronger than you think, or than Mr. Churchill thinks, or at least thought before he flew to Greece the other day. After all, was it not Churchill who spoke that eloquent sentence, a sentence I would like to leave with you in closing: "There is no high explosive so powerful as the soul of a free people"?

That goes for all people and especially for the valiant people of Spain. They too—I hope with our help, but if that is not forthcoming, then without it—will be free again.

[Excerpts from speeches at the Madison Square Garden rally against Franco held on January 2 under the auspices of The Nation Associates and labor and civic organizations.]

South American Labor Front

WE DO not like to think that the end of this war or its sequel may be fought in the Western Hemisphere. We are slow, therefore, to become interested in Latin America, where fascism is now preparing to fight on a third front. Progressive elements in Latin America recognize the danger that confronts them and are mobilizing to meet it in the only way possible, by strengthening trade-union and democratic forces and by attacking the life line of Falangism at its source in Spain. One of the most vigorous groups in this effort is the Confederation of Latin American Workers, the C. T. A. L., which claims a membership of 5,000,000. Its Second General Congress was held in Cali, Colombia, last month. An A. P. reporter attended the sessions and filed thousands of words, but the United States press took almost no notice of this important inter-American event.

The C. T. A. L. Congress had four major objectives: the organization of a continental democratic barrier against the spread of fascism from Argentina, the organization of a united front of American workers preparatory to the World Trade Union Conference to be held in London next month, the development of a post-war program for American labor, and the formulation of policies for the participation of labor in Latin America's industrialization.

Delegates from fifteen Latin American countries, Great Britain, and the United States were present. Joseph Selly, president of the American Communications Association, and

O. A. Knight represented the C. I. O.; David Efron and Adolph Staal attended as International Labor Office observers; Arthur Horner was the fraternal delegate of the British Trades Union Congress. Several Colombian government officials attended the opening sessions, and a congratulatory message from President Lopez was read. From abroad came greetings from the National Committee of the French General Confederation of Labor and from the Central Council of Unions of the Soviet Union.

Lombardo Toledano, president of the C. T. A. L., delivered the keynote speech, in which he stressed the fact that the coming era is "the period of the Industrial Revolution in Latin America." "The hour of socialism," he declared, "has not arrived. This is the hour of real democracy for which Bolivar struggled and died. . . . In order to achieve our goal we need the cooperation of our brothers in the United States, and the United States also needs us. . . . The same is true of Canada." Lombardo's speech called attention to the no-strike pledge and to the danger of native reactionaries, who, he said, were far more formidable adversaries than "the democratic sector of the United States, which, on the contrary, desires with us the economic and cultural development of our countries."

It is interesting to note that leading industrialists of Cali gave a banquet to the delegates. And on several occasions Lombardo declared that many manufacturers favored a strong labor movement as a help in the effort toward industrialization. The strength and implications of this sudden entente between labor and industry in Latin America remain to be seen; a possible explanation is that it is part of a united front against foreign imperialism. A resolution on the post-war industrialization of Latin America adopted by the Congress specifically welcomed foreign capital under controlled conditions, including a guaranty of wage rates, contract rights, and the like.

Ten important resolutions were adopted on the Argentine situation; one called for a one-day protest strike against the present fascist regime. The strike is scheduled to take place in Latin American countries only. Action by the C. I. O., whose delegates were enthusiastically applauded by the congress, has not yet been announced.

Joseph Selly reports an incident that is ironical in view of the Colombian government's hospitable attitude toward the C. T. A. L. During the first days of the congress Colombian government censorship prevented the transmission of statements derogatory to Argentina. Selly himself tested this by trying to send a message denouncing the Farrell-Perón regime. After protest by the congress the ban was lifted.

The trade-union and progressive movements in Latin America, regarding the Catholic church as a bulwark of reaction, have long been associated with anti-clericalism. The resolution on the church is therefore inexplicable except in the light of the overtures Moscow has been making in the direction of the Vatican. The resolution states that the C. T. A. L. respects all religions, churches, and believers, that it finds "no incompatibility between religious belief and the struggle for individual and social progress," and that the churches must "pursue the ends for which they were created, which are spiritual and not political." After distinguishing between reactionary and pro-democratic clerical elements, the resolution specifically expresses the C. T. A. L.'s desire for the cooperation of the Catholic church with the organized labor movement—a desire which is the stuff that dreams are made of but not political realities.

Other resolutions demanded the rupture of relations with Franco Spain and support for the Supreme Junta of National Union. The congress called for the eventual reconstruction of Gran Colombia and the Central American Union, Puerto Rican independence, and the reestablishment of democracy in the Dominican Republic. It condemned racial discrimination, and urged the release of all political prisoners in the Americas, with special mention of Carlos Presees, still imprisoned in Brazil. A mild resolution on Brazil noted its cooperation in the war effort but called for greater internal democracy in the holding of elections.

The Industrial Revolution now developing sporadically in Latin America has skipped many of the early technical, social, and economic phases of capitalist evolution, most notably that of uncontrolled competition under free enterprise. Government controls have already been established in most Latin American countries and are likely to be strengthened. Whether they will contribute to the achievement of greater or less democracy depends largely on the strength and wisdom of the organized free labor movement. If the C. T. A. L. grows sufficiently in political foresight and power it can become the decisive factor in the struggle between fascism and democracy.

The C. T. A. L. has so far maintained a solid united front against fascism. Much of its top leadership is Communist; some is not. It has made important gains against reactionary forces, and for Latin American workers the issue is not, for the present, communism or fascism, but the survival of democratic institutions in the Americas. V. M.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

GERMAN domestic propaganda continues to make capital out of a serious mistake that crept into General Eisenhower's first proclamation to the German people. The proclamation contained the sentence, "We are not coming as liberators but as conquerors." Whether this offspring of the unconditional-surrender formula was politically useful is open to question, but quite aside from that, a catastrophic error was made in translating it, and it was the translation which the Germans read on posters and in dropped leaflets and heard on the air. The translator at Allied headquarters used the German word "Eroberer" for "conqueror." But while "to conquer" in English has two different meanings, in German each of these meanings is expressed by a special word. "To conquer" means either to win the victory or to acquire territory by subjugating it. "Erobern" has only the second meaning; the first is rendered by "siegen." The translator found in the dictionary two words for "conqueror": "Eroberer" and "Sieger." In all innocence he chose the first, which completely upset the sense of the proclamation. "We are coming as 'Eroberer'" was equivalent, for Germans, to an authoritative announcement by the Allies that they were entering the country with the intention and for the purpose of subjugating it and holding it permanently.

Such mistakes are human, and certainly this slip will not alter the course of the war. But we should not be surprised to see it turned to every possible use in the Reich. Day after day Germans are reminded, in one way or another, that "General Eisenhower has declared over his signature that he intends to 'erobern' our country." For example, in the campaign against collaborators with the Anglo-Americans all persons who accept office in the Allied zone have been threatened with vehmic murder. Objections seem to have been raised by the public—the Kölnische Zeitung printed a genuine or fictitious communication which protested: "You apply different standards. Belgian collaborationists were always welcomed by us. We arrested their opponents and executed their murderers. But German collaborationists in Eupen and Aachen are called traitors and their murderers are glorified. How is that?" The newspaper's answer was based not only on the fact that Belgium had capitulated while the Reich has no thought of doing so but also on Eisenhower's proclamation. "If we had acted as Eisenhower now does," it said, "we would probably not have found any collaborationists at all. For us Liège was an occupied town, whereas Eisenhower has authoritatively stated that Aachen is an 'eroberte' town."

Some details for those who in recent weeks, swinging from one extreme to the other, have gloomily foreseen no end to the German capacity for resistance:

1. In the coming year Germany will not have the large quantities of foodstuffs which it got from the occupied countries in 1944. Domestic production is also bound to fall off. The Deutsche Landwirtschaft for November 3 informed farmers that the amount of fertilizer furnished will be appreciably reduced. Only 25 per cent, at the maximum, of the nitrogen—the most important of the fertilizers—used in 1938 will be available. "And it is uncertain whether this reduced quantity can all be delivered in time." The situation with respect to labor and animals "will deteriorate farther."

2. In January, 1945, the seventy-first month of rationing, the German consumer will receive one egg. It is doubtful whether he will get even one in February. But on the January basis he would get 12 eggs a year. In the first year of war he was allowed 86, in the second 69, in the third 49, in the fourth 39, and in the fifth 24.

3. The scarcity of civilian supplies has become so desperate that the Münchener Neueste Nachrichten ran the following idyl in its November 13 issue:

In some restaurants guests are now requested to leave a deposit for their dinner cutlery. In others people must deposit their identification cards before getting knives and forks for their meals. Sometimes the issuance of these implements is combined with the checking of coats and hats; guests are given special tokens for which the waiter supplies the needed cutlery, which must be returned before the guest leaves.

"All travelers and persons who eat in restaurants," the newspaper went on to say, "are advised to carry with them not only a napkin but their own knife, fork, and spoon in order to spare themselves some unpleasant experiences."

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

INTRINSICALLY it is unfair to subject John Steinbeck's latest book, "Cannery Row" (Viking Press, $2), to the standards of serious (I do not mean unhumorous) literature, as unfair as it would be to judge glass jewelry, or what the department stores call simulated gems, by the standards that apply to precious stones. But the responsible critic, who is presumably jealous of the good name of art and whose function, if he has any at all, is to engender discrimination in the reading public, is forced to undertake the thankless exercise of demonstrating that "Cannery Row" is the chaff and not the wheat of literature because the book is being talked about as if it were, a priori, an authentic work of art.

Let it be said at the start that the subject of "Cannery Row"—the life and the attitude toward life of a group of ne'er-do-wells in California—seems to me a perfectly good subject for literature; and I don't think it's "too bad" that Steinbeck doesn't write about the war.

A good book, even a great book, could be fashioned from the materials Mr. Steinbeck has used. I say could be; I should say has been, by a writer named Mark Twain. For, unhappily for Mr. Steinbeck, this book reminds one of Mark Twain—as fake jewels remind one of real ones—if only because it is essentially a string of anecdotes, some of them tall tales, of the sort Mark Twain delighted in.

The writing, to begin with, is factitiously simple, after the fashion of the moment; it is at the same time highflown and flyblown, cheap, fancy, and false. Here are the first and the last two sentences of paragraph one:

Cannery Row in Monterey in California is a poem, a stink, a grating noise, a quality of light, a tone, a habit, a nostalgia, a dream. . . . Its inhabitants are, as the man once said, "whores, pimps, gamblers, and sons of bitches," by which he meant Everybody. Had the man looked through another peephole he might have said, "saints and angels and martyrs and holy men," and he would have meant the same thing.

The whole book is written in this daydream prose which devalizes everything it touches and has the same relation to the force of life, and of good writing, as the iridescent foam on the edge of a river has to the main current.

The paragraph also gives us a précis of Mr. Steinbeck's "philosophy"—which brings us to his characters. They include a bunch of "no-goods, come-to-bad-ends, blots-on-the-town, thieves, rascals, bums," to quote the author's all too imitable catalogue, a village idiot, a mysterious "Chinaman" who "carried a little cloud of fear about with him," the madam of a sporting house and her girls, who are, in the hoary tradition, good at heart—these and "Doc," the little father of the town who knows all, understands all, forgives all. His "face is half Christ and half satyr." He has "the hands of a brain surgeon, and a cool warm mind," whatever that may mean. He tips his hat to dogs and dogs "smile at him." He is, finally, "concupiscent as a rabbit and gentle as hell."

The first defect of these characters is not that they are "typed" but that Steinbeck endows them with no motive power of their own. They do not move but are moved about. Often he achieves a good imitation of the behavior and speech of bums and ne'er-do-wells—but at fatal moments the hand and voice of Steinbeck become all too apparent. As a result "Cannery Row" lacks reality—either the reality of a fairy tale, which can be devastating, or the reality of straight fiction.

The great defect grows out of Steinbeck's attitude toward the people he has chosen to portray. He professes to love them; he probably thinks he does. But his real attitude, except in the case of Doc, is nine parts condescension and one part sentimentality. In "Cannery Row" Mr. Steinbeck handles human beings as if they were a species of small animal life. They exist and have their being on the same level as the frogs and dogs, the cats and octopuses he is so fond of watching. Their "happiness" is that of insects, and his "love" for them is that of a collector. Conversely, and significantly, he humanizes frogs and dogs, cats and octopuses in a way that becomes at times repellent as well as embarrassing.

Steinbeck grants a certain equality in human terms to Doc, who collects animals for scientific purposes. Doc is patently, up to a point, Steinbeck. But as a character he is a miserable failure. In order to create a character who is a philosopher, a man of wisdom and compassion, it is surely necessary to be oneself really mature and endowed with wisdom and compassion. In Doc we get only substitutes for these qualities, and I mean literally substitutes, for when Steinbeck must show Doc moved by deep feeling, all we get is the news that Doc hears music and a description of the music; when he must communicate wisdom to his animal-children he produces "world sadness" among them by reading, at a party they give for him, a poem which we are told in a footnote is "Black Marigolds," translated from the Sanskrit by E. Powys Mathers!

Aside from its negative failures, "Cannery Row" also has its positive vices. If proof were needed that sentimentality and cruelty are the two sides of the same coin, it may be found in this book. The unpleasant pleasure with which Steinbeck describes the killing of a mouse by a cat, the "murder" of a crab by an octopus, the sadism of a small boy toward a smaller boy, is disturbing, to say the least. As for the vulgarity which is a by-product of sentimentality, it is all too manifest here. Steinbeck's maudlin celebration of the automobile leads him to speak of one of his characters as "the little mechanic of God," "the St. Francis of coils and armatures and gears." It also leads him to the "philosophical" statement that "two generations of Americans knew more about the Ford coil than the clitoris."

His social criticism in general is of this stripe. For "Cannery Row" has "social significance" of a curious kind. It seems to be written out of a violent hatred of modern life,

—it tells of America's stake in urgent world economic issues

The SINEWS of PEACE

By HERBERT FEIS

Here, as the experts agree, is a floodlighting of the problems in the economic realm with which we must come to grips, if peace is to be real and solid.

Sir Norman Angell says:

"Here is an admirable treatise, clear, balanced, deeply informed, unprejudiced, a veritable model in its field. . . . Mr. Feis' book is full of suggestive conclusions and aphorisms worth noting, particularly those which push home the point that economic problems cannot be considered in water-tight compartments; that they are inextricably related to political issues."

H. G. Gideonse of Freedom House says:

"It is political economy at its best, and it reflects Feis' extensive experience as a scholar and as a responsible officer in the State Department. I think it is an indispensable economic preface to Sumner Welles' The Time For Decision—these are the economic foundations without which the political plans will remain pretty blue prints."

The Book-of-the Month Club says:

"Mr. Feis' presentation and economics are sound and the book is written with great skill and in a non-technical vocabulary what he has to say is indispensable reading for all those who seek guidance on the economic future of America."

$2.50

ECONOMIC ORDER AND RELIGION

By FRANK H. KNIGHT

Professor of Social Sciences, University of Chicago and THORNTON W. MERRIAM

Director of USO Training, National Council, YMCA

Here for the first time are set forth the issues of the current controversy between the scientific humanists and the exponents of Christianity as to the ills of American capitalism and how to cure them. An ardent secularist and a protagonist of the religious outlook lock horns on what motives and methods shall actuate the improvement of America's economic order. $3.00 particularly of our money civilization. Mr. Steinbeck uses strong language on this score. "What can it profit a man to gain the whole world and to come to his property with a gastric ulcer, a blown prostate, and bifocals?" ". . . a generation of trapped, poisoned, and trussed-up men. . . ." He calls the parties given by professional hostesses "about as spontaneous as peristalsis and as interesting as its end product."

Hatred can be creative. Steinbeck's is not. And in the end it defeats itself. His picture of Monterey is certainly meant to be a protest against the futile busy-ness, the greed and ugliness of modern life. If he had captured the reality of Cannery Row, in fantasy or otherwise, it would have constituted a protest, and might have been far more hilarious than it is. What he has actually accomplished, by turning his characters into happy and inferior creatures who live in a non-existent Monterey, is an irrelevant and rather smug escape from modern life. Bankers will love it.

"Cannery Row" is a "simulated gem" which has neither intrinsic luster nor permanent worth. It would not be worth the space I have given it if it were not, along with many another of the same sort, being currently passed, and accepted, as the genuine article.

BRIEFER COMMENT

Dr. Ruml's Proposals

A NOTEWORTHY FEATURE of Dr. Beardsley Ruml's "Tomorrow's Business" (Farrar and Rinehart, $2.50) is its avoidance of the clichés and platitudes which drip from the pens of most business men—or their ghost writers—when they undertake the defense of private enterprise. This is not just a matter of style, for Dr. Ruml has done his own thinking and has produced an analysis of the structure and functions of business which is decidedly stimulating. Moreover, he is a man who realizes that business must justify itself by works as well as faith, who can discuss the question of the union shop without working himself into a lather, who has read and digested Keynes and Hansen, and who can contemplate an unbalanced budget with a calm calculated to shock the Wall Street Journal profoundly.

Business, argues Dr. Ruml, is a form of private government, one of the several private governments which, subject to the overriding authority of the state, direct the lives of all of us. It must be a rule-maker in order to carry out the business of business, which is to get things ready for use, to provide people with purposeful activity, and to employ savings productively. In making and enforcing its rules business sets a pattern for most people which restricts their freedom of choice, and as the author admits, if there is to be tolerable freedom for the governed under these circumstances, they must have the power to say "No," whether as vendors, customers, stockholders, or employees. It follows that freedom under private enterprise depends on both the absence of monopoly and the maintenance of approximately full employment. Dr. Ruml agrees that it is the job of the national government to insure both these conditions, and he urges a plan of fiscal reform and public works designed

Can you spare 10 hours to save 30 million lives including your own?

YOU CAN read this book in about ten hours. Can you spare that much time to prevent the death of your son or grandson a few years from today? Have you the time to save thirty million lives, including your own? That is what another world war would cost in lives alone.

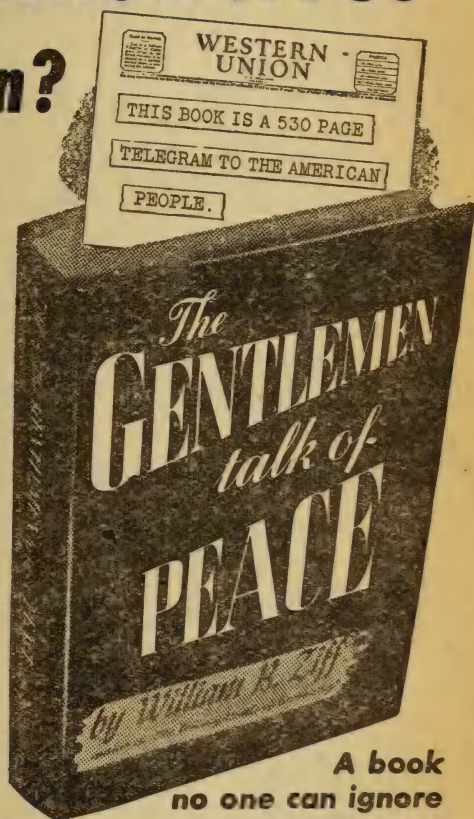

This is a big book because it deals with a big subject—but every word in it has the impact and urgency of a telegram. It is an eleventh-hour appeal to sanity and action. You will be shocked and shaken by parts of it. It takes you behind the wall of secrecy which hides the ideas that prompt the actions of the gentlemen who talk of peace. You will watch, fascinated, as the author reveals the secret and overt hatreds, ideologies, traditions, cultures and ambitions of the warring and victimized nations. And you will begin to see—what has never before been made so clear—where each one of these nations stands at this crucial moment in history . . . and, more important, where each plans to go.

This is a fighting book about peace. It is a smashing indictment of the international intrigue which is said to be preparing the way for another world war. It was written in white heat. Here are no soft words, no double talk, no moralizing, no twisting of facts to fit a scheme. Here is a brutally honest picture of the forces at work in the world today and a timely warning of the danger they spell for those who must remake the world tomorrow.

The author's solution to the world's dilemma is drastic and controversial. But the facts he presents cry out for swift and violent action. Those who have read Mr. Ziff's previous best-seller The Coming Battle of Germany know that he writes beautifully, with power and passion . . . documenting his findings with devastating precision. The Gentlemen Talk of Peace is his best and most important book. 530 pages, indexed, $3.

William B. Ziff

William Bernard Ziff is a distinguished military historian and authority on international affairs, whose views are highly regarded in official Washington. He is the author of THE COMING BATTLE OF GERMANY, an outstanding best seller of 1942.

A book
no one can ignore

SAY THE REVIEWERS

N. Y. TIMES BOOK REVIEW: "An important book . . . packed with crucial facts and thought-provoking insights."

STERLING NORTH: "Beautifully written, well organized, rich in research, hard hitting."—Washington Post

BOSTON HERALD TRAVELER: "A picture of the world that for sheer realism has few equals."

PHILADELPHIA INQUIRER: "Bold and original attack on the way our world is being betrayed by the gentlemen who talk of peace."

WASHINGTON STAR: "No other volume approaches the detailed picture it presents of the world today and the problems that vex it."

N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE BOOK REVIEW: "The hell fire with which he threatens us has a frightening resemblance to the foreseeable future."

ZIFF-DAVIS PUBLISHING COMPANY

NEW YORK - CHICAGO Canadian Distributors: AMBASSADOR BOOKS, LTD., TORONTO

to provide an adequate flow of purchasing power. It is impossible to summarize these proposals here. In so far as they provide for the abolition of regressive taxes and for a planned, continuous public-works program which would enable the construction industries to be reorganized on a stable basis, they are to be commended. But I question whether they would suffice to curb the tendency of purchasing power to pass from the weak to the strong, from the spenders to the over-savers, a tendency which Dr. Ruml recognizes as one of the gravest threats to the equilibrium of a capitalist economy.

KEITH HUTCHISON

A Lesson From 1918

THE CHAPTER OF WORLD HISTORY described in "Armistice 1918," by Harry R. Rudin (Yale, $5), is more timely today than ever. The author does not discuss what might or should have been done, but tells the story of what was done. Mr. Rudin's account makes conscientious use of the available sources; it is non-partisan and factual and unbiased by popular myths. His story is informative and pertinent to the problems of the present.

There is nothing in the story of "Armistice 1918" to justify the theory that the granting of a premature armistice caused the developments leading to 1933 and 1939. The armistice very definitely took from the Germans the ability to continue the First World War, leaving everything else open. The phrase "unconditional surrender" was not used.

But the conditions of the armistice were sufficient to enable the Allies to create the kind of peace they desired or were able to agree upon. The way this opportunity was used is another story.

Mr. Rudin interprets the effect of Wilson's Fourteen Points on Germany. He shows that the decisive success of the Fourteen Points was to cause Ludendorff to make a great mistake. Ludendorff hoped, after the fiasco of his last offensive in July, 1918, that it might be possible to gain a breathing spell or to escape the consequences of defeat by exploiting Wilson's idealism. Captivated by this idea, Ludendorff forced the Chancellor, Prince Max von Baden, to appeal to Wilson. By his pressure on the Chancellor, Ludendorff actually set in motion the mechanism by which in the course of a few weeks the German will to fight was broken. The discussions, the hopes, and the doubts aroused by the appeal to Wilson strongly contributed to rendering a German "last stand" psychologically impossible. Wilson succeeded at least in speeding the end of this one war. Readers of Mr. Rudin's book will have reason to doubt whether the slogan of "unconditional surrender" would have succeeded as well.

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN

Theater Yearbooks

FUTURE HISTORIANS of the stage are going to bless Burns Mantle for his annual "Best Plays" volume, which contains, in addition to abbreviated versions of ten plays, what is probably the most useful compendium of information about a theatrical year ever regularly compiled for any time or any country. The new volume, called now "The Best Plays of 1943-44 and the Year Book of the Drama in America" (Dodd, Mead, $3), finds the editor rather hard pressed to discover "ten best" that are also "ten good" plays, but the information supplied concerning the whole season is as full and as well arranged as ever. George Jean Nathan's "The Theater Book of the Year, 1943-44" (Knopf, $3) is the second annual issue of a volume rather more different from Mr. Mantle's than the title might indicate. There are no statistics, but to every play produced during the season Mr. Nathan gives from a page to several pages of comment in his own highly personal style instead of the mere summary of the plot to which Mr. Mantle, as annalist rather than critic, limits himself. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

To Baudelaire via Allen Tate

THE NEO-RELIGIONISTS have reached Baudelaire. Joseph D. Bennett's argument in his "Baudelaire. A Criticism" (Princeton, $2) is that Baudelaire is persona grata because in an age of optimism he reasserted the existence of the devil and because, though at the very end, he accepted even the positive side of Catholicism. The argument is based upon two interesting and symptomatic false assumptions: first, that such a reassertion was unique, or almost unique, in the nineteenth century; second, that only Catholics take a realistic view of human nature. The two assumptions combine to prevent Mr. Bennett from hearing what writers of the period, except for a handful of positivists, actually did say; and even the positivists he does not follow to the point it is more than ever vital for you to read

TODAY

Sumner Welles'

THE TIME FOR DECISION

Today, with each new triumph of Allied arms, new dangers flare to threaten the world's peace. Today, as never before, we desperately need a clear purpose strongly held by all the people of the United States. Today's events bear witness to the strength and wisdom of the Welles book. Read it now.

At all bookstores • $3.00

HARPER & BROTHERS

where, like himself, they so often turned to religion. To Mr. Bennett the life of Nietzsche is only an attempt "to incarnate a demon." Baudelaire's attack on the idea of natural goodness he calls an "exposure of modern romantic ethical beliefs"; yet precisely such an attack is the stock procedure of romanticists from Novalis and Stendhal to Strindberg and Stefan George. Mr. Bennett's assault upon the nineteenth century is all too much in the nineteenth-century tradition.

The bad history and jejune philosophy are, however, largely confined to the first thirty and the last dozen pages of Mr. Bennett's 165-page book. The body of the text contains the close and dialectical analysis of poems from "Fleurs du Mal" that has long been needed. Alike in a deficiency of relevant historical information and in a keenness of intellect trained upon ironies and ambiguities, the analysis is the first important "new criticism" of Baudelaire. Some will say that the reader's opinion of the book as a whole will depend on his opinion of Allen Tate's school of criticism. For my part I admire Tate himself for his own special abilities; at least he stands in direct relation to the work criticized. The epigone is different. The perceptions of the master he degrades to the rank of formulas, and he sees not the object but the formulas. Mr. Bennett is looking for Baudelaire; but in his path stands the redoubtable editor of the Sewanee Review.

ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY

Isolationism and War

IF THE PROSPECTIVE READER doesn't take its title too seriously he will find "An Intelligent American's Guide to the Peace (Dryden Press, $3.75), which was compiled under the general editorship of Sumner Welles, extremely useful. Mr. Welles also contributes the introduction. This comprehensive handbook of the nations of the world is really a guide to the causes of World War II rather than a guide to the peace. Its purpose, as Sumner Welles states in the introduction, is to help "the average citizen . . . obtain . . . some of the basic and factual information which he will require in order to understand the major problems" we must face. To this end a section is devoted to each independent nation and each major dependent people in the world. In addition to the information contained in any good handbook—facts about the people of each country, its land, industries, natural resources, and cultural development—this book provides an interpretative sketch of each country's history between the two wars. It is these historical sketches that make the book "an intelligent American's guide," for they are extraordinarily informative. They show how in the interval between wars each country, great and small, pitted its individual resources against the powerful world forces that were making for war. While different countries adopted different expedients in the vain search for security, all were infected with the deadly germ of isolationism, in one form or another. The end, in nearly every case, was war, and in many instances it was destruction. A final paragraph in each section is devoted to a realistic consideration of the given country's stakes in the peace, showing that after the war each will face problems that can only be solved through effective international cooperation.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

MOTION PICTURES

"BEST OF THE WAR!"—Walter Winchell

THE FIGHTING LADY

With Lt. Robert Taylor as narrator

A Louis de Rochemont production

Released by 20th Century-Fox

Now
Playing

VICTORIA

B'way at 46th Street

"One of the Best That We Shall See This Year"
—Crowther, N. Y. Times.

TWO CITIES FILMS presents

MR. EMMANUEL

starring FELIX AYLMER

with GRETA GYNT and WALTER RILLA

Brandt's GOTHAM B'way and 47th St.

"One of Hollywood's finest achievements!" . . .
Rose Pelwick, N. Y. Journal-American

Twentieth Century-Fox
presents

A. J. CRONIN'S

THE KEYS OF THE KINGDOM

Directed by JOHN M. STAHL

Produced by JOSEPH L. MANKIEWICZ

Now Playing RIVOLI B'way at 49th St.

20th CENTURY-FOX PRESENTS

MOSS HART'S WINGED VICTORY

Produced by DARRYL F. ZANUCK

Directed by GEORGE CUKOR

NOW PLAYING ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD presents
BORRY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SMITH

SONGS BY COLE PORTER

MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Matinee Wednesday and Saturday 2:30

Films

JAMES
AGEE

IF YOU compare the moving pictures released during a given period with the books published during the same period—or with the plays produced or the pictures painted or the music composed—you may or may not be surprised to find that they stand up rather well. I can think of very few contemporary books that are worth the jackets they are wrapped in; I can think of very few movies, contemporary or otherwise, which fail to show that somebody who has worked on them, in front of the camera or in any one of many places behind it, has real life or energy or intensity or intelligence or talent.

But you have only to compare the best of last year's films with the best that have been made or in your conception could be made, and the best that have been made with the best work you have known in any other art you choose, to know that those who make or care for moving pictures have great reason to be angry, for all that is frustrated, and still greater reason to be humble, for all that is fallen short of, frustration or no. And if you foresee how few years remain before the grandest prospect for a major popular art since Shakespeare's time dissolves into the ghastly gelatinous Nirvana of television, I think you will find the work of this last or any recent year, and the chance of any sufficiently radical improvement within the tragically short future, enough to shrivel the heart. If moving pictures are ever going to realize their potentialities, they are going to have to do it very soon indeed. Aware of that, and aware also of the works of genius which have already been achieved in films, I have no patience with the patient and patronizing who remind us mellowly that it took centuries to evolve an Aeschylus or a Joyce.

The sickening thing is that nearly everything that has virtue or hope at all is lukewarm or worse. We are learning better and better all the time, for instance, how to make films beautifully, elegantly, patiently, perfectly—so long as nobody severely questions the nature of the beauty, the quality of the elegance, the focus and result of the patience, the meaning and value of the perfection. In this sense I suppose "The Song of Bernadette" is a nearly perfect picture. I would about as soon see all that kind of skill and devotion used in embroidering the complete text of the Solemnization of Matrimony on a pair of nylon drawers. It is as if all the power and resource of the English language were to culminate in the prose of Donald Culross Peattie.

This suffocating genteelism, this suicidal love for and pride in the utterly controlled and utterly worthless effect, has become as grim a threat to movies as the rankest commercialism that could ever be reputed of Hollywood. Needless, perhaps, to add, it is the one aesthetic logically available to the commercial mind; such minds can hardly be blamed for indorsing a kind of beauty they genuinely care for, to the detriment of kinds they have to accept or indorse, if at all, on faith.

Or consider "With the Marines at Tarawa," the best of the four or five film records of war which I consider the best films of the year. I profoundly respect their craftsmanship, which is not only good but well used, and their good taste. And I grant that short of a tremendously forceful, daring, and sure creative intelligence, craftsmanship and taste are the best available two hands with which to work at such material. Yet it seems a sorry year in which decent grammar and a modest sense of one's subject, honorable as these are, have earned higher honor than any other achievement.

The best fiction films of the year, "The Curse of the Cat People" and "Youth Runs Wild," were made by Val Lewton and his associates. I esteem them so highly because for all their unevenness their achievements are so consistently alive, limber, poetic, humane, so eager toward the possibilities of the screen, and so resolutely against the grain of all we have learned to expect from the big studios. But I am afraid there is no reason to believe that the makers of these films, under the best of circumstances, would be equipped to make the great, and probably very vulgar, and certainly very forceful revolutionary pictures that are so desperately needed. Indeed, I suspect that their rather gentle, pleasing, resourceful kind of talent is about the strongest sort we can hope to see working in Hollywood with any consistent, useful purity of purpose; and the pictures themselves indicate to what extent that is frustrated.

If only a half-dozen properly placed men in Hollywood realized and knew how to apply the lessons in "Going My Way," they might be assured of almost any number of hits, and we might be assured of an equal number of more or less good films. The lessons, if I read them right, are that leisureliness can be excellent, that if you take a genuine delight in character the universe is opened to you, and perhaps above all that a movie, like any other work of art, must be made for love. But I am ready to bet that the chief discernible result, if any, of "Going My Way" will be an anxiety-ridden set of vaudeville sketches about Pat and Mike in cassocks; and on that bet, with enough takers, I could set up a studio of my own.

It seems to me that when an intelligent director and an intelligent boss work smoothly together, you can expect

Readers of the NATION are cordially invited to

THE FORTIETH ANNIVERSARY DINNER

of the

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY

Saturday Evening, FEBRUARY 3, 1945, at 6:30 P. M.

Grand Ballroom, Roosevelt Hotel, N. Y. City

Subject: "The Battle Ahead for Industrial Democracy"

Speakers: UPTON SINCLAIR, Pulitzer Prize Winner
ARTHUR CREECH JONES, British Labor M. P.
FRANK SCOTT, Chairman, Canadian C.C.F.

Greetings and Brief Remarks by:

Newbold Morris	Adolph Held	Theresa Wolfson
Hon. Jerry Voorhis	John L. Childs	Norman Thomas
Fannie Hurst	Freda Kirchwey	Wallace J. Campbell
Julius Hochman	Harry A. Overstreet	John Paul Jones
George Baldanzi	Paul R. Porter	And Others
Charles G. Bolte

Presentation to

HARRY W. LAIDLER, Executive Director, L.I.D.

MARK STARR, President of L.I.D., Chairman

Tickets at $5.00 a place should be ordered immediately from
LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
112 East 19th Street New York City

pictures like "Double Indemnity." It is a neat picture, and it brings back into movies a lot of acid things which ought to be there. But it brings no new ones, and it does not handle the old ones, I would say, with any notable ingenuity or interest in taking a risk. Rather, it is strictly expert—a good thing of itself perhaps; but it looks to me as if the expertness were always as sharply controlled by what is dead sure at the box-office as by what is right. I imagine that in this limited sense we can hope for more from Billy Wilder, in the immediate future, than from anybody else around.

But is it anywhere near enough? I feel more hope, on the whole, in the climate of such a studio as Metro, which gave us last year the very generous and pretty "Meet Me in St. Louis" and the very likably earnest, dogged "30 Seconds Over Tokyo." But I would hardly say that either of these films gave me any hope that next year, or the year after, their makers might bring out one that you could never forget; indeed, both were rich in guaranties that nothing of the sort will happen.

As for the films of Preston Sturges, which are of course among the best and most gifted of the year, I will be more at rest in my liking for them when I am thoroughly convinced that Sturges is not rejecting half his talents; or that there is nothing on earth he is temperamentally able to do about it. I will probably always like the films of David Selznick better than reputedly condescending aesthetes like me are allowed to like such things; for I think that more than most things that come out of Hollywood they show both genuine talent, a distinct from mere professionalism, and a genuine love for movies, as distinct from mere executive concentration on them. But I am afraid they also show, and probably always will, an equally genuine love for commercial success, and a weakness for emotional and aesthetic and philosophical attitudes which belong, if anywhere, to soap opera.

In some respects I admire Arthur Ripley more than anyone else who released a picture during the past year—for his "Voice in the Wind," which was made relatively far outside the mill, on very little money, in very little time. His film showed an unequivocal and reckless passion for saying the best things possible in the best way possible. In nearly every other respect, I must admit, I thought it poor. But it is only in that kind of passion and disinterestedness, joined with adequate talent, that I see any hope. Name five men who have or have ever had it, and their position in Hollywood. And try to conceive what difficulties they would encounter, in raising the capital, in making the films, in getting them distributed, if they or any men of their order tried to do the work outside.

When an art is in good health, mediocrity and amorphous energy and commercialism and hostility toward disinterested men become more than forgivable, as lubricants and as stimulants, and the men of skill, or of affable or gentle or charming or for that matter venal talent, are more than welcome to exist, and to be liked and rewarded. When an art is sick unto death, only men of the most murderous creative passion can hope to save it. In either condition it is generally, if by no means always, this dangerous sort of man who does the great work. I wonder whether it is any longer possible, anywhere on earth, for such a man to work in films. I am almost certain it is not possible, and is not ever going to be, in this country.

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

CAPTAIN JOHN PATRICK'S "The Hasty Heart" (Hudson Theater) turns out to be something of a tour de force. The entire action takes place in a convalescent ward behind the Burma front. There are no civilians in anyway concerned, and only one woman—the ward nurse—appears upon the scene. Yet the play is only by the accident of time and place a play about the war, and what happens could be told in so few words as to leave one wondering just how the material can be made to fill an evening. Yet the interest never really lags, and it seems to be sustained less by the atmosphere upon which it must to some extent depend than by the spiritual history of the one queer character around whom everything turns. Moreover, this central character is a young Scot who manages to unite in himself all the traditional Scotch characteristics and to cultivate them to so preposterous a degree that he might seem at first sight the hero of a burlesque rather than the hero of a play which is tragic at its best, and at least pathetic at those moments when it approaches closest to the sentimentality which it manages usually to escape.

This hero, Lachlen by name and "Lachy" to those who befriend him against his will, is a young member of a Highland regiment who has had one kidney removed as the result of a wound and who does not know that he will die in a few weeks because the remaining kidney is diseased. A kindly surgeon tells the secret to the mixed company of a convalescent ward into which Lachlen is sent, and they try to take him into their company. But Lachlen is suspicious, uncompromising, dour, and defiant to an almost insane degree. He will keep his own and he will give nothing. He wants no help from anyone and he will help none. The gift of a cigarette, a kind word even, seems to him an obligation, and he will be obligated to no man. He wants his own property and his own rights, but he wants no favors and no friendship. Because they know his secret and suspect that hardship and suffering explain his defiance, his companions turn first one cheek and then the other. They even buy for his birthday a kilt and its accoutrements—none of which he has ever owned because they are extras which the members of his regiment must pay for if they want them. Finally Lachlen melts. For the first time in his life he believes that disinterestedness is possible. He falls in love with the nurse; he distributes cigarettes to his buddies. But the surgeon, acting upon orders, is compelled to tell him that he is about to die. He realizes then that he has been pitied, he reverts to lonely fury, and he denounces the whole company. This is too much for even their goodness. They tell him what they really think of his character, his disposition, and his habits. But it is just such plain speaking as this that he understands. He hesitates; he asks them to take him back. And as the curtain falls he takes his place in the group which is having its picture snapped by the friendly nurse.

I have called the play a tour de force for the simple reason that it is more effective than sober thought convinces me it ought to be, because I cannot escape the conviction that it has been somehow "put across." I have some difficulty in really believing either that any man could be quite so dour or, at least, that if any man ever were he could be so converted. Three changes of heart so catastrophic as these and all within a few days are difficult to credit, and even if they are accepted they can be accepted only on the supposition that Lachlen is too extraordinary a freak not to be at most a pathetic oddity rather than a tragic hero. Moreover, I somewhat resent so violent an assault upon my capacity for response to sentimental appeals, even when, as is here the case, there is a good deal of humor to relieve the sentiment. But I must nevertheless admit that "The Hasty Heart" is put across, whether it should be or not. For one thing there is an extraordinary performance by Richard Basenhart (formerly the young Nazi of "Counter-Attack"). For another, besides very smooth performances by the rest of the cast, there is careful writing and very careful direction. But the whole thing does seem a bit gratuitous. Why should we need to feel so much about so unusual a character imagined in so unusual a predicament?

Art Notes

A SUPERB EXHIBITION of Degas's bronzes, drawings, and pastels at the Buchholz Gallery (through January 27) asserts him to have been a great sculptor. However that may be, the charcoal and pastels surrounding his bronze pieces show that he was an incomparably greater draftsman. His marvelous line, not sharp but deep, cuts volumes out of flat picture space instead of out of gathering shadows; yet at the same time it cuts back into the infinity into which all the possible contours of a volume can be multiplied. His bronzes, on the other hand, depend just a little too much on the spectator's finding the right point of vantage—in other words, his sculpture reveals fewer contours than his drawings.

Richard Pousette-Dart, a young painter being shown at the Willard Gallery (through January 27), displays considerable promise. Working away from an ornamental, too heavily elaborated style, pushed along by the kindred influence of Jackson Pollock and that—strangely enough—of Mark Tobey, he tries for boldness, breadth, and the monumental. He has not attained them yet; he is still too graceful, but he is traveling in the right direction. American painting is much in need of all three qualities, and it is significant that Pollock, who manifests all three, has already begun to exert an influence, though he has been before the public hardly more than a year. C. G.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IN C. E. Montague's "A Hind Let Loose" one of the characters reflects on the nature and pleasure of real writing—which is not "to fit word on thought—no; to say this made two things of them—but to hold the thought, to force it up and up the scale of clarity to where it and some unsought word rushed together and a new thing came to life." He is led to this reflection by a piece of writing that had not been produced in that way. It had begun as an imaginary newspaper concert review: "Descanting . . . on the ways of the musical critics . . . Fay had said that a notice as written by any of them would apply just as well, and no better, to any one concert than to any other; more—he had spouted . . . a typical, universal concert-notice, true of all concerts past, present and to be, with unprejudiced blanks duly left for the names of any performers whatever." And suddenly faced with the need of a review of an exhibition of paintings he had not seen, Fay had filled the blanks with the names of the painters, and the meaningless statements had become a typical, universal art-notice. Thus, "Mr. Portland has a talent—we use the word advisedly—to which it is only too easy to do less than justice. He may, as some think, have not yet compassed the whole ascent from the mood of graceful prose to that of serene and elevated poetic feeling. But at least it is something to have the ground clear and unquestionably fertile, for the seeds of future breadth and resolution."

I was reminded of this the other day by a real-life example of the meaningless jargon of newspaper concert-reviewing. "Mr. Breisach," wrote Olin Downes after a performance of "The Magic Flute," "gave a musicianly and generally meritorious reading of the score. It is not to be concluded that if he continued to interpret this score he will necessarily fail to confer upon it more of the tension, fantasy, and sparkle that permeate the miraculous composition." As for the practice of writing about what one hasn't heard, the example occurs to me of a statement that Beecham's recorded performance of Mozart's Symphony K.201 was a transitional one in the direction of his "more recent performances" of the work—performances which the writer had not heard for the simple reason that Beecham had not given them. This was an example of the critic's being able to make points about invented material that he would not be able to make about fact; and some of Virgil Thomson's reviews and articles are further examples of this on a more elaborate scale and of course a much higher critical level. Thomson himself invents the data that he works up into the elaborate constructions of thought about Schnabel's playing of Beethoven or about Toscanini's playing of almost anything or about the way the great American orchestras came about and function, which he would not be able to work up out of what Schnabel or Toscanini or the orchestras actually do; on a lower level there is the common store of invented material on every subject, out of which writers go on producing their annual article on the problem of American music or the state of opera in America that they would not be able to produce out of the mere facts of those subjects.

By ignoring such fact—that lovers of serious music in this country show the same interest in opera, when they have the opportunity to hear it, as lovers of serious music in Europe, but that they don't have the Europeans' widespread opportunities to hear it because opera is too expensive to pay for itself and doesn't receive the government subsidies in this country which keep it going everywhere in Europe—writers can go on writing about opera not having taken root in this country and why; because it is given in foreign languages which prevent people from understanding it, or because its librettos are poor drama, or because old-fashioned staging converts it into musty museum-pieces with no appeal to minds of our own day. I have in the past pointed out that one sees opera-goers in Vienna reading librettos; and that one goes to the opera not for the drama of "Norma" or "Aida" but for the music into which that drama is translated. Let me now say something about staging.

I once attended a performance of "Lucia" by the Milan Scala company which was made extremely effective and moving first of all by the respect and love with which Toscanini treated every phrase of the music, and secondly by

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.

MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. ♦♦ 29 LANGUAGES

Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration

LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE
81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

the similar respect and love that were evident in the staging. This did not reconstruct "Lucia" in the way the Moscow Art Theater Musical Studio reconstructed "Carmen," nor produce it in a "modern" style like that of Meyerhold; it gave validity to the work's own style and conventions, and in this way gave the opera the value it could have for a modern audience. It is this attitude of respect for their essential quality, and loving care in its achievement, that "Lucia" and other operatic classics need; it is this that the minds of today need, insofar as they need such classics. It is this, moreover, that one may ask of an institution like the Metropolitan; and one is then asking it to perform the function of a museum; but that is the Metropolitan's proper function in relation to a work like "Lucia." A museum piece—whether it is a painting of Constable, a novel of Jane Austen, or an opera of Donizetti—is capable of affecting us by its qualities as a work of art; and what in each instance performs the function of a museum makes it possible for us to be affected. What we may object to is not to the performing of the function, but to its being performed badly—to the painting being obscured by grime or poor hanging, the novel being published with errors or cuts, the opera being badly sung or staged in a way that makes no sense. And for the function to be performed well Jane Austen doesn't need to be rewritten in the style of Hemingway, Constable doesn't need to be repainted in the style of Picasso, and Donizetti doesn't need to be produced in the style of Meyerhold. To say, as some do, that the style of Meyerhold is necessary to interest Americans in opera is to say that opera itself has nothing to interest Americans—which is true only of some Americans; and then it may follow that we must do something with those Americans, but not that we must do things to opera.

CONTRIBUTORS

SIDNEY HOOK is chairman of the Department of Philosophy at New York University. Among his books are "Reason, Social Myths, and Democracy" and "The Hero in History."

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN was for many years managing editor of the Tagebuch in Berlin and later became editor-in-chief of the Pariser Tageblatt.

ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY is the author of "A Century of Hero Worship."

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

A Soldier Wonders

Dear Sirs: A response like the following, sent to me by a technical sergeant stationed in Europe after I had mailed him a bundle of Nations, should help to confirm you and all of us in our determination to fight for a decent post-war world:

I received a package of Nations from you this week and it did my heart good to see them. I haven't seen one for at least a year. . . . I can only see this war as one in a series which will bring all of Europe and possibly America in ruins—spiritually and materially. The Germans have lost this war but the game will go on. I feel frustrated and helpless about it. Can I ever have time any more—or can mankind ever have time again—to do the worth-while things? I hope I don't sound too gloomy, but because of well-known events—Greece, etc.—and yet others less well known it is hard to be cheerful. The foundations for World War III have been laid.

LEE ELBERT HOLT

Williamstown, Mass., December 30

For Massachusetts Readers

Dear Sirs: You will be glad to hear that an organization affiliated with the National Citizens Political Action Committee is in the process of forming in Massachusetts.

We intend that this organization shall act aggressively on international, national, and local legislation and candidates, striving consistently for the extension of political, economic, and social democracy in this country and for the development of an effectively implemented world cooperation for peace and security.

May we extend, through your publication, an invitation to all liberal Massachusetts individuals and groups to get in touch with our headquarters at Room 822, 294 Washington Street, Boston, Massachusetts, so that they may join with us in organizing for effective action.

CATHERINE J. WITTON, Secretary

Boston, Mass., December 15

Racism and Vansittart

Dear Sirs: It is the reviewer's privilege to disagree, but he should not distort. In my book, "The Tyrants' War and the People's Peace," reviewed by Rustem Vambery in The Nation of December 16, I did not base my claim that Vansittartism is racism in reverse merely upon the use of the word "race." I added: "As long as it is claimed that for two thousand years the Germans did exhibit the same qualities—the Brazen Horde has not changed down the Ages" [a quotation from Vansittart]—there is a theory behind it. No theory which will cover such a case has yet been advanced except Hitler's 'racial theory' (p. 21). In my interpretation I was preceded by certain writers whose knowledge of English terminology Mr. Vambery, I am sure, will not wish to challenge. Thus the author of an article entitled The Rise of Brutality, published in the Economist of December 27, 1941, states that "this gifted pamphleteer [meaning Vansittart] was able, in the fear and uncertainty of last summer, to canalize resentment into the easy channel of a racial myth. The Germans are to be for the British what the Jews are for Germany. . . ."

As for the statement, with which Mr. Vambery took issue, that before 1933 the Jews of Central Europe looked to Germany for a chance, I made it very clear that I was merely quoting "a young Hungarian Jewish scholar, who is now teaching in the United States." If evidence is needed, this gentleman will no doubt be glad to provide it.

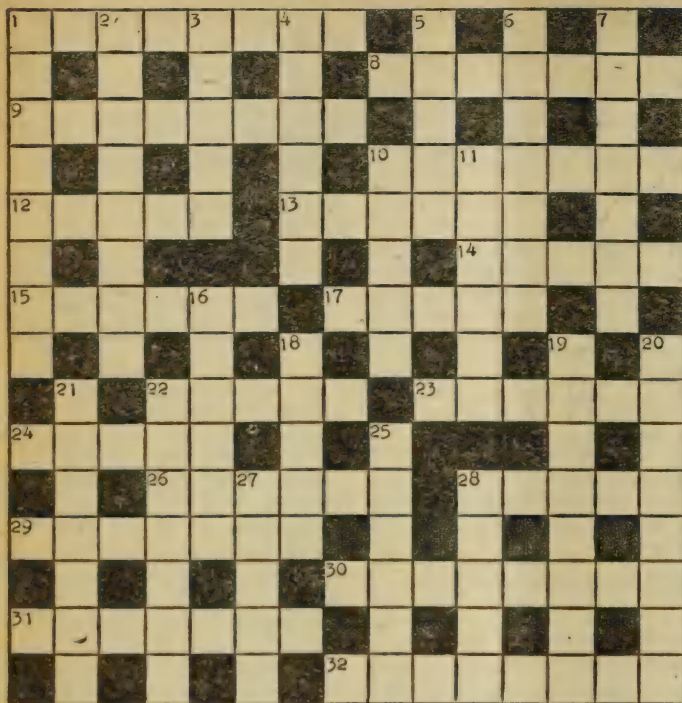

Mr. Vambery absolutely distorts what I said about the concept of the "master-race" (pp. 234-35). That the Nazis believe themselves to be a master-race I never did—nor ever will—deny. I did—and do—deny, however, that the common people of Germany regard themselves as a master-race. I mentioned the Nazis' failure to preach the master-race doctrine in campaign meetings as a tacit admission that the people would not swallow such stuff.

When I discussed the insufficiency of the republican leaders (p. 99) I also referred to what I consider the major cause—namely, a system of proportional representation which was not even devised to produce leadership. The conclusion would seem to be that if you eliminate the cause you eliminate the effect. Mr. Vambery, by referring to what I said about one aspect of the matter and ignoring the other, again distorts my argument.

At no place in my book did I charge that Lord Vansittart had anything to do with Mr. Kaufman's proposal to sterilize—not "castrate," as Mr. Vambery says—all German males.

Crossword Puzzle No. 99

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Gratification which makes an alibi certain
- 8 A fresh horse—at least the rider hopes it is!
- 9 Mounds of communal activity which are just made to order for ant-eaters (two words, 3 and 5)
- 10 Sullivan and he fought on several occasions
- 12 "The sweet simplicity of the ----- per cents" (Disraeli)
- 13 A man can usually just keep his head above this
- 14 Speech of the common man of Scotland
- 15 Ran with a Portuguese gentleman in aimless fashion
- 17 It is in a quiver before it is shot
- 22 Sort of speeches soapbox orators make
- 23 One must be a better man than him, said H. G. Wells, or what's the good of successive generations?
- 24 Such a matter is not of national importance
- 26 Sort of shooting-star
- 28 Can denim be this? Depends on how you look at it
- 29 Kicked upstairs
- 30 Simonides called it silent poetry
- 31 A fable
- 32 Why should this part-song make a girl mad?

DOWN

- 1 It doesn't accompany the singing in church
- 2 Green tin (anag.)

- 3 The animal has twisted a sinew
- 4 Widow
- 5 Give him his due (he'll get it anyway)
- 6 He doesn't require much head room
- 7 Go on board
- 10 Nothing so expensive as this, according to one writer
- 11 Europe's largest lake
- 16 A means of escape
- 18 Don't, Edwin, let them be discovered here (hidden)
- 19 Hunting's diverting
- 20 Not one of the deserving poor
- 21 Gang leader
- 22 Boiler of Russian design
- 25 The fleet is involved in a drama
- 27 American electrical inventor associated with Edison
- 28 House of lords

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 98

ACROSS:—1 TOTEM; 6 PEACE; 9 ALABAMA; 10 RAPID; 11 YEAST; 12 RANGERS; 16 HASSAN; 19 EASTER; 22 ASCENDANT; 23 ROOT; 24 RUTH; 25 CHOCOLATE; 26 BATH; 27 WEED; 28 ELIMINATE; 31 GOBELT; 33 IODATE; 36 TEARING; 37 FLASH; 40 GLOBE; 41 ANIMATE; 42 SHELL; 43 DOTTY.

DOWN:—1 TORCH; 2 TYPES; 3 MADRAS; 4 YARN; 5 VANE; 6 PAYSAN; 7 APART; 8 ENTER; 13 ANCHORITE; 14 GONDOLIER; 15 READ AGAIN; 17 AVOCADO; 18 SATCHEL; 20 STREWED; 21 ENTREAT; 29 LETHAL; 30 TOGGED; 31 GIFTS; 32 BRAKE; 34 ALOFT; 35 EVERY; 37 AXIS; 38 IVAN.

Let me add in conclusion that it is a strange thing indeed to call someone a German nationalist because he advocates a democratic Germany within the framework of a democratic federation of Europe, which in turn is to be integrated with a system of international democracy, commonly known as "collective security."

FERDINAND A. HERMENS

South Bend, Ind., December 31

Not Convinced

Dear Sirs: Two wrongs do not make a right. Both Mr. Hermens and the Economist together are less competent to decide whether Vansittart is a "racist" than Vansittart himself, who, in "The Nineteenth Century and After" (1942), made the following statement: "Again in the House of Lords I said that for reasons easily explained the bulk, not the whole, of the German nation—and please note that I do not say 'race,' I added explicitly—had become a nation of savage aggressors." Nor do I believe that an anonymous "young Hungarian scholar" whose evidence the author apparently did not examine is a more trustworthy authority on pre-Hitler anti-Semitism than Treitschke, Stöcker, Ritter von Schönerer, Lügner, and similar Germanic heroes, who certainly would not deny the fact that no Jew could fill higher posts in the civil service or become a reserve officer in the German army.

I leave it entirely to Mr. Hermens to determine whether those forty million Germans who at the plebiscite on November 12, 1933, cast their votes for Hitler were members of the Nazi master-race or just "common people," but I think, in view of this fact, that he underrates the swallowing capacity of the average German. I certainly did not "distort again" his argument by disbelieving the assumption that German democracy can be established by abolishing proportional representation. I certainly did not call the author a nationalist, but his being a "democrat" does not disprove it. On the contrary, the principal dogmas of democracy favored state omnipotence and the rise of nationalism. (Cf. "Nationality in History and Politics," by F. Hertz, 1944, p. 263.)

Nevertheless, democrats who attempt to cloak the blemishes of German nationalism render disservice not only to democracy but to the future of the German people as well.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

New York, January 6

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JANUARY 27, 1945

NUMBER 4

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- Mr. Churchill Protests Too Much 88
Wallace In, Jones Out by I. F. Stone 89

ARTICLES

- If Negrín Comes to Mexico by Freda Kirchwey 90
Break-Through in the East by Charles G. Bolé 91
50 Years Ago in The Nation 92
Tomorrow the Movies. III. Hollywood Goes to War
by Dorothy B. Jones 93
Sleep Comes Hard by Dorothy Baruch 95
A Wounded Woman Speaks A Poem by M. F. 96
Murphy Will Out by Peter Stevens 97
In the Wind 99

POLITICAL WAR

- Why the Nazis Fight On by Fritz Sternberg 100
Trivia Politica 101
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 102

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Letter from France by Lincoln Kirstein 103
Narcissa A Poem by Rolfe Humphries 106
Briefer Comment 106
Dance Note by Virginia Mishnun 109
Films by James Agee 110
Music by B. H. Haggin 111

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 100 by Jack Barrett 112

Editor and Publisher
FRED A. KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor Washington Editor Literary Editor
J. KING GORDON I. F. STONE MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor Music Critic Drama Critic
J. MITCHELL MORSE B. H. HAGGIN JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager Advertising Manager
HUGO VAN ARX MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER CAREY MCWILLIAMS REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Shape of Things

THE SECOND BATTLE OF LUZON WENT SO WELL last week that one began to suspect a catch somewhere. Why were the Japanese not fighting? Obviously they were caught badly off balance by the landings in Lingayen Gulf, which took their Manila defenses in the rear. Even locally they were surprised by our landing on the southern, more swampy shores of the Gulf, instead of in the northeast, where they had big guns. Immediate opposition, as in other recent Pacific landings, was negligible, suggesting that the destructive force of the rocket projectiles which the Navy now uses in such great numbers is a good deal more impressive than the correspondents have been allowed to tell us (probably these rockets were the American "secret weapon" which helped stop the German Ardennes offensive). Then the Japanese found movement of reinforcements severely curtailed by our air interference, which by the end of last week had destroyed half the rolling stock on Luzon. Movement of reinforcements in from the mainland was even more severely restricted by Admiral Halsey's Third Fleet air arm, which patrolled deep inside Japan's "basic sea area"—where the enemy's navy is pledged to fight—and smashed four convoys in the South China Sea, presumably forming up for the run to Luzon. Even considering these difficulties, the failure of the Japanese to fight on the highly defensible Agon River line or anywhere else except in the mountainous region northeast of Lingayen was obviously a surprise to General Krueger, who advanced cautiously towards Manila. Perhaps the answer to the puzzle was that the Japanese had suffered too heavily on Leyte to fight a losing and bloody battle on the Luzon plain, and were planning to abandon Manila, get away into the mountains, and make us dig them out. If this proves to be the case, it will be good news: for with Manila Harbor in operation again, we can prepare for the next big steps of the Pacific war.

✱

THE ARRIVAL AT MYITKYINA OF THE FIRST motor convoy destined for China over the new Ledo Road pre-figures dramatic new developments in the war on the Asiatic continent. Although the opening of direct communications with China awaits the capture of Wanting, near the China-Burma border, military observers expect the fall of that city within a few days. Plans have already been completed for placing traffic on the new road under strict American-Chinese military control, thus preventing the corruption that minimized the effectiveness of the old Burma Road. There are prospects, moreover, that direct connections with Burma may be reestablished in the not too distant future. British troops are already in the outskirts of Mandalay, and other British units are cleaning up south of Akyab. Meanwhile the United States Fourteenth Air Force has greatly stepped up its activities in eastern China and has coordinated them with blows of Admiral Nimitz's fliers along the China coast. So far no news has been received regarding the effect of the improved military prospects on the political situation within China. The deadlock between the Kuomintang and the Communists remains unbroken, but the new Chungking government has displayed much greater willingness to cooperate with the American military authorities than did the old one, in which figured Ho Ying-Chin as War Minister. China still faces great difficulties, but once supplies begin to move many of them will disappear.

✱

THERE IS A TRAGIC IRONY IN APPLYING THE term "liberation" to the capture of Warsaw. For the ancient city is in ruins and death had done its work of wholesale liberation long before the Red Army crossed the Vistula. First great city to feel the unleashed fury of Nazi vengeance, its defenseless citizens were systematically exterminated by Hitler's supermen until scarcely one was left. The few who managed to secure arms used them in the heroic but fruitless rising under General Bor at the very moment when the Russian armies staggered back under a fierce German counter-offensive. Now into the devastation moves the new government, as yet unrecognized by London and Washington but carrying Moscow's benediction. If we regard the London Polish government in exile as a feudal relic, we must view the Lublin group as primarily the creature of Moscow. And Russia's intransigence on Poland, if expressed in less pious phrases, is hardly more excusable than the British government's claims in regard to Greece. In our opinion Poland is very much the concern of the United Nations—of the United States. It must be made Item I on the Big Three agenda. Our immediate concern is for the Polish people themselves. It seems strange, for instance, that Mikolajczyk, head of the large Peasant Party, is not in the government. Again, democratic minority groups must be guaranteed rights even if they happen to be in opposition to the government. If the Curzon line is to be accepted as Poland's eastern frontier—■ seems likely—what about the western frontier? Is the partial dismemberment of Germany a matter for unilateral decision, or should it be held over for a joint decision of the United Nations, or at least the Big Three? We have insisted that it is the President's duty to take the initiative in Europe and bring the full weight of our nation into the settlement on which our own security must rest. The Polish question is a good place to start.

✱

THE POLICY OF UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER, insofar as it means no bargaining with the Nazi government or the German generals, remains as valid as it always was and we have no sympathy with the critics who condemn it, seeking a peace by negotiation. But, stated baldly and left without further definition, it has helped Goebbels to put over the idea that surrender means complete annihilation for the German people—an idea all the more easily assimilated, perhaps, because of a guilty realization of their own crimes towards conquered nations. In his speech last week Winston Churchill, refusing to abandon the principle, sought to meet this situation by declaring: "We may now say to our foes . . . we are not extirpaters of nations or butchers of peoples. We make no bargain with you. We accord you nothing as your right. Abandon your resistance unconditionally. We remain bound by our customs and our nature." Reassurances in such terms, however, are not likely to make much impression on the propaganda-sodden minds of the Germans. What is needed is some more specific statement of the conditions we mean to impose, thus giving the Germans an opportunity to weigh the advantages of surrender against the prolongation of a hopeless battle. We hope to discuss this subject in more detail next week.

✱

SENATOR BURTON K. WHEELER HAS FOUND A new method for distilling poison from the pure milk of international idealism. Not so long ago his only concern was to keep America out of Europe, as he indicated very plainly in an interview with I. F. Stone which The Nation published on January 11, 1941. Then he wasn't interested in the Poles, for whose brutal treatment by the Nazis he had no word of reproach. The Poles, he said on that occasion, should have made peace on the basis of the surrender of Danzig, the Corridor, and Silesia, and the United States ought to have pressed them to do so. Today he is loud in his sympathy for Poland, "subjected to the terrors of a ruthless conqueror" (he means Russia), and cannot find words strong enough to condemn Soviet claims to the lands east of the Curzon Line. But if the Senator's attitude seems to have changed, his purpose is the same. Then he was trying to keep America isolated; now he is intent on returning America to isolation. Either our Allies, he declares in effect, must institute the millennium in Europe or we must wash our hands of the whole mess and refuse all responsibility for maintaining the future peace. Thus he totally misses the point that American participation in an international order is not a matter of knight-errantry but of hard common sense and intelligent self-interest.

✱

CRITICS OF OUR POLICY TOWARD ARGENTINA have been proved wrong again. It is true Argentina has refused to participate in further Pan-American parleys "so long as Argentina's rights continue to be disregarded," but it has also been careful not to break with the Union, which can still serve to keep Argentina in touch with the other American countries. Moreover, Foreign Minister Peluffo's forced resignation, ascribed to differences with Juan Perón, Argentina's strong man, over internal rather than external affairs, is largely the result of American refusal to be "appeased" and is a heartening sign of disunity among the ruling clique. Peluffo is said to have been cold to Perón's aspirations. Perón apparently wants to hold "elections" to gain the Presidency for himself and by a democratic gesture secure American acceptance of the present regime. Finance Minister Caesar Ameghino, now also interim Foreign Minister, is well suited to his new post by virtue of lack of interest in it. He is now busily engaged in organizing a National Reinsurance Institute to protect blacklisted Axis insurance companies and may be expected to leave foreign-policy decisions to Perón. Argentina's relationship to the other American countries is one of the problems to be taken up at the Inter-American Conference on the war and post-war problems scheduled for Mexico City starting February 22. Stettinius will attend, and the Foreign Ministers of almost all the Latin American countries will be there. It is probably too much to expect that the problem of Argentina will be frankly discussed and a definite policy arrived at, but a jointly adopted, well-implemented Hemisphere policy toward Argentina is long overdue.

★

BY NAMING EDWARD J. HART OF NEW JERSEY chairman of the new House Committee on un-American Activities, Administration supporters apparently believed that they had laid the ghost of Martin Dies which Representative Rankin had so unexpectedly resurrected. There was even talk to the effect that the first task of the new committee would be to investigate the un-American activities of the Dies committee. Apparently, however, Rankin has again been underestimated. Although the new chairman has issued a statement declaring that in his view the committee has a moral obligation to adhere to judicial rules of evidence and not to denounce a thing as un-American merely because it "is opposed to the personal views of those who are doing the denouncing," Rankin has countered by declaring that he will bear no interference from his associates on the committee in his efforts "to rid the country of these un-American activities." Despite the efforts of the Democratic majority, it looks as if Rankin and not Hart may dominate the committee. On the crucial vote as to whether the Dies committee should be perpetuated, Hart and three of his Democratic colleagues on the committee voted against further witch-hunting. But the three Republican members—including two holdovers from the old Dies committee—voted with Rankin of Mississippi and Peterson of Florida for a continuance of the investigations. Thus the witch-hunters seem to have a clear majority of one on the committee, which is all that a man like Rankin requires to do untold mischief. Fortunately, the new committee has yet to receive an appropriation of funds. There is still time for the Democrats who voted for the Dies resolution to get letters from the home folks.

IN EARLY ISSUES OF THE NATION

CHARLES MICAUD, author of "The French Right and Nazi Germany 1933-39," writes on France's Role in the New Europe

GRAYSON KIRK, professor of Political Science at Columbia University and a close student of post-war organization, discusses The Politics of World Security

CAREY McWILLIAMS describes Racial Dialectic—Missouri Style

CHARLES ABRAMS inspects The High Walls of Stuyvesant Town

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN LABOR'S VIEWS ON post-war housing policy and those of the housing industry have been brought sharply into focus in hearings before the Senate Committee on Post-War Economic Policy and in the recent sessions of the National Association of Home Builders. R. J. Thomas, president of the United Automobile Workers, has set as a minimum goal the construction of 1,750,000 houses annually, giving employment, direct and indirect, to 6,500,000 men. He revealed in addition that his organization was prepared to build, through collective work, large numbers of homes for its own members. Other labor spokesmen urged the establishment of a permanent national housing agency and guaranties for year-round employment for workers in the construction industry. In contrast, Douglas Whitlock, president of the Producers' Council, national organization of the manufacturers of building materials, expressed doubt whether as many as 833,000 houses could be built annually and opposed the setting up of a national housing agency. In the absence of government initiative, involving housing subsidies for low-income groups, it is evident that the housing industry fully intends to pursue the restrictive policies which have characterized its activities in the past twenty-five years. Instead of costs being reduced through standardized designs and mass-production methods, Mr. Whitlock predicts that the average home built after the war will cost 30 per cent more than in 1940. If the industry persists in these policies, labor may have no alternative to a system of cooperative building as outlined by the president of the U. A. W.

★

THE MASTIFF IN THE AIRPLANE IS, FOR THE moment, as famous as the seal in the bedroom. That any responsible individual should ask for—and that any responsible official should grant—an A priority on an Army cargo plane for a dog, in war or peace, is fantastic. That the fantasy should be carried out to the point of "bumping" three servicemen is even more incredible. And that the dog should have reached its final destination in an Army truck escorted by an Army major is just too much. The whole story of Elliott Roosevelt's dog sounds as if it had been made up by James Thurber, including the fact that only the bull mastiff preserved his dignity throughout. No wonder the White House joined the outraged editorial writers in denouncing the whole proceeding. It should now dispatch a few blistering memos on the use of Army equipment for private purposes.

★

ON SEPTEMBER 12, 1905, IN PECK'S RESTAURANT, 140 Fulton Street, New York, a small group met together and observed that "the recent remarkable increase in the Socialist vote in America should serve as some indication to the educated men and women of this country that socialism is a thing concerning which it is no longer wise to be indifferent." On this note of academic optimism the Inter-collegiate Socialist Society was born. Jack London was the first president, Upton Sinclair one of the two vice-presidents, and Harry W. Laidler undergraduate representative on the executive. Forty years later the League for Industrial Democracy, successor to the I. S. S., is holding an anniversary dinner—on February 3, at the Roosevelt Hotel in New York. Upton Sinclair will broadcast a speech from California. The league's indefatigable director, Harry W. Laidler, will be honored with a presentation. Chief speakers will be Professor Frank Scott, national chairman of the Canadian C. C. F., a Socialist party headed for power, and Arthur Creech Jones, Labor Member of Parliament from England. The "recent Socialist vote" of 1944 looks small in comparison with the 400,000 polled in 1904, but the forces of progress which are cutting new channels through walls of tradition and dogma, more than justify the vision of the pioneers of forty years ago. The Nation congratulates the league and its director and urges its readers who are in the New York area to attend the celebration of its fortieth year.

Mr. Churchill Protests Too Much

WINSTON CHURCHILL'S speech in the House of Commons last week was a masterly performance. Hard pressed by his critics, foreign and domestic, he launched a counter-attack which appears to have caught the rather weak opposition in Parliament off balance. We write before the debate is closed but there is little doubt that he will get his vote of confidence. However, if the political strategist has triumphed, the statesman has failed; the speech will not restore the confidence of a large part of the democratic world, nor remove the growing mistrust of Churchillian imperialism.

It was clear from the speech that Mr. Churchill had been stung by recent criticisms of his policies. His reply was to deny everything. Britain, he insisted, had no ulterior designs in Europe, no plans for acquiring spheres of influence, no desire for bases. The sole objective of his government was to restore government of the people, to establish the rule of the ballot box, to guard against intimidation or regimentation by any faction. And he attempted to prove that in Greece, Yugoslavia, and Italy, British policy had been directed toward this end. In regard to Greece, in particular, Mr. Churchill said that he had never felt "more sure in mind and conscience of the rectitude of our motives." We think the gentleman doth protest too much.

Nor are our suspicions assuaged by the chronological account he gave of events in Greece, an account both incomplete and prejudiced. Moreover, he began his story only with the landing of the British forces last fall and thus omitted the first four acts of the tragedy. For British actions in the past three months can only be understood in the light of the persistent British effort since 1941 to bolster up the King of Greece and to scatter his opponents. It is true that at another stage Mr. Churchill referred to the supplies of arms sent to the E. L. A. S. but he did not mention that these supplies were stopped in April, 1943, although the right-wing partisans of Colonel Zervas continued to receive them. Nor did he say anything about the report of a high British officer who after personally observing the effectiveness of the E. L. A. S. operations recommended it should be given greater support. The report was pigeon-holed, the officer assigned to another post. And now Mr. Churchill sneers at the way the E. L. A. S. fought the Germans and insinuates that it saved its arms to establish a domestic dictatorship.

Again, Mr. Churchill described the republican partisans as infiltrating into Athens after the liberation and plotting to seize the government. Our correspondent, Constantine Poulos, who was there, reported in The Nation of December 23 that the resistance movement had every opportunity to take power in Athens between the time of the German withdrawal and the British arrival. Its leaders refrained because they thought the independence of their country and their democratic liberties guaranteed by the Teheran agreement.

We could point to innumerable other omissions and distortions in Churchill's story. Two must suffice. He said that when he went to Athens on Christmas Day, he found a general desire for a regency under Archbishop Damaskinos. Why did he not admit that this solution was put forward weeks before with the support of all the democratic parties in Greece and was then vetoed by Rex Leeper, British Minister in Athens? At that time agreement to the regency would have come as a sign of British good faith and would probably have averted the later tragedy. Churchill discovered this solution too late.

The British Prime Minister persisted in describing most inaccurately the E. L. A. S. forces as composed mainly of communists but added that it might be better to call them "Trotskyites." Where did he acquire the vocabulary of the fellow-traveller who uses this term to damn any left-wing nonconformist? Does it indicate a British protest to the Kremlin, which found it convenient to disavow the Greek communists in this way? Or is it an invitation to Stalin to disclaim responsibility for his followers in Greece? Whatever the explanation, Mr. Churchill's resort to this kind of abuse does not add to our confidence in his sincerity.

Full of sound and fury in his condemnation of the Greek left-wing partisans, Mr. Churchill had nothing but honeyed words for Tito and his followers who, to most observers, seem to be men of much the same kind with much the same ideas. He explained that his government had agreed with Moscow to avoid friction by pursuing a common policy in Yugoslavia and both indorsed the Tito-Subasich agreement for the establishment of a regency pending a plebiscite on the future constitution. Mr. Churchill regretted that young King Peter was not satisfied with this plan but warned him that it would be put into effect whether he liked it or not. We have no criticism of this decision but why should Peter be slapped while George is coddled? The suspicion will not down that the explanation is to be found in the greater strategic importance of Greece to the British Empire.

It is equally hard to accept at their face value Mr. Churchill's protestations about Italy. "We have," he declared, "no political combinations in Europe or elsewhere in respect of which we need Italy as a partner." But what many Italians suspect, and will continue to suspect, is that Britain requires Italy not as a partner but as a puppet. This fear may be unjustified but Mr. Churchill said nothing to allay it. Nor will the Italians appreciate his statement—in the course of a later appeal to the Germans to trust Allied humanity—that, "so far as Italy is concerned, there are moments when one has almost wondered whether it was they who had unconditionally surrendered to us, or we who unconditionally surrendered to them." Considering the present state of Italy, this witticism is not merely tasteless but callous. For not only is the country wracked by starvation, hunger, and disease, but its government is completely under the thumb of the Allied Commission and the British ambassador, who seem intent on impeding the restoration of democracy. It is all very well for Mr. Churchill to orate about giving the people "a fair chance to decide their destiny." It is deeds that count and his actions both in Italy and Greece strengthen reactionaries who can be trusted only to hold elections when they are in a position to "make" them. While he pursues such policies, he cannot expect the motives of his government to go unquestioned.

On the other hand, it is not enough for Americans to question. We have to press our own government to take far more positive action for the establishment of democracy in Europe. That means, for a start, that we must put aside our fears of revolution in Europe, recognizing that over a large part of the Continent revolution is as necessary and inevitable as it was in America in 1776. The reactionary leopards are not going to change their spots in response to preachings, especially after observing our practice in fostering Darlans and propping up Francos. They will have to be forcibly ejected, and we should encourage such action instead of wringing our hands on the side-lines. We must have the nerve to pursue the logic of democracy if we are to counter effectively Churchill's logic of imperialism.

Wallace In, Jones Out

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 22

MR. ROOSEVELT'S decision to replace Jesse Jones with Henry Wallace as Secretary of Commerce is no mere payment of an election debt, unless it be a debt the President owes the common people of the United States. The ousting of Jones and the appointment of Wallace is a necessary first step in the fulfilment of the full-employment pledges Mr. Roosevelt made in his fourth-term campaign.

The creation of 60,000,000 jobs will depend in large part on instruments of government up to now in the hands of Jones. As Federal Loan Administrator, the Texan controlled the agencies of public expenditure to which post-war works programs must look for their financing. He dominated the RFC, which in turn owns the war plants that can play so fruitful a role in an expanding economy after the war. As Secretary of Commerce, Jones occupied a key position in respect to foreign trade, one of the principal sources to which we must look for full utilization of war-swollen facilities when peace comes. This triple power conferred a triple obligation that an unimaginative, socially backward small-town banker of the Jones type was strikingly ill-qualified to fulfil. The President is fortunate and the country is fortunate to have available for these key positions a man of Wallace's vision, broad knowledge, and human sympathies. Not the least of the beneficiaries of the shift will be the forces of genuine enterprise in American business. No one could have been less sympathetic than Jones with the independent entrepreneur and the small business man, no one more subservient to monopoly.

There will be a bitter fight in the Senate over the Wallace appointment, and Jones had been busily preparing for that battle long before he released his exchange of letters with the President last night. The first public indication of his attitude was the ill-tempered editorial attack on Wallace in last Friday's Houston Post, a paper financed by Jones and run by his friend, former Governor W. P. Hobby of Texas. The paper supported Dewey in the last election. The keynote of the coming fight was struck by Jones in his rebellious and unsportsmanlike reply to the President: "For you to turn over all these assets and responsibilities to a man inexperienced in business and finance will, I believe, be hard for the business and financial world to understand." The reaction from those circles will be intense, for the RFC and the Federal Loan Agency—hitherto safe in the ultra-conservative hands of Jones—represent the first American experiment on a huge scale in state capitalism. In progressive hands this vast accumulation of government credit and capital is a potential menace to those business forces which profit by a restrictive economy. The first statements from Congress foreshadow another "Republicrat" coalition against Wallace. Jones has the support in the Senate of Taft, head of the G. O. P. steering committee, and in the House of Minority Leader Martin. The right-wing Southern Democrats have always been Jones's supporters. The Wallace appointment must run the gauntlet of the Senate Commerce Committee, which is headed by Bailey of North Carolina, friend of Jones as of every big money lobby in Washington.

Wallace faces three hurdles before he can take over Jones's vast powers. The first is confirmation; and given strong grass-roots support, he can win it. The Republicans can be embarrassed by their position during the fight over the State Department nominations. At that time they said they could not interfere with the President's choices for his own official family. The second hurdle is in taking over the Federal Loan Agency. The Reorganization Act of 1939 placed it under the Commerce Department; a special Congressional resolution passed in September, 1940, authorized Jones to accept the nomination as Secretary of Commerce and still remain Federal Loan Administrator. Whether Wallace can be both without Congressional authorization is a ticklish legal question. The third hurdle lies in the fact that the board of directors of the RFC is dominated by Jones satellites, and they may balk at accepting Wallace directives. Jones may also stir trouble by making an alliance with Foreign Economic Administrator Leo T. Crowley to cut down the jurisdiction of the Commerce Department and enlarge that of the FEA. It remains to be seen what part Will Clayton, Assistant Secretary of State for foreign economic affairs, will play in this struggle—whether he will be loyal to the President or to his old ally, Jones. At the time of Clayton's appointment it was said that he was being placed in the State Department to weaken Jones and prepare for his replacement by Wallace. Clayton is reported ambitious to take over some of the work of Commerce.

The President has tackled a man-size political job and needs organized popular support. We cannot expect the President to take serious risks left of center if we do not do all in our power to help him in the battles thus precipitated.

In this fight Mr. Roosevelt's strongest ally in Congress is Speaker Rayburn of Texas, who blames Jones for the unprecedented opposition to Rayburn's renomination in the last primaries. This opposition stemmed from the same circles which bred the unsuccessful anti-New Deal revolt in that state, a revolt to which Jones gave covert aid despite his position in the Cabinet. Whatever the outcome of the Wallace fight, Jones himself is through politically for the time being. He became a power in the Democratic Party by financing Houston's bid for the 1928 convention; he made his debut in Washington as a Hoover appointee to the RFC. He has used his vast powers to build up his own influence in Congress and to hamstring the New Deal from its very beginnings. His ouster at last is good news of first importance.

If Negrin Comes to Mexico

BY FRED A KIRCHWEY

Mexico City, January 20

THE attempt to convoke the Spanish Republican Cortes has failed for two main reasons. First, it has been boycotted by several important groups, particularly those identified with the Negrín government. Second, it has been torn asunder by the irreconcilable conflict of ambition between the two leading figures responsible for calling the deputies together—Indalecio Prieto and Martínez Barrio. The rank and file of the twenty thousand Republicans exiled in Mexico long for political unity, and many deputies attended the first session on January 10 hoping that unity might be established through the Cortes. But the essential illegality of the move and the political purposes behind it made any reunion between the divergent forces impossible. The calling of the Cortes was revealed as a political maneuver, nothing else. Its collapse was inevitable. The second session, scheduled for yesterday, was canceled, and the Cortes adjourned by unanimous vote sine die.

The maneuver was doomed at the first meeting when the necessary quorum failed to appear. The exact number of delegates present was seventy-two. This initial difficulty was glossed over, however, by turning the session into a memorial for the deputies—more than 120—who had died since the last meeting on Spanish soil in 1938. But the second session could hardly be devoted to such an uncontroversial subject. The major political issues which had reached the boiling-point had to be faced. Either the Cortes must be accepted as legal and capable of making decisions in regard to the future of the government of the Spanish Republic or else it must discard all pretense of being the Cortes. The lack of quorum was only one obstacle. Even more important than the failure to achieve a quorum was the absence of the government itself. Martínez Barrio in calling the Cortes tried to pull off the impossible double play of recognizing the existence of a legal Republican government and at the same time ignoring it. With great ceremony the traditional government "blue bench" was provided, but the head of the government, Juan Negrín, was not consulted or even advised in advance of the Cortes meeting. A telegram received here from Negrín in London by members of the Negrín Cabinet in Mexico City declared that not until January 10, the day the deputies met, did he receive notice of the meeting and then as member from Las Palmas, not as Prime Minister. Even some of the members attending the Cortes were unwilling to accept as legal a meeting called without the government. Along with the members who are not attending they realize that the only value of the Cortes lies in its constitutionality. Lacking that, a revolutionary junta would do just as well. The Cortes cannot be manipulated for political ends without undermining the validity of the democratic process.

But behind these legalistic arguments lie political and personal conflicts that have been sharpened by events in the last ten days. Put into a few words, the facts are these: Martínez Barrio intended to use the Cortes to elevate himself to the position of head of the state, a post he would automatically succeed to if he were to be confirmed as the president of the Cortes. (It should be remembered that the last Republican President resigned after the Catalonian retreat in the Spanish war and later died in France.) Indalecio Prieto had quite a different interest in the Cortes meeting. He originally opposed the idea of convoking it. One of the shrewdest of Spanish politicians, he undoubtedly anticipated the legal and other complications which were involved. He eventually supported the Barrio maneuver, hoping that he might augment the Junta de Liberación, which he wholly dominates, by drawing in various elements represented in the Cortes. Presumably he was willing to assist in the elevation of Barrio in exchange for this much-needed support. But after the first meeting he caucused his group and announced that they would oppose any action of a parliamentary nature, including the election of a president. Seeing the Cortes on the toboggan slide, Prieto hopped off before it reached the bottom. He has not saved his prestige. His junta has certainly been weakened by the whole maneuver, but at least Prieto's fortunes are not now tied to the fading star of Barrio.

One element that has gained from the abortive coup has been the Negrín government itself. If Negrín had been in Mexico, a large proportion of the groups represented in the Cortes would have crystallized around him. Several of his ministers, with Alvarez del Vayo representing him as vice-president of the Cabinet, have been playing an active part outside the Cortes, first, opposing the meeting as an illegal attempt to overthrow the government and, second, making plans for a broader coalition of Republican elements. The eager desire for unity was demonstrated by the crowds of Spaniards that packed the gallery during the first meeting and by the presence of many deputies who came not to support Barrio or Prieto but only to identify themselves with the effort to mobilize the Republican forces. The failure of the meeting must have disappointed these honest people, but it has left the government almost a free field and enhanced prestige. Now it is of the greatest importance that the elements backing the government get together and offer Spanish Republicans everywhere a firm standard to rally to.

The day before yesterday the press here carried a dispatch announcing that Negrín would arrive in America the latter half of February. Without doubt he is planning to come and has definitely told his friends so. If he should not arrive it would be only because he was prevented by the British or the American government or by both. Spaniards here discount the possibility that obstacles will be put in his way and feel sure that he will come and come soon. I cannot share this confidence. If the British government found reasons to prevent Negrín from broadcasting to the great Madison Square Garden meeting in New York they can find better ones to prevent him from coming to Mexico. Nor has the State Department shown any inclination to facilitate the movements of democratic European leaders—especially Spaniards. It seems unrealistic to hope that a plan designed to hasten the unification of Spanish Republican elements will get help from either of the major Western powers. If Negrín actually arrives, he will, I believe, succeed in drawing together all groups except the diehard irreconcilables. If he does not arrive, then the unifying forces among the Republicans here will have to work overtime to achieve the same result. It would be fantastic if reactionary policies in London and Washington were permitted to interfere with the union of Spanish democrats in exile.

Break-Through in the East

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THE Russian offensive of mid-winter, 1945, is unquestionably one of the great achievements of the war; for the skilful employment of sheer power it is probably one of the greatest military performances of all time. Regarding the affair cynically and with an eye cocked at the unhealthy political relations currently prevailing among the United Nations, one sympathizes with the fairly common expression of the American doughfoot's feeling: Jeez, I hope we never have to fight the Russkies.

Presumably the German doughfoot wishes his leader had found some other path to world domination than by fighting these same Russkies. Trying to hold the Vistula line in the past fortnight can have been no fun for even the most Götterdämmerung-minded Nazi. The gods were never intended to pass their twilight hours to the accompaniment of 500 heavy artillery pieces per mile, or to the unleashing of such a vigorous and rancorous trio of marshals as Konev, Zhukov, and Rokossovsky. These three, who learned their lessons the hard way in the early spate of German victories, have now returned with a great offensive which makes the Nazi blitzkrieg look like a rather modest kindergarten enterprise.

The primary objective of the offensive seems to be identical with that of all Allied objectives in the European theater—the destruction of Germany's armed fighting strength in the field. A secondary objective, the breaching of the Reich's eastern frontier, is already accomplished. (Perhaps not figuring largely in the calculations of the Soviet high command but composing what we may call a tertiary objective is the final annihilation of all the little voices of the "Atlantic community" which cry out that the Russians have left us holding the bag, that they make political offensives only, and why don't they open a second front anyway? Just as the opening of the second front in France annihilated—one trusts—the selfsame voices in the Soviet Union.)

The means used in attaining these objectives are quite unparalleled. Marshal Stalin does not toss in Rokossovsky, Konev, and Zhukov at the head of three battalions. It is important to remember that these men do not command armies but army groups: Zhukov, for instance, had on his staff before Warsaw five colonel generals and at least two lieutenant generals. The press-association estimates of 2,000,000 Russian troops involved on this 450-mile front may not be far amiss. This might work out at about 150 divisions. It is an interesting comparison with the United States army's original plan to fight the war against both Germany and Japan with 100 divisions of combat troops.

Konev led the offensive in the south with a drive out of the Sandomierz bridgehead, first retaking the towns which the Germans had retaken last summer—which were not then reported as lost in the Russian communiqué—and subsequently scoring a major break-through, to advance about 100 miles westward in five days to Czeszochowa. German losses in this action must have been extremely heavy, with many small-scale encirclements and surrenders. Then, with the enemy's attention concentrated in the south, the great, imperturbable, careful Zhukov—perhaps the best Russian field commander since Kutuzov—ground forward, encircled the city that neither Rokossovsky nor frontal attack could take, and liberated Warsaw. Rokossovsky himself, switched to the next front north, pushed across the Narew and outflanked half of East Prussia, driving a wedge between the Polish capital and the stronghold of militarism that can give no comfort to the Germans defending East Prussia.

Regardless of the total German losses in men, guns, and tanks, the immediate result of the early stages of this grand offensive is that the hard core of Germany's eastern defense has been broken. The Narew-Vistula line from Ostrołęka to Krakow is smashed, and with it the enemy's best hope for a successful defense of central Poland. The fall of Warsaw, marred only, but excessively, by the tragic differences of Polish—and therefore of United Nations—politics, removes the chief roadblock on the Red Army's way to Berlin. It opens not only the main road west to Berlin but the route along both banks of the Vistula northwest to Danzig and the Baltic, potentially sealing off East Prussia from the rest of the Reich. Southward, the advance beyond Czeszochowa and Krakow threatens German Silesia, second in industrial capacity only to the Ruhr.

The realization of any of these threats would be as intolerable to the Germans as would have been the continued advance toward the Ruhr and Saar on the western front. Consequently one must expect a hardening of the front—one of those seemingly miraculous tactical improvisations which the Germans can pull out of the bag to meet an apparently hopeless strategic situation. Germans have done this so consistently—at a dozen places on the eastern front since just after Stalingrad, the Mareth Line, Kasserine Pass, Anzio, the hills north of Rome, the Ardennes—that one nearly despairs of ever finally licking them. Yet obviously their opportunity for miracles diminishes. The pulling off of miracles requires three chief ingredients, outside of ingenuity, which the Germans admittedly have par excellence—space, time, and man-power. The recoil after each miracle has taken space from the Germans; the extra time has been time in which German strength declined relative to Allied strength; and the cost of the miracle has always been a net loss to German man-power. This process has but one logical culmination, which is total and irrevocable German defeat—unconditional surrender, whether Senator Wheeler likes it or not. Here the question is not one of political expediency but of fundamental military policy; and the history of German arms in this war proves conclusively that only the total dissolution of the whole fabric of the nation-at-arms can establish the fact of the nation's defeat.

Thus we may resign ourselves to the probability of yet another miraculous German recovery on the eastern front with the comforting conviction that a few more miracles will cost Germany its existence as a nation. I must state flatly, with the hope of being proved wrong, that I can now see no other way of concluding the war in Europe. The Volkssturm is in action on both the eastern and western fronts; the recent trend in German propaganda with respect to the execution of Allied "war criminals" indicates strongly a similar intention to involve the whole mass of the German people finally and irrevocably in the criminal performance of the Nazi leaders and the S. S. It is not impossible that the Germans may now turn to the use of gas on both fronts, and to the previously announced execution of prisoners of war as hostages against further Allied advances into the Reich. Through the undeniably devilish inventiveness of the German General Staff and the culminating inhumanity of the Gestapo the leaders of the present German state will try to postpone their last day as long as possible. The Ardennes counter-attack definitely succeeded in its immediate objective of upsetting the winter time-table of the Western Allies, which more than counter-balanced the heavy German losses. If the east-front situation is too far deteriorated for even the Germans to mount a counter-offensive, we must yet expect a hardening of the line some place that will require a major Russian regrouping and preparation for further offensive action. The loss of space, time, and man-power diminishes the German capability for miracles, and thus brings the day of victory blessedly closer; but in the meantime we had best toughen our minds for the kind of hideousness that would naturally accompany a nation's attempt to pull the walls of civilization down over its head into the grave.

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THE DISSATISFACTION with the young Kaiser seems to find every day bolder expression in Germany. . . . The Emperor's notion of himself was always ridiculous. During the first few years of his reign he instructed all the first teachers in Germany in the proper methods of instruction, called a convention to elevate the working classes, and told the soldiers they were to obey only God and himself, or rather God through him, and were to shoot their fathers and mothers if he ordered them. His occasional manifestations of his wisdom since then have been in all respects worthy of the Middle Ages.—January 3, 1895.

THE ENCOUNTER BETWEEN the Rev. Lem Penrod and Mr. John Slate at Grassy Creek, Kentucky, the other day, on the subject of infant baptism, will, we fear, cause a good deal of unreasonable scandal. Finding it impossible to get Slate to take a proper view of this important ordinance, Penrod drew a revolver and shot (probably merely as a warning) at Slate's leg, the ball passing through his boot. Slate, instead of taking this in a proper spirit, "rushed at the minister," whose resources at close quarters were not, however, exhausted, for he produced a butcher knife and endeavored to slash Slate's abdomen, but only reached his trousers. Friends then stopped the fray. This attempt on Slate's abdomen we cannot excuse, Slate's head being the real seat of his error; but in a fray it is, of course, difficult to plant one's blows where they will do the most good. But we must not too hastily condemn the Rev. Penrod's methods, for infant baptism is by no means the only doctrine erroneous views on which have been corrected with the knife or the bullet. There is hardly a single theological error which in times past has not been corrected by cuts, bruises, and burns. Penrod is simply an anachronism, but we trust he will keep an eye on Slate, and get him right somehow eventually.—January 17, 1895.

THE OHIO WOOL-GROWERS have resolved that the free-wool provisions of the new tariff are "a colossal political crime." This seems to us a mistake. In the first place, it will stir up the wrath of the silverites. They hold the copyright in the phrase "a colossal political crime." . . . Besides, it is hardly polite to tell the men—and particularly the women—who are buying better clothing for less money than ever before in their lives, that they are accessories to a crime.—January 24, 1895.

WHATEVER BE the right or wrong of it, the great bulk of our population will not sit and talk without some kind of intoxicating drink before them.—January 24, 1895.

OF THE FOUR NEW CHAPTERS added by Mr. Bryce to the third edition of his "American Commonwealth," none will attract more attention than those on The South Since the War, and The Present and Future of the Negro. . . . He leaves it to be inferred that he agrees with the eminent Southern witnesses whom he adduces, in regarding the possession of the suffrage as indispensable to the protection and independence of the blacks. This opinion, we believe, will stand.—January 31, 1895.

Murphy Will Out

BY PETER STEVENS

ON JANUARY 5 the New York Herald Tribune published a U. P. dispatch from Paris reporting the arrest there of Jacques Lemaigre-Dubreuil and Jean Rigaud on charges of "endangering the security of the state." Every American who was in North Africa knows that when these two men are placed on trial before the French High Court, there will loom behind them the absent figure of Robert Murphy, formerly the President's personal representative in Algiers. For it was Murphy who was the architect of the reactionary American policies which we sought to impose on the French after our landings in November, 1942; Lemaigre-Dubreuil and Rigaud were his eager collaborators.

Newspaper reports are often like icebergs; only a fraction of the real story shows above the surface. I propose to take up this U. P. dispatch paragraph by paragraph and indicate what lies in the murky depths below. . . . Murphy Will Out.

Two leading supporters of Admiral Jean François Darlan, Vichy High Commissioner in North Africa, who collaborated with the Allies after they landed there in 1942 and who later was assassinated, were arrested here today and charged with "endangering the security of the state."

The pro-democratic, American-organized fifth column in French Africa had begged Murphy before the landings to drop his dealings with Darlan, Lemaigre, and Rigaud. Murphy refused because he was determined to defeat the Germans and still preserve the reactionary révolution nationale of Vichy, to which Darlan, Lemaigre, and Rigaud were openly devoted. All three men belonged to that wide circle of French fascists who wanted France to be on the winning side in the war, whichever that was, and to retain the Pétain corporate state. All three were members of the super-counter-revolutionary organization, secretly nourished since 1922 by the German General Staff, called the "Mouvement Synarchique d'Empire," or M. S. E. It was to this gang that Murphy instinctively turned, for to him the pro-democratic French were simply "that bunch of Jews and Communists."

Jacques Lemaigre-Dubreuil, a prominent pre-war French industrialist and president of the influential French Taxpayers' League, and Jean Rigaud, who served as Minister of the Interior under Darlan, were both bitterly anti-De Gaulle in North Africa. They were placed under armed surveillance but escaped and were reported since in Spain and Portugal.

Lemaigre-Dubreuil, peanut-oil king, was also closely associated with the Banque Worms, chief German financial agent in the control of strategic French industries and the agency through which Germany sent money to French anti-democratic fascist organizations. Both he and Rigaud were associated with Laval in the sinister Banque Nationale pour le Commerce et l'Industrie (B. N. C. I.). Lemaigre founded the Taxpayers' League, whose chief function was to hire hoodlums to beat up French democrats and stage riots for political purposes. And he was the French chief of the food-stuffs section of the Armistice Commission in Wiesbaden, which stripped France of its food to feed the Germans. Rigaud was a high Cagoulard and is credited with organizing French participation in the murder of the Roselli brothers; the Cagoulards had them killed in France in 1938 as a favor to Ciano, the request having been relayed to them by the G-2 section (intelligence) of Marshal Badoglio's staff.

It is true that Lemaigre and Rigaud were placed under what the French call résidence forcée after De Gaulle came to Africa. De Gaulle had requested the right to arrest them and try them immediately, having evidence that both men had been in constant touch with the Vichy government since our landings. Murphy interceded for them with all the prestige of his position as the President's personal representative, and De Gaulle, threatened with the loss of Lend-Lease, gave in, as he did also in the case of Flandin and Nogué.

They had actively supported the Allied landings in North Africa but subsequently made no secret of their hostility to the French Committee of National Liberation, which evolved into the present French government.

The two men did in fact support our landings, and they arranged for the importation of General Giraud. It is reported, however, that they profited from their knowledge of the impending landings by buying African francs on the Lisbon Exchange. It is certain that four months after the landings they, together with General Nogué, were mixed up in the smuggling of the Bank of Morocco's gold to Lisbon. No one was punished for this crime until after De Gaulle was in power, and then only the poor puppet directors of the bank. Even after De Gaulle was established in Algiers, the French reactionaries were confident that Murphy would somehow keep him out of France, and that the junta of Nogué, Lemaigre, and Rigaud would then be recalled from the Iberian Peninsula, where they were reported to be using the Bank of Morocco's gold for their conspiracy.

If these men made no secret of their hostility to De Gaulle, neither did their American friends and backers, especially the then Colonel, recently General, and now Assistant Secretary of State Julius Holmes, and his friendly mentor, Robert Murphy. In saying goodbye to an American returning home in the spring of 1943, Murphy said, "We are not worried about De Gaulle: we've got him lassoed!"

French authorities were unable to ascertain how they crossed the frontier and reached Paris.

The chances are good that they crossed the border out of Spain into France with the same assistance they had when they fled from North Africa. I was informed by a French eyewitness that the two men had crossed from French to Spanish Morocco unchallenged, thanks to American transportation facilities and the fact that their laissez-passers were either of American origin or issued on American request.

Lemaigre-Dubreuil was said to have been instrumental in arranging the escape from France to North Africa of General Henri Honoré Giraud. Always identified with the extreme right in French politics, he at one time was suspected of being in contact with the Count of Paris, pretender to the French throne, in Algiers, and of having kept in touch with Vichy after the Allied landings. However, he was sent with Giraud's military mission to Washington and served as chief economic delegate and chief delegate for inter-Allied affairs under Giraud.

Lemaigre was instrumental in bringing Giraud to North Africa, although Giraud's departure was no "escape" but a concerted effort by the men of Vichy, through their secret "synarchy," to provide for the continuation of the New Order in France whether the Germans won or the Allies—another example of the Janus-faced collaboration by which the anti-democratic industrialists, generals, and bankers of France sought to insure their future.

Lemaigre and Rigaud were not merely suspected in Algiers of being in touch with the pretender, the Count of Paris; they openly boasted of it and said they would make him Lord Protector of the Realm. In this they had the support, on the quiet, of Murphy and his henchmen.

It is interesting to note that while Lemaigre was in Washington in December, 1942, as Admiral Darlan's delegate, he came to New York seeking to open an American branch of Pierre Laval's Banque Nationale pour le Commerce et l'Industrie.

Followers of General Charles de Gaulle have never hidden their distaste for Lemaigre-Dubreuil. At London, in February, 1943, De Gaulle asserted that "his policy has always been directed toward the exclusion of democratic elements from French resistance forces wherever they be."

To an American who was in North Africa this must seem a most moderate understatement of Lemaigre-Dubreuil's (and Rigaud's) policy. Every discouraged French democrat in Algeria and Morocco in 1942-43 also knew that in pursuing it both men had the unofficial but whole-hearted backing of Murphy. To suppress democracy had been the political objective of Lemaigre and Rigaud for twenty years. To this end they had tirelessly conspired with Pétain and Weygand to kill the Third Republic, using such organizations as the M. S. E., the Cagoulards, the Taxpayers' League, and the reactionary press. "Pétain Shall Rule" was their motto before the war began, and their intention was openly published in their press.

It was these two men, as the real power behind General Giraud, who insisted on keeping the 15,000 political prisoners and refugees in concentration camps in North Africa, where they remained for six months after we landed. Many of these internees had merely committed the crime of joining the Foreign Legion to fight for France in 1939 against the Germans or of resisting the Vichy-Axis regime in North Africa before the landings.

Murphy informed the President at Casablanca in January, 1943, that there were no longer any political prisoners in North Africa, and the President was credulous enough to repeat it on the radio. That same week I personally counted more than 7,500 such prisoners, many of them French citizens, being used in the killing slave labor of building the Trans-Sahara Railway, which would have connected Lemaigre's Senegal holdings with North Africa. Most of these poor devils were intellectuals or middle-class Europeans, unused to the fierce heat and hard labor; they received four cents a day, and died like flies. The brutality of these camps surpassed that of the German Dachau.

The persecution and disfranchisement of the Jews, the summary arrest and imprisonment of Gaullists, and the imprisonment of Communist deputies continued under Rigaud and Lemaigre with the protection of Murphy and his cover-all phrase "military necessity."

Lemaigre-Dubreuil and Rigaud, who had been Giraud's Secretary of Political Affairs, both resigned their posts in March, 1943, as a part of the general house-cleaning of anti-democratic forces from the Giraud regime. Rigaud was identified as a former Cagoulard (hooded man, or pro-fascist), and in his North African post he held power over the civilian police, which he was said to have used to spy on De Gaulle.

Both men resigned their posts, following the lead of General Bergeret, former Minister of Aviation at Vichy, who was also in Giraud's Cabinet. They resigned because on March 14, 1943, Giraud, under the pressure of American public opinion, which had begun to protest against the fascist smell of Murphy's North African version of Vichy, made a mildly pro-democratic speech. (Most of the minor political reforms promised in this speech were postponed under the excuse of military necessity and were actually not enforced until De Gaulle arrived.) But both men continued to be close to Murphy, going in and out of his great villa on the Rue Michelet and apparently serving as his advisers.

Rigaud, fascist and Cagoulard, had indeed controlled the police. He had done this by means of a coup d'état a week after the assassination of Admiral Darlan. In the middle of the night he ordered the arrest of Chiefs of Police Achari and Bringard and of a dozen other influential democrats who had aided our landing at Algiers and had in fact made it possible and nearly bloodless. Rigaud accused these men of complicity in the Darlan shooting and without a hearing hurried them off to a fort in the desert. Murphy went through the formality of a polite protest, but he and his office were unable to hide their thorough agreement with Rigaud's action. The men were kept in prison long enough for Rigaud to complete the task of making the Algerian police force his tool.

No longer fearing the police, Rigaud and Lemaigre were able to get on with their schemes for a super-Vichy regime under the Count of Paris. The S. O. L., Pétain's storm troopers, came out again and openly preached fascism and even defeatism. Murphy remained silent.

Both men fled to Spanish Morocco in May, 1944, after they were placed under police surveillance in Algiers. They are believed to have reached Spain from there. If they had not fled, it was reported, they would have been arrested "for plotting against the state." (End of U. P. dispatch.)

Here the U. P. dispatch has become vague; nothing is said of the whereabouts of Lemaigre and Rigaud between June, 1943, when De Gaulle came to North Africa, and May, 1944, when they are reported as "fleeing" to Spanish Morocco and Spain.

When the new French government made moves to arrest these men in June, 1943, it found them secretly protected by the Americans. In the case of Rigaud, the evidence of his conspiracy with the Count of Paris and his constant maintenance of contacts with Vichy was so complete that the Algiers government finally felt it could move against him despite this protection.

Rigaud fled from Algiers in an American airplane provided by Robert Murphy. He went to Casablanca. There he hid in the house of an American official and received secret messages from Murphy assuring him that his friends were all working for him in Algiers and that he should not worry. At this same time American officials answered an inquiry from M. Puaux, Resident (governor) of Morocco, by saying that they did not know Rigaud's whereabouts. Finally, through a compromise reached in Algiers by his "friends," Rigaud went into résidence forcée in Casablanca. For part of this time he was sheltered by Vice-Consul Kenneth Pendar in a house in Marrakech.

Some time in June, 1943, General Noguès, the notorious pro-fascist ex-Resident of Morocco, fled, just ahead of arrest, to Spanish territory. He was followed the next month by Lemaigre-Dubreuil and Rigaud, who crossed the border in a car lent to Murphy's organization by the Civil Affairs section of the United States army.

The U. P. dispatch reports Lemaigre and Rigaud fleeing from arrest in May, 1944, and does not mention their flight in July, 1943. I assume that they probably returned to French North Africa—just as they recently arrived in Paris—either clandestinely or with some American protection. A conspiracy of such long standing, so well financed, and for such high stakes does not die easily, as their daring trip to Paris in the face of arrest proves. Both General Noguès and Lemaigre were repeatedly reported in Vichy during the fall and winter of 1943-44, when of course all France was occupied by the Germans.

If plotting against French democracy, for the monarchy, for the Vichy type of totalitarianism, and against the restoration of a republic constitutes "plotting against the state," Lemaigre and Rigaud are guilty. Will they plead that all their actions in North Africa were taken with the full approval of the American authorities? Will they seek to call Robert Murphy as a witness for their defense? In any case, even if Murphy's name is never mentioned in court, Frenchmen will not forget the role he played in the plot to circumvent the restoration of the French Republic; and for them his policies and those of the American State Department will also be on trial.

Indeed, on a wider scale, British and American policy in Greece, Belgium, and Italy will, in the eyes of European democracy, be arraigned in that French court, for the tragic pattern for many subsequent mistakes was set in North Africa. The American press ought to report this trial in complete detail.

In the Wind

FROM HIS LITTLE FARM in the Chicago Tribune building Alex Small went to New York. This is from one of his letters home, published in the Tribune of January 5: "The very sight of the New York crowd antagonizes the visitor who has come into New York from his farm or small town on the Western plains. These frizzy heads, these broad, brutish cheekbones, these furtive, piggy eyes, these slack mouths—the whole 'muffin-faced race' which he sees in the New York subway—how different from the well-marked features of his neighbors back in Iowa or Kansas. So comes the conclusion that New York is an alien force inside the United States."

IN ITS ISSUE of January 6 Business Week reported that Republic Steel had settled out of court 192 damage suits, totaling $300,000, for the deaths and injuries of C. I. O. workers in the Memorial Day massacre of 1937. As far as we can learn, this was a clean scoop. Despite the news value of the story, none of the New York newspapers mentioned it, nor did Time or Newsweek.

BEST AND COMPANY closed its St. Louis store on January 13. The Post-Dispatch said the reason given by the company was "increased business, which it was unable to cope with in inadequate business quarters."

MRS. JOHN T. BATTEN of Birmingham, Alabama, chairman of the pan-American study committee of the American Legion Auxiliary, told the national executive committee on January 11 that the twenty Latin American countries "all have a republican form of government, they all officially recognize the existence of a common democracy throughout the Americas, and all have the same deep-rooted love of liberty."

BY HECK! Sears, Roebuck's new spring and summer catalogue, just out, has twelve pages of "dress and leisure" slacks, but not one pair of men's overalls.

COLORADO'S 40,000 old-age pensioners this month received an extra dividend of $2,000,000. That was the amount of the surplus left in the state's pension fund at the end of last year. The law requires it to be distributed pro rata.

FESTUNG EUROPA: Certificates of German birth used to be one of the highest-priced articles on the black market in Poland, but reports are that the bottom has dropped out of the market. . . . The Nazi authorities in Czechoslovakia have recently decreed the death penalty for selling civilian clothes to German soldiers. . . . Last month saboteurs visited an Oslo factory which had been making pullovers for the German army. After doing their job they carried away 1,845 kroner in currency. They later returned the money with a note expressing regret for the "mistake" and stating that they realized it was not up to them to confiscate profits derived from serving the Germans, since that would be done more effectively when the time was ripe.

[Readers are invited to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

Why the Nazis Fight On

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

THE American people were as unprepared for the mighty Russian break-through in the east as they were for the recent German counter-offensive in the west. Yesterday we were thrown into deep gloom by the discovery that the German armies could not only impede our advance but actually fight back with vicious power. Today, as the Soviet armies sweep through Poland into Silesia and East Prussia, we are resuming our interrupted plans for victory celebrations. Once more we may be disappointed.

For it is my firm conviction that our optimism today is made of the same stuff as our complacency at the very moment of von Rundstedt's attack. The limited break-through of the German western armies cannot, of course, be compared with the power and magnitude of the Russian drive. But the German armies which today are yielding before the Red Army can no more be written off than could the German armies which handed us so grim a Christmas present in Belgium. Behind the armies are a people steeled to a long and bloody resistance. It will help us appreciate the resources of the enemy today if we attempt to draw some lessons from our reverses in the west.

Although the Germans lost more than a million men during the fighting in France, these were almost all second- and third-class troops. Drew Middleton, in a dispatch to the New York Times on December 10, 1944, before Rundstedt's counter-offensive began, reported that the number of German divisions on the western front was still at least as great as on June 6, the day of invasion. The German military leaders had managed this, Mr. Middleton wrote, by "the sacrifice of third-class infantry divisions in the retreat across France and Belgium in order to save S.S., Panzer, and Panzer Grenadier units."

The regrouping of German armies on the western front was also facilitated by the fact that the Allies found it extremely difficult to supply their onrushing troops. The Germans held on to the French ports with great tenacity—they are still holding on to some—and before giving up any of them they destroyed most of the docks and machinery. These measures gave the Germans the time they needed. The reorganization was facilitated further by an advantage that increased as the fighting approached the frontiers of Germany: as the Allies' supply lines grew longer, the Germans' grew shorter.

Not only were the Germans able to reorganize; they were also able to man the western front with armies little if any smaller than those of the Allies. The Germans have an estimated seventy divisions on this front; the Allies have sixty to seventy. To be sure, the German divisions are somewhat smaller, but the numerical superiority of the Allied divisions is not so great as has been believed. And the Allied high command has no more men immediately at its disposal. This fact appears clearly in the statement which Lieutenant General Omar N. Bradley, Commander of the Twelfth Army Group, made on the German counter-offensive. He said:

In leaving the Ardennes lightly held, we took what is known in military terminology as a "calculated risk" to strengthen our northern and southern drives. In other words, instead of employing our surplus divisions in the then quiet Ardennes, we used them to attack in other sectors.

One of the most important causes of this stringency is, I believe, an overestimation of what air power can do. The air forces form a much larger proportion of the Allied than of the German armies. Such a proportion would be justified if it were possible to knock out Germany's war industries by bombing. But all the known facts indicate this cannot be done. Certainly the air war has damaged German production considerably, but it has not prevented German troops on all fronts from being excellently equipped or, on the western front, from having better—or at least bigger—tanks than the Allies. A considerable proportion of the Rhenish-Westphalian industries have been moved to areas in central Germany, Austria, the Sudeteland, Bohemia-Moravia, and Upper Silesia, which, until the current Russian advance, have been comparatively safe from heavy bombing.

If German commanders have had to reckon with a shortage of oil, it has never been serious enough to have an important influence on military decisions. There is every reason to believe that the German oil supply will not be appreciably reduced in the near future unless the war is carried from the border regions to the interior of Germany. In an analysis of Germany's oil reserve the London Economist came to the following conclusions:

... If the figures for synthetic oil are added, the German total for 1944 perhaps reaches 6,000,000 tons, although bombing may in fact have reduced the output even below these figures. Some stocks may have been destroyed by bombing, but it would be wrong to conclude that the Germans are carrying no stocks. Meanwhile, in 1943 and 1944, more and more vehicles have been transferred to generator gas, and more horse-drawn transport has been introduced for military purposes. The series of great retreats has also relieved some of the strain. It would therefore be unsafe to assume that the minimum amount of fuel and lubrication oil necessary to keep the tanks moving and the planes flying will not be forthcoming for another six months. Germany's tremendous losses of natural oil have undoubtedly brought it nearer to the edge of collapse. But past experience shows that the Allies always underestimate how much room there is still left for balancing on that edge.

The counter-offensive has completely upset the Allies' plans for a western winter offensive. In addition, it has, for the time being, strengthened the domestic position of the Nazi regime. The Nazis know they have no chance to win the war as long as they have to fight on two fronts. Their one hope is that political differences among the Allies will become so great that the coalition will break up. On this point it is worth noting that German newspapers today frequently devote half their space to these differences. Column-long stories appear on British policy in Italy, on the veto of Sforza, on the fight with the Belgian resistance, on the war with the E. L. A. S. in Greece, on every detail of Anglo-American difficulties, on the Polish question, and so on.

Lately it has been the English Tories who have given the Nazis most reason to hope. T. Bower, a Conservative member of Parliament, informed his colleagues a few days ago that Russia had "stabbed Poland in the back," and went on to say, "However unpleasant, we must face the fact that Russian imperialism is sowing dragon's teeth in Eastern Europe today. If she is allowed to get away with it, I believe another more terrible war will result in a few years' time." That certainly makes it plain enough. Mr. Bower not only speaks for himself but also brings out into the open what many Tories are thinking today. An editorial in the London Tribune entitled "Our Relations with Russia in Danger" puts it this way:

Their [the Tories'] opposition to Nazi Germany was purely opportunist and limited to the period during which Germany appeared as the main threat. This threat many powerful Tory interests consider no longer material. They consider their interests far more menaced by what they call Russian expansion into Central and Western Europe than by such threats as emanate from Nazi Germany. Their main preoccupation for some time has not been with what Germany might still do, but with what Russia is doing in the Balkans and the Baltic and possibly also in Central Europe and even France. This is no assumption on our part. It is an open secret for anyone who knows what is going on in certain Tory circles.

When the London Tribune expresses the opinion that today, in the midst of war, influential Tory circles fear Germany less than Russia, the Nazis are certainly entitled to some small glimmer of hope that the unity of the Allies will crumble if Germany is able to hold out a little longer.

Despite many weaknesses, the Gestapo apparatus is generally effective in Germany. By means of the most up-to-date and improved methods of terrorization it is able to keep both the army and the home front in line. Many writers have pointed out that Germany has no strong underground movement and have declared that this proves that the German people are united behind Hitler and the Nazis. In Germany today there are nine to twelve million foreigners, some of them prisoners of war, some of them slave workers sold by quivering governments. They work for the most part in German war industry. Without them the German army would have been beaten long ago. But the Gestapo is so strong in Germany that we have had no reports of a widespread resistance movement among them. Can anyone be so naive as to believe that these people favor Hitler?

All reports indicate that the German people are not behind Hitler, but that they are politically inactive. Not the least important cause of their apathy is the fact that the Allies' war aims offer them little hope of any salvation after defeat. Propaganda Minister Goebbels expressed the sentiments of a majority of the people when he wrote in Das Reich that the stubbornness of Germany's resistance was due, among other things, to "the Allies' fatal error in telling us of their plans for our destruction. These plans," he went on, "have been widely circulated in Germany, and every German at the front carries them with him as a catechism of war. We may lose all we have, we may lose our lives, but we shall never lose sight of this deadly danger."

The apathy of the German people can be overcome only by some challenging action on the part of the uncompromising anti-Nazis. Most of these belong to the political left. And what they have read of Allied policy toward the leftist movements in Belgium, Italy, and Greece—and the Nazi press keeps them up to date—does not encourage them to act.

We cannot expect a political crisis in Germany until the German army suffers a smashing defeat, until the war is carried deep into Germany, and until a change of policy by the Allies gives Hitler's domestic enemies reason to believe that there is a future for anti-Nazis.

Trivia Politica

WHEN POPE PIUS XII says that a return to the past is vain we had all better begin looking ahead. Those were his words to the Roman nobility when they presented him with a traditional New Year's gift. But, said the Pope comfortingly, "even the nobility has its task" in the brave new world. . . . EL SALVADOR's fake election last week had the expected result; it was won by General Salvador Castaneda Castro, Provisional President Aguirre's man, who received 312,754 votes. Several hundred courageous Salvadoreans registered their protest against the dictatorship, however, by casting votes for the four opposition candidates, who had withdrawn on the ground that they could not combat the machinery established to insure General Castaneda's election. Elections were staged in the hope of fooling hemisphere republics into thinking that El Salvador had gone democratic. . . . IN SWITZERLAND German war books have taken a sharp drop in price. "Break-through in the West" has been reduced from $1.75 to 60 cents. "Victory over France" and "From the Karawanken Mountains to Crete" have been similarly cut. "In Defiance of All Powers," which contains the high command's philosophy, is now selling for 30 cents. . . . "RUSSIA BARS Entry of Catholic Priests," a headline in the New York Times, no longer indicates that religion is considered an opiate for the masses but simply that the Soviet is meeting its own clerical requirements. "I am confident," said Ivan V. Polyansky, chairman of the Soviet Council on Religious Cults, "that Russia's own talented and hard-working clergy is capable of serving the needs of the faithful, especially as the training of new priests is already proceeding." . . . "GREATER GREECE and George for King" was one of the songs sung at last week's allegedly spontaneous demonstration in Athens, which was actually organized by the Greek Chamber of Commerce. Street hawkers did a rush business in King George lapel buttons, and one of the banners showed King George bearing a can of bully beef, a bottle of wine, and a loaf of bread in his outstretched hands. . . . FRIENDS OF FASCISM will be glad to know that Jorge Ubico, ex-dictator of Guatemala, is safe in New Orleans. He says he will remain in the United States until the end of the war, when he will take up residence in Spain. Ubico's regime was overthrown last year after a fourteen-year reign of terror in which civil liberties were ruthlessly suppressed—and schools and highways built to create a façade of democratic progress.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

HOW German industry, in spite of the bombings it has received, can still exist, how it can still continue to produce, has long been a riddle, and reference to "underground factories" has been an unsatisfactory explanation. For how, in the midst of war, did all these underground factories suddenly come into existence?

The first plausible explanation is contained in a piece of information which the Stockholm Morgontidningen printed on January 5. According to this report the Germans have been able to improvise a considerable number of underground factories by installing them in abandoned mines. Old coal mines in the Ruhr, old salt mines in the mountains around Salzburg were ready-made refuges for some sixty large war plants.

The decision to transfer the factories to this underworld was taken with reluctance and only when the bombings became unendurable. Working conditions are of course bad. Coal gas, ground water, and difficult problems of space, temperature, and ventilation must be contended with. Moreover, the shafts which afford ingress and egress are a weak spot. The account in the Morgontidningen says that the single shaft of one mine was destroyed by a bombing and that more than two thousand workmen were trapped below ground and lost their lives.

Notwithstanding all this, the sixty underground factories are now in production and employing more than 400,000 workers. That is not very many, and their output is doubtless below normal; but it helps to explain the riddle of how German industry continues to produce.

Hitler's New Year's address was broadcast at a peculiar time—five minutes after the New Year began. Whoever arranged the affair must have thought it an especially good idea to choose this hour of the night—at five minutes after twelve on New Year's Eve people are in a sentimental mood and more receptive than usual to sentimentality. What was overlooked was that the expression "five minutes after twelve" has another connotation and that Hitler himself on a previous occasion closed an address with the words: "This time Germany will not capitulate, but will fight on till five minutes past twelve." The Zurich newspaper the Weltwoche reported that throughout Germany this seemingly trifling coincidence was the only thing that stuck in people's minds from the New Year's speech. It came in a trice—and remained—"the five-minutes-past-twelve speech."

Yes, the New Year's Stimmung was gloomy. But it is well to realize that a very different mood prevailed just before Christmas, that is, after the great Rundstedt offensive had begun. We now have reports from almost all the foreign correspondents on the reaction in Germany to the first bulletins of victory. All agree that the spirit of 1940 rose from the grave with astounding vitality. When the news vendors began to call out "Great German Offensive" on the afternoon of December 18, some of the passers-by smiled at first, incredulously and maliciously. Then began such a battle for the newspapers as had not been seen in a long time. As later editions kept appearing with the headlines "Mighty German Offensive on a Broad Front in the West" and "American First Line Shattered," general enthusiasm developed. Men exchanged congratulations in the streets and in shops. The excitement grew as the good news continued through the following days. "Public opinion in Germany changed completely." The Nazi government was suddenly admired again. People decided they had done it an injustice. Enthusiasm mounted to such heights that official propaganda tried to dampen it. It remained high until, a few days later, the victorious advance was slowed. Then the flame of hope at once sank down again, and "the year ended in an atmosphere of gloom."

Drawing practical conclusions from defeat is technically known in Germany as "sich umstellen"—changing over, switching position. The Reich's diplomatic personnel in Switzerland is switching its position en masse; no fewer than nine members have recently severed their connections with the Berlin government. They are Prince Aloys Auerperg, air attaché, Dr. Georg Trump, press attaché, Gerhard Graf, Kultur attaché, plus a general consul, three consuls, the head of the Swiss office of the German News Bureau, and one of his assistants.

Outwardly all their cases were alike. All were ordered to Berlin "to report." All refused to go and left the service. Of course this account can conceal almost anything. But the gentlemen themselves declared that no deep secret lay behind it. In a brief justification of their action that they published for the benefit of Germans living in Switzerland, they reproached the Nazi government for only one thing—that it punished cruelly the slightest critical word uttered in private conversation. "But is there anyone among us," they asked, "except perhaps a few 150 per cent Nazi Party wheel horses, who has not from time to time made some critical remarks when talking with other Germans?" Clearly this was all that the gentlemen had on their conscience, and they charged the government only with excessive persecution of "even the slightest deviation from Nazi doctrine." They condemned such persecution, moreover, only because it "jeopardized the unity (Volksverbundenheit) of Germans abroad in an hour of grave danger."

The Swiss press without exception reacted unfavorably and characterized this kind of "switch" in uncharitable terms. We shall encounter it, however, more and more frequently, and not in isolated instances but by the million. Persons who thus shift their position assert, publicly or privately, consciously or subconsciously, that their defection is motivated by an objection to the minor vices of the dying regime; they do not repudiate its major crimes.

BOOKS and the ARTS

LETTER FROM FRANCE

BY LINCOLN KIRSTEIN

Somewhere in France, December 3

THIS is scarcely, as requested, a letter from Paris. But from the provinces one has a perspective on the events of today as well as on those of two and a half months ago, when I was there last. It was not surprising that anyone wandering into Paris during the first delirious days of the liberation expected, at the least, a new renaissance. The wine thrust into one's hand, the love and thanks that overwhelmed any American soldier, seemed to promise an immediate release of energies chained for four dreadful years.

It has not turned out that way. What we saw was a marvelous physical explosion, a heavenly yawning and stretching, the invalid's first faltering steps on the way to recovery. It was almost too much. From the provinces it looks like a slight relapse. Blood has started to pump back into the heart, but the real intellectual, moral, and artistic rebirth is bound to be slow in coming. And why not?

Americans, and I include all of us who have been in France for the last half-year, have no real comprehension of what the Germans did—from undeniable atrocity to cultural perversion. One hesitates even to make a slight criticism at the moment, since any American, in the past five years, has slept, eaten, smoked, and breathed better than any Frenchman. It is an error to think that suffering on the scale endured by France is "good" for the artist. It kills art and paralyzes artists so that their experiences are still-born so far as serving as subject matter.

How shocked some of us were when we paid a call on the editor of a review which now weekly holds together the great names of French letters! He had had a heroic clandestine career. But he was too angry even to be gracious. A cartoon had been submitted that he felt was too easy on some collaborating writers. The telephone wires crackled with gossip of épuration, vengeance, denunciation, and exasperation. Everyone, it seemed, had behaved badly except a few close friends. It was just like 1938. It was even rather comforting to realize, on leaving the wrangling office, that one of the constants of French character is that the more it changes the more it's the same thing. For the liberation was by no means a revolution, and the F. F. I., though once compared to the army of the Convention, has made of its capture of Strasbourg not a Valmy but another Allied victory.

From North Africa André Gide sends his journal of the arrival of the Americans in Algiers, and adds his name to the roster of the writers of the Resistance. The next week, in a withering J'Accuse, in the identical columns, Louis Aragon practically denies Gide the right to call himself a Frenchman, since he found the occupation the first occasion to learn German and read Goethe in the original.

The épuration, the purge, is less murderous than under Robespierre, but it has taken its toll. Stéphane Lauzanne, the most active Vichy journalist, was shot. De Brassilach is awaiting trial. Drieu de la Rochelle, once one of the glories of the Nouvelle Revue Française, tried unsuccessfully to expiate through suicide. De Montherlant, in an abject letter of apology, pretends to be a political idiot. He did not realize, with Céline and Sacha Guitry, what he was doing! He had hated the Jews before Hitler. Paul Morand, Pétain's ambassador to Rumania, is in Switzerland, and Gaston Bergery, minister to Turkey, has opened a dress shop in Ankara. René Benjamin is in prison, and Bernard Fay, the authority on North American culture, and Librarian of the National Collections under Vichy, is in very ill repute.

On the other side of the ledger Max Jacob, the Christian poet-painter of Jewish origin, died at Drancy, literally of mistreatment. Saint-Pol Roux, Jacques Decour, and Jean Prévost died under German bullets. The poets Mathias Lubeck, André Julien de Breuil, and Jean Desbordes were killed by the Vichy militia. Saint-Exupéry is counted as lost. Malraux, a colonel of the F. F. I. serving in the Vosges, is fighting, like so many others who may have families in hostile hands, under an assumed name. His study of Lawrence (D. H. or T. E.?) is announced.

The Académie Française reopened with a formal purging of Philippe Pétain from its roster, as well as his Minister for Culture, Abel Bonnard. It elected a great mathematician, the Prince de Broglie, André Siegfried, the economist, and Dr. Pasteur Valéry-Radot, an eminent physician. The other academies, the Goncourt and the Mallarmé, have undergone similar renovations.

An open contest for young writers held weekly by a good literary paper had for two recent subjects "Portrait of a Collaborator Who Has Turned His Coat," and "Books Which Have Done Most Harm to France in the Last Four Years." Cross-word puzzles appear in the form of the cross of Lorraine. The caricaturist Sennep has published his recent drawings; one of the best shows the Maréchal, with two bottles of Vichy water under his arm, begging pardon for bothering two Gestapo agents who are dismembering a nude. But there is no Daumier of the Resistance, and Picasso's "Dreams and Lies of Franco" were the last cartoons to treat their subjects with the dignified horror they deserve.

The last issue of the Nouvelle Revue Française appeared in July, 1943, and it will not be revived. It was put to the uses of Vichy. Its end was a sad commentary on the brilliant career which had launched so many brilliant careers. A number of weeklies are, for the time being, more or less filling the gap—notably Les Lettres Françaises, Carrefour, La Marseillaise, and other more popular magazines like Gavroche, Le Temps Présent, Action, and France d'Abord. Les Temps

Modernes, named after Chaplin's film, and promising the collaboration of Malraux, is announced. It first bore the title of La Condition Humaine. Its editor will be Jean Paul Sarthe, whose great and moving apostrophe to the Resistance, "La République de la Silence," started off the initial issue of the liberated Lettres Françaises.

The monthly reviews of arts and letters, some of which were continued in Switzerland and North Africa during the occupation, are taking up their Parisian headquarters. Notable among them are Fontaine, Renaissance, Confluences. Promised are L'Eternelle Revue, Esprit, Vrille, Les Quatre Vents, Miroirs (de luxe). There has been nothing de luxe about those that have so far appeared. Rationing of paper has almost amounted to censorship, and is a political issue. But the dailies continue to appear, as well as an increasing number of weeklies, purveying that fractional, factional, although precise and intelligent brand of opinion which American readers seldom consider a substitute for information. It was always thus, but one thing has made a real difference, namely, the recent reform laws, under which for the first time a paper is required to declare its actual ownership and circulation.

The Communist press, notably l'Humanité, has a large metropolitan following and is eagerly read in the industrial provinces. The daily with the greatest distinction of staff and style is perhaps Figaro, where one can read the exquisite prose and noble sentiments of François Mauriac of the Académie Française several times a week.

Paul Valéry has written a "Troisième Faust." This event of the first importance is to be celebrated by a special edition, replacing one of a hundred copies, secretly printed, which contained only fragments. (Other portions were heard recently over the B. B. C.) Valéry has contributed libretti for the use of contemporary composers, but this marks his debut as a dramatist. His "Faust" comprises two plays, the first part in a more or less comic mood. It is called "Lust," and in it we find Faust as an academician and author of several musical and dramatic works. The young woman, Lust, his secretary, rifles the archives to provide materials to aid his fading memory. Mephisto is a slightly tired clergyman who nevertheless recalls that he was once, in heaven, an archangel.

The second portion is entitled "Le Solitaire, ou les Malédiction de l'Univers." It is part fairy tale and part tragedy. Faust and Mephisto find themselves on the roof of the world, a mountain peak. The devil, short of breath, cannot stand the altitude. Faust throws himself into a fantastic cavern. This part is written in verse, the rest in prose. Valéry feels that his drama is indebted to Marlowe, Goethe, and the moralities of the Middle Ages. He began the play in July, 1940, during the worst hours of the flight from Paris. Valéry was up late, working, when there was a knock at the door. He went down to open it and found two enormous Feldgraus, helmeted, carrying an electric torch. They searched the house. The poet asked himself, "Have they come after my Faust or to make an inquest of my secret intentions?" But they passed by his desk, sought the roof, remarked that a slit of light was showing, and quit the house.

Gide is publishing his "Imaginary Interviews," which appeared fragmentarily during the occupation. He is as hotly defended as a patriot as he was attacked as complacent in the face of Vichy. His adaptation of Shakespeare's "Antony and Cleopatra" is announced for spring production at the Comédie Française, under the direction of Jean-Louis Barrault.

Mauriac, aside from his stint for Figaro, is supervising the scenario for the first importantly sponsored film of the Resistance, aided by the first cinema artists of France. The exteriors are now being shot. Mauriac chose the most vocative of recent verse to be declaimed by the voices of the Comédie at a recent gala, and spoke the program notes on the poets from the stage. The same theater, now under the direction of Pierre Dux, an eminent comic actor, recently revived with much success his savage "Asmodée."

Louis Aragon, whose "Crève-cœur" is well known in London and New York, is publishing a new collection of poems, "La Diane Française," and a very long novel, "Aurelian." This former surrealist, revolutionary, and even anti-patriot in the days of the popular front, emerges as the Victor Hugo of the Resistance. His quasi-official strophes on Paris, on the University of Strasbourg, on the Martyrs of Châteaubriand, give him the aspect of a laureate, but his "Musée Grevin," a long work named after the ghastly waxworks of the boulevards of the epoch when "Laval was Dauphin," and such great short poems as "Elsa au Miroir" demonstrate that he is still a poet.

Vercors (Jean Bruller), whose "Silence of the Sea" remains the classic description of the pure French spiritual attitude toward the German triumph, now edits in the open his Editions de Minuit, which were the highwater mark of clandestine publishing. But it is taken as a sign of the present slackness of creative writing that his lists mainly include reprints. I do not know whether his remarkable essay on "The Sufferings of My Country," written for America, received the attention it deserved. It is certainly the most eloquent sermon preached so far on the humbling of France and her present proud humility.

A great deal of poetry has been written on occasional themes. Aside from the poetry of Aragon, only the verses of Loys Masson, Paul Eluard, and Pierre Seghers seem to this writer to have much exportable value. It is curious to observe that the innovations of the surrealist imagery and idiom of the late thirties have been appropriated quite undiluted to serve as the academic voice for the official homage verses which are in as much demand today as the memorial wreaths deposited at the walls of executions in prisons and at the foot of statues whose pedestals alone remain.

The statue of Voltaire on the Quai was long since melted into German cannon, but the two-hundred-and-fiftieth anniversary of his birth is being widely celebrated in the state theaters and in libraries in Russia as well as in France. Max Jacob and Guillaume Apollinaire, victims and friends in war, now have streets bearing their names. We recall that the first to use the word surréalisme was le Poète Assassiné.

Malraux, speaking of painting, said that only the great works survive contact with sadness and death. Recently several writers of the Resistance were asked what authors they read in their captivity. Sarthe, author of "Le Mur," "La Nausée," and the remarkable play "Huis-Clos," was imprisoned at first in Baccarat for two months, and was, he admits, bored by the Memoirs of Montluc. But a history of the two Restorations by Vaulabelle offered impressive parallels between Pétain and Louis XVIII. He also read "Around the World in Eighty Days." In the prison at Trier he devoured Maurice Dekobra and was grateful to the French Ethel M. Dell for transporting him out of Germany to India, if only momentarily—also assorted detective stories, Sophocles, Racine, Bossuet, and "Sparkenbroke" (de Charles Morgan, sans grand plaisir). In German, he read the poems of Rilke and Hans Carossa. His two greatest discoveries were Claudel's "Soul of Satin," portions of which he tried to have enacted in the Stalag, and "Le Journal d'un Curé de Campagne." "Really, one could read no matter what, with passion, and those days stay marked with the book one read. There were the days of Somerset Maugham, of De Nerval, even the days of Maurice Dekobra."

Jean Paulhan, one of the founders of Les Lettres Françaises, was held incommunicado in the Santé. He tried to obtain a Bible from the German chaplain on the plea that he wished to be converted, but was refused. There were many legible descriptions scrawled upon the walls of his cell, but, alas! "these did not constitute a novel." So he tried to remember all the poems he had learned as a student. Three hundred lines of Leconte de Lisle "were a genuine comfort."

A conscientious effort is being made to catch up on recent British, American, and Russian music and writing. The N. R. F. is editing a series of "classics," the American works including, oddly enough, Melville's obscure "Bartleby the Scrivener," Virginia Woolf, Aldous Huxley, D. H. Lawrence are resuming their former popularity. On the stage Noel Coward, Eugene O'Neill, and Chekhov are hailed as allies, Boris was presented with much care at the Opera. Steinbeck's "The Moon Is Down" is serialized in a daily as "Nuits Noirs," and widely-praised as an exact picture of occupation.

Perhaps the most interesting of the new books promised will be an edition of the memoirs of the police chief Fouché, a figure with staggering likeness to the masters of the Gestapo. Duhamel's "Anthology of French Verse" was forbidden by the Germans and is nearly ready. A fine reproduction of the Bayeux tapestry—the original was recently shown undamaged in the empty Louvre—will be issued by Les Editions du Chêne, responsible for the best of the art books published under the occupation.

So much for a few notules. And it is impossible to make, in a phrase, any final generalization about the reemergence of the French spirit. It can be far better done a year from now when recollection, even of horrors, in some tranquillity, has allowed art to erect some new monuments in her almost accidental and unexpected way. Save for Picasso and the work of permanent value of Bonnard, little has happened in the plastic arts. Maillol died untainted by Hitler's admiration. Musical life revives with rather an insistence on Debussy, Gabriel Fauré, Dukas, and Ravel, but this can be forgiven when one recalls that there is a new generation of young Frenchmen, now approaching mature appreciation, who have never heard "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" (even in "Fantasia") or seen Courbet's "Burial at Ornans" or Delacroix's "Liberty on the Barricades." Architects are invoked to submit new projects, and the museums are being renovated.

In the big provincial capital near which I have been stationed since shortly after the Germans left, there is an activity which I am sure is typical of many parts of France, activity

For every American interested in the future of his country

DEMOCRACY UNDER PRESSURE

Special Interests vs. the Public Welfare

by STUART CHASE

"Government by pressure groups is so well established in this country that merely exploring it will get us nowhere. Mr. Chase sets out, therefore, to examine the phenomenon, to account for its origin and to calculate its trend. He does this in characteristically lively fashion. The impressive thing, and the important thing in his discussion is its clear demonstration of how under the present system the people are losing control of their own government. "Who is boss around here?" asks Mr. Chase, and no more important question can be put to American democracy. . . . Democracy Under Pressure is worth while because it does ask the question abruptly, sharply, clearly."—Gerald W. Johnson, N. Y. Herald Tribune. $1.00

This is the fourth volume in Stuart Chase's series, WHEN THE WAR ENDS. Have you read his earlier titles: THE ROAD WE ARE TRAVELING, GOALS FOR AMERICA and WHERE'S THE MONEY COMING FROM? Each $1.00

At all bookstores

THE TWENTIETH CENTURY FUND

220 West 42nd Street, New York 18, New York

which may prove the nursery for France's future inevitable greatness. The new mayor is by métier an iron-forgers, responsible not only for the magnificent restoration of the grills and gates of Jean l'Amour, the eighteenth-century master, but for the fine Maison du Peuple at Clichy. Renowned for his role in the Resistance, he was chosen to plan the local government. This he has done with dispatch and efficiency, but he has also formed a symphony orchestra which gives weekly concerts under the baton of Master Sergeant Walter Ducloux of New York, has arranged in the still empty museum a series of fascinating shows of regional art drawn from the rich local private collections, and is planning new industrial suburbs and the embellishment of the town by public works. His home is the delightful meeting place of French artists and engineers, American officers and enlisted men, and visiting members of De Gaulle's government. It is significant that when he was asked to go to Paris to fill a Cabinet position, he refused, feeling his first obligation was to his own pays. France is a land of such propres pays, and from them have gone the Rimbauds, Flauberts, and Lautrecs, to make Paris the focus, but not the face, of France.

Narcissa

Here every surface is forever gloss,
Even Time's smooth sliding
Is a great pier-glass for her, slowly drawn
In panoramic gliding.

Her days are hanging mirrors, and her hours,
Like ivory-handled looking-glasses, lie
On varnished dressers, ready to the hand,
Convenient to the eye.

And even the little moments, quickly taken,
Like a compact from a pocket in a purse,
Reflect, with brief but shining reassurance,
Their offered segment of the universe.

So to the street; and Oh, the city glitters
Brightly around her progress; where she treads,
The avenues are sleek and supple rivers,
Along whose banks the people turn their heads.

Their heads are turned, it seems, in admiration,
And the plate-glass windows gleam,
Holding, alike, her motion and her pauses,
Her fixity, her dream.

She walks below the trees, whose leaves are burnished
Spangles of bronze or copper, and whose bark
Is polished, like a colonnade of pillars,
Black marble, on the pathways of the park.

And after these, she comes to the round water,
Gun-metal color, luminous and dark,
Leans over the railings, looking at her halo,
Unbroken, in the perfect curving arc.

Beautiful world! And even more delightful,
In the secret close, to meet and recognize,
Double and pure and absolutely faithful,
Her smiling image in her lover's eyes.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Early Joyce

A LONG PASSAGE from the first version of James Joyce's "Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man" is contained in "Stephen Hero," edited and with an introduction by Theodore Spencer (New Directions, $3.50). It will be fascinating to readers of the final version and extremely valuable to students of Joyce. Much of it consists of scenes insufficiently developed, marred by sudden transitions. Consequently it may make little sense to the reader who does not know "The Portrait." But there is no longer any justification for ignorance of or indifference to any work by Joyce, who, it may now be said with assurance, used the language with a degree of consciousness greater than that of any other author who has written in English.

The beginning of this mastered consciousness of language—which reaches a true conclusion in the inexhaustible wonders of "Finnegans Wake"—shows itself when Stephen studies Skeats's "Etymological Dictionary." Yet at the same time he studies the life and the language of the streets. Thus it is clear that Joyce never permits his genius for the verbal to make him forget actual things and actual human beings. When Stephen Daedalus as an undergraduate struggles against the powerful claims of the church, of his family, and of the conventions of his time, he acts always from a profound sense of what is actual. He knows how abstractions and words often distort and hide actuality and truth. Despite his love of style in itself and language for its own sake, he constantly moves from word to thing, and from language to the experience which language should illuminate. In his mature work Joyce succeeds most of all when he is at once a great stylist and a great realist. In his first effort the double interest in language and experience is already formulated in Stephen's undergraduate essay, "Drama and Life." His theory, though directed against censorship and didacticism, cuts beneath these concerns to the principle stated and embodied in "Ulysses": "The fundamental question about a work of art is from how deep a life does it spring."

Depth of life, the full surface and the mind behind the surface, is achieved chiefly in the scenes between Stephen and his mother; and in this way "Stephen Hero" illuminates the guilt and remorse in "Ulysses." Elsewhere in this version, when the youthful Joyce is priggish, affected, pretentious, and of an uncritical seriousness, we are brought back to the statement in "The Portrait" that an artist makes no errors, since his errors are the portals of discovery. A reading of "Stephen Hero" suggests a less paradoxical statement of this truth, namely, that an artist always makes errors because his errors are his only means of arriving at certain discoveries.

DELMORE SCHWARTZ

Are You Sure You're So Clever?

THIS IS A COMMENT not so much on a book as on its publishers. Carlton Brown's "Brainstorm" (Farrar and Rinehart, $2.75) tells the story of an actual person who, for a relatively short period, fell victim to an intense mental derangement. The author "novelizes" his story—that is, he moves beyond the clinical objectivity of the ordinary case-history to make immediate and moving both the internal and external conditions of the patient. This he does with considerable literary skill; and so far as a layman can judge, his handling of the medical and institutional aspects of the case is balanced and intelligent. In short, Mr. Brown's book is serious and perhaps useful. It is therefore worth noting the methods which are being used in its promotion. When I received a letter from the publishers which bragged of the book's "sensational" style, I was unwilling to decide whether it was ignorance of the language or cynicism which prompted the choice of the adjective. But having watched the publishers daily exploit in their advertisements the vague fear of insanity which is endemic in the public, I am willing to exonerate them of any charge of ignorance. "Are you sure you're so clever?" "Why are you vaguely uneasy?" "Did you really sleep well last night? Did you?"—it is with questions like these that they promote the sale of what they cozily describe as "the intimate story of a man gone mad." Observe that "intimate"—if it worked with halitosis and B. O., why shouldn't it work with insanity? What could be more intimate than a mind? Perhaps we can soon expect photographs of two people whispering behind cupped hands and the caption "What are they really saying about you?" It is a notable piece of irresponsible brutality, and of the people who are perpetrating it we would like to ask the question, "Did you really sleep well last night? Or did your conscience bother you the least little bit?"

LIONEL TRILLING

Malarkey

FOR FIFTEEN unhappy though highly lucrative years I sat in cubicles in various advertising agencies manufacturing the sort of malarkey described in "The Advertising Smoke Screen," by Blake Clark (Harpers, $2). Lately my advertising acquaintances have been telling me that those bad old days have gone forever, but the bulk of the content of Sergeant Clark's devastating book indicates that advertising today is on the whole even more terrible than it was prior to World War I, despite all the pious protestations of committees on advertising ethics.

The hard-hitting author, whose article on cigarette advertising in the Reader's Digest raised such almighty hob, is in the good tradition of Stuart Chase, James Rorty, and a few, too few, others, when he names the names of the corporations, their products, and their advertising agencies which are currently repeating the Great Lies.

Sergeant Clark goes to the horse's mouth for his indictments, taking his material from the Federal Trade Commission's complaints against fraudulent advertising. He tells us that the commission, ridiculously undermanned as it is, handled, in 1943, more than 1,500 cases of false advertising claims at a cost of one and one-half cents per citizen. With precision aim Sergeant Clark, backed up by the FTC, picks off the heavy battalions of the advertising armies, the big cigarette manufacturers, the toothpaste purveyors, the laxative lads, the prevention-of-baldness boys, the common-cold commandos, the vitamin vultures.

One discouraging feature of the business is the way in

5 Magazine Combinations that will save you money!

• THE Nation
and HARPERS MAGAZINE $6.50
You save $2.50

• THE Nation
and CONSUMERS UNION $7.00
You save $1.50

• THE Nation
and HARPERS MAGAZINE
and CONSUMERS UNION $9.00
You save $3.50

• THE Nation
and FREE WORLD $7.50
You save $1.50

• THE Nation
and SATURDAY REVIEW of LITERATURE $8.50
You save $1.50

• THE Nation
by itself: 1 Year $5—2 Years $8—3 Years $11
You save $2.00 for two years, $4.00 for three years

Convenient Order Form

The Nation Associates, Inc.
Twenty Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Please send the following magazine combinations, for which I enclose $.....

Magazines.....

Name.....

Street.....

City..... Zone & State.....

Canadian & Foreign Postage $1 extra 1-27-45 which supposedly reputable researchers and publishers lend themselves to the promotion of the hokum emanating from the copy-writers' cubicles. In the matter of toothpastes, let it be said to the honor of the dental profession that its members come off a lot better than do the medicos connected with the fraudulent cigarette claims. Gatherings of dentists have denounced all the ballyhoo about the magic powers of any particular brand of dentrifice, and their journals have refused to take such advertising.

This book is no generalized, wholesale indictment of advertising per se. The author recognizes its legitimate function in the fields of mass production under a profit system. He gives due credit to honest advertisers and the efforts of Printer's Ink, the trade journal of the profession, and other bodies struggling against seemingly insuperable odds to clean house.

MC ALISTER COLEMAN

China to Emily Hahn

THE POLITICS of Emily Hahn's story of what China meant to her too easily goes overlooked in the face of the titillation of the lively and otherwise diverting pages of "China to Me" (Doubleday, Doran, $3). But the unwary reader, and there will be many for a book of this type, will nevertheless gain a very definite political slant on China, cleverly angled by a clever writer and adding up to a thoroughly distorted picture.

A wary reader might be inclined to ask what qualifications the author has for dealing with Chinese politics. "Mickey"

Hahn's years in China were spent almost exclusively in three cities—Shanghai, Hongkong, and Chungking. At Chungking she apparently underwent the bombings with some fortitude, for which she deserves full credit, but this can hardly be considered a representative contact with the Chinese war effort. Her closest insight into things Chinese came through Sinmay, admittedly a dilettante who never left Shanghai if he could help it. She had contacts with important people—the Soong sister she most admired was Madame Kung. Madame Sun Yat-sen would not even see Emily Hahn, and she comes off pretty badly in "Mickey's" book. The ordinary Chinese soldier is a very indistinct figure in these pages. Peasants or landlords are completely out; they were not part of the China that impinged on Emily Hahn.

And yet this is the writer who dares to say that the American public is being misled by Evans Carlson, Edgar Snow, and Agnes Smedley, writers who have not spent all their time in Shanghai or Hongkong or even Chungking but have gone to the soil on which the Chinese people live and for which they fight. These writers need no vindication, of course; the facts to which they have correctly borne witness will henceforth supply increasing proof of their contentions, despite the airy wave of Mickey Hahn to the contrary.

At times the cleverness of this author overreaches itself. In the middle of her page attacking Snow, Evans, Smedley, et al. is an italicized sentence to the effect that she is not "running them down"—oh, my, no!—just insinuating that they have deluded the American public about China. Her prejudices—the strongest one is against "leftists," a term she much affects—are almost as fascinating as her naivete. God rest her soul! Both China and the leftists may, perhaps, manage to outlive even Emily Hahn's commentary.

T. A. BISSON

CONTROVERSY

He who knows only his own side of the case, knows little of that.—J. Stuart Mill Men are never so likely to settle a question rightly, as when they discuss it freely.
—Macaulay

Controversy is an open forum for the discussion of vital issues of today, and the opinions and ideas of all schools of thought. The bulk of the magazine is composed of forums, debates and individual opinion articles. For a true understanding of what is going on in the world you must have a knowledge of both sides of the basic issues of today and tomorrow. Reading Controversy may modify your views; if not, it will surely solidify them. Here is the only place where any person with something to say (and knows how to say it) may express himself.

A few features in the winter issue:
Heated Discussion of the Race Problem

The Campus Circus... Malcolm Boyd
Is the Atlantic Charter a Pretention?... Julius Weil
I Voted to Strike... Benjamin Ball
Evolution of the Radical Writer... William Walker
How to Detect an Anti-Semite... P. Reut
Reply to a Critic... Gabriel Grundy } A Debate
Are We Fighting for a Better World?... Leon Coloutos
Realism on the Road to Peace... John McWilliams Departments: The American Scene, Literature,
Book and Magazine Reviews
Send the coupon TODAY, please.

CONTROVERSY, 212 E. & M. Bldg., West Chester, Pa.

Enter my subscription to Controversy for:

☐ 1 year $2.00 ☐ 6 months $1.00 ☐ 3 years $3.00

Send the winter issue immediately

Name.....

Address.....

Ortega on Education

DESPITE ITS PONTIFICAL STYLE and the unnecessarily long-winded introduction by the translator, Ortega y Gasset's "Mission of the University" (Princeton, $2) contains a number of interesting ideas. The author pleads for a simplification of the university curriculum to a basic minimum of studies, mandatory for all students. Universities should be organized around "the student"—what he is and what he needs—and not around "the professor" or "knowledge." But the student turns out to be a least-common-denominator type, not an individual. An intimate relation between the professional schools and the university is encouraged, but in the teaching of the professions "science," conceived as discovery or investigation of truth, has no place. Students should learn what has been discovered by teachers who are not necessarily scientists. "The teaching of the professions and the search for truth must be separated." This is innocent enough if it means no more than that an experimental research seminar is very inadequate as an introductory course in science, and that a physician does not have to be a trained physiologist. But if Ortega y Gasset's dictum means that science on any level is to be taught as a series of discovered truths, out of books, without a laboratory practice which makes "finding out" a genuine experience, then his recommendation is educationally vicious. For it misconceives the nature of science and the spirit behind it.

The most arresting suggestion of the book is that a Faculty of Culture should be central in university instruction. Its function is to teach the vital ideas, the active convictions "at the height of the times," in the form of syntheses of knowledge. There are certain ambiguities that becloud the proposal. Are universities to teach only one philosophical synthesis of "the world and man" or a variety? Presumably any they believe in, so long as it is the result of uncoerced inquiry. In that case, what Ortega's suggestion amounts to is an invitation to cooperation and cross-fertilization between faculties—a modest but sound idea. This characterization also applies to his suggestion that the university, as a group of scholars, should participate in the contemporary life of the people and recognize the fundamental problems of social policy as its own. "The university is science in addition." The addition is history—or the life of the time. In America at any rate many universities have already carried out some of Ortega's ideas episodically. His point is that it should be done everywhere systematically.

The essay was first published in 1930. That it should be so topical for current educational discussion, notwithstanding the profound structural differences between American and European universities, is a sign that the author raises some fundamental questions.

SIDNEY HOOK

Writers in Exile

PETER M. LINDT, whose German-language broadcasts are known to many Nation readers, has recorded his programs in a little book entitled "Schriftsteller im Exil," with a foreword by President Shuster of Hunter College (Willard Publishing Company, $3.20). Besides being a report of interesting conversations before the microphone, the book constitutes a small directory of German writers now in the United States. The list of names should give Hitler something to think about.

Dance Note

EVERY once in a while an artist turns up on Broadway whose heightened sense of life intensifies our own. Josephine Prémice, Haitian singer and dancer, who appeared on a program with Hadassah and Pearl Primus at the Times Hall theater week before last, is one of these. Like Carmen Amaya, whose quality and art are quite different from hers, Prémice is a live, rich personality working in a live, rich tradition; both are authentic. Prémice's gestures appear as casual and inevitable as breathing, yet involve a process quite as complicated. Everything she does has effortless authority—her approach, manner, wit, the wriggle of her hips, the way she looks at an audience. An inner, absolute timing, projected in voice and gesture, hits the audience straight and is as immediately invigorating as a blood transfusion. The Negro-French elements of Haitian folklore, moreover, produce an art that in its own way has complexities and fascinations as beguiling as those of the Spanish-Arabic flamenco. The carnival and voodoo songs which form the basis of her performance combine the sophistication and naivete which characterize Prémice herself. Both are delightful.

VIRGINIA MISHNUN

CONCERTS

NEW SERIES • FIVE PAIRS OF CONCERTS
STOKOWSKI
 N. Y. CITY SYMPHONY
 Single and Subscription SEATS NOW
 JAN. 29-30, Musorgsky, music from Boris Godunov; Miskovsky Symphony No. 21; Rimsky-Korsakov, Scheherazade.
 FEB. 12-13, 26-27; MAR. 12-13, 19-20.
 At Boxoffice — 90¢ — $1.20 — $1.80
 N. Y. City Center, 131 W. 55th St.

MOTION PICTURES

20th Century-Fox presents
ANNE BAXTER JOHN HODIAK
Sunday Dinner for a Soldier
 ON STAGE • IN PERSON
 Cafe Zanzibar Revue
BILL ROBINSON • MAURICE ROCCA
DELTA RHYTHM BOYS
 Extra—LOUIS ARMSTRONG and his Orchestra
 Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

"One of the Best That We Shall See This Year"
 —Crowther, N. Y. Times.

TWO CITIES FILMS presents

MR. EMMANUEL
 starring FELIX AYLMER
 with GRETA GYNT and WALTER RILLA
 Brandt's GOTHAM B'way and 47th St.

"BEST OF THE WAR!"—Walter Winchell.

THE FIGHTING LADY
 With Lt. Robert Taylor as narrator
 A Louis de Rochemont production • Released by 20th Century-Fox
 Now Playing VICTORIA B'way at 46th Street

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD presents
BOBBY CLARK in
MEXICAN HAYRIDE
 by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHURT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
 Matinee Wednesday and Saturday, 2-30

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Readers of The NATION are cordially invited to

The 40th Anniversary Dinner

of the
League For Industrial Democracy
Saturday, Feb. 3, 1945, 6:30 P. M.
Grand Ballroom, Roosevelt Hotel,
New York City

SUBJECT:

"The Battle Ahead for Industrial Democracy"

Speakers

UPTON SINCLAIR

Pulitzer Prize Winner

ARTHUR CREECH JONES

British Labor M. P.

FRANK SCOTT

Chairman, Canadian C.C.F.

Greetings and Brief Remarks by:

Newbold Morris
Hon. Jerry Voorhis
Fannie Hurst
Julius Hochman
George Baldanz
Charles G. Bolte
Adolph Held
John L. Childs

Frada Kirchwey
Harry A. Overstreet
Paul R. Porter
Theresa Wolfson
Norman Thomas
Wallace J. Campbell
John Paul Jones
And others

Presentation to

HARRY W. LAIDLER

Executive Director, L.I.D.

MARK STARR

President of L.I.D., Chairman

Tickets $5.00 a place should be ordered immediately from

League For Industrial Democracy
112 East 19th Street New York City

ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE

A monograph for use by physicians, psychiatrists, psychotherapists, social workers, clergymen, patients and relatives:

by ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D., Instructor in Psychiatry, Johns Hopkins University Medical School; Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist, Johns Hopkins Hospital; Medical Director, Harriem Lodge, Catonsville, Md.; Medical Director, The Farm for Alcoholic Patients, Howard County, Md.; Executive Director, The National Committee on Alcohol Hygiene, Inc.

and VICTORIA CRANFORD, Psychotherapist and Rorschach Analyst, Harriem Lodge, Catonsville, Md.; The Farm for Alcoholic Patients, Howard County, Md.

edited by: HAROLD S. GOODWIN, Day City Editor, The Baltimore Sun, Baltimore, Md.

Table of Contents

1. The Purpose of this Monograph's Therapy (Treatment)
2. Are You an Alcoholic?
3. IF You Are an Alcoholic
4. What Really Drives You to Drink?
5. Alcoholism Doesn't Make Sense
6. Taking the Moral Burden
7. Life Without Liquor
8. Glossary

End covers: (Front) The Liquor Test
(Back) Re-educational Guides

ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS

9000 Park Ave., Baltimore 17, Maryland
Please send me: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE

- ☐ Copies $1.00 Paper bound
☐ Copies $2.00 Cloth bound

Name.....

Address.....

Films

JAMES
AGEE

SEVERAL of the fairly important movies of last year, such as "Going My Way," were reviewed in this column in a couple of sentences because, lacking space at the moment, I thought I should at least add my own mention of their existence, and expected to talk about them in detail later on. I will open the New Year, a few weeks late, faithful to the same dubious policy. All of the following movies are more or less worth seeing; most of them are worth detailed comment. In case I never get around to that, here at least is a checklist.

"The Fighting Lady," a color documentary about an aircraft carrier, contains the most beautiful shots of air warfare I have seen. "Brought to Action" is a succinct, well-made record and laymen's exposition of last October's Battle for the Philippines. "The Unknown Battle," a March of Time abridgment of an Air Forces indoctrination film, contains especially fine shots of airmen in their briefing rooms, just before their missions over Germany, and answering their interrogators, just after the missions are completed.

"I'll Be Seeing You," the first American film story about a psychological war casualty, sacrifices much of its great possible value and interest to a painfully artificial set of hero-heroine complications. But there is also a beautiful performance by Joseph Cotten; and there are enough other unpretentiously good things to make a dozen average pictures.

"The Suspect" tells sympathetically about a man who kills his wife, marries the girl he loves, and lives happily until his conscience—which remains free and easy about the first wife—catches up with him. Such a story ought logically to cause the Legion of Decency to scalp itself with eyebrow-raising. Told straight, perhaps it would. Told as period melodrama, it will probably trouble nobody. The film is well acted by Charles Laughton, Rosalind Ivan, Henry Daniell, Stanley Ridges, and Ella Raines, and well if floridly directed by Robert Siodmak.

The screen version of Graham Greene's "Ministry of Fear," which is directed by Fritz Lang, is by all rights a better thriller. I didn't like it as well. It is stiff with movie talent and intelligence; so stiff it can hardly move. Perhaps its worst trouble is its lack of a simple enough emotional or human center. Each effective scene—and there are many—has to raise itself by its own cold will. But as a textbook for movie melodrama it is very interesting indeed.

"Guest in the House" is for anyone who has ever run foul of the special kind of pathetic young woman whom it follows through her efforts to destroy a family. My wonder is that her victims, in the film, fail to see through her the moment they meet her; yet I suppose they are reasonably true to life in that. Not having seen the play, I can't compare performances, but I thought Anne Baxter hated and feared and understood the girl as well, anyhow, as the writing gave her a chance for, and knew well enough how to communicate her; I also enjoyed the work of Ralph Bellamy, Ruth Warrick, and Percy Kilbride. But to single out and impale so easy an object of popular loathing seems too thin and easy a way to write a hit.

That is my objection also to two current anti-Nazi melodramas, "Tomorrow, the World" and the British-made "Mr. Emmanuel." The broad idea of "Tomorrow, the World"—the juxtaposition of a Nazi-trained child and a well-meaning liberal American family—might be good, and the working out is at least sincere and, while it lasts, absorbing. But the film—again I missed the play—hardly gets beyond using its basic idea as a kind of tension, and varying the stresses. There is not much depth of perception, either of the child or of those who suffer him, and whom he suffers; and so in turn the idea itself is not very well served.

I don't like even the basic idea of "Mr. Emmanuel"; it is a great deal too easy to tear your audience to bits through the mere thought of a gentle old English Jew who is innocent and brave enough to go to Germany and ask dangerous questions during the late 1930's. Genius might get away with such a vulgar idea, but there is no genius involved in this production. The picture is, however, so intelligently made, and so intelligently acted by Felix Aylmer; Walter Rilla, and Greta Gynt—if acting is the word for what she does—that it is reasonably sure to get under your skin whether or not you resist its cardstacking and complacency. I hope it is seen by a few people I know (and a few million others I can through them assume) who can still talk comfortably with the more genteel types of anti-Semite. A blow from a mace of its coarseness might conceivably cause them to scratch their heads.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IF YOU have wondered why the Metropolitan's productions of opera are discussed so little in this column the reason is that its press department has not been able to persuade Assistant Manager Earle Lewis that a review in The Nation is worth the money he can get for a pair of good seats. And if I am able to report on "The Marriage of Figaro" it is because the press department managed to wangle back from one of the newspapers a pair of the excellent seats that are permanently assigned to the daily press.

"Figaro" as performed the last two seasons has been the greatest experience one could have at the Metropolitan; and it is still that, even though this year's performance is not up to last year's. Where Bruno Walter's treatment of the music was relaxed and spacious, Erich Leinsdorf's is tense and driving: he rushes hetically not only through particular pieces of music—through everything up to Cherubino's first aria, for example—but from one thing to the next. Thus, not only is his pace for Dove sono rather fast for the meditative character of both words and music, but he does not pause long enough for Eleanor Steber's pianissimo singing of the reprise to create the wonderful effect it did last year. So throughout, and worst of all at the end, when he goes from the hushed exclamations at the Countess's unexpected entrance to the Count's Contessa, perdono! without a pause sufficient to prepare the audience for this concluding sublimity.

On the other hand I was newly impressed this time by Herbert Graf's imagination and skill in laying out the lines of the action on the stage and filling in detail. But I still feel that a few of the details should be changed. In the second act Susanna tries one of her caps on Cherubino; but she has measured herself against him, and should try one of her dresses on him. During this scene, moreover, Steber may intend the Countess to appear distraught; but what she achieves is an appearance of lacking interest and not being involved in what is going on; and the Countess should be an interested onlooker. Far worse is what Sayao does in the Countess's cloak and hat in the last act: it is the antics of a child in the clothes of an adult, not the exaggerated-ly grand movements of a maid in the clothes of her mistress; it gets laughs, but so would the dramatically right thing. The mistake may be Graf's; or he may lack the power to correct Sayao, who is guilty of other excesses—mostly of pertness—throughout the opera.

That is the only defect in the work of a superb cast. The outstanding performance is Steber's Countess: as I wrote last year, nobody I have seen in the role conveyed as she does the neglected young wife's beauty, spirit, and wounded pride, her humiliation at having to involve herself with her servants in stratagems against her husband; and she sings the part beautifully, using a small but lovely voice with fine musical taste and moving expressiveness. As it happens, Sayao also has a small voice of brighter timbre, which she uses with equal taste and expressiveness, and which blends perfectly with Steber's; so that their singing of the Letter Duet is one of the most enchanting moments in the opera. The Cherubino this year is Risé Stevens—amusingly gawky, and with her singing free of the tremolo and the explosiveness in phrasing that afflicted it two years ago. Brownlee's Count is good. And Pinza's Figaro—rather than his Don Giovanni—is, in my opinion, his best performance. (What is good in his Figaro is not good in his Don Giovanni: it makes him a Giovanni, not a Don.) As for the smaller parts in the ensemble, they are excellently done by Baccaloni, De Paolis, and the rest.

The first of Lotte Lehmann's series of three Lieder-recitals was devoted to Schubert and Schumann, and provided another impressive demonstration of the art that has been refined and perfected by the need of discretion in the use of an aging voice. The voice, at this concert, was still lovely; the art more moving than ever; but they were revealed in a program whose too many archnesses and inanities imposed less strain on the voice than they did, after a while, on the hearer's—or at any rate on this hearer's—patience. However there was every now and then an outstanding song which was made into an unforgettable experience. If we have seen and heard the last of Lehmann's great performances in the opera house we may still experience her gifts of dramatic characterization and projection in the concert hall—in her side-splitting performance of Schumann's "Kartenlegerin," among others.

CONTRIBUTORS

DOROTHY B. JONES served for more than two years as head of the Film Reviewing and Analysis Section of the OWI Bureau of Motion Pictures. The opinions expressed in her article, however, are her own.

PETER STEVENS is the pseudonym of an American writer who had an official post in North Africa in 1942-43.

DOROTHY BARUCH, author of "You, Your Children, and War," has acted as special consultant for the War Manpower Commission in Southern California.

FRITZ STERNBERG, a German economist, is the author of "From Nazi Sources: Germany's War Chances."

PRIVATE LINCOLN KIRSTEIN is an interpreter in a Regional Military Government unit, attached to the Third Army.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Price 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, $1. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index. Two weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

Civil Rights Defense Committee

MASS MEETING

To Greet the Defendants in the Minneapolis Labor Case
To be released from prison
January 24

These 18 CIO and Socialist Workers Party leaders are the first victims of the unconstitutional Smith "Gag" Act. Their freedom was demanded by labor and fraternal organizations representing over 4,000,000 members.

Speakers:

4 of the released prisoners:
James P. Cannon Farrell Dobbs
Albert Goldman Felix Morrow

Also:

James T. Farrell, noted novelist
Osmond K. Fraenkel, Counsel,
American Civil Liberties Union
And CIO and AFL representatives

HOTEL DIPLOMAT

108 West 43d St., N. Y. C.

FRIDAY, FEB. 2

8:15 P. M.

Admission, 25c

PUBLIC LIBRARY
ASTORIA, OREGON

its 100TH APPEARANCE

WHEN IS A 'CROSSWORD' NOT A 'CROSS WORD'?

When it's The Nation puzzle, which, continuing its checkered career, makes its 100th appearance this week. For you can't call it a "cross word" in the old-fashioned sense: it's more of an armchair detective problem really—complete with clues, false scents, red herrings, and whatnot. Especially whatnot.

Yes, when you settle back in a comfortable chair, with pipe and bowl handy, to tackle a Nation Crossword, your mind is soon being pleasantly titillated in a battle of wits with our own Professor Moriarty. Not that there's anything unfair about our Professor's methods, mind you. On the contrary. He's just a whimsically humorous, quizzical sort of fellow with playful habits—one of them being his ingenious way of actually telling you the answer you want! Judge Patrick H. O'Brien wrote recently: "... often, when I find the answer, I get a good laugh at my own stupidity for not having been able to see it at a glance."

If you haven't yet fallen under the spell, try your 'prentice hand on the puzzle on this page. Even if you don't completely solve it, we wager you'll be proud of your own perspicacity before you've progressed very far. Reference books are not a sine qua non—it's the use of "the little gray cells" that counts. Plus, of course, a nodding acquaintance with the simple facts of life.

Convenient Order Form

THE NATION

1-27-45

20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

Please enter a "Nation" subscription for the period indicated below. I enclose $_____ or, bill me ☐.

☐ 1 Year $7 ☐ 2 Years $8

☐ 3 years $11

Name .....

Address .....

Canadian and Foreign: $1.00 extra.

Crossword Puzzle No. 100 by JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Young horse with an able seaman amidsthips facing aft
- 5 You in sport perhaps, but unlikely
- 9 A change from shortbread for the Scot
- 11 Turner makes a comeback
- 12 Patron saint of Scotland
- 13 They think too much of themselves
- 14 Found in the heart of a forest
- 17 Move in here
- 19 They are not for men
- 22 Must be incarnate, since he can be fined
- 23 Foolish—like the answer
- 25 "----- the rugged rocks the ragged rascals ran"
- 26 It is over even the radio expert's head
- 27 Number of yards of cloth in a Highland kilt (one version)
- 29 Scoffed
- 31 Ali, Ena, Ted are estranged, as you can see
- 34 Retreat
- 36 "Cherry -----, -----, I cry" (Cherry -----)
- 37 Put its head on its tail and get the supposed original of the mermaid
- 39 South American Indians' arrow poison
- 40 Ran off to Gretna Green
- 41 Must have had a lot of rain when we visited Venice . . . these were full of water
- 42 Hawkshaw, the defective detective perhaps
- 43 Put thy ear to the ground

DOWN

- 1 A Sidney who voluntarily went to the guillotine to save his successful rival in love
- 2 Live in luxury

- 3 Learning in a disguised rôle
- 4 Orangemen might find in this a distinctive flavor of old Ireland
- 5 Cheap fish?
- 6 Two make a score
- 7 When he took ship he didn't register as a passenger
- 8 Virtue is its own
- 10 Peculiar for ways that are dark and tricks that are vain
- 15 Am a ruin in Europe
- 16 Not one that makes a long ~~ness~~ in play
- 17 Uniform
- 18 "Six hours -----, in law's grave study six" (two words, 2 and 5)
- 20 Heber wrote of its coral strand
- 21 A ship (anag.)
- 24 Seems to prove that two heads are better than one (hyphen, 4-1-4)
- 28 "How fleet is a ----- of the mind!"
- 29 A gentle slope
- 30 You may have read his Cobwebs from an Empty Skull?
- 32 Tip the favorite and get something for your neck
- 33 Add lye for fatal results
- 35 A Sidney who once found it ~~as~~ hot that he took off his flesh and sat in his bones
- 37 Broken rest
- 38 Here is our hotel, Sarah (hidden)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 99

ACROSS:—1 PLEASURE; 8 REMOUNT; 9 ANT HILLS; 10 GILBERT; 12 THREE; 13 COLLAR; 14 DORIC; 15 RANDOM; 17 ARROW; 22 STUMP; 23 FATHER; 24 LOCAL; 26 METEOR; 28 MINED; 29 DEMOTED; 30 PAINTING; 31 PARABLE; 32 MADRIGAL.
DOWN:—1 PSALTERY; 2 ENTERING; 3 SWINE; 4 RELICT; 5 DEVIL; 6 LOW-BROW; 7 ENTRAIN; 10 GLORY; 11 LADOGA; 16 OUTLET; 18 EMBED; 19 SHUNT; 19 PROBIGAL; 21 FOREMAN; 22 SAMOVAR; 25 ARMADA; 27 TESLA; 28 MANOR.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 3, 1945

NUMBER 5

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS	113
EDITORIALS
Constantin Oumansky by Freda Kirchwey	115
F. D. R. to Jesse Jones—An Imaginary Letter	116
ARTICLES
"Look Here Upon This Picture . . ." by I. F. Stone	117
The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté	119
The Politics of World Security by Grayson Kirk	120
Polish Land Reform by Anna Louise Strong	122
Tomorrow the Movies IV. Is Hollywood Growing Up? by Dorothy B. Jones	123
G. O. P. Sales Conference by Milburn P. Akers	125
In the Wind	126
POLITICAL WAR
No Vatican Plan for Italy? by Gaetano Salvemini	127
Dangerous Experts by Pacificus	128
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus	129
BOOKS AND THE ARTS
The Little Money by Jacques Barzun	130
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall	131
Briefer Comment	134
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch	136
Films by James Agee	136
Music by B. H. Haggin	137
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR	138
CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 101	140

Editor and Publisher
FRED A. KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor	Washington Editor	Literary Editor
J. KING GORDON	I. F. STONE	MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section
J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor	Music Critic	Drama Critic
J. MITCHELL MORSE	B. H. HAGGIN	JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
Business Manager	Advertising Manager
HUGO VAN ARX	MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates
LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors
NORMAN ANGELL    JONATHAN DANIELS
LOUIS FISCHER    CAREY MCWILLIAMS    REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE PRIMARY EMPHASIS OF THE TEHERAN agreement was on cooperation for the defeat of Germany, and the vast improvement in the military situation since it was signed is sufficient proof of how much it accomplished. But this very success is beginning to underline the inadequacy of the political clauses of the agreement. With Germany invaded on two fronts and with prospects for its collapse improving daily, the long-awaited second meeting of the Big Three cannot take place too soon. One of their first aims should be to attempt to dispel the belief that Teheran was the occasion of an old-fashioned imperialist deal. They could best do this by giving full publicity to their solutions for such problems as Poland and Greece; vague generalities about "full agreement on all points" are not going to satisfy the thirst for information in America and Britain. Germany seems likely to occupy top place on the agenda of the conference. If we wish to counteract the Goebbels line that "unconditional surrender" implies total annihilation of the Reich and slavery for all Germans, it would be well to announce authoritatively just what plans the Allies have in store for Germany. Obviously the terms imposed will be severe; about that the Germans themselves can have no illusions. But while they are left to assume the worst, many of them will be apt to heed Nazi orders to fight to the death. Only if we can make it clear to them that their future, while grim, is not unutterably dark, that when they have atoned for their crimes and renounced aggression they will be readmitted to the family of nations, can we hope to appeal successfully to them to oust their leaders and lay down their arms. Eventually, no doubt, our arms will be victorious, but an intelligent political offensive at this moment might well hasten the end and save many thousands of lives.

★

PREMIER KOISO HAS WEATHERED AT LEAST THE first stage of the political storm that has risen within Japan as a result of recent United Nations victories. But his grip on the helm of the Japanese ship of state can hardly be described as secure. The steady American march toward Manila, the continuing Chinese, British, and American victories in Burma, and the never-ending aerial bombardment of Japan's inner-island defenses and prime industrial establishments on the home islands are hardly likely to dispel the whirlwind of criticism that has risen about the Koiso regime. Nor is the Premier's acceptance of a new all-powerful totalitarian party in Japan likely to strengthen his grip. For the real power in Japan remains in the hands of the military extremists. At the moment Koiso is useful as a scapegoat to distract popular attention from the catastrophe which threatens Japan.

■ ■ result of the policies which they have promoted. But having saddled the blame for Japan's plight on the Premier, the military clique will sooner or later be obliged to drive him from office in the same manner as they were forced to rid themselves of Tojo. Under these circumstances governmental crises are of course significant only in that they reveal the power of popular discontent even under an authoritarian regime.

✱

THE ISSUE OF CARPATHO-RUSSIA, WHICH EARLIER London reports indicated might occasion a fundamental rift in Czech-Soviet relations, appears to be merely a teapot tempest. Neither government involved shows the least sign of getting agitated. This small territory, bordering on Hungary and the Polish and Rumanian provinces now claimed by the Soviet Ukraine, was, at the outbreak of war, inhabited by some 300,000 Ruthenians of basic Ukrainian stock, 80,000 Jews, and 20,000 Magyars. By the treaty of 1919 it was made part of the Czechoslovak Republic, which contributed considerably to its educational and economic improvement by building schools, roads, and other public projects. In March, 1939, ■ few days before the Nazis moved into Prague, Hungary seized the territory. The Czech-Soviet pact of December 12, 1943, pledged that Carpatho-Russia would be returned to Czechoslovakia. Now it appears that certain genuine Ruthenian nationalists have been joined by former pro-Horthy quislings in pressing for ■ union between Carpatho-Russia and the Soviet Ukraine. It may be that the movement has received some encouragement from Kiev broadcasts. But those who anticipate ■ rift in Czech-Soviet relations overlook the sound common sense of Premier Benes and the determination of his government and Moscow to keep their pledges to the letter. If after the close of the war the Ruthenian majority decides by a plebiscite to change the national affiliation of Carpatho-Russia, Prague is not likely to stand in the way.

✱

MR. KING OF CANADA IS UNEASY OVER THE doings of the voters in Grey North, the Ontario electoral district that fronts on the icy shores of Lake Huron. For the voters have chosen two non-Liberal Party candidates to oppose Mr. King's Cabinet minister, General McNaughton, who must find ■ seat in the House of Commons so as to discharge his new duties ■ Minister of Defense. The two opposition candidates are the Mayor of Owen Sound, Garfield Case, who represents the Progressive-Conservative Party—only don't be fooled by the prefix—and Air Vice-Marshal A. E. Godfrey, nominated by the C. C. F. and backed to the limit by the Political Action Committee (P. A. C.) of the Canadian Congress of Labor. Reports indicate that it is anybody's race, and Mr. King is worried. On January 12 he addressed a special letter to the voters of Grey North pleading with them to get behind General McNaughton—all of them. On January 23 he wrote ■ second letter, rather brusque this time, with some unpleasant remarks for the Progressive-Conservatives and the C. C. F., and implying that if there was not ■ wholesale withdrawal of opposition candidates by nomination day (January 29) he might call for a speedy dissolution of Parliament and a general election. Mr. King does not want an election, if it can be avoided, until after the end of the European war. But a defeat of an important Cabinet minister would mean a sharp rebuff which Mr. King is unwilling to contemplate. If the election comes now it will be one of the most critical in Canada's history. For not only will it revive the bitter issue between French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians, but it will also draw the line sharply between those whose strength is firmly bedded in big business and those who hope for more radical economic and social plans for the post-war period. From all reports it will be the C. C. F. led by M. J. Coldwell, M. P., and not the Progressive-Conservative Party that will provide the main challenge to Mr. King for the support of the Canadian people.

✱

PURSuing HIS CAMPAIGN FOR GUARANTIES of a free press in the peace treaty, Kent Cooper, director of the Associated Press, has proposed that newspaper correspondents should be granted diplomatic immunities. This would mean, in effect, "the right to report news without hindrance, and protection against being expelled—should ■ correspondent become persona non grata—except by officials of his own country." Mr. Cooper's suggestion appears open to a number of criticisms. In the first place, since foreign offices would become responsible for the removal of any newspaperman pronounced persona non grata, they would naturally insist on "vetting" all applicants for correspondents' passports. Secondly, the grant of such privileges implies the assurance of a sense of responsibility in the recipients. We could name plenty of American foreign correspondents who have such ■ sense of responsibility, but we could also name a number of others in whom it is weak, if not entirely lacking. Worse still, however, is the irresponsibility of publishers and agencies, who not infrequently employ as foreign correspondents men who are completely ignorant of the language, history, and culture of the countries to which they are accredited. And worst of all is the fact that ■ few publishers habitually issue instructions to their correspondents to slant the news in accordance with editorial policies. Maybe such abuses are more common in other countries, but our hands are not so clean that we can afford to hold them up in holy horror. If Mr. Cooper and his fellow-nabobs of the newspaper industry want to improve the status and prestige of foreign correspondents, they might well interrupt their preaching to the heathen in order to examine their own consciences.

✱

JUDGE PHILIP L. SULLIVAN'S FINDINGS IN THE Montgomery, Ward case may be good law, but they seem to us to be based on very poor economics. The government contended that the President's right to take over the Montgomery, Ward plants was based on Clause 3 of the War Labor Disputes Act, or alternatively on his extraordinary powers as commander-in-chief. Judge Sullivan stressed the point that the act only authorized the seizure of "any mine, plant, or facility equipped for the manufacture, production, or mining of any articles or materials which may be required for the war effort." Relying on standard dictionary definitions, he declared that production and distribution "were not synonymous," and since Montgomery, Ward was mainly engaged in retail trade, it could not be treated as a producer. This seems to us an example of legal pedantry. In a highly integrated economy it is difficult to say where production ends and distribution begins. Moreover, Montgomery Ward cannot be treated as having no more significance than a corner grocery. As a supplier of farmers on a very large scale its operations certainly contribute to the productive process. In the matter of the President's war powers, the Judge found that while in cases of extreme urgency they might cover the seizure of private property, in this instance there was not an "immediate, imminent, and impending" danger to the public interest to justify resort to this procedure. But the President, it seems to us, was bound to consider not only the immediate effects of an interruption of operations at Montgomery Ward but also the secondary effects of Mr. Avery's defiance on the whole delicately balanced war-labor program. It is the whole trade-union movement that has given the anti-strike pledge, and it is not possible to draw an industrial demarcation line on one side of which strikes are permissible or to hold labor to its undertaking while leaving employers uninhibited. As W. H. Davies, chairman of the War Labor Board, has said, if the Sullivan decision is not reversed or if Congress takes no action to make the board's orders effective, "the whole plan of peaceful settlement of war-time labor disputes will collapse."

✱

THE NEW JOINT WPB-OPA CONTROLS OVER THE production and pricing of clothing promise to plug, at least in part, the most serious loophole in the war-time stabilization program. While retail prices for food and most other items in the average man's budget have been held almost stationary during the past year and a half, clothing prices have risen at least 11 per cent in the same period. Since the greater part of this increase was attributable to the disappearance of low-cost goods, the new regulations have been drawn up with the specific purpose of increasing the output of the cheaper grades of clothing. This will be achieved by granting priorities on raw materials to manufacturers provided that they sell their finished product at no more than the maximum average prices prevailing in the first half of 1943. Thus in order to obtain raw materials manufacturers are required to produce approximately the same proportion of the cheaper grades as they did two years ago. Direct controls over quality and the amount of trimming to be used have also been established wherever possible. Retail prices are to be reduced in some instances, and many articles are to be marked with specific OPA dollar-and-cents prices. Although there seems to be little doubt that the new regulations will relieve current shortages in low-priced articles somewhat, the OPA is still hampered in its struggle against deterioration in quality by Congressional limitations on the creation of clearly marked standards of quality which can be understood by the consumer.

✱

THE TERRITORY OF ADULT EDUCATION, ALMOST untrod in this country, is being boldly invaded by the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, the party now in power in the Province of Saskatchewan. Watson Thompson, director of the new program, says that the ambition governing his work is to see half a million adults in his province become active and intelligent participants in the business of running their own public affairs and reshaping their environment. Toward that end, and in cooperation with other government agencies, the Department of Education will provide both rural and urban areas with the materials for "study and action." District libraries will be set up for the dissemination of public information. District centers will be built, with facilities for every phase of recreation and study, where the media of film, radio, and press will be employed. Conferences and lecture-discussion classes under the guidance of experts will be held to solve the immediate problems of the community and to view them in their broad perspective. The entire project, as it is outlined in the department's release, has the imprint of real enthusiasm and purpose. And those are qualities which the educational systems of our democratic nations badly need. The lack of them has been responsible for a loss of human and intellectual resources which, had they been properly exploited, might have offered a solid wall of resistance to the fascist teaching of our time. Had they been properly exploited, no army psychiatrist would have found it necessary to say that the mental age of the American soldier is somewhere between thirteen and fourteen.

Constantin Oumansky

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

Mexico City, January 28 (by Cable)

IT WOULD be impossible in New York to imagine the emotion felt here at the horrible accident that killed Ambassador and Mrs. Oumansky and most of the Russian embassy staff. Even the great news of the eastern front was pushed into second place in the press and in the minds of the people. Especially in government and diplomatic circles everyone seemed stunned. When President Avila Camacho was told the news, he was unable to speak for many minutes, and the effect on other officials was almost as violent. Although the immediate investigation ordered assumes that the tragedy was a pure accident such as happens every so often in even the best-regulated air force or airline, the plane that crashed was the personal plane of General Cárdenas, and the pilot was rated the best in the force. The fact that Oumansky was traveling in an army rather than a regular passenger plane was the combined result of his own desire and the amiability of the Mexican government. At a Foreign Office dinner he recently had expressed the wish that he could go direct to San José without stopping en route, as he would have to on a commercial flight. When Cárdenas heard of Oumansky's remark, he immediately offered his own plane, postponing an official army inspection trip to accommodate the Russian ambassador. It was an act of courtesy characteristic of this generous people and of Cárdenas in particular; that it ended in tragedy seems peculiarly cruel.

But the dismay here was even greater than the sudden and horrible nature of the accident would explain. To understand it one must also understand the role Oumansky has played in this country and his remarkable personal position here. In the first place, he was immensely popular in both official and private circles. Everybody liked him, and his almost fabulous social success must have modified considerably the fear of Russia that has long dominated upper-class groups here as elsewhere. I had met Oumansky during previous periods in the United States, but I was not prepared for his exuberant good spirits, charm, and vitality. Mexico seemed to have released qualities Washington kept under constraint. His intellectual energy and his limitless curiosity were equally impressive. He lacked completely the appearance of caution and reserve that characterizes Soviet officials even more than others. Above all, he was passionately interested in Mexico and identified himself to a degree unheard of among diplomats with the life and activities of the Mexican people. Critics of Oumansky imply that this was all deliberate diplomatic strategy; if so, it should certainly be studied and emulated by other Allied ambassadors.

I sat next to Oumansky at dinner at the French legation just a few nights before his death, and he talked with the greatest apparent freedom on international and particularly inter-American relations. He had no illusion that fascism would be ended by the impending defeat of Germany. He had followed in minute detail developments all over Latin America and was convinced that this hemisphere would be the scene of a terrific struggle against fascist tendencies that are already well rooted. This conviction obviously controlled his attitude toward other problems, including the future of Spain. It also led him to work energetically for better relations not only between Russia and the Latin American republics, but also between these countries and the United States. The last problem is acute and complicated. Oumansky understood that the fight against fascism in the Americas demanded the closest cooperation among the Allied powers and the pro-democratic forces of this hemisphere; for this reason he consistently promoted better feeling and did his best to counteract the mistrust of American policy which would make necessary collaboration impossible. His influence was strong among just those intellectual and political groups where mistrust particularly prevailed and where official American propaganda or diplomatic effort could have least useful results. For this reason if for no other his death should cause grave concern in the United States.

After dinner the other night Oumansky talked at length about Germany. His views become more interesting as the Red Army pushes toward Berlin. He deplored the tendency of liberal opinion, including The Nation, to cling to the hope of effective democratic forces inside Germany. He believed that such elements had been totally eliminated by exile and the terror. He advocated the most rigorous punishment of all responsible Nazi functionaries and army men and spoke of the generals and other officers who had surrendered to the Russians as a group that could be used but not trusted or given power. If the Soviet ambassador was expressing the settled view of his government, we may expect not only tough treatment for Germany as the Russian armies advance but a long period of total political as well as military control.

In arguing against the existence of widespread anti-Nazi feeling among the German people Oumansky said he had spent several weeks examining some sixty thousand letters of Ukrainians, mostly girls and women, who had been deported to Germany for forced labor in factories, homes, and farms. In the whole collection he found only a handful that mentioned an act of kindness or even ordinary humanity; the great mass revealed through those indirect phrases that have now become the lingua franca of oppressed and terrorized people the brutal or indifferent treatment of their German masters, who evidently accepted the Nazi attitude toward the "slave peoples" of Europe. Oumansky's comments, although given informally and unofficially, probably represent the typical Russian feeling and are therefore important. The wholesale horror of the Nazi occupation, especially in Russian and eastern European regions, should never be forgotten when one speculates on the policies likely to be applied to Germany.

F. D. R. to Jesse Jones

AN IMAGINARY LETTER

DEAR JESSE: This is a very difficult letter to write for I have never liked firing people. Because of this weakness on my part, and because of our long personal friendship, I have retained you in office in spite of the fact that you have never been whole-heartedly behind my policies, that at times you have gone behind my back to Congress to get my directives set aside, and that if you did not actually encourage the Texas revolt last year, you did little to discourage it. Now, however, I am asking you to resign so that I may appoint Henry Wallace to the positions you hold.

Henry Wallace deserves almost any service he can satisfactorily perform. Although I have not always treated him with consideration, his loyalty to me personally and to the New Deal has never faltered. When I failed to back him up at Chicago and he lost the vice-presidential nomination, he generously put aside his disappointment and worked with the utmost devotion for the ticket, asking nothing in return.

But this is not the reason why I am asking him to be Secretary of Commerce. I am doing that because I believe he is uniquely qualified to direct that department in its tasks of developing and carrying out the economic policies I have recently outlined to the Congress. He is qualified not only by his administrative experience—and as Secretary of Agriculture in a most difficult period he proved his ability in that respect—but by his wide knowledge and imaginative understanding of the economic problems both of our own country and the world at large. I know it is fashionable to sneer at Henry as a dreamer, but to my mind he is a very practical dreamer, and I think that the thousands of farmers who have benefited by his hybrid-corn experiment will agree with me.

In my budget message to the Congress on January 10, I said: "The American people have learned during the war the measure of their productive capacity, and they will remember that experience in the peace to come. It is the responsibility of business enterprise to translate market opportunities into employment and production. It is the responsibility of the government to hold open the door of opportunity and assure sustained markets. Then, and then only, can free enterprise provide jobs."

If this responsibility is to be fulfilled, if these objectives are to be attained, we shall have to use the powers of the national government vigorously and imaginatively. We shall have to see that the war plants we have built are reconverted to active peace-time production and are not allowed to fall into the hands of giant monopolies which seek to maintain prices and profits by creating artificial scarcities. We shall have to foster and finance small business. We shall have to take positive steps to insure an adequate flow of purchasing power to workers and farmers, for we can only produce at capacity when these groups can enjoy maximum consumption.

Henry understands these needs and believes in the policies by which I hope to achieve them. Do you, Jesse? I think not. By experience and temperament you are unfitted to implement a program of this kind. In your direction of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its subsidiary organizations you have always shown a predilection for big business. In contracting for supplies of raw materials you have consistently erred on the side of caution. "Too little and too late" can be fatal in peace as well as in war. You are trained to believe that a conservative financial policy can never be risky. But let me assure you that prudence, as defined by bankers, may well prove the most dangerous sort of risk-taking in the years ahead. If we fail to provide jobs after the war, if we fall again into a state where unemployment becomes a chronic condition, we shall risk losing everything—our financial stability, our system of private enterprise, even our constitutional liberties. It is because Henry understands this danger and you do not that I am asking you to stand down in his favor.

Always sincerely,

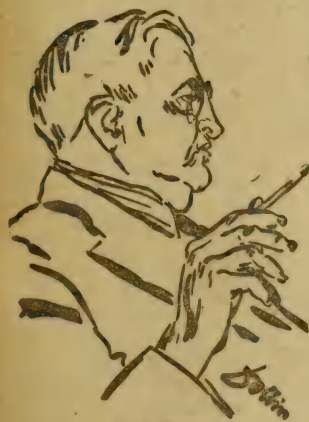

(Signed) FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

"Look Here Upon This Picture..."

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, January 28

JESSE JONES, attended by an obsequious flunky, arrived twenty-five minutes late. Senator George, in a Southern drawl, had been reading what seemed an interminable list of the RFC's lending powers—publicly owned bridges . . . subscriptions to the preferred stocks of banks . . . insurance companies . . . mining loans. The great man's entrance interrupted the monotonous and painfully dull recitation, and evoked a burst of applause from the crowded Senate caucus room. Except for a row of G. I.'s, one of them a coal-black little Negro, those who turned out to hear Jones at the first day's hearing before the Senate Commerce Committee did not look like enthusiasts for a century of the common man. There was a lady with a lorgnette, quite a number of Grant Woodish faces, a sprinkling of upper-class females of the type known to the irreverent as battle axes, with lips turned disapprovingly down at the corners. Within the huge hearing room and in the long line waiting patiently along the marble stairs outside was evidence that the business-like RFC was relaxing in loyal half-holiday.

Jesse Jones

A covey of camera men, some standing, some kneeling, proceeded to shoot Jones from all angles. The Texan has an arrogant face devoid of sentiment or sentimentality, with a stubborn money-lender's mouth. He chewed gum. George, who is obviously no demagogue, went on for twenty minutes longer, reading "by way of argument" his compilation of the RFC's loan authorizations, a breviary of state capitalism. This roll call of the powers Henry Wallace could, if confirmed, exercise over the whole domain of private enterprise was designed to create an atmosphere of quiet horror. Jones listened with obvious satisfaction, and when at the end of George's long summary Senator Pepper asked George a question, Jones rose in lordly unconcern and walked out of the hearing room. When Jones returned and was summoned to the stand, he unbent in a little joke his followers seemed vastly to appreciate. "I thought when I came in here," he told the committee, "what about the gate receipts?" The thought was in character.

The man chosen to run the Federal Loan Agency, Jones said in his prepared statement, should not be one "willing to jeopardize the country's future with untried ideas and idealistic schemes." "Have you," Bailey asked him helpfully, "ever used your powers as Loan Administrator and RFC chairman for the purpose of determining the economic character or the social character of this country?" "I certainly have not," was the answer. Jones pictured himself as just a little business man who had to keep on his toes to deal with the men who come to the RFC for loans. "They are awfully smart," he reflected, implying that somebody was smarter. "You know we are the sugar," he told the committee, "and there is where the flies are. Where the money is, that is where the moochers are, and the moochers have not all been in WPA. They are in business. Men come to us for money that are not entitled to it. . . . Unless a man is experienced in business, he is liable to make a lot of mistakes." Jones warned that the discretion given the RFC "could easily be abused either by inexperienced, visionary planning, or a disregard of the taxpayers' money."

Jones saw no need to be falsely modest or less than candid. The powers given him by Congress had caused him to lie awake nights with worry and to work twelve hours a day, seven days a week, for twelve years, ever since becoming head of the RFC. "I think it is too much authority," he said of his two jobs as Federal Loan Administrator and Secretary of Commerce. Senator Bailey, chairman of the committee, intervened when Pepper wanted to know whether one man, "if he is competent," could not fill both jobs. Bailey angrily ruled the question "not pertinent. . . I do not think it is fair to Mr. Jones." But Jones saw no need to avoid an answer. "If you are trying to ask me if Henry Wallace is qualified for both jobs," he said, "I will say no." The answer was greeted with applause. "I do not believe," he confessed, "there is another man in the world that will do it except me." As for the men he had chosen to run the RFC, they were, he said proudly, "plodders—not smart, just plodders." Not much was heard about the RFC because it was run by "men experienced in business, by men who haven't any ideas about remaking the world." (Laughter and applause.)

Henry A. Wallace

The line began to form outside the caucus room at 8 a.m. the next morning to hear the man accused of having ideas about remaking the world. But this was a different crowd; there were fewer mink coats, more soldiers. It was a younger group, with many well-known New Dealers among them. Especially the old-timers from the Department of Agriculture. Mordecai Ezekiel was there and Louis Bean, and there were cheers when Wallace appeared at the door and made his way through the crowd, grinning. The camera men gave him a workover as complete as Jones's, and Vandenberg shouted from the committee table, "Get that 1948 pose." The sergeant-at-arms appealed for order, and the chairman warned against demonstrations. Wallace took his long prepared statement out of a bulging briefcase and began to read it, at first nervously, then more slowly as he gained confidence. His voice grew deeper, and he read with great firmness. Even the young camera men, whom nothing awes, squatted on the floor in front of the committee table, listening.

In personality, as in ideas, Wallace provided a sharp contrast with Jones. Wallace is fifty-six, Jones seventy-one; but it was more than the difference in age that made the lowan seem youthful by comparison. Wallace is awkward, still a bit the hayseed, not too agile in answering questions. He has a laugh that is almost a giggle. He is not clever. His statement lacked the professional touch of the public-relations counselor. It was sometimes eloquent, but it was also occasionally tedious. But as one listened and watched the man, one felt that he spoke for the conscience of America, for all that is best in our country, its naive idealism, its irrepressible optimism. One felt that it was a historic occasion. He did not seek to placate the committee, to trim his sails, to gloss over his fundamental beliefs. He laid out his post-war full-employment program with courage, zest, and passionate sincerity. He has Jefferson's wide-ranging mind and Lincoln's homely human goodness, and the committee was impressed despite itself.

Except for Pepper, who fought a lonely battle in his behalf, no committee member present at the hearing was sympathetic to Wallace's ideas. The faces at the committee table might have been duplicated at any well-to-do business men's gathering. The composite impression was of big cigars and heavy jowls. It was not until one looked more closely that one began to discern individual features: Bailey's sickly-hued De Valera face, Vandenberg's heavy cheeks and high balding forehead, Brewster's almost eagle-like gauntness, Radcliffe's late Roman profile, Burton's small, swarthy, and saturnine face, O'Daniel's big round pumpkin of a head, little Bilbo hunched down in his chair. The fifteen-to-four vote for the George bill to strip the Secretaryship of Commerce of its lending powers and the fourteen-to-five vote against confirmation are indications of how hostile the committee was. The majority of its members would have liked a witch hunt, but somehow the hearing became a kind of economics seminar. Wallace's frankness, his good humor, his obvious honesty disarmed them. The quality of the man got across. They didn't know quite what to do with him.

At one point the committee seemed to be on the point of slipping into a familiar pattern. "I would like to call your attention," Senator O'Daniel said, "to a book supposed to be authored by you entitled 'Whose Constitution?' You have not changed your mind as to the ideas expressed in that book?" But when Wallace answered, "Probably not, Senator," O'Daniel did not pursue the matter farther. Bailey tried hard to get a firm hand on this strange creature but soon found himself involved in an academic discussion of equity financing. The best Brewster could do was a miniature stump speech on the injustice done the Maine potato some years back by the AAA. And Senator Tobey, who was good enough to praise Wallace's work at the Board of Economic Warfare, wondered plaintively where the money was "coming from to buy twice as many refrigerators and twice as many automobiles as we had in the past." Even Wallace's supposed ambition to put milk on Hottentot doorsteps was left to friendly elucidation by his champion, Senator Pepper. Wallace is a hard man to hate face to face, and the hearing must have disappointed the Jones supporters.

Wallace is far from being as inept a politician as he purports to be. By presenting his post-war program as an outgrowth of the President's "economic bill of rights" and a loyal attempt to fulfil Roosevelt's pledge of 60,000,000 jobs after the war, Wallace put both the White House and his Democratic Party opponents on the spot. The President must support it or seem insincere; the right-wing Democrats are maneuvered into the position of opposing the President when they oppose Wallace. Wallace, by his presentation, made the issue pro or anti F. D. R., pro or anti full employment. The program itself, for all the yowling of the rightist press, is no more visionary than the similar stabilization achieved by Wallace in the sphere of agriculture before the war against a similarly hysterical opposition. Like the new Beveridge proposals in England, it offers the only possible hope of combining full employment with private enterprise, and in retrospect will appear genuinely conservative rather than radical.

Should Wallace lose, he will emerge with enhanced stature, a popular hero. His opponents will some day find it a costly victory. Should the White House fail to support him in the current fight, after the ignominious letter the President sent Jones, Wallace will replace Roosevelt as the leader of progressivism in America. His forthrightness has put him ahead of the field for 1948. In that longer perspective he can afford to be philosophical now. He cannot hope to be confirmed as both Secretary of Commerce and Federal Loan Administrator, but a compromise on the former job is still possible. The President may facilitate it by a strategic retreat in the form of an executive order anticipating the George bill and separating the two offices. Given a decently enlightened appointment to the Federal Loan Agency, we can look toward the post-war period with some confidence. To have Wallace in the Cabinet and Jones out would be worth almost any compromise.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

AFTER two weeks of incredible advances on the eastern front, it was still impossible to say whether the Red Army was achieving the primary objective of its greatest offensive—the destruction of Germany's fighting strength in the field. As this is written, on Sunday, the advance toward Berlin still continues, although there are indications that it may be slowing down. Already that advance has been great enough to demonstrate the Red Army's success in achieving what I termed last week its secondary objective—the capture of ground. If the killing of German soldiers has proceeded at the same rate, then the Red Army is very near victory. If it has not—as seems likely—then the European war will still be long and hard. For the achievement of secondary objectives, no matter in how stunning a fashion, is never decisive. Germany will be defeated decisively, not by the occupation of territory, but only by the destruction of its capacity for further armed resistance.

The measure of that destruction is impossible to assess at this distance. A Russian communiqué late last week totaled up 295,000 Germans killed and 86,000 captured since the start of the offensive. The figures are probably marked up; even so, the proportion between killed and captured is suggestive. The index of a real rout lies in the number of prisoners taken: the lines break, units are cut off from one another and internally disorganized, small bodies of troops and vehicles rush to the rear, and in the confusion the pursuing force rounds up tens of thousands of prisoners. This has undoubtedly happened on a considerable scale; but the present action is being conducted on a vast scale, and a vast rout would produce hundreds of thousands of prisoners. The proportion would be more like four prisoners to one killed than one prisoner to four killed as the figures indicate in this case.

What these figures suggest, therefore, is that the Germans are still fighting, taking orders, and dying very well. It looks as if the German high command ordered an all-out defense of the whole East Prussia-Vistula line, fought hard there until the Russians broke through in strength on several sectors, and then ordered fairly large-scale delaying actions while withdrawing the bulk of the German forces rapidly to the west. A major effort has been made to hold key communication centers against the general tide of the Soviet advance, and it is conceivable that the high command hoped to draw the Russians into a great trap in western Poland, snapping it shut with counter-offensives out of the East Prussian and Silesian bastions.

This hope—which could never have been a rosy one—was shattered by the familiar Soviet strategy of alternating offensives on all sectors of the front. The extension of offensive activity to include a pincers operation against East Prussia and a combined drive south and west into Silesia not only made this the greatest land offensive of history but forestalled any German attempt to take the central drive across Poland in flank.

Reading over that paragraph, I am struck by the inadequacy of the phrase "offensive activity." That little pincers against East Prussia involved the boldest strategy, the most aggressive tactical handling of troops, and some truly amazing feats of logistics in keeping a rapid advance supplied. Rokossovsky, who started from his position north of Warsaw to advance westward, swung north through the rugged Masurian Lakes defenses all the way to the Bay of Danzig; Chermiakhovsky ground westward through another part of the same defensive system toward Königsberg.

This same boldness has characterized the entire offensive, especially as regards the fortified communication centers which the Germans held hard in an effort to slow the Russian advance—Torun, Posen, Kalisz, Krakow, and so on. In each case the Russian advance appeared to slow before the cities; then the cities appeared as the spearpoints of German salients thrust into the advancing Russian lines; then the line closed behind the cities and the advance continued, with the garrisons left for mopping up by subsequent waves of Russian troops who could handle the matter in their own time.

So in two weeks the Red Army advanced up to 200 miles, overran more than 40,000 square miles of territory, reached and probably crossed the defensive barrier of the Oder River at several points, cut East Prussia off from the rest of Germany, removed Silesia from the list of Germany's industrial assets, and rendered Germany's most important eastern defenses incoherent. Pretty soon people will say that the Russians are getting too powerful for comfort.

A good deal of the Russian power derives from the flexibility of the Red Army's organizational structure, especially its tactical and supply doctrine. Everything that has wheels is employed to support an advance. Ingenuity and resourcefulness keynote all sorts of local operations, and commanders in the lower grades are given much leeway in making decisions on the spot and carrying them through with whatever means come to hand. A river crossing, for instance, doesn't wait on the arrival of engineer-corps troops with folding boats and bridging equipment, as in the American and British armies—the Russians utilize local resources, including bundles of faggots, barn doors, and farmers' punts. The comparative simplicity of equipment and of the Russian soldier's individual needs makes supply problems far less important in the calculations of staff officers. Russian observers were amazed when they saw the care we lavished on air-conditioning our tanks. Presumably they are equally amazed by the diet, clothing, and personal equipment of our troops. We pay a price for being able to boast that we have the best-equipped army in the world: a complicated supply system can become a burden, especially in pursuit.

Yet even though the Russian standard of living makes the Russian supply problem easier than that of the western Allies, a relative breakdown of the Russian lines of communication will probably cause a halt in the Russian advance somewhere short of Berlin. It will be something more than coincidence that the supply stoppage will occur just where German resistance stiffens. The German knows his enemy, and in this case as in others will probably elect to stand where he knows the leading Russian elements will be feeling the strain of shortened ammunition and gasoline rations, as they move beyond comfortable range of railheads and forward supply depots. Then will come a pause while the Russians regroup for the next blow—a blow which will almost certainly be compounded and perhaps made decisive by a general offensive from the west.

The Politics of World Security

BY GRAYSON KIRK

WHILE the coming months may bring victory to the United Nations on the battlefields of Europe, they are likely to bring a series of crises on the political front. The decisions which will be made during this time will go far toward determining whether the states which are now bound together to some extent by the menace of a common foe will be able to project their war-time collaboration into the post-hostilities period when that common bond no longer exists. Of all these decisions, none is more central—and more supremely important—than that which will determine the character and role of the future organization which is to be set up to maintain international peace and security. A major blunder in this field might well have disastrous and irretrievable consequences. Since the time is short, it is imperative to make a candid and searching examination of the foundations upon which future security organization must rest if it is to fulfil the role to be assigned to it.

At the moment—and despite the misgivings aroused in this country by the Polish boundary question and by British policy in Greece—the United States is experiencing an unprecedented wave of enthusiasm in favor of international security organization. Leaders of both parties and various influential private groups have gone on record as favoring the general outlines of organization which were hammered out at Dumbarton Oaks last summer, and only a few diehards have dared to continue to advocate what is generally termed an isolationist program. Indeed, it is probably not too much to say that American opinion has seized upon the principle of international organization as the great panacea for future peace.

No sane man can deny the general truth of the statement that effective organization of the world would do more than any alternative program to insure a fair prospect of peace for future generations. The difficulty is, however, that a war-weary world may fail to ponder adequately the obstacles which must be overcome, and the price which must be paid, before such an organization could confidently be expected to fulfil the hopes and aspirations that are certain to be fixed upon it. Without decrying for a moment the validity of the goal which has been set, or the general principle adopted for its achievement, we shall be on far safer ground if we do not allow our hopes to lead us to believe that the millennium will be at hand as soon as we have created a streamlined version of the League of Nations.

The dangers of over-optimism can be well illustrated by some of the official pronouncements of recent months. Thus, when Secretary Hull came back from Moscow a year ago he reported to Congress that "as the provisions of the four-nation declaration are carried into effect, there will no longer be need for spheres of influence, for alliances, for balance of power, or any other of the special arrangements through which, in the unhappy past, the nations strove to safeguard their security or to promote their interests." The Connally resolution adopted by the Senate November 4, 1943, stated that the United States would "join with free and sovereign nations in the establishment and maintenance of international authority with power to prevent aggression and to preserve the peace of the world."

These statements—and many others of the same kind—seem to be based on the view that it is possible to create an organization which, without interfering with the sovereignty of its members, will be able to guarantee world peace against any and all threats which may arise. No extensive demonstration is required to show that this is a counsel of perfection rather than a hard-headed appraisal by responsible statesmen. The international organization projected at Dumbarton Oaks cannot guarantee peace to the world; it can only create conditions which will favor progressive development toward that goal. Unless this lesson is learned well in advance—and remembered—we run the risk of expecting too much, and too soon, and the result of disappointment might be a reaction of cynicism which would sweep away all possibility of achieving the modest gains which such an organization can insure.

Absolute security could be achieved only by the creation of a supra-national organization which would subordinate the present sovereign states substantially to the level of the component states of the American union. The central organization would need to have a monopoly of all military power in excess of that which the members would need for preservation of their domestic peace. Only by this transference of preponderant power to the central organization could there be a sure guaranty that belligerent tendencies on the part of any member could be curbed with a minimum of delay and difficulty. And even then, the lessons of the American Civil War would need to be remembered.

No such drastic scrapping of the present state system is contemplated in the existing proposals, and it is favored as an active policy only by those organizations and groups which have allowed their wholly praiseworthy aspirations to blind them to any sense of present or prospective realities. In essence, therefore, the new international organization necessarily will resemble the League of Nations in that it will be a consultative agency for the organized collaboration of sovereign states.

The consequence of this conclusion must be examined in the light of the distribution of world power which will exist in the foreseeable future. Modern technology has produced the new concept of total war. It has maximized the power which greater states can bring to bear in support of their policies, and it has minimized the resistance which the smaller states can muster against them. For good or ill, a few power centers—the United States, the Soviet Union, and Great Britain—will possess a concentration of strength unprecedented in the history of the modern world. If they maintain a united front, it is difficult to see how any other power coalition could be developed anywhere which would dare to challenge them.

It follows, therefore, that the new organization for security must rest upon that basis of great-power collaboration. If this exists, then these powers, acting through the machinery and procedures of the organization, will be amply able to assure the peace of the world. If it does not exist, then the organization will fail as dismally and as surely as did the League of Nations. In other words, this concentration of power is such that, in the event of a quarrel among the great states themselves, the organization, as such, would be unable effectively to coerce the great-power miscreant by the threat or actual employment of force. The result of such an unhappy situation would not be police action by the organization for the disciplining of a member but a major war in which the first result would be the complete destruction and collapse of the organization.

This conclusion should not necessarily be a cause of alarm or dismay. It is merely an appraisal of things as they are, and it places the whole problem of international organization in a better perspective. It frees the solution from some of the impedimenta of excessive sentimentalism and sterile legalism. Also, it points to several courses of action which in the long run may be more fruitful of results than an attempt to force the new world into the narrow grooves of past organizational thinking.

The first—and in many respects the most basic—conclusion is that the new organization, whatever its precise procedural arrangements, will not provide an alternative to international politics. On the contrary, its effectiveness as a security instrument will rest squarely on the political ability of the great states to harmonize their respective policies sufficiently to prevent a deadlock. To this end the organization will powerfully contribute because it will provide an instrumentality for the regular and continuous collaboration of these governments. By providing a common meeting point and a green baize table around which the representatives of these states will regularly gather, it should be able to favor the development of mutual understanding and the dissipation of unfounded suspicions and fears.

The objection may be made that the discussion thus far has pointed in the direction of an organization which would be an agency whereby the greatest states would impose their domination upon their lesser colleagues. In answer it may be said that if this—and nothing more—is true, then the organization will soon break down because it will rest on a principle strongly opposed by important sections of public opinion in some if not all of these states. The corollary of the exercise of great power inside a world organization must be, in the long run, the acceptance of responsibility for states which are weaker, and the imposition of a self-restraint which no external agency can impose. But the point is that while the development of this sense of responsibility is essentially a political process, the mere existence of an organization, which will rest on the basis of a formalization of these obligations, will contribute toward its progressive growth. It is in this, quite as much as anything else, that the hope of a peaceful future lies.

If this political basis for the maintenance of future security is accepted, then the maintenance of friendly collaboration becomes an overriding compulsion on all the governments and peoples concerned. There must be an acceptance of the view that comparatively little has been accomplished merely by the elaboration of an ingenious mechanism which cannot be self-operating. Also, there must be a realization that if serious breaches between these powers occur as a result of conflicting policies over the war settlements, they will not easily be repaired by the organization.

As seen from this point of view, the much-mooted questions of voting arrangements in the proposed Security Council lose much of their controversial character. From a strictly legal point of view the ability of a great power to block action by the council with respect to a dispute to which it is a party may be objectionable, but if the organization rests on the basis of great-power solidarity for all effective action, then either the decision taken, and the resulting action, will be one in which all will concur, or no decision will be taken. A dispute to which a great power is a party will not be settled through formal voting arrangements.

In this sense the unrestricted veto can perhaps be defended as offering a presumption of solidarity which would not be provided by its absence. In any event, it is not a matter of sufficient importance to warrant any of the great states in jeopardizing the creation of the organization merely in order to make its view prevail.

A better perspective is provided also with respect to the assumed conflict between national security arrangements and those associated with the international organization. It is undeniable that each major state will insist upon having its own house in order before it undertakes important responsibilities to the community hall. This conclusion is open to serious objection only if one assumes that the new organization will at once be able to assure peace to all. But since this assumption is scarcely realistic, then it is understandable that these powers, which cannot be protected automatically by the organization, will wish to have a reasonable sense of national security as a prerequisite to everything else. This will be as true for the United States in the Pacific as for Russia in its political arrangements with the neighboring states of Eastern Europe, or for Britain in safeguarding its imperial channels of communication. It is important, however, that so far as possible these arrangements be made on the basis of mutual understanding of the respective positions of the other powers concerned, and with full consideration for the interests of all other states affected. In other words, these developments must be undertaken and regarded as elements contributing to the future peace, and not as obstacles to it. If they are regarded by other states, large or small, as steps toward future aggrandizement rather than as measures for the protection of the status quo, the post-war structure will have been dealt a mortal blow.

Since the hope for a peaceful future lies far more in the spirit of peoples than in mechanical arrangements, it will be dangerous if excessive attention to the technical details of organization and procedure blinds men of good-will to the fact that international politics—even the much-maligned politics of power—will continue to be the dominating characteristic of a world of sovereign states. The important thing is to direct power into the channels of responsibility. In this lies the safety, not only of the peoples of the smaller states, but of all peoples everywhere.

The Polish Land Reform

BY ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Moscow, January 25 (by Cable)

IN THE name of the National Council of Poland and in conformity with the decisions of the Peasants' Committee of Radzyn County I tender you this title deed to the land." A stocky, middle-aged peasant in a sheepskin jacket stepped forward to the stage, which was decorated with the red-and-white flag of Poland, and received a paper from Vice-Minister of Agriculture Bienick. Scattered applause came from more than a thousand men and women in sheepskins and in heavy shawls huddled in the freezing hall with its bomb-smashed windows. Some faces were rapt, some grinning, some wistful, but most were as solemn as if in church.

This was land reform in action in rural liberated Poland. All estates of more than 125 acres—in Poland these are regular manors worked by many farm hands—were being confiscated and parceled out among the peasants.

The land situation in Eastern Europe has long been notorious. President Bierut of the provisional government says that before the war two-thirds of Poland's farm lands were owned by 16,000 landlords and the remaining one-third by 4,000,000 peasants. I won't insist on these figures, for Polish statistics are complicated, but everybody agreed that land reforms were needed. The question was how and when.

The National Committee of Liberation decided to carry out the land reform immediately. It placed the procedure under triple control—county agents appointed by the government, peasant committees elected from the villages, and workers' brigades volunteering from the cities.

I visited a typical estate in Podzamcze during the land division. It contained over two thousand acres, nearly half of them arable land, the rest woods. The aged landowner had died during the war, leaving a young widow who was not living on the estate but in a city home. The estate was being divided among fifty-seven farm hands who had previously worked on it and the peasants of three villages.

A peasants' committee consisting of two peasants from each village and two farm hands of the estate worked for a week under a subchairman from the township checking two hundred applicants for the land. Stanislaw, a farm hand with five children, was given eight acres. Wiernici, with eight dependents, got twelve. Janowski, with only two, got eight acres because his son was a volunteer in the Polish army.

There were long debates over doubtful cases. One peasant declared he possessed only two acres, but his wife was rumored to have ten in another county. An old man admitted to but one acre, but he had had twenty-five which he had turned over to his four sons, who were farming it together.

The chief disputes were between the peasants and the farm hands. The farm hands said, "Our fathers and grandfathers worked this estate and we expect twelve full acres before anyone else." The peasants argued that that wouldn't leave anything for the needy among them. An endless debate threatened, but the chairman of the workers' brigade—a restless mechanic—arranged a compromise.

This complicated checking of claims is only the first step. Next come complaints, and then a review by the provincial land departments. Cooperatives are formed to handle the indivisible estate property, such as tractors, flour mills, barns. Finally a big formal meeting is held and the title deeds are conveyed amid flags, bands, the national anthem, and Polish soldiers saluting.

By such processes 800,000 acres formerly belonging to

No Vatican Plan for Italy?

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

CARRYING on a controversy from the United States with a paper published in Vatican City is rather difficult, for mail is slow and one cannot rely blindly upon summary information from American correspondents about what a paper says in Rome. Therefore I must discuss now, in January, 1945, something which broke in Rome in November, 1944. But where Vatican policies are concerned one must be as patient as the Vatican. Patience usually pays.

On May 19, 1943, the New York Times carried a report from Berne by Daniel T. Brigham, whose relations with the Vatican legation in that city were exceedingly cordial. Mr. Brigham said he had learned from a "well-informed Vatican source" that a "plan" had been "elaborated in a special message from Pope Pius to Archbishop Francis J. Spellman of New York, at present in the Middle East." The plan "was said to have been taken to Istanbul, Turkey, by air yesterday, N. . . . by Monsignor Emmanuele Clarizio, a Vatican representative, who is understood to be awaiting an answer." The plan aimed to make possible Italian "voluntary collaboration in the ousting of the Fascist regime" and "an end at once." It provided that "in the cadres of the Italian regional prefects, who for the purpose of civil administration would not be considered to have been active supporters and would in their turn be subject to the tests of an Allied Commission sitting in Rome, a ten-year period of political metamorphosis would be immediately introduced. During this period civil administration would be handed back to the people by certain well-defined stages. The Fascist Party as such would be immediately disbanded." A provision was made in this first plan, Mr. Brigham continued, "for the arrest or handing over to the Allies of any fascist leaders."

In The Nation of August 7, 1943, I pointed out that the prefects were the backbone of the Fascist regime, and that the Amgot plan announced in July and the Vatican plan announced in May were as alike as "two rotten eggs." Amgot had borrowed even the distinction between "active" and "inactive" Fascists from the Vatican plan, and then had gone one step farther and admitted into the American-British fold Fascists who had been "active" up to the moment of defeat. In August, 1943, Archbishop Spellman was in New York. He kept silent.

One year later, after the Allies had occupied Rome, a journalistic campaign was launched from that city to persuade the American public that a five-year Anglo-Saxon occupation was indispensable in Italy to forestall communism. In The Nation of August 19, 1944, I noted that the 1943 Vatican plan, taking a longer view, had asked for a ten-year occupation. Through a typographical error, the date "May 19, 1943"—the date of the New York Times dispatch from Berne—appeared in The Nation as "May 11, 1944."

When my article arrived in Italy, the news of the Vatican's ten-year occupation plan caused such a stir that the Osservatore Romano of September 19, 1944, found it necessary to say that "on May 11, 1944," no plan for the reconstruction of Italy had been formulated by the Vatican. "We are authorized to state," it said, "that this fantastic information lacks any basis whatsoever."

I wrote at once to the Osservatore Romano asking whether its statement meant that no Vatican plan existed "on May 11, 1944," or that the plan described in the New York Times on May 19, 1943, had never existed. "If the Osservatore Romano is kind enough to state that the Vatican plan 'never existed,'" I wrote, "it is to be hoped that Archbishop Spellman will tell us why the information given by the New York Times was contradicted neither in May nor in August, 1943. The fact, if true, was as important in 1943 as in 1944. If it has deserved an official contradiction by the Vatican under the date 'May 11, 1944,' it deserved to be contradicted by the New York Archbishopric in both May and August, 1943."

The answer of the Osservatore Romano, published early in November, was that "a plan of the Holy See for the reconstruction of Italy did not exist either in 1943 or in 1944, or ever." It should be noted that the Vatican paper's pronouncement lacked official sanction, that it did not use the solemn formula "we are authorized to state." Further, the Vatican paper was careful not to explain why Archbishop Spellman played 'possum in August, 1943. And finally, by asserting that no Vatican plan had existed in 1943 or in 1944 or "ever," the Vatican paper discredited its whole statement.

Was there really no Vatican plan for Italy? Does the Vatican make plans for all the countries of the world except Italy?

As I said above, a few weeks after Mr. Brigham had reported the Vatican plan for Italy, Amgot announced a plan that was a replica of it. Then, as Amgot planned, the Fascist regime was ousted by "the Italians," that is, by a palace conspiracy in which men like Federzoni, who had always enjoyed the favor of the Vatican, had a hand; the unconditional surrender took place; an Allied Commission was set up and is now sitting in Rome, protecting Fascist prefects and other high civil and military officers from any attempt to purge them. And that Allied Commission is handing back the civil administration step by step to "the people," that is, to the prefects chosen by the Royal Government. In May, 1943, when he reported the Vatican plan for Italy, was the Berne correspondent of the New York Times a prophet or was he a newspaperman who gathered his material from informed sources?

On May 12, 1943, the French journalist Pertinax, who is not a man to fabricate news and who was on good terms

In this sense the unrestricted veto can perhaps be defended ■■ offering a presumption of solidarity which would not be provided by its absence. In any event, it is not a matter of sufficient importance to warrant any of the great states in jeopardizing the creation of the organization merely in order to make its view prevail.

A better perspective is provided also with respect to the assumed conflict between national security arrangements and those associated with the international organization. It is undeniable that each major state will insist upon having its own house in order before it undertakes important responsibilities to the community hall. This conclusion is open to serious objection only if one assumes that the new organization will at once be able to assure peace to all. But since this assumption is scarcely realistic, then it is understandable that these powers, which cannot be protected automatically by the organization, will wish to have a reasonable sense of national security as a prerequisite to everything else. This will be as true for the United States in the Pacific as for Russia in its political arrangements with the neighboring states of Eastern Europe, or for Britain in safeguarding its imperial channels of communication. It is important, however, that so far as possible these arrangements be made on the basis of mutual understanding of the respective positions of the other powers concerned, and with full consideration for the interests of all other states affected. In other words, these developments must be undertaken and regarded as elements contributing to the future peace, and not as obstacles to it. If they are regarded by other states, large or small, as steps toward future aggrandizement rather than as measures for the protection of the status quo, the post-war structure will have been dealt a mortal blow.

Since the hope for a peaceful future lies far more in the spirit of peoples than in mechanical arrangements, it will be dangerous if excessive attention to the technical details of organization and procedure blinds men of good-will to the fact that international politics—even the much-maligned politics of power—will continue to be the dominating characteristic of ■ world of sovereign states. The important thing is to direct power into the channels of responsibility. In this lies the safety, not only of the peoples of the smaller states, but of all peoples everywhere.

The Polish Land Reform

BY ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Moscow, January 25 (by Cable)

IN THE name of the National Council of Poland and in conformity with the decisions of the Peasants' Committee of Radzyn County I tender you this title deed to the land." A stocky, middle-aged peasant in a sheepskin jacket stepped forward to the stage, which was decorated with the red-and-white flag of Poland, and received ■ paper from Vice-Minister of Agriculture Bienick. Scattered applause came from more than ■ thousand men and women in sheepskins and in heavy shawls huddled in the freezing hall with its bomb-smashed windows. Some faces were rapt, some grinning, some wistful, but most were ■ solemn as if in church.

This was land reform in action in rural liberated Poland. All estates of more than 125 acres—in Poland these are regular manors worked by many farm hands—were being confiscated and parceled out among the peasants.

The land situation in Eastern Europe has long been notorious. President Bierut of the provisional government says that before the war two-thirds of Poland's farm lands were owned by 16,000 landlords and the remaining one-third by 4,000,000 peasants. I won't insist on these figures, for Polish statistics are complicated, but everybody agreed that land reforms were needed. The question was how and when.

The National Committee of Liberation decided to carry out the land reform immediately. It placed the procedure under triple control—county agents appointed by the government, peasant committees elected from the villages, and workers' brigades volunteering from the cities.

I visited a typical estate in Podsamche during the land division. It contained over two thousand acres, nearly half of them arable land, the rest woods. The aged landowner had died during the war, leaving a young widow who was not living on the estate but in a city home. The estate was being divided among fifty-seven farm hands who had previously worked on it and the peasants of three villages.

A peasants' committee consisting of two peasants from each village and two farm hands of the estate worked for a week under ■ subchairman from the township checking two hundred applicants for the land. Stanislaw, a farm hand with five children, was given eight acres. Wiernici, with eight dependents, got twelve. Janowski, with only two, got eight acres because his son was a volunteer in the Polish army.

There were long debates over doubtful cases. One peasant declared he possessed only two acres, but his wife was rumored to have ten in another county. An old man admitted to but one acre, but he had had twenty-five which he had turned over to his four sons, who were farming it together.

The chief disputes were between the peasants and the farm hands. The farm hands said, "Our fathers and grandfathers worked this estate and we expect twelve full acres before anyone else." The peasants argued that that wouldn't leave anything for the needy among them. An endless debate threatened, but the chairman of the workers' brigade—a restless mechanic—arranged ■ compromise.

This complicated checking of claims is only the first step. Next come complaints, and then a review by the provincial land departments. Cooperatives are formed to handle the indivisible estate property, such as tractors, flour mills, barns. Finally a big formal meeting is held and the title deeds are conveyed amid flags, bands, the national anthem, and Polish soldiers saluting.

By such processes 800,000 acres formerly belonging to

No Vatican Plan for Italy?

BY GAETANO SALVEMINI

CARRYING on a controversy from the United States with a paper published in Vatican City is rather difficult, for mail is slow and one cannot rely blindly upon summary information from American correspondents about what a paper says in Rome. Therefore I must discuss now, in January, 1945, something which broke in Rome in November, 1944. But where Vatican policies are concerned one must be as patient as the Vatican. Patience usually pays.

On May 19, 1943, the New York Times carried a report from Berne by Daniel T. Brigham, whose relations with the Vatican legation in that city were exceedingly cordial. Mr. Brigham said he had learned from a "well-informed Vatican source" that a "plan" had been "elaborated in a special message from Pope Pius to Archbishop Francis J. Spellman of New York, at present in the Middle East." The plan "was said to have been taken to Istanbul, Turkey, by air yesterday, May 17, by Monsignor Emmanuele Clarizio, a Vatican representative, who is understood to be awaiting an answer." The plan aimed to make possible Italian "voluntary collaboration in the ousting of the Fascist regime" and "an armistice at once." It provided that "in the cadres of the present Italian regional prefects, who for the purpose of civil administration would not be considered to have been active party supporters and would in their turn be subject to the orders of an Allied Commission sitting in Rome, a ten-year plan of political metamorphosis would be immediately introduced. During this period civil administration would be handed back to the people by certain well-defined stages. The Fascist Party as such would be immediately disbanded." No provision was made in this first plan, Mr. Brigham continued, "for the arrest or handing over to the Allies of any Fascist leaders."

In The Nation of August 7, 1943, I pointed out that the prefects were the backbone of the Fascist regime, and that the Amgot plan announced in July and the Vatican plan announced in May were as alike as "two rotten eggs." Amgot had borrowed even the distinction between "active" and "inactive" Fascists from the Vatican plan, and then had gone one step farther and admitted into the American-British fold Fascists who had been "active" up to the moment of defeat. In August, 1943, Archbishop Spellman was in New York. He kept silent.

One year later, after the Allies had occupied Rome, a journalistic campaign was launched from that city to persuade the American public that a five-year Anglo-Saxon occupation was indispensable in Italy to forestall communism. In The Nation of August 19, 1944, I noted that the 1943 Vatican plan, taking a longer view, had asked for a ten-year occupation. Through a typographical error, the date "May 19, 1943"—the date of the New York Times dispatch from Berne—appeared in The Nation as "May 11, 1944."

When my article arrived in Italy, the news of the Vatican's ten-year occupation plan caused such a stir that the Osservatore Romano of September 19, 1944, found it necessary to say that "on May 11, 1944," no plan for the reconstruction of Italy had been formulated by the Vatican. "We are authorized to state," it said, "that this fantastic information lacks any basis whatsoever."

I wrote at once to the Osservatore Romano asking whether its statement meant that no Vatican plan existed "on May 11, 1944," or that the plan described in the New York Times on May 19, 1943, had never existed. "If the Osservatore Romano is kind enough to state that the Vatican plan 'never existed,'" I wrote, "it is to be hoped that Archbishop Spellman will tell us why the information given by the New York Times was contradicted neither in May nor in August, 1943. The fact, if true, was as important in 1943 as in 1944. If it has deserved an official contradiction by the Vatican under the date 'May 11, 1944,' it deserved to be contradicted by the New York Archbishopric in both May and August, 1943."

The answer of the Osservatore Romano, published early in November, was that "a plan of the Holy See for the reconstruction of Italy did not exist either in 1943 or in 1944, or ever." It should be noted that the Vatican paper's pronouncement lacked official sanction, that it did not use the solemn formula "we are authorized to state." Further, the Vatican paper was careful not to explain why Archbishop Spellman played possum in August, 1943. And finally, by asserting that no Vatican plan had existed in 1943 or in 1944 or "ever," the Vatican paper discredited its whole statement.

Was there really no Vatican plan for Italy? Does the Vatican make plans for all the countries of the world except Italy?

As I said above, a few weeks after Mr. Brigham had reported the Vatican plan for Italy, Amgot announced a plan that was a replica of it. Then, as Amgot planned, the Fascist regime was ousted by "the Italians," that is, by a palace conspiracy in which men like Federzoni, who had always enjoyed the favor of the Vatican, had a hand; the unconditional surrender took place; an Allied Commission was set up and is now sitting in Rome, protecting Fascist prefects and other high civil and military officers from any attempt to purge them. And that Allied Commission is handing back the civil administration step by step to "the people," that is, to the prefects chosen by the Royal Government. In May, 1943, when he reported the Vatican plan for Italy, was the Berne correspondent of the New York Times a prophet or was he a newspaperman who gathered his material from informed sources?

On May 12, 1943, the French journalist Pertinax, who is not a man to fabricate news and who was on good terms with the Vatican delegation in Washington, stated that "the Vatican is deeply concerned with the social upheavals that, in the peninsula, are likely to be the outcome of military defeat beyond the sea and of unlimited destruction by air raids at home." On May 18 the New York Times broke the news from Berne, although in the form of an "unconfirmed report," that "the Vatican had informed the British and American governments that an Italian collapse now would have disastrous results unless Italy was neutralized at once or immediately occupied by Allied armies." The Times used these headlines: "Mussolini Appeal to Pope Reported"; "Italian Leaders Said to Have Asked Pontiff to Use Good Offices with the Allies"; "Vatican Said to Have Warned London and Washington of Danger in Collapse." The cordial relations that exist between the New York Times and the New York Archbishopric are well known. On June 13, 1943, the Pope personally addressed a gathering of Italian workers and advised them to shrink from revolution. Was there no plan in the mind of Pius XII when he made that address?

On March 30, 1943, Cardinal Schuster, Archbishop of Milan, warned the Italians that they should "remember that the pledge of national unity is the monarchy of the House of Savoy." And behold, in May, 1944, "special investigators" of the American army intercepted messengers near the lines in southern Italy and opened a Vatican mail pouch. In it they found documentary evidence that the Vatican was engaged in aggressive if highly secret machinations for the House of Savoy. The leaders of the party which calls itself "Christian Democratic" are working hand in glove with the monarchist party, and some of them were Vatican employees up to yesterday. Was there never a Vatican plan for Italy?

Last July a controversy broke out between monarchists and republicans over whether a Constituent Assembly should be summoned at the end of the war to decide upon the form of government for Italy. The Osservatore Romano took up the cudgels for the monarchists and called for a plebiscite instead of a Constituent Assembly. In Silone's novel "Bread and Wine" the horse that always nods while walking is christened "Plebiscito" by the peasants. In November the Lieutenant General of the Realm came out for the plebiscite. No Vatican plan for Italy?

In August Churchill had four or five meetings with Pius XII in Rome. Did Pius XII ask Churchill to announce some plan for Italy since he, Pius XII, had never had one?

As long as Mussolini was in power, the Vatican tried to rescue him from ruin. Since his collapse, the Vatican has been trying to rescue the Royal House, the conservative social classes, and the Concordat of February, 1929. This is the Vatican plan for Italy. To be sure, the Vatican does not want to take responsibility for the execution of its plan. The so-called Christian Democratic Party takes that responsibility. But this game deceives no one in Italy.

As long as American relief to Italy is handled through Vatican agencies, the Italians will silently bow to necessity. But Vatican City does not produce wheat, clothes, shoes, or raw materials. When the five-year or ten-year occupation has come to an end and people can no longer be controlled by "food as a weapon" and similar tricks, the Vatican will learn that its sowing of a monarchical wind can reap only an anti-clerical whirlwind.

Dangerous Experts

BY PACIFICUS

PERHAPS the most dangerous development in the field of Far Eastern post-war policy planning is the growing influence of an Anglo-American team of shortsighted foreign-service conservatives. If their ideas prevail, the process of purging Japan of its militarist and imperialist elements and helping a new, democratic Japan to emerge will be set back for many years. The results may even go beyond those of the disastrous British policy in Greece and produce not only civil war in Japan but conflict among the United Nations.

The two officials referred to are Eugene Dooman and Sir Paul Butler. Mr. Dooman was counselor of the American embassy in Tokyo at the time of Pearl Harbor and was primarily responsible for the execrable mistake in judgment which minimized the threat to the United States represented by Tojo's appointment in October, 1941. When Joseph Clark Grew was director of the State Department's Office of Far Eastern Affairs, Mr. Dooman had the title of Special Assistant, although many in the department remarked that the relationship between the two paralleled that of Edgar Bergen to Charlie McCarthy. Now that Mr. Grew has been promoted, Mr. Dooman seems slated to emerge as the Robert Murphy of American policy toward Japan. According to Drew Pearson, he has been placed in charge of all State Department relations with the army and navy civil-affairs sections. He has been touring civil-affairs schools in the United States indoctrinating the future occupation officers with his own inaccurate interpretation of what makes Japan tick. If American public opinion permits his further elevation to the position of political adviser to the occupation authorities, the results may well be disastrous.

Mr. Dooman not only believes in retaining the emperor system, minus some of the more militaristic forms of emperor-worship, but also thinks that the only elements we can rely on in Japan are the business leaders, court-circle aristocrats, and bureaucrats. In a word, he supports the retention of the present ruling groups with the exception of the military extremists. Mr. Dooman will not concede that other groups have any capacity for leadership or that it might be possible to involve Communists or other labor and peasant leaders in the post-war administration of Japan. In short, having lived almost half of his life among upper-class Japanese, Mr. Dooman shares many of their reactions.

Sir Paul Butler is a British counterpart of Mr. Dooman. He too served extensively in the foreign service in Japan. He is now adviser to the Foreign Office on Far Eastern matters. When he came to this country to attend the International conference of the Institute of Pacific Relations held last month at Hot Springs, Virginia, he apparently brought with him a manuscript entitled "Japan in Defeat," a study prepared under his direction at Chatham House, the quasi-official foreign-affairs organization in London. Those who have seen his manuscript or who heard him speak at the Hot Springs conference report that the policy he enunciates for Japan makes Churchill's Greek policy seem enlightened. He apparently goes so far as to support the retention of "moderate" militarists in the post-war Japanese government.

It was generally assumed at the conference that Sir Paul was presenting either an official British view or an official British trial balloon. It is important to note, however, that his position was opposed by the great majority of those present, including virtually the entire American delegation, although Sir Paul was able to gloat over the support he received from a young subordinate of Mr. Dooman's.

If the policies of these minor Neville Chamberlains are put into effect, American and British influence will be found in support of the discredited imperialist ruling groups of Japan. Russia, however, if it participates in the war against Japan, is likely to support Susumu Okano and his Japanese People's Emancipation League, now growing stronger at Yenan. It is obvious that the situation contains the seeds of civil war and international conflict.

What is required is a United Nations agreement to support a wide coalition of Communists, industrialists whose interests lie in peaceful trade, and all those in between who can agree on the necessity for purging Japan of its military-fascist ideology, economy, and government. To achieve and execute such an agreement in good faith, it will be necessary to render ineffective all officials whose narrow conservatism would lead them to risk civil war and international conflict rather than support a regime dedicated to political and economic progress which might develop a quasi-socialist character.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

AS THIS is written, the battle for Upper Silesia is being fought. If the Reich loses it, there can be no doubt about the consequences: in a few weeks at the most all further resistance will inevitably collapse. For this second most important industrial region in Germany has become, with the progressive destruction of the Ruhr, the most important. Probably not an item of its production can be spared. Loss of its coal would certainly be fatal. According to recent reports, coal shipments from Upper Silesia in 1943 rose to the unprecedented height of 90,000,000 tons, that is, 36 per cent of the total amount produced in Germany. In the following year, 1944, as the damage to the Ruhr increased, the percentage of Silesia's contribution must have mounted. Without this source of energy the Reich could not possibly fight on for any length of time.

Even if the front is stabilized once more, before Silesia is overrun, the Reich, in the opinion of this writer, will get but a brief reprieve. However the military situation develops, the coal scarcity is bound to become a catastrophe. The mere fact that Silesia has become a war area reduces coal shipments to a fraction of what they were. And things had reached a point where they could not be allowed to grow worse.

Of the hundreds of witnesses to these conditions only a few need be cited. (The point is not the suffering of the Germans but their ability to continue the war.) The sub-prefect of Lauenburg announced on December 31:

All coal consumers, including public offices, industrial firms, and the like, must exercise the utmost economy in heating, for they will have to get along with considerably smaller quantities than had been anticipated. Households must heat only one room and turn off all other radiators.

The magazine Das Reich declared on January 7 that "unforeseen factors" had suddenly made the precarious coal situation even more precarious, and not only for private consumers but for industry. The causes given were the "absolutely necessary conscription of miners for the armed forces or for work on fortifications, the unexpected use of rolling stock for the transportation of troops, ammunition, and food, and the damage done to the rail network and occasionally also to the railroad shops by the incessant air raids." The school vacation, which would normally end on January 3, was extended to January 15 on account of the lack of coal, and then to January 31, for the same reason. On January 11 the Stockholm Aftonbladet reported that "in the past few weeks millions of city households have been unable to obtain any coal at all. . . . Many cafes and restaurants have stopped heating entirely; in Berlin only the Hotel Adlon is adequately warm."

Similar limitations are of course placed on the use of gas. For example, in Dresden, the capital of Saxony, the authorities announced that "special circumstances" compelled them "once more to reduce gas pressure. Gas will therefore burn poorly or not at all. In districts served by the East Saxon Gas Company . . . the use of gas will have to stop completely." Such was the situation when Upper Silesia was still unthreatened and its production intact.

It is true that coal is a special case; for other commodities the curve of supply does not descend so steeply. It is going down, however, at a rate which is accelerating from week to week. "A serious food crisis is developing in Germany because of the breakdown of transportation and distribution," declared the Aftonbladet on January 10. Food trains are being wrecked every day between stations and at stations. Some stand on sidings for weeks. Enormous quantities of food spoil on these trains and on others which wait in vain to be unloaded. Especially during the recent severe cold spell vast quantities of potatoes were lost by freezing.

New restrictions, general or local, are continually being imposed. Soldiers on furlough used to receive a number of extra ration points as a "gift from the Führer to soldiers on leave." At the beginning of January it was announced that these special food cards would no longer be given out and that retailers should not honor them if presented.

The German News Bureau (D. N. B.) broadcast on January 17 that "milk deliveries to the distributors have declined still farther in most parts of the Reich" and that the situation was "made worse by transport difficulties." It was therefore "not always possible" to give consumers their full ration, reduced as that ration was. In the Rhineland the full ration of flour and bread was for some weeks unobtainable, but the public was assured that the unused points would be honored later. They were canceled, however, in the middle of January. "Winter fruits," such as apples and pears, have disappeared almost completely. According to the Berlin Zwölf Uhr Blatt of January 12, they will be given out only to children, expectant or nursing mothers, and sick people. The maximum monthly allotment will be two kilos (four and a half pounds) to pregnant or ill adults and one kilo to children—about one mouthful a day.

RECEIVED
PUBLIC LIBRARY
HARVARD-YENCHING INSTITUTE
APR 10 1945

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE LITTLE MONEY

BY JACQUES BARZUN

FROM the deplorable financial status of the academic man in this land of plenty, some have argued that teachers should organize themselves into unions and demand the standard of living they think they are entitled to. This might be a practicable way if it could ever be determined what leverage teachers can employ and who their employers are. I feel a strong corporate sense binding me to my colleagues, and once upon a time I joined a so-called union to see what it could do. It could obviously help teachers in public schools and other tax-supported institutions by lobbying at the legislature in the approved way. But the members of an endowed university are in a peculiar position: they do not work for themselves, nor directly for their clients—the students; nor for the administrative heads, who are mere agents, nor for the trustees, who do not run a profit-making concern. The university teacher clearly works for the public. But he cannot strike, expostulate, bargain, or picket. The fact that colleges are of so many different kinds, and run on so many different financial plans, obscures the common truths in confusion. Nevertheless, the profession is by and large under the control of public opinion, and it is before the public that teachers must present their claims.

What is needed is, then, not a union in the ordinary sense, but a guild—of which one or two approximations already exist—whose chief object should be to establish and maintain intelligent and dignified public relations. It should endeavor to tell the people what teachers are for, what they do and need, and why it seems best to support them more liberally than hitherto. This would have a double advantage: the first, a raising of the dignity of the profession; the second, an indirect training of the population in matters upon which they pass judgment whether they know it or not.

When one considers that almost every adult necessarily comes in contact with education by being a parent, a taxpayer, a member of a school board, a reader of books and periodicals, a library and museum visitor, or a radio listener, one can see the political need for closing the rift between the laity and the teaching profession. Parent-teacher associations cannot do it, or at least have not done it, for reasons too numerous to go into. But an association of teachers of all ranks and specialties, serving the interests of teachers before the public just as a medical association does, might in time improve a multitude of conditions, of which not the least is the reallocation of funds for the sake of a freer, richer, and more irresistible instruction.

A suggestion more ambitious still, but one which I find attractive and just in principle, would be to organize every college or university into a genuine company of scholars, the proceeds of whose work should be shared among themselves on a basis to be worked out equitably. Individual initiative could be encouraged by reserving a suitable portion of earnings and royalties to the author, while the rest would be credited to a fund for annual distribution among the group.* In most cases the university press could be the main agency for marketing the products of scholarship, both local and national. A healthy regional competition could arise and a somewhat stouter direction be thereby given to research. Whatever may seem utopian about this proposal—which has been made at various times and places—is really not so. Strict individualism in scholarship is an illusion. Scholars already engage in many cooperative ventures whose profits go into the General Fund; publishing a set of source- and textbooks is a case in point. The knowledge of twenty people goes into the work, and returns seldom accrue to the doers. Conversely the "authors" draw upon the brains and experience of their colleagues as well as upon the facilities, the books, and the time that belong strictly speaking to the community. A redistribution of joint annual earnings would be simply a clearer business arrangement.

Far from desiring a slovenly pooling of thine and mine, I should like to see at work throughout academic life a sharper sense of business values. Too many persons, inside and outside the profession, act as if a teacher's time or thought were a free commodity. It is flattering to be considered on the same plane as sunlight, but any guild of scholars should set its face against this belief and train its membership to put a proper price on their own services. I do not urge this to inaugurate monopoly gouging, but as a safeguard for quality and conditions of work, including self-respect.

As things now stand abuses are rife. Within the profession, nothing is more common than the request for free lectures, free concerts, even the free gift of books which one has written. Except when this type of charity has a clear excuse, all such requests should be steadfastly refused, with a precise explanation of the reason why. One college I know used to cry poor according to a set form, so as to obtain cheap the most interesting outside lecturers; yet it always had enough funds for the elaborate entertainment of trustees, parents, and graduating classes, as well as for expensive printing on all occasions. This amounts to the cynical and unethical practice of paying for luxuries by bilking the butcher. Choosing may be hard, but a college had better find out whether it loves wisdom better than tea cakes, for one student absent-mindedly wrote on a paper, "You cannot serve God and Gammon at the same time."

Outside the profession all sorts of persons, clubs, and commercial firms have learned the same begging habit for obtaining professional services gratis or at a nominal fee. One wealthy and powerful publisher wishing an expert opinion on a manuscript intimated that since the house examined so many books, it could only pay a few dollars to have each one judged. Does the head of the firm speak to his doctor or lawyer in that graceful cadging way? The reverse of this attempted graft is of course the distribution of free books, and teachers should have enough moral fiber to decline such gifts—which they ultimately pay for in the price of other books—so as to have a clear conscience when putting a price on their opinion as experts. Another well-dressed mendicant said to me: "This is a book you'd read anyhow. Read it for us in manuscript and we'll give you a copy—if we publish it." The mixed appeal to the gambling instinct, the love of bribery, and the urge for self-depreciation reaches here its perfection.

* President Hutchins's proposal, akin to this, has much to recommend it. He would raise all salaries, abolish intermediate ranks, appropriate all royalties, and grant two months' extra leave for "producing." My sole objection is to the reduction of the normal vacation to a single month, and to its extension only for the sake of turning out work. I am certain that teaching would again suffer. Three to four months free, without imposed obligations, is a strict minimum for all teachers.

If the corporate business spirit has a proper role in our society—and it seems to be built into our very laws—the man of knowledge has a clear duty to insist on due remuneration. It is not because it only takes him a few minutes to give out information that therefore the information has cost him nothing. It is not because someone else's purpose is "educational" that therefore he must fulfil it free. As a distinguished violinist said, "I will gladly play without fee to your students—if you will refund to them the afternoon's tuition." And an author who was being "reasoned with" on the ground that his giving a judgment on an anthology would really mean a pleasant evening's reading cut the begging short with, "Sorry, my education's been too expensive."

The teacher and thinker must constantly bear in mind the special conditions that define his craft. He cannot count as aids to his advancement the pain and fear that favor the doctor or the apprehension of loss and disgrace that favor the lawyer. He has on his side only mankind's desire for light—the light that gives all other things their shape; and this, though a strong motive, is easily obscured by more immediate demands. The teacher must consequently sustain it most steadfastly in the very persons who neglect or forget it most easily. He must do this not for their good merely, though that is a real reason, but for his good wherever it is identifiable with the good of his calling. Like any other man, a teacher may be selfish and mistake private ends with public, but this possibility must not keep him from upholding the public ends he represents, even if these ends are expressed—as they are bound to be—in money. Without money, intellect is crippled, art starves, and science stagnates. If the field marshal is not ashamed to admit that money is the sinews of war, the teacher should feel no qualms in proclaiming that "alma mater" means first of all the nourishing mother.

[This article, like its predecessor, Distrust of Brains, is taken from the author's forthcoming book, "Teacher in America," which will be published by Atlantic-Little, Brown later this month.]

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

I MET A FRIEND in Eighth Street and we repaired to a diner for a cup of coffee. He's writing a book, he had had a good morning, and he was jubilant. We talked about writing and its hazards. I should describe writers as a happy breed of men who are usually unhappy. The writer is either worried about something he has written or about something he's writing. If he isn't working at anything he's worried about that. He has his moments, of course, but they are not too frequent, and he knows very well that within a few hours he may be wondering what he ever saw in that paragraph. And one of the sad things about the whole process is that when he's jubilant he can foresee that he will shortly be discouraged but when he's discouraged he can't imagine being jubilant again. The outsider may well wonder why anyone persists in such a vocation. The insider knows that it's a compulsion, a sweet sorrow, that can't easily be exorcised.

IN MANY CASES it should be exorcised, but the tendency is all in the other direction. The desire to write is constantly taken for the capacity to write. This is one of the results, I suppose, of widespread literacy. The fact that words and sentences are the units of literature as well as of literacy obscures the difficulty and the talent and the hard work involved in creating a work of art which happens to be a book. Relatively few people feel that anybody could compose a symphony or paint a picture, let alone a good symphony or a good picture. A great many people feel that anybody could write a book. This circumstance has led to a great deal of useless suffering on the part of would-be writers who don't even know that writing is a craft. And, further to confuse the issue, it has led to the production of many chunks of printed paper which somebody is always willing to call books. So many of them and such bad ones that the authentic writer, in his down moments, may well decide that there is no point in adding his own drop to the flood.

The authentic writer, curiously enough, is more likely to feel that way than the non-writers of non-books. For him the answer is contained in a remark of Henry James. In one of his sketches of Venice James wonders if there is not a certain impudence in writing about a subject so much written about. Happily he proceeds, nevertheless, because, he says, "I hold any writer sufficiently justified who is himself in love with his theme." But one must really be in love with one's theme. And have a theme.

LATELY I've been getting more pleasure from music than from books. I wouldn't be surprised if Mr. Haggin's dissertation on "Music for the Man Who Enjoys 'Hamlet'" has had something to do with it. And I think it is partly because the language of music seems wonderfully fresh and pure and unhackneyed in a world up to its neck in words.

I'm very tired of words, especially public words. I sometimes wish that all public talking, in print or out, could be stopped for a week—on the radio, in newspapers, in halls—and then turned on only once a week. I'm sure the quality of the talk would be improved. There is something depressing about the compulsion to talk out loud every day of the year whether you have anything to say or not. And though I avoid columnists, radio commentators, and public speakers as I would the plague, the knowledge that they are going on unceasingly day in and day out is depressing enough.

From all this the miraculous and beautiful economy of Mozart and Beethoven and Schubert and Haydn is a blessed relief. And they really have something to say.

A WEEK OR SO AGO I received an irresistible invitation which began as follows: Ad symposium platonium, sed voluptatibus epicureis non alienum, convocant vos. It was an Italianate affaire, gay and charming. The food was delicious and the "symposium" was very pleasant. Among other things I heard an amusing story about Gaetano Salvemini. He is reported to have told a young Italian American of his acquaintance, "Stop being an intellectual. Be a wop! Be a wop!" Salvemini is one of the great characters of our day. Anyone who spends an hour with him comes away with a sense of having had an experience; and I've noticed that such people when they speak of him involuntarily turn up the corners of their mouths in an unconscious reflection of his own Dionysian smile. He is technically an intellectual, but he's a "wop" too of the most delightful sort. In his politics he is what is known as uncompromising, but that is an extremely dull word for the beautiful gusto, the joyous intelligence, the gleaming integrity, with which he sails into arrogant imperialists, timid souls, and slithering politicians.

The last time I saw him he had just had news from his home town in Italy, where the people had danced and sung in the streets when Mussolini fell. He had been greatly amused and touched to hear that he, Salvemini, was a hero there. So much so that the townspeople were convinced that they had not been bombed because Salvemini had spoken to Roosevelt! It's too bad Roosevelt isn't more sensitive to the advice of Salvemini.

THE PEOPLE'S CHOICE

by Paul F. Lazarsfeld - Bernard Berelson - Hazel Gaudet

- ✓ EVERY four years we are exposed to a period of political propaganda—what does it all amount to?
- ✓ AT WHAT time in a presidential campaign do most voters make up their minds?
- ✓ ARE campaigns really necessary?
- ✓ ALL THESE questions and many more are answered in The People's Choice. "Certainly of interest to serious students of political behavior."—New York Times. $3.00

DUELL, SLOAN AND PEARCE

STARTLING

It is startling when you stop to think about it.
Not a single principle of making decisions proposed by the Dumbarton Oaks conference is right.

WILLIAM CROCKER ■ Box 211 ■ PRESCOTT, ARIZONA

AFTER I HAD SAID what I thought of "Cannery Row" I reflected on the charge sometimes made that critics write nasty reviews of good books because they are jealous of the authors or have a generic compulsion to denounce and belittle. I think the charge is psychologically unsound, for according to my own experience and observation one's normal reactions to a book one likes are quite the opposite of jealousy and bad will. And I'm not speaking of the classics. My anger over "Cannery Row" was the obverse of my pleasure over, say, "The Leaning Tower." I wouldn't be caught dead writing "Cannery Row." I should be very glad to have written "The Leaning Tower"—but my feeling toward its author, in spite of the fact that she's another woman, is more like affection than anything else.

I should certainly call my feelings about both books personal. One's reactions to books and writers are personal and are bound to be because the stuff of art—emotion and idea—is very close to where one lives. It is one thing to be "objective" about emotions and ideas with which one is not sympathetic. Justice Holmes remarks in one of his letters that "to be civilized is to be potentially master of all possible ideas, and that means that one has got beyond being shocked, although one preserves one's own moral and aesthetic preferences." The critic, likewise, should be potentially master of all possible ideas and emotions. But I wouldn't put much faith in a critic who isn't shocked by the falsification of emotion or idea.

I'M ALSO SHOCKED by books in which characters are reduced to less than human status. Albert Jay Nock, in his autobiography, made a statement to the effect that he had felt more comfortable since he had decided that most human beings aren't human. That is one way of compensating for the inadequacy we all feel in coping with the world we live in. It is not a very admirable way; and it is not a creative way. For the novelist it is peculiarly self-defeating, no matter how many best-sellers it may yield. For him it is a case simply of fouling his own nest. Human beings are both his end and his means. In so far as he denies them their quality of being human he deprives them of significance either as instruments of self-expression or of communication with the human beings who are his readers. He might better write about the curious and amusing behavior of fleas or frogs—which has its own quite different interest.

Some weeks ago in the New Yorker Edmund Wilson said with what seemed to me astounding complacency that such books as Caldwell's "God's Little Acre" and "Tragic Ground" are no longer attacked as they once were because "we are prepared, as our grandfathers were not, to study human behavior on the animal level." (I had evidence of this the other day when by chance I came upon a radio program which was a horrible caricature of "Tobacco Road"—and all the more horrible for being "clean" in the radio sense of the word.)

I'm not the least bit complacent about this tendency in fiction—though I grant that the study of human behavior on the animal level may have its uses in science. But I doubt that it has much of a future in fiction for the simple reason that human beings as animals soon cease to be interesting, just as any monstrosity eventually becomes boring.

AMERICA'S PLAN TO FREE ALL COLONIES

Churchill blusters, but other highly placed Britons nod agreement as Washington plans a postwar world in which no nation "owns" a single colony! Does the plan make sense? Is the end of imperialism really in sight . . . can we bring freedom to the world's 600,000,000 subject people . . . what obligation is America ready to assume in the new scheme of things? "America's Plan for the Colonial World" is an authoritative, illuminating document from the pen of an insider—a man whose connections with European governments demand anonymity. Read it in THE AMERICAN MERCURY for February.

WHO WILL GOVERN POLAND?

The first nation to war against the Nazis has become a major stumbling block for Russia and the Western Powers. Is there more than meets the eye behind Russian recognition of the "Lublin Government" and our refusal to extend recognition? Does Russia really want a puppet Poland? What does the record of Russian relations with the Polish Underground indicate? William Henry Chamberlin, noted student of Russian history, documents his thought-provoking conclusions in "Some Truths About Poland."

THE AMERICAN MERCURY—for February—OUT NOW

What will you turn to first in this month's MERCURY? Pegler: Tough Guy Columnist is a profile in acid of a writer who doesn't let his police-court reporter's mind stop him from posing as an oracle on national and world affairs. Life in Spain Today is a graphic description of surface glitter and inner sordidness in a land seething with intrigue. In A Mercury Survey of Opinion Leaders publicist Edward L. Bernays makes ten important predictions for postwar America, based on a survey of leaders whose views have correctly foreshadowed popular opinion. Ship Workers in the Northwest unveils a shocking picture of workers loafing at the very time frantic advertisements appeal for more ship workers to bolster lagging production. Hope for Alcoholics is the encouraging story of New York's experiment with alcoholics—a treatment that seems actually to work . . . Seven other arresting articles, essays and sketches enrich the pages of the February MERCURY—plus such regular features as Down To Earth by noted naturalist-writer Alan Devoe, The Theatre by George Jean Nathan, Fiction, Poetry, Books, Cartoon, Open Forum.

How Important Are Mercury Articles?

Within its own domain the Library Poster carries the prestige and authority of a Dun & Bradstreet report. Each month the Poster lists the ten best current magazine articles published in America, selected by a jury of three outstanding librarians—Rollin A. Sawyer of the New York Public Library, Charles H. Compton of the St. Louis Public Library, and Dr. Luther H. Evans of the Library of Congress. From August to December 1944 thousands of articles in hundreds of magazines were checked. The jury chose the best 50 . . . and 11 of them were MERCURY articles! Here indeed is evidence of the importance of MERCURY content . . . explanation for THE MERCURY's rise to an all-time high in circulation . . . reason for its reputation as "the magazine of opinion that makes things happen."

Lawrence E. Spivack PUBLISHER

I've just read "Tragic Ground." And in fairness to Mr. Caldwell it must be said that his latest book is not merely an account of the subhuman characteristics of Tobacco Road. Like "Trouble in July" it grants them humanity by putting them in a social context which explains their predicament. But it is not nearly so good as "Trouble in July" in this or any other respect. As story it lacks the drama and suspense of the earlier book, and it is quite devoid of any sense of tragedy. In some ways it seems, indeed, like a mere mechanical repetition of "Trouble in July."

Caldwell's venture into the Russian scene led me to say that he had better stick to God's little acre. But "Tragic Ground" makes me feel that he has exhausted that soil. The characters it yields are so uncomplicated, their behavior and especially their sexual behavior, their humor, and their way of speaking are so familiar and predictable by now that they have become tiresome.

SEVERAL PEOPLE have spoken of my note on Tintoretto's "A Doge in Prayer Before the Redeemer" in a way which made me feel as if I had uttered a password which admitted me to their own intense pleasure in some work of art. And one friend out west writes that she had "that same experience at the Metropolitan. It was on a Saturday night during a symphony concert and I stood in front of one of the big Egyptian Pharaohs—granite. There was a sign saying 'Do not touch,' but I did. I will never forget it."

TODAY & TOMORROW

A New Paper of Information and Opinion

LOUIS ADAMIC, Editor-Publisher

The current issue contains five articles by Louis Adamic:

Tito Simply Had to Win in Yugoslavia
Anglo-American "Schizophrenia"
Why Yugoslavia Is Being Denied Relief
The Fraud of the "Polish Problem"
Basic Realities Inside Greece

Also articles on:

Hungary • Spain • Asia • USA and USSR • Germany • Developments Within
U.S. • The Poison of Racial Prejudice.

Annual subscription $1; sample copy 25c

TODAY & TOMORROW

Milford

New Jersey

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Philosophy of Logic

IT BECOMES more and more obvious that the science of formal logic is an independent discipline whose progress depends on men able and willing to devote themselves to it as a profession. Nevertheless, it remains for the philosopher to examine the method and presuppositions of logic very much as he would examine physics, economics, or history. It is the philosophy of logic that Professor Cohen treats in most of the studies in "A Preface to Logic" (Henry Holt, $2.50). What is formal logic? what are propositions? what is implication? what are concepts? Such questions illustrate his concern—one which is fully justified yet different from the more technical and equally justified concern of symbolic logicians.

Readers of his "Reason and Nature" will find it rather easy to predict most of Professor Cohen's answers, and those who were convinced by that specimen eruditionis will feast upon this one. But those who weren't will continue to ask him what he means by "possible" when he says that logic is the science of all possible being, and whether he can avoid the vicious circle of defining the possible in terms of logic. They will find the correlation of 87 per cent between the membership of the International Machinists' Union and the death rate of the state of Hyderabad again offered in proof of the difference between statistical and causal connection. But they will continue to press for a clearer answer when they are told (again) that causation involves a "thread of identity" between cause and effect. Those who suspected a bit of shadow-boxing in his early attack on Bacon will see a new sparring partner in Carnap, some of whose views may well be criticized but who never says—as Cohen says he does, on page 57—that "unverified statements are meaningless." Surely a philosophical grammarian (pace Peirce) should distinguish between "unverified" and "unverifiable."

And yet, in spite of all this, many will come away with great respect for a thinker who has survived several waves of obscurantism and many muddled attacks on the method of science. Professor Cohen is no fair-weather friend of reason, but still thinks of logic as an indispensable element of liberal civilization and free thought. We find ourselves reading a learned man who, after having served City College so long and so well, has dedicated this book to it and its students. They will appreciate this moving gesture and will always remember him as their greatest teacher.

MORTON G. WHITE

George (Apley) Wharton Pepper

GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER is an old dear, and his autobiography, "Philadelphia Lawyer" (J. B. Lippincott, $3.75), is completely disarming. The ex-Senator, like Miniver Cheevy, was born too late. Instead of coming into this confusing world in 1867 in the Walnut Street home, the Gentleman from Philadelphia might well have found an eighteenth-century setting more congenial. He would then have been a leader of the Pennsylvania Federalist junto, and one can easily picture him tearing up copies of that rabble-rouser Duane's Aurora until such time as the stage from New York would bring Mr. Hamilton's Evening Post, in which undoubtedly "Mad Tom" Jefferson would be skinned alive.

About the man there is the shining integrity of a Chippendale piece setting him off from his fellow-survivors of the Hamilton system, such as Nicholas Murray Butler or the present Secretary of War. He is, above all things, a good man, whose first act as Senator was to vote against the unseating of the ineffable Truman H. Newberry of Michigan. (He tells us that to this day he gets "angry" whenever he thinks of the injustice done to the man whose devoted friends contributed $195,000 for the primary nomination.)

Pretty soon Teapot Dome blew off. "The record of President Harding was smirched," says the author gravely, "as is always the case when a too-trusting executive is betrayed by a subordinate: but I have yet to see the slightest bit of evidence that he knew or suspected what was going on"! (Exclamation mark ours.) No one should miss pages 203 to 206, the section headed I Liked Them Both, in which Senator Pepper gives us his estimates of Presidents Harding and Coolidge, not omitting the usual sling at "that man." It is a priceless picture of the Conservative mind.

MC ALISTER COLEMAN

Do Ideas Make Literature?

THE COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS has done well to reissue Mary M. Colum's seven-year-old "From These Roots: the Ideas That Have Made Modern Literature" ($2.50). Suave and unacademic, Mrs. Colum's book is a much-needed survey of dominant ideas in and about Western literature since Lessing. The thesis of the book is that modern literary ideas were laid down by Lessing and Herder, confirmed and extended by Wordsworth, Coleridge, De Staël, Sainte-Beuve, and Taine, and exhausted by later generations. Today, Mrs. Colum concludes, a new Lessing is needed "to achieve some liberating ideas" and "to make some clear recognizable boundaries between the various kinds of writing."

Full of interesting obiter dicta, and by and large a very useful book, "From These Roots" is especially welcome in these days for its sound correlations of English, American, French, German, and Russian (unfortunately not Scandinavian) literary opinion; by reminding us of forgotten facts Mrs. Colum alters many of our opinions of both the nineteenth and the twentieth centuries. Unhappily, her account of recent generations is patchy and capricious. Considerations of space would excuse a certain superficiality, but they do not excuse, for instance, her cavalier treatment of Marxism or her failure to mention I. A. Richards and the best critics of today. Since Mrs. Colum is at odds with "the new critics" as to what criticism is, she might at least have paid them the compliment of a refutation. Had she paid them even the compliment of reading their work she might, I think, have come to view more skeptically the major premise of her book, to wit, that literature is made by ideas; and the ease with which she assumes this and other things makes some of Mrs. Colum's writing seem inadequate. But all this is to complain of what Mrs. Colum has not done. What she has done is good.

ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY

Russian Economics

A MORE APPROPRIATE TITLE for J. F. Normano's "The Spirit of Russian Economics" (John Day, $2) would have been "Foreign Influences in Russian Social Thought" or something to that effect. Even the most Russian of Russia's ideological movements, Slavophilism, was heavily indebted to German philosophy. There certainly is throughout this useful little book an unreconciled, and possibly irreconcilable, dichotomy between the author's factual report of the influence of foreign ideas and his conclusions. Another writer, working with the same material, could easily have concluded that Russian economic thought has been altogether devoid of any originality, and that even such adjustment of foreign dogmas to Russian conditions as was attempted was pedantic and academic.

The author surveys the influence of British Smithianism, French physiocratic thought and Saint-Simonism, German cameralism, historicism, Katheder-Sozialismus, Marxism, and other foreign economic ideas in nineteenth-century Russia. Readily imported, these ideas were equally readily discarded because they failed, in the long run, to satisfy Russia's needs.

While Normano is probably right in saying that Slavophilism served Russian industry as a defense against European competition, his statement that the economic motive of the Russian Revolution "was the necessity to fight not primarily Western capitalism as a whole but its nearest and most dangerous position: German penetration," is not only historically untrue but also theoretical nonsense. It is contradicted by the Allied intervention against Bolshevism, by the close cooperation between Germany and Russia in the twenties, and by the writings of Lenin, Trotsky, and Stalin.

HEINZ EULAU

MOTION PICTURE

"One of the Best That We Shall See This Year"
—Crowther, N. Y. Times.

TWO CITIES FILMS presents

MR. EMMANUEL

starring FELIX AYLMER

with GRETA GYNT and WALTER RILLA

Brandt's GOTHAM B'way and 47th St.

STAGE PLAY

MICHAEL TODD presents
BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT

SONGS BY COLE PORTER

MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Matinee Wednesday and Saturday, 2-35

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

REBECCA," now current at the Barrymore Theater, is not by any reasonable definition of the term a play. It is, to be sure, divided into three acts of two scenes each, and dialogue is spoken by actors in costume who move about a stage. But such a composition is not really a play, not really even a bad play, unless some attempt has been made to tell a story in some fashion capable of making it both intelligible and interesting in its own right. No such attempt has here been made.

By all this I do not mean merely to assert in some unnecessarily elaborate fashion that Miss Daphne Du Maurier is an incompetent dramatist. From the records of her publisher it is evident that she has some kind of competence as a writer of prose fiction, and for all I know, she might be capable of writing a competent play if she should ever try. What I do mean to say is that this confused and hurried jumble of incidents in which the antecedents of the actions, the motives of the performers, and the intentions of the author are usually equally unclear, is a jumble which would never have been thrown together in just this way by any dramatist, however incompetent, who was free to shape his story as he told it. If there had never been a novel of the same name, no author could conceivably have desired to write this script, and no producer into whose hands such a script fell would dream of producing it if he did not also know that some other work of which this was supposed to be some sort of approximation was already in existence.

Improbable as to many it will no doubt appear, I have not read "Rebecca" as a novel, or seen it as a movie, or heard it on the radio. I am, therefore, in no position to say what merits the story may possibly exhibit in some telling other than that with which I am familiar, and I must confine myself to the remark that I can only suppose the original to have been a novel which ought to have been written by Mrs. Henry Wood and entitled "The Mistress of Manderley; or Lord de Winter's Terrible Secret." If, for some reasons which I find it impossible to imagine, this judgment upon the original work is unjust, the injustice is totally irrelevant to the alleged play under consideration. The best judge of any dramatization is inevitably one who is innocent of all knowledge of its original source, since only such a judge can be sure that his memory of facts or effects is not making him suppose that he is getting from the play something actually not there at all, and I solemnly assure any prospective spectators who happen to be as ignorant as I am that from the goings on at the Barrymore they cannot possibly get anything except a confused impression of some very lurid doings which seem to involve a man who murders his wife because she is a bit of a nymphomaniac and then takes up with a timid halfwit who helps him fool the coroner. I can also assure him that for the most part the acting is, if anything, a little worse than the script would inevitably force it to be. Of the leading performers Diana Barrymore probably deserves the highest praise, which in this case must consist in the statement that she detracts little or nothing from an impossible role. Florence Reed, as the sinister servant, acts sinister without making it very clear what she is being sinister about. Bramwell Fletcher, bouncing about the stage in a wispy jaunty fashion, gives what must be one of the most unconvincing portraits of a grand seigneur ever seen on any stage. Oddly enough, two supporting players—namely, George Baxter as the nymphomaniac's lover-in-chief and Reginald Mason as a county official—give excellent performances.

By contrast with "Rebecca" almost anything which makes an attempt to stand on its own legs is bound to seem worthy of a certain praise. Unfortunately, however, the only other productions upon which I have opportunity to comment here both impose a pretty severe strain upon the good-will with which I approach them. "Good Night Ladies" (Royale Theater) is an old Hogwood farce remade for the war-time trade and become little more than an excuse for parading a group of young ladies in various approximations to the nude. Several of them look very well that way, but anyone thinking of going to see for himself should be warned that he will be surprised at one thing—namely, the jokes which persons of mature years and apparently urban background have never heard before. "A Lady Says Yes" (Broadhurst Theater) remains a strictly Grade B musical show despite the agreeable presence of Carole Landis. The rather painful plot which seems to concern itself somehow with the dream of a man who is having his nose remade is no doubt accounted for by the fact that the author is said to be a successful plastic surgeon who is further alleged to have helped out financially with the production.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

THE title "Sunday Dinner for a Soldier" suggests to me a movie that could be made in a dozen or a thousand versions, all of them good; but the version that has been made is not one of them. The family which stages the dinner lives on a houseboat near Tarpon Springs, Florida. The nominal head of the family is Charles Winninger with white whiskers; everybody calls him Grandfeathers. The actual head is Anne Baxter; she is wondering whether or not to marry a rich young man who can't understand why she dances all alone (to the music of a large invisible orchestra and chorus) in the sand-founded ballroom of a derelict hotel. Other members of the family are a pretty little sister who loves a hen named Miss Easter, and two little brothers, one of whom says of a flower, "It stinks swell." These are represented as nice people, but very poor and, in their poverty, ever so whimsical and lucky. John Hodiak, the soldier who turns up for Sunday dinner, comes of nice people too, in a social and money sense, but his parents were divorced when he was twelve and he ran away when he was fourteen and worked in factories; so he too enjoys the advantages of all the classes and suffers the disadvantages of none. One of the ads for the film says of his romance with Miss Baxter, "Their eyes met! Their lips questioned! Their arms answered!" and though both players try to be reasonable about it, that is not much of an oversimplification.

I sat through the picture in a misery of embarrassment, which intensifies as I try to write about it. I feel embarrassment rather than simple anger because most of the people who worked on the show appear to have loved it, believed in it, and had great hopes for its originality and worthiness. The confused but genuine sweetness of their intention is as visible through all the mawkish formulas, and as disturbing, as a drowned corpse never quite surfacing. I cannot bear to say in detail why I found the film so distasteful. To do so would be like spending a self-controlled day with an innocently awful family, then sneering at all that was painful to you but dear to them.

"Shanghai Drama" was the last movie G. W. Pabst made in France before he went over to the Nazis. I understand that it was heavily censored by the French (including this American print), but it is hard for me to imagine that that can have made much difference. Shot by shot, some of it is interesting and nostalgically satisfying; even at his best Pabst is heavy as lead, but even at his worst he is also gifted. But the story—White Russians forced to work for Black Dragon agents—is like Malraux redone for the pulps. The worst we can do can hardly match the Europeans when they take their trash seriously.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

WEBSTER AITKEN'S series of three piano recitals at Town Hall is in part retrospective: at the first he played Beethoven's "Diabelli" Variations, which he played at his debut recital in New York ten years ago. I happened to be present at that debut, not because of any knowledge or expectation concerning Aitken's playing, but because of an interest in the infrequently heard "Diabelli" Variations. But the performance I heard led me to describe the recital as "one of the most notable events of this or any season; for it presented . . . a young man who is already a matured pianist, musician, and artist." And later, urging Nation readers to hear him, I wrote: "What is remarkable about him is not so much his rich endowment of technique and musical feeling as his integration of these resources, and behind this the inner integration of experience and emotion. This—astonishing in one so young—manifests itself both in his choice of music to play and in the way he plays it, and lifts him in both respects out of the group of gifted young American pianists to a place among a handful of living artists . . . [It] causes Aitken's mind to be attracted by such gigantic musical matters as Beethoven's 'Diabelli' Variations or the 'Goldberg' Variations of Bach; he plays one of these works in public because of what it means to him and out of a desire to communicate this to other people; and the resources he brings to his task are evident only in the coherence and power of the work as he plays it, the unobtrusive adequacy with which its every formidable technical requirement is satisfied."

The ten years have further matured him, so that today he is able to impart even greater coherence and power to the "Diabelli" Variations. But even more impressive for me, at his recent recital, was his playing of a smaller, less immediately imposing work—Mozart's extraordinary Rondo K. 511 in A minor. The grace of the flow of melody, the strength of its phraseological articulation, the gradual building-up of tension to the last powerful statement, the unflawed beauty of the sound in which all this was achieved—these made the impact of this quiet, unemphatic piece, in the end, overwhelming; and in their quiet, subtle way they provided an overwhelming demonstration of the powers of a great musician and a master of the piano.

Victor's February list is devoted chiefly to recordings by Marian Anderson, Rachmaninov, Morini, and Primrose of the little pieces of sticky candy that such musicians feed their concert, radio, and phonograph audiences, and that don't call for discussion here. In addition it offers a set (986; $4.50) of Brahms's Sonata Opus 78 for violin and piano—a characteristic Brahms product, with its saccharine themes and their aridly synthetic involvements to produce large structure. Making it worse is the tremulous tone and phrasing of Yehudi Menuhin, with the piano part reduced to a faint murmur possibly by the recording engineers but probably by Hepzibah herself, who persisted in deferring to the brother whom she far surpassed. And on a single disc (11-8729; $1) is a good performance by Boulton with the Hallé Orchestra of Liadov's "Kikimora," a very slight piece in the style of Rimsky-Korsakov.

Continental Record Company has issued under the title "Encore!" a set of three 10-inch discs with the pianist Andor Földes's performances of a number of small pieces: three of Brahms's Waltzes Opus 39, Liszt's "Valse oubliée," Chopin's C sharp minor Mazurka and C major Prelude, Debussy's "Maid with the Flaxen Hair," Gershwin's Prelude in B flat, arrangements of Prokofiev's March from "The Love of Three Oranges" and Shostakovich's Polka from "The Golden Age," and also a Fantastic Dance by Shostakovich. Some of the playing that Földes did with Szigeti was good enough; but I recall writing about my dissatisfaction with his playing in Szigeti's Mozart sonata series at the Y. M. H. A.; and his solo performances in this set I find heavy-handed, mannered, and sentimental.

In Early Issues of The Nation
Puritanism and Democracy
By Ralph Barton Perry
Reviewed by Sidney Hook

Verse Chronicle
Some Young Poets and a New Genre
By F. W. Dupee

The Last Flowering of the Middle Ages
By Joseph Van Der Elst
Reviewed by Clement Greenberg

A Satisfying Life of Social Pioneering for Socially Conscious Young Men and Women

To be appointed as from January 1, 1945

DISTRICT STUDY-ACTION LEADERS

In the Adult Education Division • Department of Education Province of Saskatchewan

AGES: 25 - 40

BOTH SEXES: ANY NATIONALITY

ACADEMIC QUALIFICATIONS

University degree in most cases
Grade XII minimum

CHIEF QUALIFICATIONS

Social Vision
Psychological and sociological good sense
Belief in "the People" and in social change

OTHER DESIRABLE EXPERIENCE

Armed Services • Teaching
Rural Community leadership or farmerorganization responsibilities
Social Service
Labor-organization responsibilities

SALARY

Junior and Senior Grades, according to age and experience
Junior Grade: $1800-$2400 per year
Senior Grade: $2400-$3000 per year

Apply, with photograph, to:

DIRECTOR OF ADULT EDUCATION

DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

PROVINCE OF SASKATCHEWAN

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language. MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple! Thousands have succeeded. ♦ ♦ 29 LANGUAGES Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE 91 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

"HEAVEN AND HELL"

The most definite teaching on the certainty of immortality and on the life hereafter is to be found in the Writings of famed scientist, philosopher, theologian, and statesman. His book on HEAVEN AND HELL FROM THINGS HEARD AND SEEN, may be obtained by new readers at the introductory price of five cents.

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG

SWEDENBORG FOUNDATION, INC. Room 1636, 51 East 42nd St., New York 17

FIGHT Infantile Paralysis JOIN the March of Dimes

Invest NOW in a

WRITING CAREER

Buy U. S. War Bonds First—then Invest in Your Own Future

The Magazine Institute, a private school owned and operated by successful writers and editors, offers practical, personal training in writing for magazines. You work in your own home, in spare time. Every assignment is returned with detailed criticism.

FICTION OR NON-FICTION

You may concentrate on either short story or article work, or you may experiment with several fields. The Magazine Institute training is not a textbook course but a series of fascinating writing tasks which lead to the actual preparation, under editorial direction, of short stories, articles, feature stories, whatever you are best fitted to do.

FREE CATALOG

Send TODAY for our free catalog which tells all about opportunities in magazine writing.

THE MAGAZINE INSTITUTE, INC.
Dept. 93-C, 59 Rockefeller Plaza,
Rockefeller Center, New York 20, N. Y.
Please send me your free catalog. This inquiry is confidential and no salesman will call on me.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Dr. Magnes and Palestine

Dear Sirs: In your issue of December 23 you published a letter from Dr. Judah L. Magnes giving his views on the Palestine situation as a resident of that country. I have lived in Palestine for some twenty-four years and have had extensive dealings and close contact with Jews and Arabs in the practice of my profession as a lawyer and as adviser to the Jewish Agency for Palestine. I believe the views expressed here are shared by the overwhelming majority of Jews in Palestine.

The problem confronting the Jews is not, as Dr. Magnes suggests, how to give the Jews the chance for a larger immigration. It is how to insure to every Jew who needs or wishes to go to Palestine the right to do so, how to put an end to the national homelessness of the Jewish people. Zionists believe this can be done only by enabling the Jews to develop their national life in a country of their own. They consider that the Jews have the same right as all other peoples to live as a nation in the land which was their cradle, the land which owes its place in history to the Jews.

If one were to accept Dr. Magnes's proposition that Jewish immigration into Palestine should be arbitrarily restricted to 500,000 additional Jews, one would at once be confronted with the question which Arabs might put, why as many as 500,000, or that which the Jews would put, why only 500,000?

Dr. Magnes commits another error of approach when he bases his case on the need to allay the "fear" of the Arabs. Whether that "fear" is real or a political pretext for opposing legitimate Jewish aspirations, it should not be permitted to interfere with a just decision upon the Jewish claim. If we are to be kept from attaining our rightful goal because the Arabs fear, or say they fear, the consequences, they need only allege that fear and the Jews would lose their right to reconstitute Palestine as their homeland. That would be neither reasonable nor morally justifiable. Would Dr. Magnes suggest that the Arabs be prohibited from achieving independence in Syria or the Lebanon if the Jews allege, as they well might, that they fear in such a case that the Syrians and Lebanese might wish at some future date to attack the Jews? I venture to doubt it. Dr. Magnes's conviction that the Jewish people can be won over to a proposal for "bi-nationalism" of the type he indicates is without a shred of justification. He knows, or should know, that the vast majority, indeed all but a negligible percentage of the Jews in Palestine, are most definitely opposed to such a scheme. He knows that at the American Jewish Conference held in New York last year, representative of virtually the entire Jewish community of the United States, a resolution was enthusiastically adopted by some 480 delegates out of a total of 500 favoring the opposite of what he suggests—namely, the establishment of Palestine as a Jewish Commonwealth. How in the face of these facts Dr. Magnes ventures to express his pious but chimerical hope that the Jews would agree to his bi-nationalism compromise is a riddle I cannot solve.

The attitude of the Arabs is no different. I invite Dr. Magnes to furnish evidence that a single one of the numerous Arab political parties has ever given the slightest justification for such a belief. The fact is, the Arabs are sufficiently intelligent to understand that you cannot artificially keep the number of Jews and Arabs equal.

Dr. Magnes also fails to point out that the question is not one between the Jews of Palestine and the Arabs of Palestine, but one between the Jewish people and the Arab people. The Arabs have six independent countries in which they are free to live their national life as they please—Egypt, Syria, the Lebanon, Iraq, Yemen, and Saudi Arabia. These countries are one hundred times the size of Palestine. Are the Jews not to have the right to one little country where they too will be free to live their national life as they think right?

Dr. Magnes speaks of political parity. Those who share his opinion have been challenged to explain how a state will function in which Jews and Arabs have an equal voice and equal voting power. Clearly it will be faced by a stalemate from the very first day of its existence and will be unable to carry on.

Dr. Magnes is so concerned about Arab "fears" that he goes on to suggest that there be created a larger union of Palestine, Transjordan, Syria, and the Lebanon. Why two other Arab states, Syria and the Lebanon, should be expected to join such a union to allay the "fears" of Arabs in Palestine is another riddle. One would have thought that states usually take such steps only because they consider them to be in their own interest. This is but another instance of the hopelessly unrealistic nature of Dr. Magnes's proposal, which is made in complete disregard of the fact that repeatedly during the last few months the Lebanese government, through its Prime Minister, categorically declared that the Lebanon would not entertain any proposal to enter a federation which would in any way impair its complete independence and full sovereignty.

The effect of Dr. Magnes's proposal should at least be clear. He can envisage the existence of independent Arab states. They already exist. But he apparently cannot contemplate the existence again of a Jewish state. To the Jewish people he counsels the abandonment of all hope to live again as a people. They are to remain the one people discriminated against. They are to be a pariah among the nations. It is to this inferior, second-grade status that Dr. Magnes would have his readers believe the Jews of Palestine will agree. I am afraid Dr. Magnes fails to understand the spirit and mind of the Jews of Palestine despite his twenty-two years of residence in the country. If there were any danger of a Jewish revolt in Palestine, it would be against precisely the scheme Dr. Magnes is advocating, a scheme which would bar Palestine to the entry of Jews and condemn the Jewish people forever to inferior status by preventing them from achieving national independence in their ancient homeland. To such a fate the Jews cannot possibly be expected to submit. BERNARD JOSEPH
New York, December 28

Notes on the "Digest"

Dear Sirs: I wish to correct a few misinterpretations that happened to appear in Fulton Oursler's reply to your editorial on the Reader's Digest.

First, let me, as a member of the Magazines Committee of the National Council of Teachers of English which made the report Mr. Oursler referred to, reassure him that the Executive Committee did not reject our report but voted to continue the study for another year after we on the committee agreed to it. This may be corroborated by consulting the accounts of the convention published in the Chicago Sun, the New York Times, PM, Variety, Tide, Newsweek, and many other papers during the week of November 23, 1944.

Second, as to Mr. Oursler's statistics on "cooperative planning," let me quote the statistics I compiled in an article I wrote on the Reader's Digest for the English Journal (June, 1943) entitled The Rainbow. For the year 1942, out of a total of 411 articles, 70 were "undigested," or a percentage of 17. The percentage ranged from a low of 12 per cent in May and August to a high of 25 in November.

Third, in that same article, I asked the question our committee asked the Reader's Digest to answer, to no avail: Is the Reader's Digest still a digest? The figures say no. We maintain that the Digest is a journal of opinion, comparable to The Nation, and not the falsely claimed champion "of both sides" as it claims. The Nation does not hesitate to admit that it is biased in favor of liberalism. If the Digest has a bias—and we think it has—why doesn't it come right out and say so? We are willing to settle for just that alone. Does the Digest have the courage to do it?

SAMUEL BECKOFF

Long Island City, N. Y., January 10

Yugoslav Relief Ship

Dear Sirs: For the last three years the Yugoslav people have made a disproportionate and unusual contribution to the victory of the United Nations. They have done it practically without aid from anybody—in fact, in the face of persistent unwillingness in the United States and Britain to recognize that contribution.

Perhaps thousands of American soldiers who fought in Africa and Sicily or who are still fighting in Italy are alive today partly because Tito's Yugoslav Liberation Army and partisan detachments, using weapons captured from the enemy, were keeping large German forces pinned down in Yugoslavia away from the fronts on which our men are fighting.

The Yugoslavs did this at an almost unimaginable sacrifice. Nearly two million of their best men and women, girls and boys, have perished in the struggle. This is as if the United States had lost fifteen million of its finest people.

Now, those who have managed to survive these three terrible years face death or the bitterest hardship for lack of the most elementary supplies. Over 70 per cent of their national wealth has been destroyed. Their houses, their cities, their fields have been devastated or stripped, and seven million people, more than half of them children, are

"PARTISAN REVIEW"

is at the present time the only first-rate literary magazine in America." — EDMUND WILSON

In the Winter 1945 Issue of

PARTISAN REVIEW

THE COLONY by ISAAC ROSENFELD

Winner of the first prize in the Partisan-Dial novelette contest

JAMES BURNHAM
Lenin's Heir: A Revaluation of Stalin

LIONEL TRILLING
Art and Neurosis

RAMON SENDER
Rhapsody in Latin American Poetry

HANNAH ARENDT
Approaches to the German Problem

RANDALL JARRELL
Poetry in War and Peace

MARY MCCARTHY
Faith on Broadway

DELMORE SCHWARTZ
Yvor Winters: A Literary Provincial

JAMES GROSSMAN
Mr. Agee and the New Yorker

H. R. HAYS
Defense of the Thriller

JAMES JOHNSON SWEENEY
Interview with Jacques Lipchitz

WYLIE SYPHER
Social Ambiguity in a Gothic Novel

POEMS: Marguerite Young, Byron
Vazakas, Oscar Williams, Arthur Mizener.

PARTISAN REVIEW

45 Astor Place, New York 3, N. Y.

I enclose ☐ $2.00 for one year
☐ $3.00 for two years subscription to Partisan Review beginning with _____ issue.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

ZONE _____ STATE _____

Crossword Puzzle No. 101

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 "I will take my ----- oath on it" (Don Quixote)
- 6 No amount of pull will help you if the door has this on it
- 10 Cop it in the eye
- 11 Shy in company
- 12 This comic is Gilbertian
- 13 Profited by giving Ned an ear
- 16 Pussy-footed
- 17 He illustrated the "Alice" stories
- 18 The bird inside wants out, and the bird outside wants in
- 20 Downpour in the Ukraine
- 22 Where even the briskest walker adopts a shuffling step at last
- 23 Grit
- 24 Back room
- 25 Politely called "puree" (two words, 3 and 4)
- 27 Completely put out, a nightbird goes to bed
- 29 Cobbler's work, this
- 34 Confess (two words, 3 and 2)
- 85 Single, but not all alone
- 86 Lifeless
- 87 We are, or used to be
- 88 All that is left when grandmother has learned her lesson

DOWN

- 1 Extreme. Transpose the last two letters to make it more extreme
- 8 Steamship, or part of its cargo
- 4 The common run
- 5 Wagers
- 6 Lost Pa in a government department!
- 7 Herds in a scrap

- 8 One of the things that "gyred and gimble in the wabe" (Jabberwocky)
- 9 An English capitalist?
- 14 Removed from high office
- 15 Resigns (anag.)
- 16 You and I impersonated by Peggy —the flighty creature!
- 18 This accounts for how the money goes (two words, 4 and 4)
- 19 Sure thing
- 21 "It was a mighty while ---" (Ben Jonson)
- 25 Yours may be your parents or your nation
- 26 One requires a lot of this to shine in society
- 28 Flinch
- 30 Attainable, perhaps, but rarely attained
- 31 Character in The Mikado who stops just short of being rude (hyphen, 2-2)
- 32 Drink like a fish
- 33 Ice usually precedes this

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 100

ACROSS:—1 COBALT; 6 STUPOR; 13 OAT-CAKE; 11 RETURN; 12 ANDREW; 13 EGOISTS; 14 ORES; 17 STIR; 19 NUNNERIES; 21 FIEND; 23 INEPT; 25 AROUND; 26 AERIAL; 27 EIGHT; 29 GIBED; 31 ALIENATED; 34 LAIR; 36 RIPE; 37 EMANATE; 38 CURARI; 40 ELOPED; 41 STREETS; 42 SLEUTH; 43 EARTHY.
DOWN:—1 CARTON; 2 BATTEN; 3 LORE; 4 TANGERINE; 5 SKATE; 6 TENS; 7 PIRATE; 8 REWARD; 10 CHINEE; 15 RU-MANIA; 16 SNOOKER; 17 SIMILAR; 18 IN-SLEEP; 20 INDIA; 21 SPAHL; 24 TETE-A-TETE; 28 GLANCE; 29 GLACIS; 30 BIERCE; 32 TIPPET; 33 DEADLY; 35 SMITH; 37 ERST; 38 ELSA.

without clothing and blankets. Tens of thousands of men, women, and children will starve or freeze to death this winter if supplies do not reach them soon.

To help meet their critical need, plans have been made to send a relief ship to Yugoslavia loaded with used warm clothing, tinned foods, and medical supplies. The American Committee for the Yugoslav Relief Ship at 58 Park Avenue, New York, has been formed by the War Relief Fund of Americans of South Slavic Descent to conduct the emergency drive to fill the ship.

This is an appeal to your readers to go through their trunks and closets and attics and pick out their used but still serviceable clothing of all sorts and sizes and any blankets and quilts they can spare. If they send the articles at once to the committee, it is highly probable that their contributions will warm someone in liberated Yugoslavia this winter.

I beg your readers to bring this appeal to the attention of others in their neighborhood, to people in their office, shop, school, library, club, or church. It may be, for instance, that some clothing merchant or manufacturer has overstocks of unsalable garments and other articles. All such goods will be deeply welcome in Yugoslavia.

Neighborhood, school, church, or shop collecting committees might be started. Volunteer help of all kinds is needed.

Clothing may be brought to our headquarters, American Committee for the Yugoslav Relief Ship, 58 Park Avenue, New York (LExington 2-2708), or may be mailed to our warehouse, 161 Perry Street.
LOUIS ADAMIC
New York, December 18

CONTRIBUTORS

GRAYSON KIRK is professor of government at Columbia University.

ANNA LOUISE STRONG has been a sympathetic reporter on Russia since 1921.

DOROTHY B. JONES was formerly head of the Film Reviewing and Analysis Section of the OWI. The opinions expressed in her article, however, are her own.

MILBURN P. AKERS is political editor of the Chicago Sun.

JACQUES BARZUN is an associate professor of history at Columbia University.

MORTON G. WHITE is an instructor in philosophy at Columbia University.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 10, 1945

NUMBER 6

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS

- A New Foreign Policy? 143
Still Too Much Brass Hat 144

ARTICLES

- Zhukov's Gamble by Charles G. Bolté 145
Wallace: Second Round by I. F. Stone 146
Britain's Economic Dunkirk by Keith Hutchison 147
25 Years Ago in The Nation 149
The French and the Big Three by Charles A. Micand 150
Strange Doings in California by Carey McWilliams 152
Nazi Post-War Strategy by Alfred Kantorowicz 154
In the Wind 155

POLITICAL WAR

- When Does Morale Break? by Joseph Bornstein 156
Latin American Front by V. M. 157
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 158

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Some Young Poets and a New Genre
by F. W. Dupee 159
Briefer Comment 161
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 163
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 165
Film Note by James Agee 166
Music by B. H. Haggin 166

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

- CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 102 by Jack Barrett 168

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART
ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

COINCIDENT WITH THE RUSSIAN SWEEP AND ON the eve of the Big Three meeting, it is reported that our fliers are beginning to shower the Germans with pamphlets spelling out the meaning of "unconditional surrender." There is no naming terms, but a distinction is clearly drawn between "individual Germans who had nothing to do with the crimes committed by the war criminals" and the war criminals themselves. "It is the wish of the Allies," say the pamphlets, "to give the German people the possibility for normal peaceful development as members of the European family of nations."

★

BUT SUCH IS NOT THE WISH OF ADOLF HITLER. In his Third Reich anniversary speech Hitler denounced the false promise of the decadent democracies, pointed a trembling finger at "the horrid fate that is now taking shape in the east," and exhorted his war-harrowed people to strengthen the heart and steel the nerves "in the holy determination to wield the sword . . . until final victory crowns our efforts." He pictured the menacing wave of "Jewish Asiatic Bolshevism," which unless checked by superhuman effort would engulf not only Germany but the whole European continent and England as well. Perhaps Hitler was directing his remarks not only to the Berliners watching the brightening glare in the eastern skies and the refugees crowding the roads from Breslau and Stettin. Perhaps he was also thinking of more isolated Russophobes gazing out across the broad expanses of Lake Michigan and a few others with a view of the Potomac. The Vansittartites must have had some satisfaction in seeing the frenzied captain trying to herd the whole German shipload—passengers and Nazi crew—into a single leaky lifeboat: now it is salvation or damnation for all.

★

WILL THIS RADICAL PAN-GERMANISM BE ANY more convincing when urged by the fanatic of Berchtesgaden than when argued more suavely by the English lord or his American counterparts? The German mass held together by propaganda, terror, war, and desperation is beginning to separate itself out into constituent parts. There is probably toughness yet in morale. There is certainly fighting strength which will yet be demonstrated on all fronts. But the cracks are beginning to appear. The craven are beginning to look for a hiding place—twice Hitler spoke of the cowards and the infamous ones. The foreign workers, such as the Russians in Oppeln, carry on more effective sabotage. The renewed activity of the Free Germany Committee in Moscow and of its counterpart in France is undoubtedly having an influence in encouraging Germans who have never been sympathetic with the Nazis. Prisoners report that even the stout-hearted Wehrmacht fighters have lost all hope of matching the increasing odds against them. The iron-disciplined fanatics of the S. S. will hold the longest. But even their nerve will crack when they find that the desperation and hatred born of fear in the hearts of the German people is no longer directed toward the enemy "from the steppes of Asia" but towards their own leaders who have led them through twelve years of tinsel glory and hopeless suffering into this ghoulis twilight. The funeral march of Götterdämmerung has begun. *

THERE MUST BE NO COMPROMISE IN OUR STAND on the punishment of war criminals. Already two good men have been lost to the United Nations War Crimes Commission because they insisted that neither the political status of the criminal nor the nationality of his victims should protect him from justice. If the hundreds of thousands of helpless German Jews—men, women, and little children—and the courageous anti-Nazi Germans who have fallen victim to Nazi torture and cruelty are not avenged, then one main objective of this war will remain unfulfilled. There has been a sinister tendency on the part of both the State Department and the British Foreign Office to eliminate from the war its ideological essence and reduce it to a mere clash of military powers. Under such an interpretation the sadists who carried through the shocking brutalities in Poland will be run to earth but the master minds who designed the crime of Nazism itself will go free. If this is a peoples' war and not just a war of states and governments, now is the time for the people to speak. Their pressure has already forced statements from Richard K. Law for the Foreign Office and Joseph Grew for the State Department, although it has not put back on the War Crimes Commission Sir Cecil Hurst and Herbert C. Pell. The pressure of the people must continue to act on and through their representatives and their governments, and must even be felt at the Big Three conference. The danger of leniency with Nazis is revealed in the warning article of Alfred Kantorowicz in the present issue. As a first step to a free world the forgers and perpetrators of Nazi crimes must be brought to justice.

✱

THE CURRENT CONDITION OF ITALY IS A POOR advertisement for Anglo-American statesmanship. Not only are cold, hunger, and disease rampant, but reports from all parts of the liberated area speak of a wave of crime and juvenile delinquency. Herbert L. Matthews has recently cabled the New York Times from Sicily: "Eighteen months after its liberation this island is half-starved, wretched, and rebellious, a prey to grave civil disorders." According to this source, the troubles range from brigandage to draft riots to "virtual insurrections." An uprising in Ragusa and Agrigento provinces early this year ended with at least thirty-six dead and eighty-five wounded. Reports like this remind us that the necessity for preventing anarchy was one excuse for following the principle of continuity in Italy, for upholding the Royal House, and for maintaining in office local Fascist functionaries unless their reputations were especially malodorous. The promises of law and order must now seem as ironical to the Italians as the promises of food.

IN SICILY ONE CAUSE OF UNREST AND POSSIBLY a cause of disorder is the separatist movement, whose leaders are seeking to have the island made an independent, sovereign state, after which they would be willing to federate with Italy. Mr. Matthews reports that this movement cuts across all party lines. Its supporters claim that ever since the Risorgimento they have been exploited and neglected by the government at Rome, which has hindered industrial development and done little or nothing to relieve agricultural distress. However, it is noteworthy that the "financial backbone of separatism and its chief leadership" are supplied by the big landlords. Since one of the most vital needs of Sicily is a subdivision of the big estates, this group may well be moved by the fear that some future left-wing Italian government will move to expropriate them, along with the landlords of the mainland. With "independence" the island would almost inevitably come under British influence, and British governments are notoriously tender of landed interests. Mr. Matthews does not mention this point or, perhaps because of the censorship, the strongly held belief of many Italians that the British have given aid and encouragement to the separatists. But the analogy he draws between the separatists and the Moslem League in India, with its demand for Pakistan, is suggestive.

✱

THE LIBERATION OF MANILA HAS SYMBOLIC AS well as military importance. It is the first great city recaptured from the Japanese, and the enthusiastic welcome given to our forces is good evidence that politically our Eastern enemy has been building on sand. Strategically, the taking of Manila cuts the Japanese garrison in two and opens up the possibility of a return of the American navy to the Cavite base, though this move may be delayed by a Japanese death-stand on Corregidor. But in any case American possession of the major Luzon airfield virtually completes the isolation of the vast Japanese holdings in the South Pacific. Although the enemy is attempting to counterbalance the loss of sea communications by obtaining a land route across China, his possession of a land link between Canton and Hankow by no means assures a dependable system of communication. A railway still has to be built; and even if it can be completed before an American landing on the China coast it will be subject to constant attack by the Fourteenth Air Force and Chinese guerrillas. Meanwhile, the opening of the Ledo-Burma road promises to have an immediate effect in strengthening Chinese resistance and in making it possible to build up a stronger American air force. Most encouraging of all is the report of a projected reorganization of the Chinese army along lines that have long been advocated by General Stilwell and other American military authorities. Under the plan one-third of the ragged, ill-nourished conscript army is to be demobilized; the rest is to be reorganized and given a considerable increase in pay. This will have the triple advantage of increasing the number of men available for food production and war work, reducing by some millions the number who must be fed by the government, and increasing the efficiency of the remaining Chinese troops. The significance of this move is best expressed in General Stilwell's own words when he declared that "the Chinese soldier, if fed, clothed, and trained, is as good a soldier as anyone can ask for."

STEPS FOR STRENGTHENING THE ROLE OF THE International Labor Organization in the post-war period received top priority at the meeting of its Governing Board which has just terminated in London. A constitutional change was adopted which will permit the I. L. O., formerly linked loosely with the League of Nations, to cooperate closely with the new security organization provided for at Dumbarton Oaks while retaining its present functions. After a bitter dispute in which the employer delegates were overruled, the Governing Board voted to establish seven international industrial committees on a tripartite basis, with government as well as employer and worker representatives. These industrial committees are intended to serve as international collective-bargaining agencies which will stabilize wages and working conditions in the basic industries. A foretaste of the problem of dealing with the defeated countries was provided when the representatives of France and Yugoslavia successfully opposed Italy's petition for readmission into the I. L. O. A plea that Russia be invited once again to participate in the organization was also sidetracked. Yet it is evident that if effective international labor standards are to be created and enforced, all nations, particularly the low-standard ones, must be included.

✱

OUR PUBLIC OFFICIALS SHOW AN INFINITE capacity for tying themselves up into legalistic knots in dealing with the enemy, whether it be in connection with punishing war crimes or the handling of alien property. The Department of Justice has been persuaded by the Office of the Alien Property Custodian to pay almost $700,000 to a group of former I. G. Farben employees in this country rather than contest their suits for recovery of stock seized after Pearl Harbor. The stock was acquired either just before or just after the outbreak of the European war under circumstances designed to keep I. G. Farben subsidiaries in this country in hands friendly to the Germans. Our Washington editor, I. F. Stone, in an article called Fumbling with I. G. Farben, recently called attention to this situation and to the unusual career of one Ernest K. Halbach, president of General Dyestuffs when it was exclusive sales agent in this country for I. G. Farben and securely under German control. Halbach is under indictment for conspiracy with I. G. Farben and his bank accounts are blocked by the Treasury, but he has been drawing $82,000 a year as "consultant" to his old company since the Alien Property Custodian took it over, and he will now be paid $557,550 for the stock taken from him after the war began. The government's decision to settle rather than fight seems all the stranger since in the only one of these I. G. Farben subsidiary cases to reach the courts the government won the first round.

✱

REPEAL OF THE POLL TAX IN GEORGIA RANKS as one of the most encouraging developments in recent weeks on the domestic front. It is an event, however, which can be interpreted two ways. Conservatives are already pointing to the repeal as conclusive evidence that the South will handle the problem satisfactorily if it is not subjected to pressure by "outside agitators." Yet the fact remains that Georgia's action came at a time when the pressure for federal legislation outlawing the poll tax is greater than it has been at any other period since the Civil War. No one is likely to insist on federal legislation if all the poll-tax states will voluntarily rescind their discriminatory restrictions on voting. But as these states have had many years in which to abolish their restrictions by their own initiative and have failed to act, it would seem obvious that greater pressure is necessary. The need for a federal law is further pointed up by the situation in Tennessee, where a bill outlawing the tax was invalidated by the state Supreme Court and the legislature has refused to pass a new bill designed to by-pass the objections of the court.

A New Foreign Policy?

RUSHING across Europe, the comet-like Harry Hopkins left a glittering wake of speculation before he vanished behind the overcast of censorship which hides the deliberations of the Big Three. Possibly before this issue of The Nation appears, that overcast will be lifted and an expectant world given some inkling of the agenda and conclusions of the conference. Meanwhile, it may be instructive to examine some clues to the nature of the program which the President is laying before Churchill and Stalin.

From Washington, London, Paris, and Rome have come reports which suggest a new and firmer American policy in Europe. We have, if these reports are to be trusted, abandoned the idea that war can be conducted purely on a military level with all political questions thrust aside until the guns stop firing. In an interview in Rome, Mr. Hopkins is reported to have said that the Administration now realized that conditions in the liberated countries could not be left out of account in military planning. He added as a personal opinion—but would he have voiced it if it was at variance with those of his chief?—that the swing to the left among the European nations was to the interests of the United States, provided it did not go to the extremes of totalitarianism. In an account of the same interview Anne O'Hare McCormick quoted Hopkins as saying that American motives for participation in European affairs were not so closely connected with immediate national interests as were those of the British and the Russians, illustrated by their concern for security in the Mediterranean and in Eastern Europe respectively. Our concern, rather, was for "a good peace" based on the ideals for which we had fought.

In the view of some observers, all this means that President Roosevelt, strengthened by the assurance of Senatorial support, is going to talk turkey to both Churchill and Stalin. He will tell them that British and Russian demands for security must not stand in the way of the kind of settlement that will give the United States security against the outbreak of a third world war in Europe. Moreover, it is believed, he will emphasize the fact that Americans are not taking part in the liberation of Europe in order to enthrone new dictatorships and will insist on joint machinery to insure that the Italians and the Greeks actually have a free hand to choose their future form of government. According to Jon Kimche of Reuters, the message the President sent Churchill via Hopkins contained a flat veto of all "totalitarian governments in Europe whether of right or left," and included in this description the present setups in Lublin and Belgrade.

We confess to some skepticism about these reports in the absence of corroborative evidence. Surely, if the Administration were going to take a rigid stand against totalitarianism, it would not overlook Franco. Moreover, the deference our diplomats, official and unofficial, show to the Vatican does not seem to us to be consistent with a strong stand for European democracy. It is true that the Pope has recently spoken favorably of democracy, but his notion of democracy is a decidedly esoteric one, and we cannot forget that he has condemned only those fascist regimes which have actively interfered with the political or property rights of the church. Yet the Administration continues to treat the Vatican as an important temporal power; indeed, as one of the United Nations, not, perhaps, quite on a par with the Big Three but as worthy of consultation as France.

Assuming, however, that these suspicions are groundless, what are the arguments and the bargaining counters that Mr. Roosevelt can employ in overcoming the fears and ambitions of Britain and Russia? Reports from several quarters declare that he proposes to use America's economic position as a club. Russia and Britain, not to mention smaller European powers, will need generous American credit for reconstruction. This country, the President may say, is prepared to offer the necessary loans but only if the political settlement of Europe is such as to minimize the risks. How effective this argument will prove we do not know. Historically, the Soviets have always looked askance at loans with political strings attached, and the British are already torn between the desire to speed reconstruction and the fear of economic dependence on the United States.

In these circumstances the second means of persuasion, which Mr. Roosevelt is supposed to have up his sleeve, may prove more effective. This is support for the principle of a tough peace for Germany coupled with a definite American undertaking to enforce it by means of the Vandenberg or some similar plan. Reports from several different sources agree that the so-called Morgenthau plan, with some modifications, represents the policy for post-war Germany which the President has adopted. It would include the partial dismemberment of the Reich, with Silesia going to Poland and control of the Ruhr and Rhineland passing to some kind of international commission. These steps alone would deprive Germany of a major part of its heavy industry, but its war-making capacity would be further reduced by the physical removal of chemical, machine, and other plants to neighboring countries which have suffered from German occupation. In addition, Mr. Roosevelt, it is said, is ready to back the use of German labor on a large scale to make good the devastation in countries invaded by Germany.

On paper such schemes have the quality of rough justice. Germany's victims have the right to demand that their economic needs take precedence, that their standard of living should be restored to normal before that of the Germans. But while giving the utmost consideration to their claims we have to take into account the ultimate consequences of such drastic peace terms. Could a Germany deprived of its wealthiest provinces and strictly limited in its economic activities exist at all as a political entity? Could any kind of native government be found for it, and, if not, what kind of military rule would the Allies be able to provide and for how long? These are but a few of the questions to which the Morgenthau plan gives rise. Perhaps the Big Three will provide some answers. Until we have them, the plan appears as an impractical but far from harmless blueprint.

Still Too Much Brass Hat

WE HOPE the Senate Military Affairs Committee will not let itself be stampeded into passing the May-Bailey work-or-fight bill without full hearings, and we hope that the committee will amend the bill to increase the powers of the War Manpower Commission and the Office of War Mobilization. The angry statement made by Senator Edwin C. Johnson (Democrat, Colorado) serves to call attention to the fact that the War Department still seems intent on going its own high-handed way in the handling of man-power. The Nation has called attention time and again to the fact that man-power cannot be isolated from the rest of the war-production picture and that much current difficulty goes back to the stubborn unwillingness of army-navy procurement services to cooperate with civilian war agencies in a coordinated program. Judging from Senator Johnson's outburst, that attitude of mind still dominates the War Department.

The House turned down the Voorhis bill to handle labor shortages by giving greater power to the War Manpower Commission. This approach seems to us the one best designed to combine compulsion with efficiency. But the work-or-fight measure as passed by the House did provide that the basic certificates for compulsory mobilization of man-power should be issued by the Director of War Mobilization "after consultation with the appropriate representatives of management, labor, agriculture, and government" and after finding that voluntary recruitment had failed. This means full utilization of the democratic and cooperative community mechanisms already established by the War Manpower Commission in war production centers. And this provision was based on the written recommendation agreed upon by the War Department and the other agencies concerned with man-power.

Senator Johnson declared that after the committee had accepted this recommendation by a vote of seven-to-two, a high War Department spokesman privately telephoned several members of the Senate committee to urge them to substitute a "compromise amendment" placing greater powers in the hands of Selective Service boards and relegating the Office of War Mobilization and other civilian agencies to mere advisory roles. Johnson called this "dirty double-crossing," which it is, if true, and the committee has held up the bill. It seems to be clear to everyone but the brass hats that the local draft boards are not equipped to handle the complicated and delicate problems of labor mobilization; they have made a mess of the simpler problem of occupational deferments. The army-navy procurement services prefer to leave compulsory powers with Selective Service because it is under military influence, if not domination, and has no authority to go into related phases of the war-production problem.

To explain what we mean we call attention to the order issued on January 26 by J. A. Krug, chairman of the War Production Board. This order seems to embody the first agreement among army, navy, War Manpower Commission, and War Production Board on a very old, obvious, and elementary problem. The problem is for the army and navy not to place new contracts in tight labor areas without regard to the man-power and facilities available. Some time ago Production Urgency Committees were set up to establish employment ceilings and labor priorities designed to channel labor into places where it was most urgently needed and to bring some order into the placing of new contracts. The January 26 order provides that no new prime contracts are to be placed in tight labor areas without the approval of the Production Urgency Committee when the new contracts would require an increase in labor above the Manpower Commission ceilings. Such an order should have been made months ago.

The Nation has long urged Congress to adopt some such comprehensive measure for coordinating industrial and labor mobilization as was embodied in the Kilgore-Pepper-Tolan bill. It believes some measures of compulsion in the labor field necessary, but it believes these will prove most effective in the framework of a planned war economy. The army-navy procurement services have always preferred the hit-or-miss approach, have always resented any suggestion that they cooperate with civilian war-production agencies. Senator Johnson's outburst indicates that this is still the prevailing spirit. If a work-or-fight law is enforced in that way, on the premise that war-production tangles can be solved merely by ordering workers around, we are headed for trouble. The Senate Military Affairs Committee can prevent that trouble by passing a work-or-fight bill which would operate within the framework of the Office of War Mobilization and not at the mercy of impatient military martinets and uninformed and subservient local draft boards.

Zhukov's Gamble

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THE Russian advance continued to make extraordinary progress last week. Having covered three hundred miles in three weeks, the Red Army brought the war almost to Berlin—and Germany a big step closer to defeat.

German resistance hardened during the week, especially on the southern flank of the great Russian salient pointed toward Berlin, where Marshal Konev made but little progress into Silesia. It hardened less successfully on the northern flank, where Marshal Rokossovsky occupied most of East Prussia and pushed a shoulder into Pomerania, cutting the Danzig-Berlin communication lines. In the central and most threatened sector of the front German resistance settled itself only on the approaches to Küstrin and Frankfurt, after Marshal Zhukov had rolled up near the Oder on a twenty-mile front. As I write (Monday), late reports indicate that the Russians are drawing up around these two traditional eastern bastions of the German capital, which form with the Oder the last major obstacles short of the city itself. Berlin is less than forty miles away.

The last forty miles may well prove to be the hardest. The two fortress cities and the river line are not the only things standing between Zhukov and the greatest single prize of the war against Germany. It must be assumed that the German high command has gathered a fairly respectable force for this desperate and vital battle for Berlin, by moving up the last of Germany's strategic reserves, some divisions from the western front, and newly trained units of the Volkssturm, whose members can fire machine-guns from pillboxes despite their late and hasty indoctrination. It must also be presumed that something more than a vacuum lies between the Oder and Berlin. It has been apparent for two years, ever since Stalingrad, that this area would one day have to be defended, and undoubtedly it is laced with tank traps, mine fields, barbed-wire entanglements, and mutually supporting strong points. It is also one of the most heavily built-up areas in the world—which means street-to-street and finally house-to-house fighting, although the flatness of the German plain and the lack of natural obstacles might permit broad flanking sweeps to cut off Berlin's communications.

Perhaps even more important is the present contour line of the Russian front, from Elbing on the Baltic to Katowice in Polish Silesia—an enormous sickle, through which Zhukov's hammer is pounding at Berlin. The shape of the sickle and the position of the hammer, neatly symbolic of Russian power though they may be, are enough to give a traditional staff officer the heebie-jeebies. Against an enemy with any considerable power still at his disposal, Zhukov would obviously be putting his head into a sack. His farthest spearpoint is three hundred miles from its jumping-off place; the base of the Russian salient is some six hundred miles long; the spearpoint is only twenty miles wide, with the sides of the salient sloping in steeply to form this exceptionally narrow and exposed position. The southern slope of the salient follows the general line of the Oder, which may be a barrier to German pressure as well as to Russian crossing; the northern slope follows the less formidable line of the railway from Berlin to Danzig, which can be crossed at will except in so far as the crossing is interdicted by fire from one side or the other.

Into this seeming cul-de-sac Zhukov's supply lines run from the far side of the Vistula, three hundred miles away. The direct line is blocked at a crucial spot by the continued resistance of the German garrison in Poznan, which may come to play as important a part in eastern-front affairs as the hopelessly besieged German garrisons in the French Atlantic ports played in western-front affairs. Whether, in the face of these difficulties, the Russians can continue their already extraordinary supply performance remains to be seen. One would judge not, but one has learned not to apply ordinary judgments to the Red Army.

The hardened resistance at the Oder and the dangerous shape of the Russian line do suggest that Soviet strategy will call for redoubled efforts by Rokossovsky and Konev to relieve Zhukov's exposed and essentially unsound position.

It would be entirely in keeping with past Soviet strategy for Zhukov to regroup while his friends to right and left rolled up the German flanks, cutting through Pomerania to Stettin and over the southern Oder through German Silesia to Liegnitz and Görlitz.

Whether Soviet strategy follows its traditional pattern or Marshal Zhukov ignores his dangers and drives on to Berlin, it is obvious that the Germans are in the direst straits. Refugees clog the roads from the east, eliciting the tearful remarks of German radio commentators; with what must have been hundreds of thousands of these wretches in the streets, Berlin received its most concentrated bombing of the war on Saturday from the United States Eighth Air Force. Goebbels was reported charged with the defense of Berlin, with Hitler scheduled for the crags of Berchtesgaden. The coldest winter, the greatest fuel and food shortages, the gravest military threat of the war: this is Germany on the twelfth anniversary of Hitler's rise to power. It seems unlikely that the Reich will last thirteen years, much less the thousand promised for it by the megalomaniac corporal.

Wallace: Second Round

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 4

MR. ROOSEVELT'S attitude in the battle over the appointment of Henry Wallace as Secretary of Commerce is far from clear. Last Sunday night I was informed by two separate sources in close touch with Wallace and with Senator Pepper, who has been leading the fight for him, that confirmation could be expected within a few days. I was given to understand that a compromise had been reached under which the President would issue an executive order separating the Federal Loan Agency from the Department of Commerce. It was believed that this would satisfy enough of Wallace's opponents to obtain a majority for him, as I feel sure it would have at that time. The cheerful confidence of the Wallace forces began to evaporate when Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday passed with no such message from the President.

On Thursday morning the Washington Post reported that as the Senate "squared off for round one, Barkley lacked any word from the President." The Post said it had been "four days since he [Barkley] advised Mr. Roosevelt to separate loan functions from the Commerce Department by executive order, and to green-light the George bill doing the same thing." When the Senate met that day, it was only one vote that prevented passage of the Bailey motion to take up the Wallace appointment before the George bill. I have encountered no one who does not think Wallace would have been beaten if the nomination had come before the Senate ahead of the bill. The forty-three-to-forty-one vote against the Bailey motion was an even narrower escape than it seemed to be. Senator Taft had voted "nay" only so that he could move for reconsideration, and on that motion Wallace might have been defeated. Fortunately Senator Bailey, with the help of Vice-President Truman, obtained the floor, shutting off the Taft motion to reconsider and moving instead to postpone the consideration of the Wallace nomination for thirty days.

Senator Barkley not only asked a postponement of thirty days but agreed that he would move for an extension if the George bill had not been passed by the House and signed by the President at that time. He thus pledged himself to hold up any vote on the Wallace nomination until the George bill was law. It was only in the course of speaking on this motion to postpone that he finally brought forward the long-awaited message from the President. The majority leader said he had "just received" it, "through the White House," and later indicated to the press that he meant this literally and had not had the message when the Bailey motion came up.

It has been a favorite last-ditch device of the President's to head off legislation he did not want with an executive order designed to take the steam out of the forces behind the legislation. This was the tactic he used to prevent passage of the Kilgore-Pepper-Tolan bill for an Office of War Mobilization two years ago. But in this case there was no executive order, only a promise to approve the George bill when passed. The message was not direct from the President but in a letter from Judge Samuel M. Rosenman to Senator Barkley. Had the message come earlier, it might have been used to win immediate confirmation of Wallace on the President's promise to approve the George bill. Timed as it was, the message was of little value, since Barkley had to agree to postpone a vote on the nomination until the George bill had actually been passed and signed. This, as is already becoming clear, only gives Wallace's enemies more time in which to work out new ways to block his confirmation.

Censorship regulations designed to protect the person of the President prevent full discussion of the message. "As we all know," Senator Barkley said, "the President is on the verge of a very important conference." The foreign press and radio report that he is abroad. It may be that some difficulty in communication, whether technical or precautionary, explains the belated character of the President's message. This might conceivably have something to do with the absence of the expected executive order. But the incident stirs misgivings, coming as it does after Mr. Roosevelt's rather cheap letter to Jesse Jones, with its ignoble attempt to duck responsibility by implying that he "had to do something for Henry." The parallelism with the Chicago brush-off is strong. I hope it is unjustified.

In my opinion, and I hope I am wrong, it will be harder to obtain Wallace's confirmation after the President returns from that "important conference" to which Senator Barkley referred. An "important conference" at this time is likely to result in some long-postponed territorial settlements in the East, and if Mr. Roosevelt has to win conservative support for a new Polish boundary, he will be in no position politically to ram the Wallace appointment down the Senate's throat.

Conversely, there will be new arguments for withdrawing the nomination in the hands of Wallace's enemies and rivals in the Administration.

The anti-Wallace forces are shifting their strategy. The George bill, which was put forward to hurt Wallace, proved to be based on an overestimate of his strength in the Senate. It is the only thing which can now save him. As Arthur Krock observed sadly in the New York Times today, "the only way to have assured Mr. Wallace's rejection was to have made his full appointment an open-and-shut question. . . . Though this knowledge came soon, it came too late to be applied by the all-out opposition." But some minds run in similar channels, and even as those words were being written by Krock, Rankin of Mississippi was announcing that he would move to send the George bill back to committee in the House and to keep it there until the Senate had voted on the Wallace nomination. This means a fight in the House between Rankin, who hates Wallace, and Rayburn, who hates Jesse Jones. And it will be a fight between two Southern Democrats for the votes of Southern Democrats. If Rankin wins, he will be the boss of the House, leader of a victorious rightist coalition.

With the Wallace nomination, progressives have embarked on a political battle equaled in importance only by that for a stable United Nations peace. More is at stake here than who shall be Secretary of Commerce or what shall happen to Henry A. Wallace. The stability and prosperity and political health of post-war America hang upon the outcome, for this is but the beginning of the long fight for full employment. That fight may easily be lost and only with difficulty won. Even if Wallace is confirmed—and he can be—the victory will only be a starter. The next step will be the choice of a Federal Loan Administrator, and after that we may expect every concrete proposal to stir bitter opposition in Congress.

It seems obvious that a lengthy political campaign of this kind cannot finally be won by last-minute frantic flurries, a wave of telegrams, and a burst of lobbying. It can only be won if the leaders of the C. I. O.-P. A. C. and N. C.-P. A. C. are determined to carry on their political activities on a more than hand-to-mouth basis, if they are prepared to get out to the grass roots and through patient organizational and educational work, without frenzy or rancor, explain the meaning of full employment and the methods by which it may be obtained. Victory will not be won by blaming "reaction" or Rankin, or by election threats against Congressmen. The basis of Wallace's difficulties in Congress is the fact that the full-employment issue is as yet imperfectly understood by the people of this country. When they understand the issue and are aroused enough to demand action on it, Congress will be no obstacle. There lies the P. A. C.'s job and ours.

Britain's Economic Dunkirk

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

TO WHAT extent has Britain's economic structure been undermined by the war? Will the price of victory prove to be permanent impoverishment? Has John Bull, as some allege, been bankrupted by his efforts, and, if so, what sort of composition will he attempt to make with his creditors? By lifting the statistical blackout the White Paper on the war effort of the United Kingdom has made possible at least a partial answer to those questions.

Some American commentators have asserted that Britain will be in a better economic position than the United States after the war because the growth in its national debt has been relatively smaller. But the size of a country's internal debt has no bearing on its capacity to produce real wealth; that is only affected to the extent that war destroys or consumes the actual means of production. For modern war is necessarily on a pay-as-you-go basis. Today's battles cannot be fought with weapons produced tomorrow. Consequently the economic demands of war can only be met by increasing current production and reducing current consumption, in other words, by sweat and abstinence now. No draft on future consumption is involved apart from what is necessary to replace expended capital assets. And so far as this country is concerned, it appears that, on balance, its wealth-producing equipment has increased during the war, and its ability to supply the needs of its citizens is greater than before.

All European countries have, on the other hand, suffered some degree of capital deterioration. The most obvious form of such wastage is the sheer destruction incidental to battle or resulting from deliberate attempts to deny facilities to the enemy—scorched-earth tactics. Less obvious, but in the case of Britain not less important, is what is called "disinvestment," which arises from failure to maintain existing capital assets at full efficiency because the necessary man-power and materials have been diverted to war production. Another form of disinvestment is the liquidation of foreign assets in order to pay for urgently needed war goods from overseas.

The destructiveness of modern warfare is beyond description; in a country which has the misfortune to become a stubbornly contested battlefield, it can be almost total. I have been told on good authority that in Italy, from the toe of the peninsula to the River Arno, only 6 per cent of the capital equipment, including railroads and public utilities, remains intact. In large parts of Russia the devastation is even more complete; homes, farms, factories, power stations, schools lie in ruins after being burned and blasted, first by the retreating Red Army and again by the retreating Germans. In Holland the very soil is being washed away or poisoned with salt water by the strategic flooding practiced by friend and foe. The loss of the means of production in these and other countries obviously implies a fall in the standard of living to a subsistence level. For a long time their peoples will have to devote all their surplus energies to the task of rebuilding their productive and social capital; they will be forced to choose bridges before butter.

Britain has been a battlefield throughout a large part of the war and remains a battlefield today, but the physical damage it has suffered, while severe, is not on this horrifying scale. The White Paper provides the information that up to September 30, 1944, 202,000 houses had been destroyed or damaged beyond repair, 255,000 more had been rendered uninhabitable, and 4,073,000 were damaged but remained inhabitable. If we estimate the cost of reconstruction at an average of $2,000 for houses in the first category, at $800 for those in the second, and at $200 for those in the third, we arrive at a total bill for residential property of $1,420,000,000. No details at all are available of the damage received in air raids by industrial and commercial property, churches, public buildings, schools, hospitals, and so on, but in London alone it is clearly very considerable. Making a rough guess, I would say that a figure of $600,000,000 for replacement costs would be far from excessive, bringing the over-all total to around $2,000,000,000.

During the war the only maintenance and repair work that can be carried out in Britain on buildings, machinery, and other forms of capital equipment is that which is essential to the war effort. Consequently a large amount of normal depreciation is not being made good, and the plant of the country, as a whole, has deteriorated. In 1940 this disinvestment was more than counterbalanced by new investment, but according to the White Paper, in the three years 1941 to 1943 there was a net disinvestment of almost $1,600,000,000. Assuming a figure for 1944 equal to that of 1943, a total of $2,100,000,000 would be reached. Unfortunately, it is not clear just what kinds of capital are covered by the estimate in the White Paper which refers to "private net disinvestment at home." This may or may not include depreciation suffered by residential property. Certainly it does not include what may be called intangible disinvestment.

The most important form of this is, perhaps, loss of education due to the war, since trained intelligence is any country's primary capital equipment. The necessity for evacuating millions of children from the cities has led to disruption of the primary schools; the urgent need of man-power has sent numbers of young people of teen age into the factories, depriving them of secondary education; service in the armed forces has prevented or interrupted higher education for many. To the extent that these losses are made good, a draft on future production is necessarily involved, since these young people must be maintained by the working population while they acquire the skills and knowledge without which their future usefulness to the community will be impaired.

Leaving aside such immeasurable losses, we have as the result of enemy action and internal disinvestment an estimated total reduction in capital of some $4,100,000,000 or a little more than £1,000,000,000. Imposing as this sum is, it is not too formidable in relation to the British national income, which in 1943 amounted to £8,172,000,000. If Britain maintains full employment after the war, the whole loss can be made good within a few years, allowing at the same time for a considerable improvement on the standard of consumption prevailing during the war. According to Sir William Beveridge, the full utilization of British resources in 1938, by raising the employment rate from the actual 87.1 per cent to the 97 per cent which he believes possible, would have added £500,000,000 to the national income, or about £650,000,000 in terms of the higher current prices.*

The problem of compensating external disinvestment is much more difficult to tackle since its solution depends in part on the policies of other countries. The income from Britain's Victorian heritage of foreign investments has long played a vital part in the maintenance of its trade balance. These investments were both widely diffused geographically and very diverse in character. They included large amounts of American stocks and bonds, government obligations of the dominions, colonies, and foreign countries, the direct ownership of mines, plantations, and industrial establishments in all parts of the world. Prior to 1914 the interest and profits arising from these assets were still largely being reinvested abroad, but the need for foreign exchange, particularly dollars, in the early years of the First World War caused the liquidation of a part of Britain's foreign holdings. And after the war a falling off in British exports made it necessary to draw on the income from the remainder in order to meet the bill for imported goods. In fact, in the thirties the trade balance could only be maintained in some years by a draft on capital account—that is to say, by external disinvestment.

There was therefore a very close connection between Britain's foreign investments and its standard of living. Without the inflow of income from abroad it would not have been possible to pay for a large part of the foodstuffs and manufactured goods which came to the British consumer from overseas. The British housewife would have found smaller supplies of Argentine and Australian meat in the stores; her family might have had to go without South African and Spanish fruit, Danish bacon, French cheeses. Movie fans would have had to be content with fewer American films, smokers with less tobacco, drinkers with reduced quantities of wine. In some cases the deficiency might have been partially compensated by increased home production, but only at an increased cost. There would have been no way of avoiding a decrease in total consumption and hence a lower standard of living.

Britain's imports (less reexports) in the three pre-war years 1936-38 averaged £866,000,000. They were paid for as follows:

Exports .....	£478,000,000
Shipping services .....	105,000,000
Financial services .....	40,000,000
Income on foreign investments .....	203,000,000
Deficit .....	40,000,000
Total .....	£866,000,000

It will be seen that actual exports of goods covered little more than half the cost of imports: the remainder had to be provided by what is known as "invisible exports."

According to the White Paper, overseas assets amounting to £1,065,000,000 have been sold since the present war started, mainly for the purpose of paying for war materials. As a consequence, it has been estimated that Britain's income from this source has shrunk by at least 50 per cent. A still further reduction may occur as the result of technological changes brought about by the war—say, the permanent displacement of natural rubber, in which much British money has been invested, by synthetics.

* "Full Employment in a Free Society," page 139 (English Edition).

In addition, Britain has borrowed, apart from Lend-Lease, from countries supplying it with goods and services, such as Argentina, India, Egypt, and Portugal. Unable to make payment by exporting goods of its own manufacture—for which the raw materials and man-power could not be spared—it has given these countries I. O. U.'s to the tune of £2,300,000,000. According to Lord Keynes, by the end of the war the total of these frozen sterling credits is likely to approach £3,000,000,000. Eventually this debt will have to be refunded and liquidated. Let us assume that, provisionally at least, interest and amortization are fixed at no more than 5 per cent per annum. This would mean an additional £150,000,000 annually on the debit side of Britain's international accounts.

On the credit side, as can be noted from the table above, income from shipping is an important item. But this too is expected to diminish in the years immediately after the war. Up to the end of 1943 Britain had lost in the course of the war 2,921 ocean-going vessels of 11,643,000 gross tons out of a pre-war merchant fleet totaling 17,500,000 gross tons. An intensified shipbuilding program plus purchases from abroad has made possible, however, the replacement of a considerable part of this loss; so that by the end of 1943 the tonnage on the United Kingdom and colonial registers was only 29 per cent less than before the war. On the other hand, the enormous growth of the United States merchant fleet suggests increased competition for freights in the immediate post-war years and a probable decrease in Britain's share of the world carrying trade. It would seem reasonable, therefore, to estimate Britain's post-war net income from shipping at only two-thirds of the pre-war figure.

Assuming that pre-war average imports and exports are maintained, we can now construct a tentative post-war international balance sheet for Britain.

Dr.		Cr.
Imports .....	£ 866,000,000	Exports .....	£ 478,000,000
Payments to foreign creditors	150,000,000	Shipping services	70,000,000
		Financial services	40,000,000
		Income from foreign investments	100,000,000
			£ 688,000,000
		Deficit .....	328,000,000
	£1,016,000,000		£1,016,000,000

It is possible that in the transitional period following the end of the war Britain might be willing to meet such a deficit by (a) liquidating part of its remaining foreign assets, or (b) incurring new debts—possibly via the international financial institutions envisaged in the Bretton Woods agreement. But it is certain that such a policy could be safely pursued only for a very limited period. Borrowing abroad for the creation of permanent income-producing assets is one thing; borrowing to pay for current consumption must tip the scales still more heavily against the debtor country and eventually lead to repudiation of the debt.

It follows that unless Britain is able to increase its income from exports and shipping by some 60 per cent, it must effect a drastic reduction in imports—a step which would imply the reorganization of its economy and a definite reduction in its standard of living. In fact, with a limited area of cultivatable land and with rather meager resources in raw materials, apart from coal, it is doubtful whether under these circumstances Britain could continue to support anything like its present population.

Britain, in short, has suffered an economic Dunkirk in the course of the war. Can it recover and, if so, by what means? One thing is clear, recovery will not be automatic. Britain will be forced to budget its diminished resources and to plan its peace economy no less thoroughly than it has planned its war economy. In future articles I propose to discuss the nature of this planning both in its short-term and long-term aspects, and its bearing on American problems.

[The first of a series of three articles.]

25 Years Again "The Nation"

ONE OF THE FIRST ACTS of the Czechoslovak Republic was to create a Department of Social Welfare. The first report of the Minister, Dr. Karel Winter, issued at the end of December, is an encouraging account of progress and a suggestive indication of things yet to be done.—February 7, 1920.

THE LEADERS of the prohibition forces seem to be in a fair way to offset the success which they have recently won by bringing both prohibition and the Eighteenth Amendment into contempt. . . . Such extraordinary rigor of enforcement . . . as is now contemplated is little likely to commend prohibition to thoughtful persons; on the contrary, it is almost certain to bring about a reaction which may go a long way toward nullifying the amendment and the laws under which the amendment is to be carried into effect.—February 7, 1920.

"THE ECONOMIC CONSEQUENCES OF THE PEACE."

By J. M. Keynes. . . . This is a very great book. If any answer can be made to the overwhelming indictment of the treaty that it contains, that answer has yet to be published. Mr. Keynes writes with a fulness of knowledge, an incisiveness of judgment, and a penetration into the ultimate causes of economic events that perhaps only half a dozen living economists might hope to rival.—HAROLD J. LASKI, February 7, 1920.

AS WAS TO BE EXPECTED, the failure of the United States to enter the League [of Nations] has deprived that organization of much of its importance, and it is unlikely that the League will do much more than mark time until the final decision of this country has been taken.—February 14, 1920.

LONDON, JANUARY 20. . . . The Coalition government declines in power, and Labor is the only rallying point of the malcontents. . . . Thus we stand in Great Britain today with a swiftly flowing current of rather indefinite opinion around us—a current, however, which carries the Labor Party far towards Parliamentary power.—J. RAMSAY MACDONALD, February 28, 1920.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH: T. S. Eliot, "Poems"; A. F. Kerensky, "The Prelude to Bolshevism"; Thorstein Veblen, "The Place of Science in Modern Civilization."

The French and the Big Three

BY CHARLES A. MICAUD

A YEAR ago it was fashionable to affirm that France's crushing defeat had forever relegated it to the status of a second-rate power. Since then, however, a series of successes for French diplomacy has been crowned by a military alliance with Russia, and France is now ready to reenter the big league. Its recognition as a world power will have important repercussions on the balance of power within Europe and on the character of the world peace organization.

Two main principles are guiding the foreign policy of the Provisional Government of France: the first is the quest for security, particularly the elimination of the German menace; the other is the reestablishment of France's former power and prestige—the French people are in no mood to play second fiddle, a natural reaction after years of national humiliation.

Keeping in mind these two principles of French diplomacy, we can understand the full meaning of the Franco-Soviet treaty of alliance. First, it guarantees France against a resurgent Germany. The past two decades have proved that collective security is a myth unless enforced by all the leading countries; Frenchmen fear that those less directly threatened may again relax their vigilance. Whatever the attitude of Britain and America toward the Germany of 1960, the French want to make certain of an overwhelming superiority on the Continent, for they are convinced that the Germans will behave only if threatened with disaster. Had the Franco-Soviet pact of 1935 been made effective by staff conversations, had the German high command been convinced that the war must be fought on two fronts, France would have escaped its 1940 disaster.

But the present treaty with Russia is more than an instrument of security; it is also an instrument of power politics. Russia's desire to strengthen its own Continental position was France's opportunity to regain its freedom of action. Already disposing of a powerful friend in the East, the French government is encouraging competitive bidding for a valuable friendship. Nor is it surprising to see a still weak nation capitalizing on diplomatic opportunity. De Gaulle has already proved that he is a hard bargainer as well as a passionate nationalist.

This does not mean that France has shut the door on England and America, trusting that the Soviet alliance will give it full security. On his return from Moscow De Gaulle made it clear that his government was now intent upon strengthening the ties with the West. The Continental system would not be complete without the full participation of England: the Triple Entente is still better than a bi-lateral pact with a too powerful partner. Besides, France possesses a large colonial empire whose defense requires close collaboration with Britain and the United States. More important still, the French people are anxious not to sacrifice collective security on a world basis to a system of Continental alliances, which is considered a pis-aller. A committee has already been established to reconcile the treaty with Russia with the Dumbarton Oaks projects. This is not an easy task.

Had the Big Three agreed 100 per cent on the coming peace organization, the Franco-Soviet pact would probably not have been signed. The Russians need a friendly voice at the next conference in order to tip the scale in their favor. More precisely, they expect France to back up their claim to a zone of security in Eastern Europe and its corollary, the right of veto at the council of the new League of Nations. The French diplomats—if invited—will be in a difficult position trying to bring about a compromise between the Russian thesis and the American concept of integral collective security. Their position will be complicated by the fact that they want to make the Big Three agree to France's own solution of the German problem. For to them the status of the Rhineland is the keystone not only of France's security on the Continent but of its position as a world power, and is closely related to the broader questions of the balance of power within Europe and the character of the world peace organization. That is why De Gaulle has consistently demanded that France participate in decisions concerning the future of Germany, why he forged his diplomatic weapon at Moscow. "France does not intend to finish the war without the assurance that French forces will be installed permanently from one end of the Rhine to the other," he declared bluntly on January 25. In a New Year's interview with the Paris correspondent of Free World, M. Georges Bidault first indorsed Russia's demands concerning the Curzon line, then emphasized his government's position on the Rhineland: "The territories that compose it, and one must add to them the Ruhr, will no longer be governed militarily, economically, administratively by Berlin."

Not only is the Rhine frontier strategically valuable, but the coal of the Saar and Ruhr basins would make France the first industrial and therefore first military power west of Russia. Already disposing of the richest iron-ore deposits in Europe, France would be in a position to build a heavy industry comparable to that of Germany before the war. Its production of steel, the best index of its "power," would be multiplied three times, with a corresponding decrease on the German side. Rather than ask for an outright annexation that would meet serious ethnical and political objections, the French government is likely to urge a special status for the Rhineland, leaving it politically independent but integrated within the French economy. The leading country in the West could then group the smaller nations into a powerful federation. As the hinge in the new Moscow-Paris-London axis, France would hold the balance of power in Europe, England's traditional role.

Admitting that such an ambitious scheme is being entertained by De Gaulle and receives the support of Stalin, still it has little chance of realization against the opposition of America and England. In spite of their desire to strengthen France, the two English-speaking powers may well object to this one-sided solution of the German problem. For it would recreate the balance-of-power pattern for Europe without helping England to solve its own economic and strategic dilemma. Faced by the problems of post-war trade, and with insularity no longer an asset, Britain is eager to pool national resources in a Western bloc which would include the autonomous Rhineland.

Not only the statesmen of Belgium and Holland but those of France seemed to look favorably on the British idea of regionalism. De Gaulle alluded to it on several occasions. After the liberation of France his financial adviser, M. Istel, again took up the proposal in a well-documented address given at the Sorbonne. Even the angry reaction to Marshal Smuts's famous speech a year ago could not be interpreted as proof that French nationalism was too strong a barrier to union; De Gaulle's followers objected mostly to the cavalier tone of Smuts's proposal relegating France to the status of a second-rate power. To the Fighting French, then poor relations of their great allies, the advantages of the British plan were obvious. Here was a chance of reestablishing France in a position of prestige and power. Besides, its economic problems after the war would be similar to those of Britain. And to those problems planned economy was hardly a sufficient answer: it could not insure an expanding economy, adequate social security, and higher standards of living to a country tailored on the eighteenth-century pattern. A division of labor with other nations was preferable to former attempts at self-sufficiency, which in practice amounted to a policy of agricultural preferment and an economy of scarcity.

The idea of a Western federation was thus maturing in European minds when, on the eve of their trip to Moscow, De Gaulle and Bidault officially denied that France had any intention of joining an exclusive Western European bloc. Many observers saw in these declarations the coup de grâce to the Franco-British regional plan.

It may be questioned, however, whether France, or even Russia, is definitively opposed to a Western European union. Russia's present veto is understandable in terms of its old fear of "capitalist aggression," a fear that dictated its foreign and even its domestic policy between the two world wars. Its unsuccessful attempts to organize collective security against Nazi Germany have not been forgotten, and the Soviet leaders want to make sure that the Munich spirit is dead. On the other hand, Moscow may well prefer to deal with two super-powers of approximately the same strength than with a sprawling Atlantic community in a position to build another cordon sanitaire all the way from China to Central Europe. If guaranties are given that the Western bloc is not a rival in arms but a friend, Russia may well agree to the principle of regionalism in the West which it is now sponsoring in the East. In this connection a leftist France offers perhaps greater guaranties than Britain, especially in view of Churchill's policy toward Greece, Belgium, and Italy. The Soviet government may want to ascertain that a strong and friendly France will vouch for the foreign policy of the Western federation. But in any case Stalin is not likely to modify his present attitude until the next elections in Britain and in France show which way the wind is turning and until tangible proofs are given of the pro-Russian orientation of the Western democracies.

PEP TALK TO THE DEAD

As for France, its new eastward orientation is no proof that it has definitively abandoned the idea of a partnership with Britain in the West. At Moscow De Gaulle may even have attempted to convince Stalin that the new unit would not be directed against Russia. Rather than playing alone the part of a super-power, France may find it wise to share the burden with Britain. The heroic mood of today is not to last, and the French people will again prefer security to prestige. If the next general elections in Britain and in France confirm the present trend to the left, and if Russia no longer objects to the scheme, the demands for an integrated Western Europe will steadily increase. Those who fear that the proposal of a Western bloc is but a cloak for British imperialism will be reassured. They will see in an economic union the most practical way of destroying economic barriers within a large area and thus of increasing production and raising the standard of living. In a federation of social-democratic countries they will see a means of strengthening international confidence, the key to the whole problem of collective security.

Instead of pretending that complete confidence exists between the "peace-loving" nations, many Europeans are inclined to believe that it is still lacking, mainly because of the ideological conflict that overlaps the present struggle for national independence. According to them it is more urgent and practical to build up confidence than to insist on a special brand of automatic peace mechanism. They see in the phrase "security system" a useful instrument, but one that must progressively become more efficient and powerful, through mutual understanding and fruitful compromises.

The first step is to create a state of equilibrium between the great powers. A tri-polar system, and later a multi-polar one, is deemed preferable to the "ethical imperialism" of the Big Two—especially so since Western Europe would build an ideological bridge between Socialist Russia and capitalist America. Besides, the collective job of rehabilitation that must be undertaken would be greatly facilitated by regional planning. If the thorny economic and social questions are quickly solved within large areas, then agreements on a world scale are made possible: it will be easier for a few prosperous units to lay down rules of conduct and to stick to them than it would be for a large number of hungry rivals. Finally, regionalism can democratize and fortify the world organism for peace. The smaller states will soon realize that only their union in large federations can allow them to participate in the world government as active and responsible members. Some are already hoping that France and England will create a precedent in Western Europe.

Strange Doings in California

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Los Angeles, January 30

POLITICALLY California is one of the liveliest states in the union—a state in which "anything can happen"; it has been the scene of some fantastic political shenanigans during the past fifteen years. Even seasoned political observers, however, were stunned by Governor Warren's message to the legislature on January 8. Boldly seizing the initiative, the Governor has proposed a liberal, if by no means comprehensive, social program. Among its items are a compulsory health-insurance bill, large plans for preventive medical care, the establishment of a school of industrial relations at the University of California, the creation of a commission of inquiry into race relations, and a liberalization of unemployment-insurance legislation, including—miracle of miracles!—an extension of unemployment-insurance benefits to agricultural workers. Since as late as 1942 persons who advocated the inclusion of agricultural workers in the unemployment-insurance program were automatically denounced as "Communists," a practice in which the Governor actively participated, it is small wonder that his message has been referred to as a "bombshell" that "rocked the legislature." Coupled with the Governor's sudden, and total, reversal of attitude on the Japanese evacuee question, his message is important political news, and has been so interpreted in the West. To appreciate its effect one should realize that it came as a distinct surprise to most factions, including apparently his own stand-pat Republican backers, and is markedly at variance with his 1943 program and, indeed, with his entire political record to date.

Unquestionably the decisive factor in this sudden reversal was the November, 1944, election. There can be no doubt of the current liberal trend in California politics—the people gave President Roosevelt a plurality of 500,000—and Governor Warren apparently read the meaning of the election correctly. Prior to November he had given no hint of the kind of program he intended to sponsor, but between the election and January 8 he seems to have determined to make a bold bid for liberal support. His program shows evidence of hasty improvisation; the compulsory health-insurance legislation, for example, has not yet been drafted. It also indicates that the Governor, an ambitious man, is playing for national stakes. His message was quickly interpreted on the West Coast as a bid for reelection in 1946 as the necessary pre-condition to capturing the Republican nomination for the Presidency in 1948.

Governor Warren's current appearance as a liberal represents, under the circumstances, the minimum change consistent with political survival. For the Governor is in an exceptional predicament. He was elected in 1942 as a Republican running on a "non-partisan" platform. The "non-partisan" character of the campaign was stressed for the simple reason that a sizable majority of the registered voters of California were then, and still are, members of the Democratic Party. He was elected, in fact, by a defection of Democratic votes. He is in the position, therefore, of being a Governor who represents a minority party, despite the fact that the Republicans control both houses of the legislature. To maintain this precarious position, it is necessary for him to hold the Old Guard Republican support, which has always been his, and at the same time to snare a good many Democratic votes. Agility is the prime requisite of a politician occupying such a position.

His January 8 message knocked the Democrats off balance, but that is not in itself a major accomplishment. For the Democratic Party in California represents to an extravagant degree the incongruous elements that make up the party nationally. In California the Democrats are not so much a political party as a loose federation of disparate groups. The party leadership in the legislature is divided, inept, and furtively reactionary. Its initial response to the Governor's message was characteristic—bitter complaints that he had "stolen" the Democrats' program. When the Democratic leaders had recovered from the shock, they proceeded to do precisely what the Governor wanted them to do: they announced that henceforth they would be the "economy bloc" in the legislature.

But if the Democrats were shocked, "all has not been peaches and cream on the Republican side of the legislature," to quote Chester G. Hanson, veteran political correspondent for the Los Angeles Times. From the bewildered manner in which the Republicans behaved, it is apparent that they had no more warning of the new dispensation than their Democratic colleagues. It is extremely doubtful, in fact, whether even the Old Guard within the Republican Party received advance information; there is no evidence that they were consulted. The prevailing tone in the Republican press has been one of mild consternation mingled with cautionary admonitions. The Los Angeles Times, in commenting on the compulsory health-insurance program, declared there was much to be said on the matter "pro and con," pointed to "a wide diversity of opinion," and suggested "further study" of the proposal with postponement of actual consideration until after the war. If Governor Warren is on a hot spot, the Old Guard also occupies a rather embarrassing position. For Warren is their candidate—hand-picked, carefully trained, skillfully promoted. At this late hour there is no other candidate to whom they could turn if they should feel compelled to dump him. If they cannot support his program in its entirety, and they have given no indication that they intend to do so, still they can hardly afford to oppose it openly.

For the moment the Governor clearly holds the initiative. The only faction not caught off guard by his sudden putsch was the C. I. O., which constitutes the real spearhead of liberalism in California today. The C. I. O. has come forward with its own health-insurance plan without waiting for the introduction of the Governor's bill. While indorsing the Governor's "commission of inquiry into race relations," it has quickly proposed legislation for the creation of a state Fair Employment Practices Committee. As between the two health-insurance plans, the C. I. O.'s is much the better. To finance his plan, the Governor has proposed a 3 per cent tax on wages and salaries, one-half to be paid by the workers, one-half by the employers. The C. I. O. plan contemplates comprehensive coverage of all individuals now protected by unemployment insurance through a 3 per cent tax divided as proposed by the Governor but with the state bearing all administrative costs. In the Governor's plan, physicians would be compensated on a fee system; in the C. I. O. plan, on a per capita basis. Thus the issue is between the C. I. O. (and P. A. C.) elements on the one hand and the Governor on the other rather than between the Democratic Party and the Republican Party.

To understand fully the Governor's position, it is necessary to consider one of the most peculiar political relationships in California—that between Governor Warren and Attorney General Robert W. Kenny. In a sense Bob Kenny is responsible for the Governor's successful career in state politics. When Earl Warren ran for Attorney General in 1938, he faced the likelihood of defeat, despite the fact that the Democratic nominee was not a strong candidate. The registration was overwhelmingly Democratic, more so than it is today, and the people were determined to oust the entire Republican machine. In this emergency Warren appealed to Kenny for support, setting forth in a letter in his own handwriting his undying devotion to civil liberties. Always inclined to be unpredictable where personalities are involved and often motivated by a remarkable generosity toward political opponents, Kenny proceeded to indorse Warren. It was really his action which tipped the scales, for even with the indorsement Warren was elected Attorney General by an extremely narrow margin.

Today Governor Warren is uneasily aware of the formidable Mr. Kenny, whose lengthening political shadow he sees whenever he looks guardedly over his shoulder. He fears that Robert W. Kenny can defeat him for the governorship in 1946. His position would be quite different were the Democrats without a strong candidate. But Bob Kenny is the ablest politician California has produced since the emergence of the Hiram Johnson of 1910—to be distinguished from the aged and embittered relic of isolationism who still survives in the Senate. In 1938 Warren was the only Republican elected to an important state office in California; in 1942 Kenney was the only Democrat elected. Just as Warren has been successful in wooing Democratic votes, so Kenny has shown a still more remarkable ability to draw strength from the Republican camp. Kenny's left flank is securely guarded, and he knows how to maneuver his right flank in an extremely dextrous fashion. Warren has a fairly secure right flank, considerable support in the center, and no support whatever on the left. The personal relationship between the two men is cordial, and they have cooperated effectively since Warren has been Governor, but the rivalry is intense if not overt. The older and more experienced politician, Governor Warren watches every move of his younger rival and has shown a surprising ability to imitate, and in some cases to anticipate, Kenny's genuine liberalism. The nation is likely to hear a great deal more about these two personalities in the future. For the Governor hopes to be President in 1948; and liberal Democrats throughout the West hope, some day, to send Bob Kenny to the White House. Without showing his hand, Bob Kenny is setting the political pace for the Governor.

The burning question in California at this moment is whether Governor Warren really intends to fight for his twelve-point program of social legislation. On the face of things he has a good chance of getting most of it adopted. Nominally, the Republicans control both houses of the legislature—twenty-seven to thirteen in the Senate, forty-two to thirty-eight in the Assembly. They are enabled to maintain this nominal control, despite the dominant Democratic registration, by two things—the havoc wrought in party politics in California by the system of cross-filing permitted in the state and the fact that the Senate is a most undemocratic body. The populous County of Los Angeles, for example, has but one representative in the Senate. For the most part, the Senate is made up of grim-faced, tight-fisted "cow-country" reactionaries, some Democrats, some Republicans.

Owing to the war the state's finances are in such excellent condition that the Governor can actually project a reduction in state taxes while sponsoring a liberal social program. The real powers in the state capitol, however, are the lobbyists. The most opulent of these, Art Samish, has more influence in the legislature than, say, the state chairman of the Republican Party. And Art Samish has no politics; he has clients. The situation is somewhat unique, therefore, in that a majority of the legislators are not directly responsive to pressure from their party or from the Governor or from the masses of the people. Despite this fact and despite the influence of the Samishes, the Governor could still control the situation if he were prepared to fight for his program, not merely by continuing to support it publicly but by "calling in the boys" and "turning on the heat."

Whether he intends to push the program to this extent will not be known until the legislature reconvenes after the coming recess. There are indications that the Governor's newly found, if limited liberalism is strictly Ersatz and that he has no intention of waging a last-ditch fight. On the other hand, if certain elements of the Old Guard have read the signs of the times as shrewdly as the Governor has, then it is conceivable that he might secure the adoption of the entire program, in which case it is equally conceivable that he might be reelected in 1946. If he is reelected in 1946, he will unquestionably be a leading contender for the Presidential nomination in 1948. He has opened his hand with some big cards, and the bets are in proportion to the stakes involved. It is worth noting, however, that his message did not present a comprehensive program. It largely ignored the question of federal-state relations, had little to say about the staggering post-war problems which California faces, and was generally silent about the war and the peace. In any case, a measure of national attention may well be fixed on Sacramento during the next few months, for the little drama being enacted there may be a pre-view of the 1948 campaign.

Nazi Post-War Strategy

BY ALFRED KANTOROWICZ

DR. GOEBBELS has been carefully fostering the idea, by direct and indirect means, that Nazism will wage a long, desperate underground battle inside the Reich after the defeat of its armies in the field. In fact, many observers in this country take it quite for granted that Himmler is making minute preparations for transforming the Gestapo, the S. S., and the Hitler Youth into guerrilla bands which will resist Allied occupation forces from their hideouts in the mountains, the forests, and the big cities.

The Nazis, unfortunately, have no such intention. They will emerge from defeat—with false names and forged documents—as willing servants of the occupation authorities. They will be agreeable, polite, decent fellows who want nothing but to help the Allies in the complicated task of preventing riots, anarchy, chaos. By appearing to serve the Allied administration faithfully, they will become its trusted colleagues.

A partial analogy to what we may expect in Germany is found here in the German prisoner-of-war camps. Generally the Nazi prisoners make it their business to behave "correctly" toward the camp authorities and guards. They are clean, alert, well-disciplined, and everyone praises their willingness to cooperate in practical matters. Many sources report that American military authorities have very little trouble with Nazi prisoners, and that they find it hard to believe that these pleasant boys are no different from the murderers of Maidanek. If disturbances occur in a camp, they are usually begun by anti-Nazis who insist upon arguing about political questions.

The Nazi prisoners of war know that there is little sense in making life miserable for the camp authorities. Their principal purpose is to keep their fellow-prisoners under control. Wherever opposition to Nazism appears in the ranks, it is mercilessly stamped out. Only after the New York Times told the story in January did people begin to realize the extent of the moral and physical terror to which the Nazis have been subjecting their fellow-prisoners—threats of reprisal after return to Germany, insinuations that exchanged prisoners would take back to Germany lists of all "insurgents" and that their families would be held as hostages, hangings, beatings, death.

The Nazis climbed to power by the ruthless suppression of "internal enemies," whom they called traitors, Jews, or Communists. Only after the Third Reich had succeeded in killing, imprisoning, or driving out all actual or potential defenders of democratic, socialist, and pacifist principles did it challenge its weaker neighbors—and later the great powers of the world.

The Nazi leaders are men of icy mind and brutal will, political strategists of the first order. They know that once their armed forces have been finally crushed—whether by the fall of Berlin or the fall of Berchtesgaden—one period of German imperialist activity will have definitely ended. They cannot initiate a second phase by a desperate, obviously futile struggle against their conquerors. But long-range plans can be laid, and the primary condition for their success, just as it was before, will be the "human material" at hand. The chief concern, then, of the surviving Nazi leaders, Junkers, industrialists, and imperialists will be to hold and gradually tighten their grip on the German masses.

For a while, perhaps, a few underground gangs will operate amid the ruins of Germany, armed desperadoes, war criminals who have nothing more to lose. They will be a nuisance but not actually dangerous, for the real force of Nazi Germany will not be behind them. The real "resistance" will be planned by other leaders and carried out by the strategy of "cooperation." The people will be permitted, even encouraged, to ease the physical burdens of the occupation authorities. But any attempt at ideological communion will be obstructed and punished by death, through the "vehme," or secret courts.

These so-called "vehme" courts were a product of the political struggles in Germany after the First World War and were used by the Freikorps, the Black Reichswehr, and early S. A. gangs. "Verräter verfallen der Vehme"—"traitors will be punished by the vehme courts"—was a slogan by which all peace-loving and democratic-minded Germans were terrorized. For everyone was a "traitor" who desired a genuine understanding with Germany's former enemies or the consolidation of Germany's progressive elements. The world duly noted the assassination of the Catholic leader Mathias Erzberger and the democratic Foreign Minister Walther Rathenau, but it failed to recognize the significance of the many minor vehmic murders which inevitably broke the democratic backbone of the country. We shall see a re-emergence of these self-styled vehme courts in Germany on a far greater scale. It is for their administration that Himmler has trained tens of thousands of his most reliable, fanatical Nazis.

The Nazis hope that after five years have passed they will have achieved their first aim—the physical destruction and moral intimidation of anti-imperialist, anti-Nazi forces in Germany—and have regained their temporarily loosened hold on the German masses. They hope that by that time American and British troops will have gone home, assured of the cooperative attitude of the Germans. France, Belgium, and Holland, exhausted by the war and busy with their own reconstruction, will relax their vigilance. Then the German nationalists can again begin to prepare, step by step, the moral and material rearmament of the German people.

How far this Nazi strategy will succeed depends on two closely related factors—the degree of unity among the main Allies and the use the Allies make of anti-fascist forces within Germany. A policy of appeasement, a deal with the reactionary elements in the country, will amount to sponsorship of the Nazis' post-war dreams.

In the Wind

A READER PASSES ON to us an article from the German propaganda magazine Signal for January 1, 1944, which has just reached him. The magazine was found on the body of a dead German soldier. The article is a translation of America, the Land of Promises, by Henry J. Taylor, in the September, 1943, issue of the Reader's Digest. Taylor's article consisted of excerpts from his book "Men in Motion." The Reader's Digest prefaced it with this editorial note: "America's policy of exaggerated internationalism is as dangerous, foolhardy, and destructive as narrow isolationism." Signal prefaced it thus: "In September, 1943, the Reader's Digest published excerpts from the book 'Men in Motion.' The author, Henry J. Taylor, was a correspondent in Africa, Palestine, and Syria for North American newspapers; his thoughts are of interest to us Europeans also. They show that Signal's analysis of American affairs has paralleled that of clear-thinking Americans themselves."

AN ASTROLOGIST ADVERTISES in the Carnegie Hall program booklet that she "is now specializing her practice in post-war rehabilitation cases and vocational guidance."

THE CHICAGO SUN REPORTS that "Dewey, an American of the Century," the official campaign biography published last year at $2.50, is now on sale in Chicago at 10 cents a copy. The price in New York is 49 cents.

APPLICATION BLANKS for membership in the Gideons International, the organization that puts Bibles in hotel rooms, contain this note: "IMPORTANT: The object of the Gideons is to associate Christian business men (white) for service, and to carry to the world the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ." In answer to an inquiry N. F. Dewar, secretary, wrote, "We do not accept into our association any but those of the white race."

FESTUNG EUROPA: A new weapon in the Norwegians' war of nerves against the Nazis is the "telephone bomb." A stranger phones to a factory, business office, or public building and warns that the place is about to be blown up. There have been so many explosions that such warnings cannot be taken lightly. The disruptive effect is considerable. . . . The extreme youth of the new Nazi recruits in Denmark has given rise to this joke: "They say Hitler has asked for a forty-eight-hour armistice." "Why?" "Oh, they say he has two divisions that are going to be confirmed on Sunday." . . . Lieutenant General Kurt Dittmar, Nazi military commentator, explained the situation thus in a recent lecture in Bratislava: "We have taken our European task so seriously as to hold on to areas more than once solely out of regard for this or that ally or neutral state in order not to endanger them. Our European conscience was so strong that for the sake of our allies we undertook enterprises which were often beyond our strength."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind—either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

When Does Morale Break?

BY JOSEPH BORNSTEIN

THE hope that the European war would end in 1944 was based mainly on optimistic speculation about the state of German morale. Though no serious analyst, even when the Allied armies were advancing rapidly through France, expected that they could fight their way through to Berlin and Munich in a few weeks, many persons hoped that a collapse of German morale would open the road and spare the Allies the effort and the risks of further battles. Optimism was nurtured by various factors that were supposed to decrease Germany's will-to-resist—the great air raids against German cities and the threat of even more destructive bombings to come, Germany's terrific losses on the eastern front, the expulsion of the Wehrmacht from France, and the capitulation of Germany's last allies in Europe. The combined force of these developments, many believed, would reduce German morale to the breaking-point before the Allied armies reached the Rhine. It was thought that the Germans could not but realize that further fighting, especially on German soil, would merely mean senseless sacrifices on their part. Yet German morale did not break.

In 1944, and before, German morale was indeed very low, at least in the interior of the country. The events of June 20, whether these represented a genuine revolt or preventive action by Himmler, made it clear that even generals and staff officers, as well as civil servants in high positions and leaders of industry, no longer believed in the possibility of German victory. Nazi newspapers had for a long time reported almost daily that workers and middle-class men and women were being punished by Nazi courts for defeatist talk, spreading rumors, offending Nazi officials, helping foreign workers and prisoners of war, listening to foreign radio stations, refusing to work, and the like. There is much evidence that disillusionment, skepticism about propaganda, hatred for the regime, and longing for peace had spread through Germany as never before in a country at war. Even in 1918 Germany had not shown such defeatism. Nevertheless, there was no explosion.

When does morale break? In 1940 and 1941 the Germans expected to break British morale by the blitz. Today it is generally conceded that the blitz actually had the opposite effect. When the R. A. F. began to bomb German cities in earnest, many observers doubted Germany's ability to endure such attacks for long. As it turned out, German morale was able to withstand several years of strategic bombing.

It is certain that at some critical moments in the life of nations, when everything is at stake, a minor incident may become decisive. When the morale of a people has been brought close to the breaking-point, just a bit more of suffering and horror may cause the explosion. Who knows what would have happened to England in 1940 if the Germans at that time had been able to add the V-bombs of 1944 to the blitz of the Luftwaffe? Apparently human nature, given a little time, is able to adapt itself to seemingly unbearable conditions. People can get used to almost anything once the first shock is absorbed. In 1940, when France collapsed, weakness and treason gave the people no chance to become accustomed to the effects of Stukas and Panzers. The British had time to adjust themselves to the blitz; the Germans had time to get used to strategic bombing—and to many other things.

Private letters written to German soldiers as far back as 1942 by family, friends, and sweethearts are in the hands of the Allies. These letters deal mostly with the first great air raids over German cities and the hardships of the eastern front; they mirror the average German's first realization that the end of the war was still far off, that the outcome was uncertain. Reading these letters, one has difficulty in imagining greater sadness and disillusionment, a bleaker hopelessness. Through hundreds of pages runs the leitmotiv: there must be a change for the better very soon, because things are so bad that no change, or a change for the worse, is unimaginable. At the time these letters fell into Allied hands things had become much worse from the German point of view, but there was hardly any evidence that morale had deteriorated still further and none at all that it was "breaking." Goebbels's shrewd propaganda may have helped the people over the crisis, but propaganda could not change the reality they had to endure. One can only conclude that they grew accustomed to the reality.

Apparently morale does not break automatically when subject to a certain amount of strain. Sometimes, however, as history shows, poor morale acts as an infection and as such has decisive effects. At those times it spreads like a disease in all directions, from factories and market-places to government offices and police stations, from civilians to the armed forces, from the man in the street to the rulers in chancelleries and staff headquarters. Finally it paralyzes the instruments of power in the hands of these rulers, and they give up—as they did in Russia in 1917, in Austria and Germany in 1918, in Italy in 1943, in Rumania, Bulgaria, and Hungary in 1944. The Nazi rulers, it is true, are not likely to be affected by their subjects' low morale. Their instruments of power—the Elite Guard, the Gestapo, Nazi officials of all ranks—are bound to them by the fear of having to share their leaders' fate in case of defeat. The leaders themselves have no doubt that their own lives will be lost if they cede power. They know very well that for them there is no way out.

Germany's morale held in 1944 because some essential condition of collapse was lacking. Some kind of spark is needed to cause the explosive transition from low morale to breaking morale. There must be incitement to action and also the possibility of effective action. The front-line soldier whose morale sinks to a certain level can surrender to the enemy; he can escape from his difficulties by merely raising his arms. As a prisoner of war he will receive food, he will be allowed to sleep. The civilian in the interior cannot surrender: only by suicide can he put an instant end to his sufferings. The average German who has lost his belief in the Nazis, or who never had such belief, who is fed up with the war and longs for peace, has very little chance to act. Any attempt to change his situation would require him to become a hero—for one has to be a hero to disregard the power of the Gestapo, disobey and resist the Nazi rulers, and risk execution as a traitor. But exhaustion and hopelessness do not breed heroes en masse. Moreover, most Germans think correctly that they will all have to pay anyway for what the Nazis have done to other nations. No hopes such as were aroused in Germany in 1918 by the example of the Russian Revolution and the discussion of Woodrow Wilson's ideas neutralize German fears of things to come. We should not be surprised that German morale has not yet broken. Forceful underground movements have not developed in any country without some help from the outside. Not many men will risk their lives simply to hasten the defeat of their own armies and to deliver themselves up to the uncertain will of many victors. At any rate it seems that many Germans, low as their spirits have sunk, have chosen to wait. They may grumble, they may sometimes pray that the Lord and the United Nations hasten the end, but their depression of yesterday, today, and tomorrow does not influence events.

One day, nevertheless, German morale may break. It will certainly break if greater losses than Germany has already suffered destroy the physical power of the Nazi machine, if Gestapo and Black Guards become too tired and hopeless to do their duty and refuse to break up strikes and riots and to prevent the liberation of prisoners—even Gauleiters and Himmler's aides may become unable to carry on. Until then, however, we shall be in a safer and clearer position if we count exclusively upon victories in the field. German soldiers have an opportunity to surrender. German civilians do not.

Latin American Front

GUATEMALA is the first Western Hemisphere country to sever relations with Franco Spain, and Cuba is reported about to become the second. Mexico has never recognized Franco. After its break with Spain, Guatemala announced that it would expel all Falange agents, including a number of Spanish "priests," under the same law that provided for the expulsion of Nazi agents after Pearl Harbor. . . . RECOGNITION of the Farrell-Perón regime in Argentina as a result of the Foreign Ministers' meeting at Mexico City on February 22 looms as a dread possibility to the democratic Argentine people, according to Gonzalez Iramain, former Socialist deputy and representative of Patria Libre, the Argentine pro-democratic organization. Gonzalez claims that if the other American countries refuse to recognize the present regime and apply economic sanctions, the Argentines themselves can reestablish a democratic government. The State Department is said to be sending out unofficial preliminary feelers to find out what concessions Argentina might make to secure recognition. If the regime's intransigent mood holds through the coming Foreign Ministers' meeting and if, in consequence, a strong non-appeasement policy is adopted by the meeting, pro-democratic forces may score a real victory. . . . A CONTINENT-WIDE STRIKE called by the C. T. A. L. (Latin American Federation of Labor) for January 25 as a demonstration against Argentine dictatorship materialized in only eight countries. Between the no-strike pledge and the harsh anti-labor character of the governments in many of the countries for which the strike had been scheduled, its effectiveness as a show of labor strength was almost nullified. In Argentina proper the regime displayed its iron fist in a flimsy glove. Throughout the day all radio stations broadcast a new decree requiring employers to grant workers regular vacations, and at the same time the government took stern steps to prevent any possibility of a strike; despite these measures several minor demonstrations occurred. . . . AVRA M. WARREN, in his new post as director of the Office of American Republics, will probably add a few more nails to the coffin of the Good Neighbor policy. Known for his effective work in keeping Spanish Loyalist and French Popular Front refugees out of this country and in helping to secure recognition of the terroristic Bolivian regime, he can be counted on to insure our losing valuable friends and making important enemies—the people of Latin American countries, as opposed to their governments, are genuinely pro-democratic. . . . PERU'S UNDERGROUND Aprista Party staged its first national convention since 1931 in a secret meeting hall near Lima last month; 308 enemies of the dictatorship decided to "fight to establish a true democracy" by participating in the 1945 elections, changed their organization's name to the Peruvian People's Party, and adopted a conciliatory attitude toward the Catholic church, which is coming into its own in Latin America as elsewhere. . . . PUERTO RICO'S new Partido Popular, which won the elections last fall, has drafted a program by which the island can maintain economic balance while taking its first steps in political independence. The party proposes that the following measures be put into effect after independence: conversion of the sugar industry into public utilities, with profits limited to $25,000 for each concern; continuation of the land-distribution policy—this has already resulted in the division of a number of former estates among 52,000 families; nationalization of power companies; creation of a development bank to encourage new industries and extend the activities of those already established; exemption from taxes of all real estate valued at less than $1,000; establishment of minimum wages in all industries. Similar proposals might well be formulated by other territories, colonies, and protectorates hoping for independence. . . . IN TOTALITARIAN BRAZIL domestic mail is now censored, and it is difficult for persons in one section of the country to know what is going on in another. Vargas alone is cleverer than both members of the Farrell-Perón team. According to some reports, the presence of United States troops and bases in Brazil has created the impression that we will suppress any uprising against him, a fact that may endear the United States to Vargas, but hardly to his subject people.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE war has taken on a tempo that is hard to keep up with. A column written early enough to fit a weekly magazine's schedule may become old stuff before it appears in print. With that in mind, let us look at some of the incidents in the last act of the drama.

After the fall of a regime the succeeding government has always considered it extremely important to obtain the documents of the deposed government intact. The facts that emerge from the secret protocols, correspondence, and orders are usually invaluable from the material, the moral, and the historical point of view. The Nazis learned this in 1918, when the German Republic, and also the Allies, derived immense advantage from the records of the imperial German government. It could be assumed, therefore, that the Hitler gang would do everything imaginable to prevent their papers from falling into strange hands.

Panic about their documents developed first in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and the Ministry of Justice—with good reason. Months ago the two ministries moved from Berlin to Breslau, which was supposed to be safe. As the Russians advanced toward Breslau and chaos broke loose in the city, the safety of these ministries' records was the first thing thought of. Their removal was accomplished by plane with proper haste. And it can be taken for granted that in all the eastern provinces immediately threatened, important local records—those of the Gauleiter, the Gestapo, and the like—have also been transported to a place of safety.

In Berlin steps were taken to save the official documents as soon as the military crisis became acute. The Swedish press carried reports of the caravans of trucks that were driven into the courtyards of the ministries still in Berlin, particularly the Reich Chancellery, and driven out piled high with more or less carefully packed maps and papers. Where was this precious stuff being taken? If the Berlin correspondent of the Stockholm Tidningen is to be believed, it was all being carried off to the Bavarian Alps—or, to be more precise, to the vicinity of Hitler's eyrie, Berchtesgaden. It is rather odd that this correspondent's dispatch, as printed in the Stockholm newspaper on January 23, got through the Berlin telegraph office, since it contained statements which ordinarily no military censor would let pass. The possibility that the whole thing was a plant should not be excluded. On the other hand, in times of great confusion things happen which would be unthinkable in normal circumstances. The dispatch gave the following details:

The German government has decided to evacuate the important documents of all ministries to Berchtesgaden, where extensive fortifications are now practically finished. Experts say that the so-called Berchtesgaden fortress is impregnable. Ammunition, food, and medicine for several years have been stored in it. The greater part of all the Nazi Party's important documents are already there. The government officials will probably go to places near Munich.

I would advise the reader not to worry about the possibility that after the battle for Fortress Europe and then for Fortress Germany six more years will be needed to subdue Fortress Berchtesgaden. One can no longer take much stock in the word "impregnable." It seems plausible, however, that the important papers of the Nazi regime will be concentrated in one spot where on the last day of the thousand-year Reich they can all be reduced to ashes in a colossal auto-da-fé. This bonfire, even if it is kindled in the majestic setting of the Alps, will not correspond perfectly to the Götterdämmerung fantasies of the Nazi neo-Wagnerians, but it may be the only part of them that comes true. And although more has been destroyed in the world than these papers, their burning—which there is no earthly way of preventing—will be a severe loss to the contemporary world and to posterity.

In the meantime we see no weakening of the leading Nazis' monstrous determination to exert all their remaining might to the end that the Reich, "like a torpedoed battleship, will sink beneath the waves with its batteries firing." And there is no sign that in their shrinking territory the Nazis will not successfully quell every large-scale defection and desertion, every revolution from above or below, every mutiny, separatist movement, or "capitulation à la 1918." The material situation grows worse, one may say hourly. On January 23 all the express trains in Germany and a considerable number of the local trains were halted for lack of coal. On the same day the Völkische Beobachter announced that the gas would be cut off in every home which had any other kind of stove—were it one handed down from great-grandmother's time—that could be used for cooking. To relieve the railroads, even the sending of letters by post was stopped. The disorganization of transportation is also reflected in a decree applying to the "thousand instances" of freight addressed to persons "who cannot be found"; cars loaded with goods without an owner block the rails and stations. But all this only spurs the people in power to invent new tricks to arouse the masses' fighting spirit. Himmler has ordered that recruits for the army shall be sworn in with a solemn new ceremony, which is described in the Völkische Beobachter of January 21:

Formerly the ceremony was conducted in a barracks yard as a purely military form. Henceforth it will symbolize the solidarity between the battle front and the home front, and will take place in public in the presence of the local armament workers. The machines will be stopped while the recruits swear the sacred oath to die for the Führer and the German Reich. The armament workers will then present some newly manufactured weapons to the company leader, and a band will play, "God, who made iron, wanted no slaves" ("Der Gott, der Eisen wachsen liess, der wollte keine Knechte").

The campaign to make the population afraid to collaborate in any way with the enemy continues. For some time Germans have been told that a patriotic Fehme (secret court) in the occupied regions kills every traitor to the Fatherland. Many tales—all invented—of such secret murders in areas under Anglo-American control have been served up. On January 20 the radio and the newspapers circulated accounts of four new cases, giving names and places—one man executed by hanging, three by shooting.

The men killed by the Fehme were notorious characters who ingratiated themselves with the Americans by slandering and denouncing nationalist-minded German workmen. Together with a Jewish interpreter they held drinking bouts and blackmailed our countrymen. They have been warned, and now they have met the fate they deserved.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Some Young Poets and a New Genre

OWING to the prosperity of the big publishers and the zeal of small subsidized concerns like New Directions and the Cummington Press, many young poets are now appearing in book form. To judge by the half-dozen I have lately read, the young Americans are not particularly original. In recent verse there is only one very arresting technical development—the descriptive satire, to which I shall return later on. For the rest, Hopkins, Yeats, Eliot, and Auden are still the great influences; and the impact of the seventeenth-century metaphysicals is more direct than ever. In addition to being involved in artifice and loaded with conceits like a baroque reredos, this verse often speaks the very idiom of the seventeenth-century masters, carrying archaism much farther than did even the generation of Eliot. In the work of the young Trappist monk Thomas Merton—an intense mind but a rather undistinguished stylist—the kinship is with Henry Vaughn, great seventeenth-century mystic and lover of children and nature. But John Donne is the metaphysical most commonly appropriated by the younger Americans. Sometimes, however, their poems, elaborated out of proportion to the emotional charge, suggest not Donne but Erasmus Darwin, as if our seventeenth century were slily turning into an eighteenth century.

Often like hail
The branded hands of mad Corona flail:
Covies of frightened meaning soar.

These young poets direct much energy to detail and seldom attempt operations on any scale; instead, it is lyrics, lyrics, lyrics. Perhaps it is the distressing state of the world which sentences them to this fragmentary utterance. In any case, among the volumes I am considering no single poem is as long as Eliot's early Prufrock, and none pretends to anything like its dramatic and speculative range. Most of the young continue, however, to subscribe to the expressionist doctrine which informs all modernist poetry and according to which poetic beauty consists in a style imitative of the complexities and surprises of the mind rather than in a style inspired by given standards of harmony and felicity. On the whole this doctrine is still fruitful in the practice of the younger poets; but there are exceptions. Occasionally someone will work hard for the expressive and produce only the gauche. In the pretentious infelicities of Eve Merriam, for example, modernist poetry achieves a rowdy burlesque of itself. Miss Merriam specializes in the poetry of the physical:

down to the muddy ground oh look at it tumbling:
the idiot accident blobber-mouthed and fumbling!

Eyesocket leaps like egg,
flops yellow-oozing down.

Neither male nor female any more;
a girl you nestle in my house of hair,
I climb your legs and bandy boyish war.

Considerable devotion to form is the rule among the younger poets, although again there are exceptions. The temperament of Tennessee Williams, for example, is fresh, adventurous, and Western; but lacking structure, lacking even the will to concentrate and organize his materials, he simply reads like a good foreign poet in an indifferent translation. In Jean Garrigue, on the other hand, an exceptional delicacy combines with a nice sense of architecture. Instead of merely stringing images together, as so many American poets have done since Whitman, Miss Garrigue understands the nearly lost art of writing sentences in verse. It is true that her attachment to Hopkins sometimes leads to irritating preciosities of syntax:

But nor sun purifies nor strengthens by air
That warped delicacy!

Yet her straight writing is beautifully articulated:

Now upon this piteous year
I sit in Denmark beside the quai
And nothing that the fishers say
Or the children carrying boats
Can recall me from that place
Where sense and wish departed me
Whose very shores take on
The whiteness of anon.

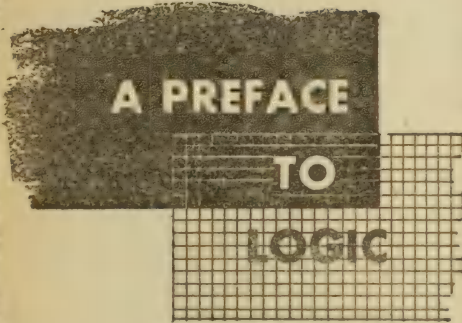

Indeed, what Miss Garrigue chiefly needs is a subject compelling enough to let color and light into the refined dimness of her poetic world. Her love poems are at present her best. When she is not writing of love she is, so far as I make out, not writing of much of anything; and she is then apt to occupy herself with tricks and fancies which impress me as trifling.

I come finally to the new development of which I spoke above, the descriptive satire. Of this form Karl Shapiro is the chief exponent, but Randall Jarrell, Robert Lowell, and John Frederick Nims work in it. The basic method is familiar: it consists in juxtaposing to the vulgar or terrible things of modern life the beauties or pieties of an older culture, often of an earlier stage of American culture. But this poetry of disappointed hopes and broken promises is now exploited with more fervor than it was even by Pound and Eliot. The subject, usually some very definite contemporary incident or phenomenon, is visualized with care at the same time that it is ransacked for its metaphorical possibilities and sardonic implications; and the verse, freighted with resounding language, tends toward a pomposity appropriate to the poem's mock-heroic intention.

And now the legion bones of Arlington
Laid out in marble alphabets
Stare on the great tombs of the capitol . . .

One of the earliest examples of the descriptive satire was Karl Shapiro's Washington Cathedral, in which a visitor to that structure, after gazing at the neo-Gothic wonders of the interior, steps outside to discover that "a red naked crane/Hangs over the unfinished transept,/a Cubist hen rivaling the Gothic School." The cathedral is thus seen to be only a

A book on thought that will delight and profit every reader

by Morris R. Cohen author of REASON AND NATURE

THIS unusual work by one of America's foremost philosophers is for the man or woman who finds a quiet sort of excitement in "thinking" . . . who is willing to consider a theory, a problem, or a philosophy for the sheer pleasure of doing so. It is not an "outline". It does not expound any special theory. It is, as the author says, "an exploration of the relation of logic to the rest of the universe". Stimulating because it is presented in a lucid, vigorous, and witty style, it offers a fascinating experience for the alert layman who wants to be enriched by the latest developments in philosophical thought. $2.50

THE NATION: "Many will come away with great respect for a thinker who has survived several waves of obscurantism and many muddled attacks on the method of science. Professor Cohen is no fair-weather friend of reason, but still thinks of logic as an indispensable element of liberal civilization and thought."

—Morton G. White

"deus ex machina," its phony grandeurs typifying the "tons of fake magnificence" under which all modern Washington buries its great heroes and its great past. By comparison with the achievements of Yeats and Eliot, the descriptive satire is a small thing—it is modern poetry shrunk to mere genre—but in it the toughness and realism of the twenties, fortified in many cases by the political insight of later times, survive as they do in hardly any other form of contemporary writing.

The varied targets of Shapiro's satire were indicated in the title of his first book, "Person, Place, and Thing." It is by things that John Frederick Nims is chiefly attracted: the repulsive paraphernalia of an industrial city. These he likes to ridicule by presenting them as beautiful or holy or romantic; so that in each of his poems there takes place a kind of malign transformation scene which only leaves the things in question more gruesome than before. The illuminated signs of movie houses become "New stars rising, Gem and Regent"; their interiors are "spearmint heavens"; a penny arcade is a "pale and dusty palace under the El"; a magazine stand is a "grotto of our lacquered saints"; an El train is a ship in which

On nights of rain, the captain in the prow
Dares in great dark the iron-charted flood,
Follows a star of harbor green as mint,
Skirting disaster's little eye of blood.
Is fortunate yet, for sudden in the night
Stations arrive like Indias of light.

This is charming, and much of Nims's work is equally ingenious, even though it seems finally to belong to the realm rather of fancy than of imagination. For just as, by comparison with Shapiro, Nims is too inflexible a metrist, so he is inferior in power of generalization; and his great peril is whimsy.

The most brilliant poet to emerge since Jarrell and Shapiro is Robert Lowell, who brings to satire the ethical ferocity and outraged idealism of a latter-day Bostonian turned Catholic. His poem Christmas Eve in the Time of War, which carries the subtitle, A Capitalist Meditates by a Civil War Monument, is a clear example of the kind of satire I have been discussing. For, as its title indicates, the symbol on which it builds its complicated structure of allusions—religious, political, historical—is a definite object in a definite time: a Civil War monument observed on a snowy Christmas Eve during the Second World War.

Stone generals

Perching upon a pillar of dead snow,
Two cannon and a cairn of cannon balls,
Livid in the unfinished marble, know
How Christmas drunkards left them in the cold,
While Christ the King is rocking on the mould.

But Lowell's work is not confined to this sort of satire. As Allen Tate observes in his introduction to Lowell's book, the poetry is of two types, one avowedly Catholic and a little theoretical, the other "richer in immediate experience . . . the references being personal and historical and the symbolism less willed and explicit." This seems in general to be true. Allusions to his ancestral Boston lend to one group of Lowell's poems striking concreteness; Boston is the "unreal city" of his private waste land. And if it is his luck to be sprung from a milieu so thick with ghosts and relics, it is his virtue to have exploited the chance so passionately in his work. He is a poet of very high promise and distinction.

NOTE: Thomas Merton's work appears in "Thirty Poems," New Directions, $1; Eve Merriam, Tennessee Williams, John Frederick Nims, and Jean Garrigue are published, together with a run-of-the-mill Latin American, Alejandro Carrion, in "Five Young American Poets, Third Series, 1944," New Directions, $3; Robert Lowell's book is "Land of Unlikeness," the Cummings Press, $3. F. W. DUPEE

BRIEFER COMMENT

Open Secrets

THE INFORMATION contained in the 1,200 pages, of small type, of "The Secret History of the War," by Waverley Root (Scribner's, $10), was not hitherto secret, and the two volumes bring one down only to the close of 1942. Besides a vast quantity of essential facts the author has felt compelled to provide an excess of cartilage and connective tissue. It is not secret history that the British soldier is ill at ease without his beer, and there is far too much conjecture and interpretation, together with prodigious amounts of gossip, much of it doubtless true. It is hardly important to know that shortly before his attack on Russia Hitler delivered a private three-hour speech to a blonde young opera singer of soft curves and different expectations. Sometimes the author includes his own suppressed dispatches at full length. Elsewhere he gives far too much description of public states of mind. The Pacific war is not treated at all.

But these things admitted, it must be said that the book is a useful one. It does contain a vast amount of absolutely essential information, much of which has been given little or no space in the daily press. Its valuable substance is, as it were, all that background material which the diligent, well-connected political journalist has brought to editorial conference rooms for his paper's guidance. Much of it might be called "off-the-record stuff." Here and there is a minor scoop. In other places one is surprised at a shrewd estimate or a keen analysis.

To sum up: Mr. Root has written a new kind of history of the first three and a half years of the European war. At one-third the size it could have been a remarkable book. It is now a useful but garrulous compendium of "inside facts" and knowing talk.

RALPH BATES

William of Orange

WHEN WILLIAM, PRINCE OF ORANGE, assumed leadership of the Dutch revolt against the King of Spain, his legitimate overlord, he had no intention of founding a new state. He resisted the encroachments of Madrid upon the government at Brussels and claimed for the Netherlands Knights of the Golden Fleece, the highest nobility of the Low Countries, paramount influence over native affairs. The burghers, on the other hand, had reasons of their own for resenting Spanish rule. King Philip II, consistently pursuing the course steered by his ancestors, the Dukes of Burgundy, strove to unite the bewildering diversity of duchies,

Research Studies of the Committee for Economic Development

PRODUCTION, JOBS AND TAXES

Postwar Revision of the Federal Tax System to Help Achieve Higher Production and More Jobs
By HAROLD M. GROVES

Professor of Economics, University of Wisconsin

This concise and penetrating survey takes up 16 aspects of corporation and individual taxes and gives definite proposals for new or revised measures. $1.25

THE LIQUIDATION OF WAR PRODUCTION

Cancellation of War Contracts and Disposal of Government-Owned Plants and Surpluses

By A. D. H. KAPLAN

Professor of Economics, University of Denver

Presents concrete proposals for ways and means of reconversion that will contribute to production and job opportunities in the postwar period. $1.50

DEMOBILIZATION OF WARTIME ECONOMIC CONTROLS

By JOHN MAURICE CLARK

Professor of Economics, Columbia University

A thorough study of existing controls—their objectives, their effects, their authorization. Analyzes the conditions under which they may become useless, and offers specific recommendations for their cessation. $1.75

PROVIDING FOR UNEMPLOYED WORKERS IN THE TRANSITION

By RICHARD A. LESTER

Professor of Economics, Duke University

Considers present arrangements for solving the problems of transition unemployment and develops a comprehensive and practical program to meet the issues involved. $1.50

GOLD AND THE GOLD STANDARD

By EDWIN W. KEMMERER

Professor Emeritus of International Finance, Princeton University

A study of the gold standard in history, with special reference to Britain and America today. $2.50

ECONOMIC PROBLEMS OF LATIN AMERICA

Edited by SEYMOUR E. HARRIS

Assoc. Professor of Economics, Harvard University

The economics, economic history and prospects of Latin America presented in clear, non-technical language by a group of acknowledged experts. $4.00

At all bookstores

counties, and seigneuries that constituted the Netherlands into a closely knit, centralized state. But the Dutch people clung to their local and provincial rights and privileges. Their resistance was prompted by the wish to preserve medieval variety from being merged in uniformity. Native conservatism refused to accept the centralized administration imposed upon it by a foreign ruler. Popular resentment, however, would not have gathered the strength for successful resistance if it had not been fired by religious zeal. It was the inhuman persecution of heretics that turned political discontent into armed rebellion. Democratic Calvinism was the militant force that liberated the Netherlands. The Knights of the Golden Fleece, realizing that they had unchained forces that threatened their own power no less than that of the sovereign, abandoned the cause of the rebels and submitted again to the King of Spain. Prince William alone decided otherwise. And in that decision he showed his greatness. He stood by the Calvinist burghers, not because he liked Geneva better than Rome, but because he knew that freedom for the Dutch people could be won only with the aid of the zealots of the Reformed religion. Their zeal would not grant to the Catholics the freedom of worship they claimed for themselves. Prince William championed tolerance toward all believers. But he had to abandon that counsel of perfection for the immediate need of Calvinist support. The proud Knight of the Golden Fleece, forsaken by his equals, was henceforth the rebel leader of despised heretics.

The story of Prince William's tragic life set forth in C. V. Wedgwood's volume "William the Silent" (Yale, $3) is a moving tale of frustrated hopes and indomitable perseverance in spite of repeated failure. He knew himself as an instrument in the hands of divine providence. Under its guidance he accomplished miraculously the very reverse of what he set out to accomplish: the revolt that was started to preserve the medieval heritage of the Dutch resulted in the foundation of a modern state, which fifty years after his death aroused the admiration and envy of all Europe. His latest biographer combines sound learning with literary ability. She has written a beautiful book that will give comfort to those readers who despair of this age, which in so many respects resembles that of the Prince of Orange.

A. J. BARNOW

THE POSTWAR WORLD

● If the most successful peace treaty only lasted thirty-three years, what can we expect in the postwar world? What are the factors and special considerations involved? Thirteen experts present their understanding of the problems, the results and the probable costs. Among them are Robert S. Lynd, Francis B. Sayre, Joseph L. Hromadka, T. A. Bisson, Vera Micheles Dean, John L. Childs, et al. $2.00

AT YOUR BOOKSELLER

ABINGDON-COMESBURY PRESS

DEPLORABLE

It is deplorable when you stop to think about it. Not a single principle of making decisions proposed by the Dumbarton Oaks conference is right.

WILLIAM CROCKER ■ Box 292 ■ PRESCOTT, ARIZONA

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Organized Labor in China

FOR YEARS many people have lamented the lack of an authoritative book on Chinese labor. Because of the appalling scarcity of reliable information on the subject in English, researchers have been forced to avoid the topic. In "The Chinese Labor Movement" (John Day, $2.75) Nym Wales successfully overcomes this handicap by drawing on hitherto unpublished material which she obtained in interviews with veteran Chinese labor leaders on her visit to Yenan. As a result we have for the first time the full story of the rise of a militant Chinese labor movement between 1922 and 1927 to a peak of three million members, which was followed by the Shanghai massacre of April 12, 1927, and the subsequent suppression and elimination of all free trade unionism in China. Members of American labor unions will find the discussion of the Chinese Association of Labor particularly instructive in view of the $1,250,000 which they intrusted to this organization in 1943 and 1944 in the belief that they were helping Chinese labor. Miss Wales quotes official Chinese documents to show that the Chinese Association of Labor is a cultural and welfare rather than a trade-union organization and that the "unions" which make up its membership were largely organized by the Kuomintang under strict government control. Most of these "unions" operate in public enterprises, and under the law they have the right neither to strike nor to bargain collectively. In contrast, Miss Wales finds the beginnings of a genuine democratic workers' movement in the 1,350 Chinese industrial cooperatives and in the "free" labor unions of the guerrilla areas. While the story of all of these developments is necessarily fragmentary, students of China and anyone who is interested in the struggle of labor will find this little book extremely useful.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

The Other Germany Again

IF MANY DELIGHT to shock us with reports of proto-Nazis at all points in the history of German culture, there are also more generous souls to remind us of "the other Germany." Two of the latest reminders are Heine's "Germany, a Winter's Tale," in a new English version by Herman Salinger (L. B. Fischer, $2.75), and "Against the Current: the Life of Karl Heinzen," by Carl Wittke (Chicago, $3.75).

Heine writes of a trip to Hamburg which was one of the few interruptions of his long exile in Paris; he denounces Prussianism, and so the poem, written in 1844, is topical a hundred years later. Despite Hermann Kesten's passionate introduction one is not convinced that such topicality goes very deep, and Mr. Salinger himself was so embarrassed by Heine's preface that he put it at the back of the book; but these things need not detain us here. More pertinent is the fact that Heine found it possible stridently to denounce Prussianism, yet to praise the other Germany. For the new version Mr. Salinger has composed honest, crisp, colloquial verses. Those who cannot read German will get the impression that Heine was almost a poet. What translation of Heine gives a better impression?

Professor Wittke's project was a simpler and less ambiguous undertaking. His life of the great German American Karl Heinzen (1809-80) is appropriately solid and business-like. To read it made me realize how excessively my knowledge of German socialism a hundred years ago was limited to what Marx and the Marxists have told me. In freeing an independent radical from the disgrace and obscurity conferred upon him by the disingenuous slurs of doctrinaires Professor Wittke has performed one of the finest services of scholarship. And he has written an interesting book.

ERIC RUSSELL BENTLEY

FICTION IN REVIEW

THE winter fiction season has been unusually lean. There have been far fewer new novels in this pre- and post-holiday period than there were in the same period last year, and one begins to wonder whether the publishers have run out of even bad books, as is reported to have happened in England after a few years of war. Well, pending either such a total drought or, what is more likely, the renewed spring torrents, here are a few notes on some random volumes about which you may have had a mild curiosity.

"The End of All Men" by the Swiss writer C. F. Ramuz (Pantheon, $2.50), although now published in English for the first time, is not a new work; the publishers do not tell us the date of its original European appearance, but I gather from Denis de Rougemont's introduction that it was about twenty years ago. A fantasy in which the concerns of our daily lives are measured in the light of a cosmic catastrophe, "The End of All Men" not only belongs to a category of fiction to which I am a priori hostile, it being my experience that such large subjects as the imminent destruction of the human race have a way of inviting easy psychologizing and philosophic banalities, but in addition is written in a style that I find a peculiarly pretentious bore. Mr. de Rougemont

枕戈待旦

"China is big, baffling and bewildering. To cover this huge topic in a readable book takes a literary knack.

Lin Yutang is probably the only living writer who could do it. The Vigil of a Nation is a fine performance. Lin Yutang gives his report as a personal book of travel. His intuitions, his graphic strokes, his limber wit and neat analysis of his compatriots convey a concrete, intelligible China."

—Francis Hackett, New York Times

"...beautifully written, full of delightful personal reminiscences and humorous and appealing anecdotes... the book contains Dr. Lin's own program for the China of the future as well as his revealing picture of the China of today... as provocative and consistently interesting as anything he has ever written."

—Howard Taylor, Philadelphia Inquirer

"Dr. Lin presents the case for Chungking in THE VIGIL OF A NATION... a ringing declaration of faith in China and her leaders. Indeed, it sounds like the opening bell in what promises to be a lively argument."—David Appel, Chicago News

"Shrewd and balanced... startlingly informative, remarkable, and provocative... 'Must' reading."

—Book-of-the-Month Club News

Illustrated with 8 pages of photographs.

At all bookstores • $2.75

THE JOHN DAY COMPANY

MOTION PICTURES

20th Century-Fox presents

HANGOVER SQUARE*LAIRD CREGAR*LINDA DARNELL*GEORGE SANDERS

— ON STAGE —

MILTON BERLE

Star of "Ziegfeld Follies"

Now
PlayingROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street"One of the best that we shall see this year"
—Crowther, N. Y. Times.

G. C. S. presents

MR. EMMANUEL

A TWO CITIES FILM PRODUCTION

starring FELIX AYLMERwith GRETA GYNT and WALTER RILLA
Brandt's GOTHAM B'way and 47th St.

Graham Greene's

MINISTRY OF FEARstarring RAY MILLANDand MARJORIE REYNOLDSNOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD PRESENTS

UP IN CENTRAL PARKBook by HERBERT Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
& DOROTHY FIELDS DOROTHY FIELDS SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Ave. & 59th St. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDEby HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER*MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Matinee Wednesdays and Saturdays, 2:30 mentions the affinity of this style with the technique of the moving picture: "You will soon notice, when you read 'The End of All Men,' that in this book everything is seen before it is explained. Certain parts of this epopée are written like a motion-picture scenario. The characters appear in the light, a head, an arm—the close-up of a hand. . . ." But this seems to me to describe the technique of an arty and self-conscious, and dated, cinema which there never was any reason for literature to try to imitate. And actually Ramuz's novel doesn't put me in mind of the work of the camera at all. Rather, it strongly recalls to me the work of Masereel, of those dull, plodding, morally suffocating stories in woodcut which also once enjoyed an esoteric vogue.

To call "Crying at the Lock" by Adeline Rumsey (Simon and Schuster, $2.50) a psychological thriller is to ignore its ambitions to serious psychological insights; to call it a serious psychological novel is to be grossly misled by its psychiatric pretensions. Actually Miss Rumsey's history of a young man beset both by memories of a dead first wife and the malignities of his second choice is melodrama for the better lending-library trade, at the level where simple story-telling must show its passport of literacy and sophistication; and there would seem, these days, to be no better proof of worldliness than psychiatric paraphernalia. In addition, Miss Rumsey's book sustains a general air of lively, decent intelligence which makes it hard to remember that one is reading merely a time-killer.

In "The Golden Rooms" (Vanguard, $2.50) Vardis Fisher continues the good, not too clean fun with his anthropoid forbears which he started in "Darkness and the Deep." The title of the present volume refers to the discovery of fire, a development which Mr. Fisher re-creates with searing vividness. Fortunately I have no knowledge of anthropology to be challenged or provoked by this fictionalized account of mankind's rise to its present stature. I simply enjoy myself and let any old steps-in-progress fall as they will. But I do have the impression that this march toward civilization is becoming harder and harder on the stomach—an evolution which I suspect it is a little within the pleasure of the narrator to modify. For example, Mr. Fisher's new volume celebrates a feast of mammoth, the recollection of which I still keep down with only the greatest difficulty.

Of the two mystery novels in Elliot Paul's "I'll Hate Myself in the Morning and Summer in December" (Random House, $2.50) I read only the second, an excursion into Nazi sabotage in Chile. Since Mr. Paul failed to raise a goose pimple on this susceptible skin, I very much doubt the appeal of his book to the thriller addict. But on the other hand, perhaps by some happy chance the addicted public has become so surfeited with horror and violence that it is ready to welcome an anti-fascist story notable for its very lack of bloodthirstiness.

DIANA TRILLING

CONCERTS

NEW SERIES—MONDAYS AT 8:30 P. M. TUESDAYS 6-7:30 P. M.

STOKOWSKI

FEB. 12-13, Cowell, Fanfare; Beethoven, Pastoral Symphony; Bach, Sonata in E Flat, Part 1.

ALSO FEB. 26-27:

MAR. 12-13, 19-20

N. Y. CITY SYMPHONY
Single and Subscription SEATS NOWAt Radio City — 90c — $1.20 — $1.80
N. Y. City Center, 131 W. 55th St.

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

EVEN the least ardent admirers of Miss Margaret Webster are not likely to question her courage. She demonstrated it once when she opened her American campaign with "Richard II," and she demonstrates it again with her production of "The Tempest" at the Alvin Theater. When less intrepid entrepreneurs screw up their courage for a round with the bard, they usually choose one of the old standby plays with a fool-proof plot, but Miss Webster scorns such half measures. She does a "Hamlet" or an "Othello" as a matter of course; she also determinedly plays what the timid would pronounce very nearly unplayable.

Some critics of "The Tempest" have always thought it feeble, and the rest have always been sure that it is very nearly ineffable. By their judgment it would seem therefore too bad or too good for the living theater, and until Miss Webster came along it has not, to the best of my memory, been done in New York since I saw it something like a quarter of a century ago. Now she not only puts it on but also puts it over, and does both because she uses the approach which has served her well in the past.

So far as I can make out, this approach might be defined in some such imperatives as the following: assume that the play, or at least some usable portion of it, is neither too delicate nor too dead for the requirements of a commercial theater; hire a cast which, in addition to being competent, includes members whose publicity value is by no means negligible; use any theatrical devices which will serve a purpose without caring too much whether they are or are not part of the Shakespearean tradition; don't worry too much about losing some of the "values" so long as you are sure that you have got some of the others. In this instance, as in the several previous ones, the result is exactly what I presume Miss Webster had hoped. A considerable portion of the public will be agreeably surprised to discover that "The Tempest" is more entertaining than it had been inclined to suppose. Shakespeare's more self-conscious admirers will grant as much as they ever grant to any modern performance of any of his works—namely, that it is well worth seeing, even though, of course, it does not do justice to a play which in all probability will never be done justice to.

It is with this latter view that I tend on the whole to agree. Arnold Moss is an acceptable Prospero, even though he is assigned a part which calls for more in the way of majestic bearing and majestic utterance than any actor can reasonably be expected to possess. Canada Lee makes a comically brutish Caliban, and Vera Zorina surprised me. In anticipation, a long-legged Ariel seemed almost as preposterous as a fat Hamlet, but besides capering very prettily, she gives the sprite a certain impressiveness, a certain dignity, which I had never supposed part of his character, but which, I must admit, is quite appropriate once one has seen it. George Vaskovec and Jan Werich, the Czech clowns, are sublime, and despite anything that others may say, I saw nothing to reprehend in the antics which made the Trinculo-Stephano scenes high points in the performance.

As one might expect, those purplest of purple patches, Prospero's two big speeches, are less impressive when delivered from the stage than they are when read to oneself, and I think the dislocation of the "we are such stuff as dreams are made on" passage is a serious mistake, since it makes it apply to the play as a whole, not, as it actually does, merely to the little divertissement staged by the magician for the entertainment of his guests. On the other hand, the half-mocking, half-tender scene between Ferdinand and Miranda came off very well indeed, and the important fact concerning the performance as a whole is the same as that which emerges from any reasonably competent performance of any of Shakespeare's plays—the fact, namely, that though certain incidents and certain lines seem less striking than they do when the play is read, certain others take on a significance which the reader is almost certain to miss. The answer to the old question whether Shakespeare belongs on the stage or in the study is simply "both."

As for the play as a whole, this performance confirmed my private conviction that it is neither merely feeble on the one hand nor on the other so much the wisest or profoundest of its author's works as to be very nearly beyond human comprehension. Prospero's farewell to his art really is, I am willing to believe, Shakespeare's farewell to his own. Caliban really is a playful embodiment of all the brutishness which Shakespeare, after the fashion of his time, thought typical of the mob in any society. Here on this desert island goodness does for once triumph easily and completely because here for once is a microcosm in which a perfectly good man is invested with absolute power. But "The Tempest" is a fantasy, not the solemn legacy of a statesman or a philosopher. Its famous serenity does not mean that its author had somehow reached a wisdom transcending "Hamlet" or "Lear." It means only that he was accustomed to assume a premise for any work of art and that, perhaps because he was in a happy mood, he chose for the nonce to assume, as one line in the play has it, "The seas threaten but they are merciful." To babble as some critics do of deeper wisdom and higher synthesis, to assert that "The Tempest" solemnly proclaims that God is in his heaven and all therefore right with the world, is to put Shakespeare somewhere below the level of Browning. It is to make him, as some critics seem determined to do, a forerunner of Mrs. Eddy.

Exhibition of SCULPTURE

MOCHARNIUK

Feb. 12—Mar. 3

MARQUE GALLERY

16 West 57th St., N. Y. C.

Alcoholics
ARE

Sick People

ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.,

Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist

JOHN HOPKINS HOSPITAL

ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS

2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.

Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.

- ☐ copies $1.00 paper bound
- ☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound

Name.....

Address.....

Like all Michael Todd's shows, "Up in Central Park" (New Century Theater) strikes the eye. It also, thanks to some pretty tunes by Sigmund Romberg, sometimes strikes the ear. Unfortunately, however, it never, to put it mildly, strikes the mind or even, very often, the funny bone.

Film Note

WHAT FILMS I will manage to discuss at anything like proper length when space next becomes available already puzzles me; I am snowed under by possibilities, some worthy, others quite as relevant through conspicuous unworthiness. For the time being I will say briefly that I enjoyed "On Approval," an English-made film with Beatrice Lillie and Clive Brook, so thoroughly that I have to fight off superlatives; that "Hangover Square" is a better than average horror picture up to, but not including, its wildly overloaded climax; that "A Song to Remember" contains a good deal of nicely played Chopin, and is as infuriating and funny a misrepresentation of an artist's life and work as I have ever seen; and that judging by "The Three Caballeros," a streak of cruelty which I have for years noticed in Walt Disney's productions is now certifiable. I should add fair warning about "On Approval": it is a studied, dead-pan, parodistic, late-Victorian setting of a Lonsdale drawing-room comedy, and practically every good thing about it is extremely specialized. A popular hostile synonym for that is "precious." Trivial as it is, I would be grateful for a lot more preciousness of the same sort; "On Approval" itself could use more.

JAMES AGEE

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

SERKIN'S illness caused a change of program at a New Friends of Music concert: instead of Busch and Serkin playing Mozart sonatas there were the Busch Chamber Players performing several works, of which I heard two: Bach's D minor Concerto for two violins, with Busch and Frances Magnes as the soloists; and Rameau's Troisième Concert. The Bach Concerto was performed with Busch and Magnes standing in front of the orchestra and facing the audience—which might have worked if there had been enough rehearsal for soloists and orchestra to achieve an understanding about tempos and ensemble; but actually a performance which sounded as though it had not been rehearsed was not even held together by a conductor; and in addition there were technical defects in Busch's playing, of which Magnes's was free. On the other hand, for the Rameau piece Busch seated himself at the head of the first violins, where he led what was evidently—from the beauty of sound and precision and finish—a long-rehearsed performance of a delightful work.

At another concert the New Friends, finding that a program of Mozart's Quartets K. 428 and 590 and Debussy's Cello Sonata was a little short, filled the fifteen or twenty minutes with a First Cello Sonata by Jean Hure—fifteen or twenty minutes too much of the polished inanity that is one vein of modern French music. Debussy's Sonata, for me, was only the expertly contrived motions of saying something that wasn't really said; Schuster's playing of it was masterly in its refinement of tone and style. And that reminds me of a recent Sunday afternoon when I walked into a living room where the radio was turned on for the Philharmonic broadcast of Dvorak's Cello Concerto with Leonard Rose as the soloist, and I heard cello-playing that was astounding in its beauty of tone, its ease and fluidity all the way to the extremes of the instrument's range. Even Feuermann's playing, as I recall it, is surpassed by Rose's in these respects—which are all that I would venture to talk about after a hearing of only a movement of Dvorak's Concerto.

The Budapest Quartet's performances of the two Mozart quartets were unequal, as its performances are these days. Fatigued after Lehmann's third recital, and poisoned by the air of the unventilated hall, I was half-asleep during K. 428; but my guest, who has experienced ears for quartet-playing, told me not to worry—I had missed a performance which sounded as though they hadn't rehearsed or had had a fight that morning. On the other hand the performance of K. 590, for which I was wide awake, was fully up to Budapest standard. At the Y. M. H. A. too the group's playing has reached heights in certain of Beethoven's quartets—Opus 135, and above all Opus 132—which it has not reached in others. And the Budapest Quartet reminds me of Alexander Schneider's Albeneri Trio: the pallid tone which its pianist produced in Ravel's Trio turned out to represent not an adaptation to Ravel's music but a French style of piano-playing that produced the same tone in Beethoven.

As for Lehmann, it appears that she holds a lot in reserve for the occasions when she decides to use it. What she saved in volume of tone and emotional intensity at her first recital she expended in her wonderful singing and acting of the songs of Wolf and Strauss at the third. And so I dare say she will have enough for her great performance of the Princess in "Der Rosenkavalier" later in the month.

Columbia's February list is headed by a set (556; $5.50) of Beethoven's Quartet Opus 18 No. 5 performed by the Budapest Quartet. The work has no searching and profound slow movement; its serious moments are those of a somewhat impassioned first movement, a wistful and lovely minuet movement; and for the rest there are a light-footed and charming second movement in triple time and a high-spirited finale. The performance, recorded before the Petrillo ban by the Roisman-Schneider-Kroyt-Schneider group, is excellent; its recorded sound is hard and cold, but at least without the harshness and coarseness and break-ups of other Columbia reproductions of Budapest performances.

Columbia's only other new release is a three-volume set (554; $18.50) of Shakespeare's—not Verdi's—"Othello," as performed by Paul Robeson, José Ferrer, Uta Hagen and their supporting company. It is not in my province; but I can say that whereas I know that the lines of "Richard II" which Maurice Evans speaks are poetry I don't know this about the lines of "Othello" as Robeson speaks them. And I can report that the reproduction of the voices is sometimes unclear near the center of the record.

For the rest Columbia features two older sets from its catalogue. One (X-157; $2.50) offers the delightful Bocherini music that Françaix arranged and scored with excellent taste for the ballet "Scuola di Ballo," beautifully performed by the London Philharmonic under Dorati, and beautifully recorded. The other (313; $4.50) offers Grieg's Piano Concerto, excellently performed by Gieseking with a moderately good accompaniment by the Berlin State Opera Orchestra under Rosbaud. The recorded sound is good; but there is some wavering of pitch in my review copy, and its surfaces are noisy.

---

BUY BONDS

---

Letters to the Editors

Wanted: Horse Sense

Dear Sirs: Every time I see opinions in your journal that speak of good balance and impartial appraisal, your stock goes up with me. I refer particularly to your criticism of the dictatorial practices of James Petrillo.

Not all business men are anti-labor by any means. A larger and larger percentage of them are understanding that better and more regular wages are the means of providing the purchasing power necessary to prevent over-production in normal times. This is one of the major selling projects we need to undertake in our country, but it has to be undertaken sensibly. We shouldn't try to attain a 50 per cent increase in the minimum wage in one jump—and we shouldn't guarantee the minimum wage to everyone, because the higher the minimum goes, the more encouragement for loafing. That temptation should be removed.

Wisconsin had a good policy before NRA. Its program worked well without a lot of expensive supervision and at the same time led to fair piece rates. The practice was something like this: where people were employed at hourly rates, there was to be no argument, the minimum had to be paid; but where people were employed at direct piece rates, the minimum had to be high enough so that 75 per cent of the workers could earn the minimum or more; the remaining 25 per cent tolerance was intended for learners, handicapped workers, the aged, those who fell below par, and those who preferred to loaf.

It provided a natural incentive for productivity—and American progress is based on productivity, not on the principle of getting something for nothing.

We belong to the small-business crowd. We are not anxious to get any handouts from Uncle Sam. We are only interested in fair rules and regulations—rules that curb monopoly and prevent it from operating with all kinds of privileges and advantages. We know what kind of a squeeze monopolistic business can put on an ordinary enterprise. If with fair rules we can't hold our own, I for one would want to step aside and let someone else try to head our business.

But to me it seems that labor is mimicking monopolistic business far too much when it yields to men like Petrillo, when it supports a wage principle that encourages the slow-down practices that have been so prevalent in recent months and years, and when it further encourages the principle of trying to get something for nothing.

What is needed so much today is just common, ordinary horse sense with fair play under statesman-like leadership on the part of business, labor, agriculture, and government. After all, we have common interests. Why can't we start working together instead of constantly fighting each other—and why can't a journal like yours lead with that kind of leadership?

C. T. HABEGGER.

Berne Manufacturing Company
Berne, Ind., December 29

The Political Score

Dear Sirs: I read The Nation carefully each week, as I always have. I read it expecting to find hard-hitting liberal journalism, a courageous lashing at idols and vested interests. But instead I have been getting a kind of fuzziness, a moral and intellectual wishful thinking, that borders on cowardice. Certainly in the kaleidoscope of contemporary politics it is often necessary to urge certain compromises of detail; but only from within the framework of a consistent position. You have no such position. Or at least I have been unable to discover it. It is no longer possible just to be against fascism, any more than it was ever possible just to be against war. There must be a why and a how. I wish sometime the editors of The Nation would stop to figure them out.

If I have any right at all to criticize, it is only because I have read and supported your magazine for many years, but I suggest that at this time one must be either for or against the political forces controlling the peace. Assuming the latter position, it is still both wise and possible to bargain with these forces—but only from an unmistakably independent stand. Your present criticism of Churchill, for instance, is meaningless in the context of your generally acquiescent policy for the last six months. Your fairly uncritical support of the President during the election incriminates you, to that degree, in his present cynical amorality. Your willingness to publish a Soviet apologist like

Anna Louise Strong involves you in at least a partial indorsement of Russian imperial ambitions. I insist that much irresponsible confusion results from your refusal to face the political facts of life with a realistic but principled attitude and philosophy. Perhaps it is unfair to put my objections on an almost ethical—rather than a purely intellectual—basis, but that is precisely the way I feel about it.

No better example of what I mean could be found than a sentence from your editorial of December 16. You said: "... in Italy the new Bonomi government, minus Sforza and the Socialists but including the Communist leader, Togliatti, will provide a temporary compromise" (italics mine). But this is no compromise. This is the basic pattern as designed by Stalin and Churchill, and tolerated, if not actively approved, by President Roosevelt—a new partnership between reactionary right and totalitarian left, omitting the only ones who might give us a free Europe. Is there

FREE
to All
AUTO
owners

This Book Tells How To

- get better gas economy
- prolong tire life
- preserve exterior finish
- keep your car in the best operating condition

You can get a FREE COPY from any General Motors dealer or by using the coupon below.

Customer Research Dept., Room 1817
GENERAL MOTORS, DETROIT 2, MICH.

Please send FREE COPY of new edition 64-page
"Automobile User's Guide"—containing 196 practical suggestions on wartime operation.

Name.....
please print

Address.....
please print

City..... Zone State.....

Make of car.....
now owned..... Year model.....

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 17, 1945

NUMBER 7

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS

More Perfect Union	169
The Shape of Things	170
Wanted: a Janitor	172
Enter the Air Trust	172

ARTICLES

The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté	173
This Is What We Voted for by I. F. Stone	174
Labor Meets in London by Margaret Stewart	176
Exports: Britain's Triple-A Priority by Keith Hutchison	177
The Battle of the Rhone by Andrée Viollis	179
China to Lin Yutang by Edgar Snow	180
In the Wind	183

POLITICAL WAR

The Nazis' Next Twelve Years by Horst Mendershausen	184
---	-----

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall	187
Concerning the Devil by Reinhold Niebuhr	188
Briefer Comment	189
Films by James Agee	192
Art by Clement Greenberg	193
Music by B. H. Haggin	194

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 103 by Jack Barrett	196
--	-----

More Perfect Union

THE long-awaited meeting of the Big Three has more than justified expectations. After the Crimea Conference any lingering hopes our enemies may have entertained of dissension and division among the leading powers of the United Nations, must be dashed. Whatever disagreements existed among Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin, it is clear that a common determination utterly to crush Nazism proved a cement far more powerful than any of the forces pulling them apart. And whatever questions were left unresolved, they certainly managed to dispose with amity of a long and controversial agenda.

The communiqué issued jointly at the close of the conference is a most impressive list of achievements. As was to be expected, the coordination of plans for the final military defeat of Germany takes pride of place, and for the better realization of that aim there is, at last, provision for meetings of the general staffs of all three countries. Even more useful at this stage of the war, when political problems are coming more and more to the front, is the arrangement for regular and frequent consultations of the foreign secretaries of the three powers. Another welcome feature of the communiqué is its very specific reaffirmation of the principles of the Atlantic Charter, together with proposals for dealing with the problems of the liberated countries in the spirit of that instrument. Added to this is a solution for the tangled and embittered Polish question—a solution which obviously represents a compromise and one which we hope will receive sufficient support from the Poles themselves to prove workable.

A noteworthy product of the discussions is the olive branch held out to France. The French felt, with reason, that they were entitled to an invitation to the conference, which was bound to have an important bearing on their future security. Now they are asked to participate both in the occupation and the control of Germany. Further, France, together with China, is asked to join in sponsoring the United Nations conference on the Dumbarton Oaks proposals, which will be held in April, and is to be consulted on the solution reached for the voting-procedure difficulty before this is made public. Finally, the French government is being invited to help operate the machinery designed to facilitate concerted action in ironing out the internal political and economic difficulties of the liberated countries.

In regard to Germany, the Big Three "agreed on common plans and policies for enforcing the unconditional-surrender terms which we shall impose together on Nazi Germany." These terms are not to be published until the defeat of Germany, but it is clear that there is nothing soft about them. For the communiqué goes on to declare "our inflexible

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Association, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 319 Kellogg Building.

purpose" to destroy utterly German militarism and Nazism. To this end it is announced that all German armed forces will be disarmed and disbanded and the General Staff of the Reichswehr broken up. German military equipment will be either removed or destroyed and German industries adapted to military production eliminated or controlled. All war criminals are to be punished, and the Nazi Party and all its institutions wiped out. Reparations in kind are to be levied "to the greatest extent possible" in compensation for the damage wrought by the Germans in the war.

We have no criticism in principle of these proposals, but we regret the absence of any clear indication of the way in which they will be carried out. Some suggestions for enforcing them which have been widely if unofficially circulated would leave the German people without even a dim hope of recovery. However, the Big Three declare that it is not their purpose to destroy Germany, while pointing out that the continuance of a hopeless resistance must make the cost of defeat heavier. Indeed, the gravest threat to Germany's future is now offered by the suicide strategy of the Nazis. If they succeed in persuading their deluded followers to fight from town to town, scorching the earth behind them, and finally carrying on prolonged guerrilla warfare from their inner mountain fortress, the result will be a devastation that even the softest peace will not remedy. We hope that Allied propagandists in broadcasting the news of the Crimea Conference to the enemy will hammer home this fact.

There should be no complaint this time that the Big Three's communiqué does not communicate. If it does not completely satisfy our hunger for information it does provide a very filling meal. We hope, too, that the results of the conference will discourage efforts that have been made to picture the President as a "yes-man" for his two formidable colleagues. The agreements announced bear out earlier hints that a more positive American policy had been adopted. We think Mr. Roosevelt is to be credited with the emphasis placed on the Atlantic Charter, and the procedures devised for assisting the reestablishment of democracy in the liberated countries bear the marks of his craftsmanship. The first fruit of this agreement to take joint action in meeting political problems created by the war is Russia's abandonment of its stand-pat attitude on Poland. That signifies, we hope, the end of unilateral action and a union made more perfect.

The Shape of Things

ALTHOUGH NOTHING SPECIFIC WAS SAID ABOUT Spain in the report of the Big Three conference, the "leak" of Prime Minister Churchill's rebuke to Franco for his proposal of an anti-Soviet pact permits us to hope that a new policy toward Spain will soon be evident. If new proof is needed of the Spanish government's continued complicity with the Hitler regime, it is readily available in the recent outrageous broadcasts by Falange radio stations. With Zhukov's army threatening Berlin and with Eisenhower ready to strike in the West, the Valladolid radio said: "The Germans are preparing a sensational blow to stop the Soviet advance. They have now dug in in positions where they are resisting while awaiting the hour of the counter-attack." The broadcast went on: "General Franco's Spain and Germany are the two European countries that still have vital energies. . . . The great confidence apparent in Goebbels's speeches is in keeping with military events. Germany is serene, aware of her own destiny; she is ready to save herself and Europe." All this on February 4, 1945! Being farther removed from the front lines, Radio Valladolid spoke with greater optimism than Radio Berlin. Americans may be inclined to laugh at this nonsense. But laughter at similar statements made by Hitler in 1938 has already cost this country many thousands of American lives, and it must not be forgotten that Franco Spain is an important factor in Hitler's plan to continue the war even after military defeat.

✱

SUCH A CHANGE IN POLICY WOULD NOTABLY improve the United States' position at the Foreign Ministers' Conference which will begin on February 21 in Mexico City. We know that various Latin American countries are preparing to introduce at this conference the question of severing relations with Franco. Those who demand a break are inspired by two motives. One is the warm sympathy for the Spanish Republican cause throughout the Latin countries of the Western Hemisphere. The other is the desire to rid America of the Falangist pest. Both sentiments were expressed with force by the Mexican Under Secretary of the Interior, Señor Casas Aleman, when he addressed the big Spanish Republican rally in the Arena Mexico on January 29 as President Avila Camacho's personal representative. His remarkable speech, of which the American press took scant notice, appeared in full on the front page of every Mexican newspaper. It amounted to the extension of a kind of recognition to "the only Spain we love and respect." Nothing would place the United States delegation to the pan-American conference in a better position to overcome Latin America's enormous distrust of us than if Stettinius could appear there not as Franco's advocate but as the friend of Spanish democracy.

✱

SOME CHOICE RUMORS ABOUT LEND-LEASE WERE laid at rest by the Foreign Economic Administration at the recent hearings of the House Foreign Affairs Committee. In response to the charge that the cigarette shortage was due to lend-lease operations, the FEA pointed out that our lend-lease exports totaled only about 1¼ per cent of our cigarette production in 1944. The rumor that Canadians were growing fat on American lend-lease butter was exploded by the fact that Canada has received no butter, or any other commodity, under lend-lease. The story that the British were buying aviation gasoline from us at 25 cents a gallon and reselling it to the American army at 55 cents a gallon collapsed when it was revealed that we neither sell gasoline to the British nor buy it from them. A companion tale to the effect that American troops were being outrageously overcharged for food by the British was punctured by the disclosure that all the food provided to our troops by the British is gratis as reverse lend-lease. Some of the rumors, like the one that the Russians were shipping lend-lease planes to Japan in exchange for rubber, were shown to have originated with the Berlin radio. Others, such as the story of a "square mile of American-made farm machinery," originated with a traveling Congressman. What was actually seen was a depot where American tractors and road-building equipment were stored preparatory to shipment to France. While we would like to think that the FEA's answers would put a stop to the insidious stories about how poor Uncle Sam is being played for a sucker by the wily foreigners, we suspect that by this time there is a brand new crop of stories from similar sources.

★

THE AMERICAN BANKERS ASSOCIATION IS seeking to conquer the Bretton Woods plan by dividing it. In a report carefully timed for the opening of Congress debates on the plan, which was approved by forty-four nations last summer, the International Monetary Fund is damned by the bankers, while the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development is boosted. The authors of the report are of course "heartily in accord with the objectives" of the Bretton Woods agreements, but they consider that the proposals for the fund which is designed to assist exchange stabilization introduce "a method of lending which is novel and contrary to accepted credit principles." In banking circles, we suppose, it is inevitable that novelty should be considered, ipso facto, dangerous, but we are surprised to find that the fund's proposed mode of operation should be regarded as violating accepted credit principles. For the fund is designed to act as an international reserve bank, and its mechanisms appear to be an adaptation of those employed in the Federal Reserve System. However, the bankers will have none of it and propose to transfer such of its functions as appear useful to them to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. This institution, which is intended to make or guarantee long-term loans for approved wealth-producing projects, should, in their view, be endowed with additional powers to negotiate currency-stabilization agreements and originate loans for this purpose. The result would be to mingle long-term and short-term credit operations in a way that we have always understood was considered "unsound" banking practice. There are a number of other points in the bankers' report which are open to serious criticism. But the major count against it is that the scheme they advocate is very different from the one approved by the forty-four nations at Bretton Woods—a scheme which itself represented a compromise giving great weight to American views. If Congress yields to the bankers' clamor and proceeds to gut the present plan, there will probably be no international agreement at all.

★

THE CANADIAN BY-ELECTION IN GREY NORTH hung out the storm signals for Mackenzie King. The defeat of his Minister of Defense, General McNaughton, by a Progressive-Conservative candidate brought the conscription issue once more to the fore. Mr. King will face the people in the coming federal election badly shaken by his recent parliamentary crisis and further damaged by this latest rebuff. To make matters worse, his compromise formula on conscription, displeasing enough to Ontario, has alienated Quebec. Those who know their political way around say that the French province which in the past has voted "le straight King" will send to Ottawa a bloc of independent nationalists in protest against the government's betrayal of its anti-conscription pledge. Two factors, however, may change this picture. First, the violence of the pro-conscription sentiment in Ontario as expressed in the recent by-election may drive the Quebecois back into the Liberal fold to avoid a fate worse than King. Second, if the war in Europe is over, the conscription issue may well fade into the background. That brings up the matter of the C. C. F., which has been offering a strong challenge on the left and whose strength has been concentrated in the western provinces and in the industrial districts of Ontario. In the Grey North by-election, the C. C. F. candidate, Air Vice-Marshal Godfrey fared rather badly. The district is largely rural and has never been a C. C. F. seat, but the conscription issue undoubtedly dulled the edge of the C. C. F. appeal. If, therefore, the election is held while the war in Europe is still on, the Tories will exploit to the full the discontent and bitterness over the government's conscription policy. They will certainly gain seats, although it is almost inconceivable that they will have enough to form a government. If, on the other hand, the election is delayed until the end of the war in Europe, the real test—and a much more genuine one—will be on the issue of post-war plans. Here the main contenders will be the Liberal Party and the C. C. F., for apart from their venom toward Mr. King the Progressive-Conservatives are bankrupt of political ideas. But no matter when the election is held it is quite possible that no party will emerge with a clear majority.

★

ALTHOUGH THE DEATH SENTENCE IMPOSED ON Private Henry P. Weber of Vancouver, Washington, for refusing to drill has been commuted to life imprisonment, little can be said in defense of the army's handling of the case. Private Weber quite obviously should have been dealt with as a conscientious objector. While his objections to the bearing of arms do not stem from religious conviction and thus are not specifically covered by the law, hundreds of political objectors with similar views have suffered no greater indignity than being sent to the C. O. camps. Weber, however, failed to obtain formal recognition as a C. O. When he reported his scruples against the use of arms to his induction officer, that officer is reported to have instructed him to voice his objection to each specific order that went against the dictates of his conscience. When, in accordance with this instruction, he refused to drill, he was court-martialed and sentenced to be hanged. The Weber case is a flagrant exception to a generally fair policy. The army's treatment of C. O.'s has been much more sensible and humane than in the last war and has coincided with the heightened respect for civil liberties in general. There have been more cases of stupidity than injustice. C. O.'s, as a rule, have been sent to work camps where conditions bear some faint resemblance to those experienced by our soldiers before they enter combat areas. Few would raise any complaint on this score. The stupidity is to be seen in the failure to put C. O.'s to useful work at the top level of their skills. There was the much-publicized case of Dr. C. C. Devault, a qualified scientist, who was denied laboratory facilities and sentenced to three and a half years in jail. And there have been numerous cases of farmers and specially trained workers who have not been permitted to alleviate the man-power shortage. C. O.'s have willingly offered their bodies for experiment in the interest of human welfare. We should make better use of their brains and skills.

✱

THE APPEAL FOR CHINESE UNITY ISSUED AS A joint statement by ten leading Chinese-language newspapers in the United States and neighboring countries must have come as a rude shock to the Kuomintang propagandists who have been busy assuring Americans that there is only one side to the Kuomintang-Communist controversy. The ten newspapers, representing well over half the total circulation of the Chinese-language press in North and South America, call for an immediate end of the one-party dictatorship in China and the creation of a national coalition government as an effective means of assuring victory over Japan. They urge that all restrictions on free speech and press be removed and that all patriotic parties and groups be given the same legal status. Our readers will find in the statement's condemnation of the blockade of the Border Region, of the existence of secret police, and of the lack of effective government measures to combat inflation and the black market striking confirmation of Edgar Snow's views as expressed in his article on Lin Yutang in this issue. The need for an end of recriminations between the Kuomintang and the Communists and for the creation of a united China was clearly indicated by Acting Secretary Grew in an official statement issued at Washington recently. Mr. Grew made it plain that our good offices were available for an accord that would unite China in the struggle against our common enemy.

Wanted: a Janitor

THE Committee on Un-American Activities needs a janitor, three clerks, and a definition of what, after all, is an un-American activity. These primary requisites are set forth in the Congressional Record of January 29 and in a letter written on January 20 by Representative Mundt to one hundred prominent Americans asking them to define the committee's objective. Mr. Mundt wrote that "unless it is held that there is no such thing as an un-American activity, Americans should be able to agree on what it is, and our committee could then expose it."

But not without a janitor, adds realistic Representative Cochran. On January 29 Mr. Cochran offered to the House Resolution 109 requesting funds with which the Committee on Un-American Activities might employ a clerk at $3,900 a year, two assistant clerks at $2,640 and $2,109, and a janitor at $1,560. As reported in the Congressional Record, the additional assistant clerk is needed because the committee has "eighty file cases and about twenty unopened boxes full of papers, and because the files are not catalogued or indexed," and also because someone has to be present whenever anyone outside the committee goes over its records. No one objected to the hiring of the clerks, but Representative Engel questioned the need for a janitor. "Committee after committee that meets once or twice a year has a janitor," he complained. "I do not know what in the world they need a janitor for. The Committee on Territories, next to me, has not met three times a year, I believe, but it has a janitor." Representative Cochran, on the other hand, felt that his committee was entitled to a janitor "because every other committee of the House has one, and further because this man must look after some large rooms as well as keep the files clean."

The fact that any herculean character who undertakes to clean up the Dies Augean-stable files deserves more than $1,560 a year did not figure in the House discussion—nor did anyone raise the question whether the committee's first need is for a janitor or a raison d'être. To some this question may appear as irrelevant as the old problem of which came first, the chicken or the egg. But all will agree that if the egg is rotten it should be thrown out.

Enter the Air Trust

AT THE Chicago International Civil Aviation Conference, the United States delegation took a strong stand against monopoly. In the name of free competition it stoutly opposed the British plan for an international organization with broad powers to regulate international airline routes, frequencies, and rates. Such regulation, our representatives declared, would make for a cartel system and would throttle the development of international commercial aviation; they desired no interference with the competitive ability of each country's airlines to get all the traffic they could based on efficiency. Senators Bailey and Brewster, who were members of the American delegation, concurred in this policy. More than that, according to Russell Porter of the New York Times, they were said to have made it clear that the kind of agreement which the British desired would have to take the form of a treaty and be ratified by a two-thirds' vote of the Senate. Such a treaty, they indicated, would encounter stiff opposition.

It is a little strange, therefore, to find that the Senate Sub-committee on Aviation, of which Senator Bailey is chairman and Senator Brewster ranking minority member, is apparently supporting the principle of a "community" company which would enjoy a monopoly of America's foreign air traffic. This is the principle for which Pan-American Airlines—up to the war in the possession of a de facto monopoly—has been fighting for years, openly at hearings of the Civil Aeronautics Board, quietly but no less strenuously in the Congressional lobbies.

On February 8 the Wall Street Journal published a series of extracts from a document drawn up by the Senate sub-

COMING IN THE NATION
The Legal Case Against Adolf Hitler
By Raphael Lemkin

The Walls of Stuyvesant Town
By Charles Abrams

Who are the Partisans?
By Milton Bracker

committee, which, after paying a handsome tribute to Pan-American and noting the general reliance of other nations on a single air-transport system in the international field, declares:

We are of the opinion that we must very seriously consider concentration upon one coordinated system in the international field in order (1) to meet foreign-flag competition; (2) to service our foreign policy in peace and in war; (3) to avoid loss and subsidies, i.e., to assure success; (4) to meet the demands of our commerce; (5) to insure uniformity of policy. . . . It is true that the people of this country . . . seek to avoid monopoly. But we do not carry this policy beyond reason. . . . We recommend a minimum of American-flag operators—even just one—in the foreign field and the highest degree of regulation in the public interest.

In a letter to the Wall Street Journal Senator Bailey has intimated that his subcommittee has not yet adopted a definitive policy and that this document is only one of a number of drafts circulated for purposes of discussion. However, the newspaper reports that other Senators "insist that the document is far from a preliminary work." It is rather a composite of various drafts, and while no formal vote has been taken on it, a majority of the subcommittee members are said to have indicated their support for its principles. Additional evidence of the headway this monopoly plan is making is the reintroduction by Senator McCarran, a member of the subcommittee, of a bill to provide for the creation of a single American overseas airline in which the domestic airlines would be permitted to participate.

This is not a policy to be condemned out of hand, always provided that there is genuine government regulation. But we suspect that such is not the idea of Juan Trippe, the dynamic and dictatorial chairman of Pan-American. He has hitherto been very successful in bending Congress to his purposes—a notable example was its refusal of a mail appropriation to the rival American Export Airlines—and if he is able to get legislative sanction for his monopoly plans, it will not be surprising to find that the public control provided is mainly window-dressing. It will be even less surprising if, once Pan-American has its exclusive charter, perhaps under a new name, it seeks to make a deal with the "chosen Instruments" of Britain and other countries, providing by private treaty an international cartel instead of the kind of international organization which the British and Canadian delegations at Chicago attempted to achieve by public treaty.

The monopoly plan, it is only fair to note, is not that of the Administration. In fact, the Civil Aeronautics Board and the State, War, and Navy departments are all believed to be opposed to it. But as the document quoted by the Wall Street Journal pointed out, "The forming of policy in air transportation is a function of the legislative department." That being so, this revelation that the competition we fought for so hard at Chicago is considered something less than sacrosanct in Congress is likely to be viewed curiously abroad. It may seem yet another proof to cynical foreigners that our antipathy to monopoly is far more a matter of preaching than of practice.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THIS department views the war fronts tonight with the happy reflection that Abe Lincoln's birthday has been most fittingly celebrated with the announcement of great and encouraging agreement among the Big Three at Yalta, a Crimean town which the Red Army liberated a year ago. There may be discoveries of omissions and dirty deals, and we may all wake up with a hangover; but tonight one can be thankful for Lincoln and his memory, which still walks the earth, preserving the Union by principle and compromise compounded together in courage.

A strong believer in the twin principles of unity of command and the council of war, Lincoln would have been pleased by the military sections of the Yalta communiqué. The chief staff officers of the three nations most heavily involved in the war against Germany met and exchanged full information on current and pending operations. They agreed on the timing, scope, and coordination of the next blows, which are to be delivered from east, north, west, and south. (The points of the compass I italicize may have been thrown in to add to the discomfiture of the German General Staff—but then again, they may not have been.) Finally, they agreed to hold future meetings of the military staffs when necessary.

These decisions are all-important, not only for the final phases of the war against Germany, but for the increasing possibility of Russian participation in the final phases of the war against Japan, and above all for the years of pacification and heightened Allied accord which must follow the shooting war. One may hope that at Yalta the foundations were laid for a structure long desired—a true Joint Chiefs of Staff, drawing in the top Soviet commanders alongside their British and American opposite numbers. There has long been too wide a gap between the Anglo-American Joint Chiefs, sitting in Washington, and the Soviet Supreme Command, sitting in Moscow. The interchange of ideas, plans, and problems across a table top goes farther toward achieving a meeting of minds than any number of code cables. The announced agreement as to the timing of blows from all points of the compass should also eliminate most of the grumbles from both sides of Germany as to why the other fellow doesn't open up a second front at once.

While the big gears were conferring on new and heightened attacks, their friends on the fighting fronts were hammering away at the slowly fading German strength. The big actions continued in the east, where the Russian generals, having obviously read last week's edition of this column, proceeded according to the plan therein contained (I'm boasting). Zhukov was held hard at the tip of his long salient around Küstrin and Frankfurt, and fierce battles raged on the Oder crossings near Berlin, while Rokossovsky and Konev fanned out into Pomerania and Silesia, broadening the tip of the salient, relieving the threat to Zhukov's exposed flanks, and posing new threats to the German troops in north and south. Instead of a long, narrow dagger pointed at Berlin, the Russians by Monday night occupied a great bulge thrusting into Germany, shouldering up toward Stettin and the Baltic, and pushing down behind Breslau and toward Dresden.

This movement of broadening the salient will probably continue until Zhukov has a firmer base from which to push off again toward Berlin, the unhappy capital. It remains to be seen whether Zhukov will be strong enough, and Berlin's defenders weak enough, so that he can push straight into the city, or whether he will go around in a double envelopment, cut off the city's communications, and continue on to the west and south while the following infantry goes in and cleans up the city. The latter course is traditional with the Red Army; but Berlin covers an enormous area, and will certainly be more difficult to encircle than Warsaw. Even if it is encircled, we have seen what the Germans are capable of doing in the way of protracted house-to-house defense at Budapest. If it proves too difficult to encircle and Zhukov decides to fight his way straight in, the Germans have the Stalingrad example before them, and it would be unwise to anticipate that Germans are less brave and cunning than Russians when fighting in defense of their homes.

How many times have the afternoon dailies announced that American armies have smashed their way through the last remnants of the Siegfried Line? I lost track about two months ago. This talk of lines and walls is most misleading. One thinks of a string of posts, or a brick wall through which an army thrusts its head, then its shoulders, then its hips. The trouble presumably comes with the hips. It would present a more illuminating picture if one spoke of a defense area, or a deeply echeloned defense in depth. I realize that this would be difficult to fit in a headline, but it would make for more understanding of what Allied infantrymen are up against—tank traps, interlocking fire points, minefields, bunkers, plenty of wire, all of it under the fire of artillery which has been zeroed in to the exact yard; and then a couple of miles of broken, hilly, wooded, ravine-cut country (also under fire) and the whole thing is encountered once again.

As for that "comparatively open country leading to the Rhine," which lies beyond, it is full of towns and villages every one of which is a better tank obstacle than can be erected in a field, every one of which will have to be fought through—or around, which is worse because it fouls up the supply lines and the mechanized columns.

The essential futility of military criticism was neatly illustrated last week by the revelation of the Roer dams, which the Germans controlled. We were all yapping about the no-progress of the armies across the Roer near Düren, and now three months later we hear that if they had progressed, the Germans would have opened the flood-gates and washed them down into the North Sea.

The British-Canadian drive through the Reichswald toward the Rhine has been a promising preparation for full-scale offensives in the west. Capture of Cleve provides elbow room for a swing to the south in the narrow space between the Rhine and the Maas. This area must be pretty well cleared before any crossing of the Rhine can have much hope of permanent lodging. Preliminary operations here, and farther south once the Roer subsides, will pave the way for some big blows that should stop the flight of German reinforcements to the east.

This Is What We Voted For

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 13

THE first reactions of the capital to the concrete and energetic communiqué from the Crimea Conference indicates that this will rank as one of the President's greatest achievements. With Mr. Churchill and Marshal Stalin, he has taken us one firm step farther along the difficult road to a total victory and a stable peace. Much since November 7 has been disheartening to the day-by-day observer, but in the proceedings at Yalta the historic significance of Mr. Roosevelt's reelection is made plain—in foreign policy a continuation of close and friendly liaison among the leaders of the Big Three, the sine qua non of Axis defeat and post-war reconstruction. One can easily imagine Governor Dewey doing many of the same things and making many of the same appointments as Mr. Roosevelt since the election, but one cannot imagine a Republican President reaching the Crimea agreement on Poland, as one cannot imagine a Republican President appointing a man of Henry Wallace's outlook as Secretary of Commerce. Whatever his compromises on less important matters and however his evaluation of detail and his sense of timing may differ from those of some of his progressive supporters, Mr. Roosevelt's course clearly remains charted toward the two major objectives of an enduring peace abroad and full employment at home. This is what we voted for.

In the sphere of military action the Crimea communiqué is regarded here as foreshadowing a new offensive against the Reich, this time from the north, probably through Denmark. Should the Germans be forced to fight on a fourth front, their collapse would be hastened, and there is much hopeful speculation about the Russian agreement to sit in with the Chinese at the United Nations Security Conference to be held at San Francisco on April 25. The date is the deadline for denunciation of the non-aggression pact between the U. S. S. R. and Japan, and it is felt that the Soviets would not risk this announcement, with all it may imply in Tokyo, unless they were confident that final victory over the Reich will be close enough in the next few weeks to enable them to handle a surprise attack by Japan. This reflects confidence by the U. S. S. R. not only in its own strength but in the trustworthiness of its allies. A related indication of the ever closer relations among the Big Three is found in certain phrases in the communiqué which seem to doom any hopes that might have been nurtured by the "Free German" generals in Moscow.

When Stalin joins in expressing an "inflexible purpose to destroy German militarism . . . to disarm and disband all German armed forces; break up for all time the German General Staff . . . remove or destroy all German military equipment; eliminate or control all German industry that could be used for military production . . . remove all Nazi and militarist influences from public office and from the cultural and economic life of the German people" (my italics), he must feel sure enough of his Western allies to shut the door on the use of the Marshal von Paulus crowd as an alternative instrument of Soviet policy. A declaration of intent to "disband all German armed forces" is a departure from earlier Stalin statements that seemed to promise the Reich the right to retain an army and opened an avenue of negotiation between Moscow and dissident German generals among its prisoners.* To use some of these generals as pawns against the West might at one time have seemed a grim political possibility in Moscow. Apparently the Crimea Conference has made Marshal Stalin feel that no such dangerous game will be necessary. This is regarded here as not the least of the President's achievements at Yalta.

Even so fruitful a conference as the one just closed cannot be expected to solve all mutual problems. It is noted here that while the leaders of the Big Three agreed on the establishment of a joint commission to discuss reparations, they have yet to establish a joint commission on war crimes. The communiqué does, indeed, speak of an inflexible resolve to "bring all war criminals to just and swift punishment," but recent events have made it quite clear that this resolve is much less inflexible in Washington and London than it is in Moscow. It may be significant in this connection that the communiqué makes no reference to the industrialist collaborators of the Nazis whom the Russians also wish to punish but some Anglo-American circles are anxious to protect. This may explain the failure to set up a joint body to handle the many complex problems involved in punishing Nazi higher-ups and the omission of any joint statement warning the neutrals not to grant asylum to Nazi leaders. In this sphere it would seem that leaders of the Big Three do not yet see eye to eye. Franco Spain is one of the neutrals which need renewed warning, and the Argentine is another. Here the differences among the powers are well known.

It is good to know that there will be closer cooperation and consultation among the Big Three in the future in regard to liberated countries, and it is hoped that they will also decide in the near future to begin informal but detailed discussion of the problems which will arise in the occupation of Germany. The announcement that the Reich will be split into three and almost certainly—when the French join in—four separate spheres of military control does not solve these problems; it only sets the stage for them. There will be a joint military commission in Berlin, but this also will not be enough to make certain that the occupying powers carry out their pledge to extirpate all traces of Nazism in the Reich. The Russians are better qualified for this task by political training, temperament, and the working-class basis of their regime. Unless there is mutual discussion, we may find Nazi elements taking refuge underground in the more equable and complacent climate of the English or American zone of occupation. This would be dangerous not only for the future of the Reich but for future relations among the occupying powers.

It is in the handling of these concrete problems that Allied unity and efficiency will be tested rather than in the formal details of voting rights and the structural charts for the projected world security organization. But it is on the latter and above all on the Polish settlement that discussion in Congress and by the opposition will center. The position to be taken by the Republican Party is not to be judged from the first approving statements evoked by the Crimea communiqué. Senators Austin of Vermont and White of Maine have applauded the results of the conference, but both are internationalist Republicans. Herbert Hoover, with unexpected and admirable magnanimity, has praised the President's work. But Vandenberg, the bell-wether of the party majority on foreign policy, indicated that he was undecided about the Polish settlement. It is on the Curzon line that the main battle will be fought.

The danger is not from the extreme isolationists like Wheeler; they command the sympathies of only a negligible minority in the country and the Senate. The danger, as in the old League fight, lies in those who express themselves as fully in accord with the need for preventing German resurgence and establishing world peace but—. This time the leader of the "but" brigade is Vandenberg. Until the announced results of the Crimea Conference, he seemed to offer a bridge, however shaky, between the old isolationism and world cooperation. But the final settlement of the Polish question at Yalta brings fully into view the most treacherous aspects of the Vandenberg proposal. Now to propose the reopening of the Polish settlement after the war would be to disrupt the Allied unity and confidence on which not only the military strategy but the diplomatic decisions of the Crimea Conference were based. Not the slightest cost of the Vandenberg proposal would be Soviet cooperation in the war against Japan. To insist on perfectionism along the Pripet Marshes might mean payment in American lives on Pacific islands. That would be a high price to pay for Polish megalomania and American domestic politics.

---

CORRECTION: In last week's article, Wallace: Second Round, the last sentence of the second paragraph should begin, "Fortunately, Senator Barkley, with the help of Vice-President Truman, obtained the floor . . ." Through a typographical error Barkley was transmuted into Bailey.

* "It is not our aim," Stalin said on November 6, 1942, "to destroy all military force in Germany."

Labor Meets in London

BY MARGARET STEWART

London, February 9 (by Cable)

THIS is the first peace conference." With these words the chairman of the London County Council welcomed the delegates to the World Trade Union Congress, which opened in London's blitz-scarred County Hall on February 6. The congress is certainly the greatest international gathering of labor ever held. More than two hundred delegates are here, representing nearly fifty million workers in forty-five countries. They have come from every quarter of the globe—in the words of the hymn, "from Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strand." There are Indians, Russians, Jews, Chinese, men who fought in the maquis of France and Belgium or with Tito in Yugoslavia, men who fought against fascism in Spain before anti-fascism was fashionable, Americans and Latin Americans, delegates from the British Commonwealth, Swedes, Swiss, and Irish from the neutrals. The only condition of admittance is a trade-union card carried by an opponent of fascist dictatorship. These men have met, in the words of British transport leader Deakin, "to chart a course for mankind."

The congress is dominated, just as the peace conference will be, by the Big Three—Britain with 7,000,000 members, Russia with 27,000,000, and the United States (C. I. O.) with 6,000,000. From these three countries come the three presidents: George Isaacs, chairman of the Trades Union Congress; Vassili Kuznetsov, chairman of the Soviet trade unions, who learned his English at Ford's in Detroit; and R. J. Thomas, vice-president of the C. I. O. and head of the Automobile Workers. The three vice-presidents are Saillant, of France, a leader of the resistance; Lombardo Toledano, the forceful Mexican leader representing the Latin American Federation of Labor; and Chu Hsueh-san, who heads 600,000 Chinese workers.

The opening session was smooth sailing, being largely taken up with formalities—appointment of a Standing Orders and a Credentials Committee, addresses of welcome, a message from Prime Minister Churchill, a humdrum harangue by Deputy Prime Minister Attlee. All this took time, since it had to be translated into French, Russian, and Spanish.

A squall blew up at the end of the second day when the Standing Orders Committee presented its report. Sir Walter Citrine, bronzed from his visit to Greece, mounted the rostrum and roundly condemned its decisions. First, it had recommended the inclusion of former enemy countries—Italy, Finland, Rumania, and Bulgaria—on the ground that circumstances had changed since the congress preparatory committee first decided to exclude them. "How can you discuss the treatment of the enemy with people who until yesterday were themselves enemies?" asked Sir Walter. He did not think that any of these countries, with the possible exception of Finland, could claim a stable or democratic trade-union movement.

Secondly, the Standing Orders Committee had recommended the admission of a Lublin Pole whose credentials had been flown from Moscow. This issue, urged Citrine, was still under consideration by the government. Why should the trade unions rush in where ministers feared to tread? Finally, the committee had recommended that the voting should be by countries—one country, one vote—with a two-thirds' majority constituting a decision. This, said Sir Walter, was contrary to the spirit and purpose of the conference, which was intended to be only advisory. This issue is undoubtedly the most critical before the delegates. The British fear being swamped by the votes of Russia and the numerous countries which, as has become increasingly obvious in the course of the conference, follow the Soviet line.

The third morning opened in a heavily charged atmosphere which was not relieved by an uncompromising speech from Lombardo Toledano or by the criticism of "Comrade Citrine" voiced by Tomasov, a Soviet delegate. R. J. Thomas, who had flown from America and rushed straight to the hall from the airfield, poured oil on the troubled waters. He moved reference back to the Standing Orders Committee of the first controversial sections of their report, that is, the recommendations on the ex-enemy countries and Lublin. This was agreed, and the Standing Orders Committee eventually decided that the ex-enemies should be invited to send representatives whose credentials would be examined by the Credentials Committee to determine whether they should be delegates or merely observers. This dispute, which at one stage threatened to break up the conference, may be a foretaste of the far greater controversy which promises to develop next week.

On the first item of the agenda, the Allied war effort, there is complete agreement, even if each delegation tends to compete in boosting the contribution his nation has made to the defeat of fascism. America came out of this very well with a munitions production record showing an elevenfold increase in three years and the virtual disappearance of time lost through strikes. Reid Robinson, head of the Metal Workers, who gave this report in the absence of Hillman and Thomas at the opening session, called for cooperation among the Allied nations in peace as in war.

The delegations are agreed, too, about the issues of the peace settlement. There is a solid core in favor of hard terms for Germany. The C. I. O. and the Chinese, especially, are determined that what is sauce for Germany shall also be sauce for Japan, and so far it seems that the Russians, although not at war with Japan, are ready to agree.

It is over the future of the international union movement that a real cleavage may occur. The Russians, the C. I. O., the French, and the Latin Americans want a brand-new international and not the resurrection of the moribund International Federation of Trade Unions. The British T. U. C. wants to reorganize the federation and extend its membership. They have a close link with the A. F. of L., which has categorically refused to sit at a round table with the C. I. O. and the Soviet unions. A decision to form a new international would cause the A. F. of L. to retire to splendid isolation, a state of affairs which the British want to avoid. This was the threat made by Robert Watt, A. F. of L. leader, at the I. F. T. U. meeting in London last week, for which he was hotly attacked by Will Lawther, blunt-speaking ing British miners' leader. It may be that these differences will settle themselves, though the stage seems set for a major ideological clash. Low, the cartoonist, summed up the situation brilliantly in a cartoon showing Olga, the fair Russian maiden, seated between two suitors, Citrine and Hillman, with a portrait of Green, a frosty-faced old maid, frowning down from the wall.

Exports: Britain's Triple-A Priority

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

BRITISH business men don't like war-time economic controls any more than their American confrères do, but they are resigned to their continuance for a long time not only after VE Day but after VJ Day. Chafe as they may against price ceilings, material and labor priorities, control of investment issues, import and export restrictions, foreign-exchange licensing, and other limitations on freedom of action, most of them realize that such controls must be relaxed gradually if chaos is to be avoided. That does not mean there will be no pressure to remove restrictions; almost certainly it will be applied by consumers who, having suffered years of "austerity" with exemplary patience, will naturally hail the advent of peace as an opportunity for a buying orgy.

But that is just why it will be impossible to restore a free market quickly, leaving the forces of supply and demand to regulate production and prices. Suppose all controls were to be removed at one blow, what would happen? The one thing which is plentiful in Britain is money. Despite very high taxes, retained income per capita has increased by nearly 50 per cent. But with necessities rationed and all other goods extremely scarce if available at all, people have not been able to spend their incomes. As a footnote in the White Paper on Employment Policy, published last June, puts it, "The present clothing ration provides roughly one-half of the pre-war consumption of clothing. . . . Only about one household in ten can now buy a pair of sheets and one household in five a pair of blankets each year. Only one person in seven can now buy each year a knife, fork, or spoon, one person in three a kettle, saucepan, or frying pan, one person in four a teapot or jug. The manufacture of carpets, vacuum cleaners, refrigerators, and other household appliances is virtually prohibited."

The other side of the medal is the growth of private savings, which in the first five years of the war amounted to $33,200,000,000—equal to the British national income at its present swollen level. Of this, $12,800,000,000 represented small savings in defense bonds, savings accounts, and so on. In addition, though not to the same extent as in this country, currency has been hoarded in teapots and under mattresses. Thus with the end of the war a keen desire for goods will be combined with unprecedented purchasing power. Only the goods will be absent, or in extremely short supply. In such a situation the abolition of rationing and price ceilings could have only one result—competitive bidding for goods, which would create an inflationary situation in short order.

Moreover, many of the things most missed by British consumers during the war—fruit, dairy products, wine, textiles, toys, household gadgets—are imported, or manufactured largely from imported materials. If import restrictions and foreign-exchange licenses were abandoned, traders and manufacturers would buy heavily abroad, creating a tremendous demand for foreign currencies. At the same time, with a booming home market business men would take little interest in promoting exports; so that the inflow of foreign exchange, already far below British needs, would be reduced to a trickle. The inevitable consequence would be the rapid exhaustion of British reserves of gold and foreign currencies, followed by sharp external depreciation of sterling.

One of the few things about which most American business men agree with the Administration, even though they differ about ways to achieve it, is that the earliest possible stabilization of foreign-exchange rates is a prime interest of the United States. So long as there is no certainty about what the pound or the franc or the guilder will be worth in terms of dollars, there can be no orderly development of foreign trade. Serious depreciation of sterling after the war would be most injurious to American exporters, especially since, in falling, sterling would drag many other currencies with it. But it is the British exchange and import controls which have made it possible to maintain an official rate of $4.02 throughout the war. It is therefore to America's interest that these pegs should not be removed before Britain has had time to restore its balance of payments, which, as I explained in my last article,* the war has knocked completely out of kilter.

It is to be feared that many American exporters, finding their trade with Britain, or British colonies, restricted after the war by import quotas or even by flat embargoes on certain types of goods, will overlook these facts. When I was in London last fall I discussed this matter with an official of the American Chamber of Commerce there who was rather gloomy about the possibility of misunderstandings in America over British economic policies. He agreed that import and other controls would have to be maintained for a considerable period after the war but said that he had no doubt many American business men would consider such measures discriminatory. He thought that firms whose products were likely to obtain low priorities would probably attempt to maintain their good-will in Britain by setting up factories there. But this step will not free them from control trouble: since Britain, for some time, will experience shortages of both materials and labor, it will have to proceed on the principle of first things first. Thus the manufacturer of, say, radio combinations may have to wait for a building permit until more urgently needed houses have been constructed.

* Britain's Economic Dunkirk, in the issue of February 12.

In the January issue of Foreign Affairs W. Manning Dacey, editor of the Banker (London), pointed out that after economic demobilization and reconversion Britain and America will face diametrically opposite problems. The chief difficulty in the United States will be to reverse the trends which have made possible the high level of war-time savings. It will be necessary to discourage thrift as a mass virtue, to stimulate spending, to foster higher living standards. Unless this is done, production will be choked, and deflation and large-scale unemployment will follow. Britain, on the other hand, will have to damp down the demand for consumer goods and encourage savings in order to provide for reconstruction at home and a great expansion of exports.

This is a task that will call for very delicate handling by the British government. The average Briton will understand that housing must have a number-one priority and that the rebuilding of schools and hospitals is more urgent than the restoration of country clubs. But a recent Gallup poll indicated a wide lack of understanding of the fact that since Britain must import to live, it must export or die. Consequently, the limitation of meat imports in order to conserve foreign exchange, or the assignment of textiles to foreign markets while clothes rationing continues at home, is likely to cause discontent, and calls for a greater amount of popular education than the government has yet attempted.

Psychologically and politically, it would, in fact, be impossible to attempt to hold consumption to war-time standards, even though by so doing internal reconstruction and the recovery of export trade might be speeded. Some relief from enforced frugality there must be, and in the interest of morale fairly high priorities may be given to goods which are not strictly necessities. It may be considered important, for instance, to give early satisfaction to the British craving for oranges and bananas; or to release exchange to permit the bare legs of British women to be clothed in nylons as soon as America has a surplus for export. In this connection it is noteworthy that, despite the need for conserving dollars, the British government has permitted increasing imports of American films during the war, the value in 1943 being more than twice that in 1939.

But while some consideration may be shown to morale builders, preference will be given to imports of essential foods, raw materials, and machinery for increasing the efficiency of British industry. Moreover, such materials and machinery will be allocated first of all to manufacturers who undertake to sell all or a considerable part of their output abroad. For exports must rank high in the order of priorities if Britain is to recover its external purchasing power and its ability to buy freely throughout the world.

This is how Planning, a periodical issued by the British organization PEP, sums up the situation:

Just as production for war is a patriotic duty now, so production for export will be a patriotic duty after the war. Workers for their part must realize that when they help make a motor car, or a suit of clothes, or a pair of silk stockings for export, they are, in effect, producing the bread, butter, and tea which they will have for breakfast next morning. . . . Just as it will be a crying scandal if luxury hotels are built while any family lacks a decent house, or if Mayfair rides to the theater in new Rolls-Royces while Wigan walks to work because there is a shortage of bicycles, so it will be more insidious and no less scandalous if new satin evening dresses are sold to decorate English debutantes when they might have been exported in exchange for raw cotton from the U. S. A., meat from the Argentine, grain from Canada, or oil from Venezuela.

In my last article I pointed out that in order to pay for imports on the pre-war scale, which means in order to maintain its pre-war standard of living, Britain would have to increase exports by more than 50 per cent of the average for 1936-38. However, recovery of the export trade has to start from a much lower base than the pre-war figure since, owing to the concentration of man-power and materials on munitions, overseas sales have been cut back with increasing severity. In 1943, the last year for which figures are available, British exports, excluding most "mutual-aid" shipments, were only 50 per cent of the 1938 value and only 30 per cent of the 1938 volume. American cash exports, excluding lend-lease, have remained much closer to their pre-war level. That comparison has been the cause of a good deal of resentment among British business men. They feel that their American competitors have not only had a better chance to hold their own markets but an opportunity to win former British customers. This belief is not without foundation. During the war American exporters have had things pretty much their own way in Latin America, always a heavy buyer of British goods, and have established firm footholds in a number of African and Asiatic countries where British traders once predominated. The New York Times of December 15, 1944, quotes R. C. Thompson, export manager of the Electric Auto-Lite Company and member of an official mission to the Middle East, as saying that in that region "American exporters have gained almost immeasurably in a competitive position with Great Britain."

In the period immediately after the war Britain, however, will probably be able to regain ground. With the whole world starved for goods and with many important markets, such as Argentina, Brazil, India, and Egypt, well supplied with foreign exchange, there will be trade opportunities for both America and Britain, and selling will not be a serious problem. For Britain the problem will be rather one of production, of raising output sufficiently to take care of urgent home demand while leaving a surplus for shipment overseas. As we have seen, the expansion of exports is so vital a national interest that the government will have to take action to divert industrialists from the easy pickings of the domestic market to the more strenuous business of catering for the foreigner. The British government is taking steps, just as the State Department is, to improve its commercial-intelligence service; it is also extending its pre-war export-credit insurance scheme. But such measures are ancillary to an official undertaking to provide the export industries with a high priority for "raw materials, labor, and factory space freed from war purposes." In addition, such industries will almost certainly be given a preferred position so long as new capital issues are subject to "rationing."

It is unlikely that the export industries in this country will be accorded similar privileges. The need being less urgent, the necessary control over production and consumption would be far more strongly resisted. The tendency of American business in the immediate post-war period will be to concentrate on filling the pent-up demands of the home market before turning their salesmen farther afield. This may give the British some opportunity to catch up.

I have outlined here the kind of program British economists and government officials believe will be necessary to see their country through the economic strains of the post-war transitional period, which it would be optimistic to put at much less than five years. It is the kind of program that the average Briton will find it hard to take after his strenuous and sparse living of the war years. He will find jobs plentiful, but his standards of consumption, while showing some improvement, will remain comparatively low. Taxes are likely to stay high to discourage spending, and the drive for savings will continue. A good deal of grumbling is inevitable; it may be mollified if there is a slow but steady improvement in conditions. On the other hand, if management of the controls is unskilful, a rising tide of discontent may undercut the government's purpose.

Such an outcome would have grave consequences not only for Britain but for the world. Britain occupies a key position in international economy owing to the enormous market it offers for the goods of other countries. But if that market is to be fully restored, Britain must reestablish its balance of payments at a level which will enable it to finance whatever volume of imports is required to maintain and gradually raise its standard of living. The achievement of that aim depends a good deal on the self-discipline of its people—a quality they have shown in high degree during the war. But it also depends on the policies of other countries, and particularly those of the United States.

If the forces of economic internationalism and cooperation triumph in this country during the transitional period, Britain is likely to persevere with its efforts to restore its economic position to the point where a return to its traditions of multilateral trade can be safely undertaken. If, on the other hand, America, showing lack of understanding of its problems and impatience with the restrictions it must temporarily adopt, reverts to economic isolation, then Britain may heed the siren voices which are hymning the advantages of the unorthodox trade routes pioneered before the war by Dr. Schacht.

In a further article I propose to review the long-term outlook for British trade and to discuss the sharp controversy on international economic policy which is being waged in London.

[The second of a series of three articles.]

The Battle of the Rhone

BY ANDREE VIOLLIS

A LONG the road that leads from Montélimar to Lorient in the Rhône Valley, I looked on the terrible and death-scarred scene of a battle. History will remember this Battle of the Rhône as the first great victory of Americans over Germans in the south of France.

Straight, wide and smooth, flanked on one side by the railroad and on the other by the great river, the road stretches out toward Valence. The battle started on August 28. A few days before, the people around Avignon could observe moving north, like a green and yellow caterpillar, an unending chain of German vehicles of all kinds: troop trucks, tanks, armored cars, self-propelled guns and machine-guns, motorcycles, and occasionally one of those small, swift staff-officer cars, elegant and shining—all camouflaged, or rather dressed up, with leafy branches, like Birnam Wood moving on Dunsinane. Interspersed among the steel helmets were the bare heads, the caps, and the stiff-brimmed hats of the Vichy militia, some with their wives and children, some carrying suitcases, all fleeing from inexorable justice.

Three German divisions were on the march, the Second Panzer Division forming the vanguard and doing the scouting. Many of the soldiers looked worn out and discouraged, but some were vigorous with youth and the sunshine. They laughed and sang and joked. Weren't they going north, going home? They would see their families again, the families they had left almost five years ago. If a car stopped for some reason, the officers strutted about, chests pushed out as usual, well-fed and arrogant, with the traditional rolls of pink flesh showing above their collars, their lips moist and greedy.

This was not flight. Of course not; it was simply "an orderly retreat," a "shortening of the front," necessary because the Americans had landed on the coast. They were still far away, around Grasse, Draguignan, Gap. They would need wings to catch up with the Germans. As for the maquis, those "damned terrorists" had never been easy to handle, but now they were on the other side of the river and would hardly dare to attack such an important convoy.

Then, quick as lightning, formidable, unexpected, catastrophe struck the caterpillar chain. The terrible fate of those three German divisions was soon written in deadly characters for twenty kilometers along the road.

The American troops had landed in one operation from Cavalaire to St. Tropez, between Cap Nègre and the Golfe de Fréjus. Parachutists had been dropped behind the Montagnes des Maures toward Le Luc and Le Muy. Soon the whole Maures massif was encircled by Allied troops with their spearhead pointing toward l'Esterel. The beachheads and the terrain through which the troops deployed had been chosen by the French Forces of the Interior, who had shown good judgment. From then on everything went along quickly.

On August 17 the Americans entered Drolguignan, which had been liberated by the F. F. I. on the sixteenth. Avoiding frontal attack, they by-passed the two big ports of Toulon and Marseille and advanced toward Brignoles and Manosque. They occupied Castellane on the seventeenth and Digne on the nineteenth. At Digne General Butler took command of a column consisting of panzers, tank destroyers, excellent artillery, and a few gliders, and captured Sisteron, Gap, and Corps on the Route Napoléon. Resistance was weak and from two to four thousand prisoners were taken in each town; only Corps was fiercely defended.

Two columns then marched on Grenoble, which was taken on the twenty-second. Another swung toward Die, Crest, Saillans, along the Drôme River, and established itself in the hills above the road from Montélimar to Lorient. About two hundred tanks, cannon of all calibers, and machine-guns were massed there.

All this had been so carefully planned and was accomplished in such secrecy that the Germans had no idea what was happening around them. Ahead of them the Drôme joined the Rhône. The Americans, together with the F. F. I., dynamited the bridge, blocked the road with a few armored cars flanked by a small contingent of men, and waited. They waited for two long days and nights, anxious lest their guess had been wrong.

Then suddenly through the trees they saw the mighty German column advancing, preceded by tanks and accompanied by five armored trains mounting 260- and 380-millimeter guns. The men at the road block started a skirmish. Then, on a given signal, American tanks, mobile artillery, and machine-guns poured their deadly fire into the convoy. Taken by surprise as they were, the Germans fought back fanatically all the afternoon. During the night they pushed forward with such desperate energy that the Second Panzer Division, though it suffered enormous losses, managed to break out of the trap.

As I stand here on a hill above the Rhône I can see the wreckage of the battle spread over the country below me. A vast graveyard of vehicles extends for twenty kilometers along the road. Many cars, even some of the biggest, have been thrown into the fields and lie there wheels in the air. Others, smashed till they are nothing more than junk heaps, clog the ditches. Some have their metallic guts hanging out; others reach steel arms toward heaven. Wood and iron are burned out or blackened, but some of the camouflage branches are still strangely green and alive, mocking the destruction.

And the men? Fresh earth covering long trenches marks the place where they were laid, misplaced and anonymous. For five or six thousand of them the retreat ended in death. Six thousand were taken prisoner.

Negro troops whose task it is to dispose of the corpses still move about the graveyard of cars. They have not yet finished their work. A stifling odor of burning and decay envelops the whole countryside.

The Battle of the Rhône will be remembered by the Germans as the beginning of the end.

China to Lin Yutang

BY EDGAR SNOW

THIS is a day of regret for me, because I have to offend a writer whom I have admired and respected, and who has been a friend of mine, for many years. But what else can you do about a book written with such unexpected smallness of faith in a man's people, so full of mischief, and so lacking in dignity and pride?

For "The Vigil of a Nation" by Lin Yutang (John Day, $2.75) libels some of our best allies among the Chinese people, allies who happen to be led by Chinese Communists—who happen to have renounced, years ago now, any intention of establishing communism in China in the near future, and have an administration which is, according to most people who have seen it, more nearly democratic than any China has yet known. Simply because of Lin's anti-red tirade, his book will be exploited by ignorant and reactionary groups here which ordinarily take no interest in China's welfare. And because the people whom he attacks are permitted no representative in this country who can refute him, it is obligatory that the few Americans who know the facts should seriously hold him to account.

In the present volume the author leaves his role of compiler of ancient wisdom and wit to enter a new métier, that of polemicist and party propagandist. True, in one place he does call this a travel book, and when he isn't bewailing Chinese peasants and workers—the 80,000,000 led by the Communists—as "Bundists," there is some "booster"-like praise for Chinese food and the cultural greatness of Ch'in and T'ang. But the main purpose of his book is to extol the virtues of the Kuomintang, or National Party, under Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, as the sinned-against in China, while denouncing the Kungchintang, or Communist Party, as the sinner.

There is nothing wrong with giving the case for the Kuomintang; both sides should be heard. Even after hearing them the outsider has little chance of knowing the whole truth because all war is full of falsehood, with the percentage rising sharply when you get into civil war. Still, you get the shape of a thing better the more angles of its contradictions you see. The trouble here is that Lin's contradictions merely contradict, in the manner of the spoiled child whose best retort to a point of critical logic is to shout, "You're ten times all those things yourself."

Although Lin sets himself up as an authority on the Chinese Communists, he nowhere gives evidence of having talked to any Communist outside Kuomintang concentration camps. He never visited any part of guerrilla China. He ridicules correspondents who at least took the trouble to see what they write about, and he asserts that to find the "evils of totalitarianism" in China "one must go to Yenan"; yet he himself never went there. Lin doesn't even define his political geography very well, and a paragraph of simple home truth is necessary to help the reader locate himself in the scenes described by this self-yclept "cultured vagabond."

The dominating political truth about China is that it is partly a colonial, in the main a semi-colonial, country. The richest and most advanced areas are in Japanese hands—except where guerrillas oppose them. But the country will soon be liberated largely as a result of the destruction, by American arms, of Japanese naval and air power, the main forces of the Japanese army, and Japan's home bases. The question will then arise: what kind of government will prevail in an independent China, after eight years—and in the case of Manchuria fifteen years—of colonial administration?

In the still uninvaded provinces of China the Kuomintang selects and appoints all officials. Chiang Kai-shek is the "leader" of that party. He is also the party-elected chief of state. Nobody in China except a minority of the 2,000,000 members of the Kuomintang Party ever cast a vote to keep Chiang Kai-shek in power. In this picture neither the Communist Party nor any other political party has any de jure existence. It is still a fact that the Kuomintang government has never officially rescinded its anti-Communist laws, which make membership in the Communist Party an offense punishable by death. Under such a regime no political opposition can exist, except with the support of armed forces. When Lin Yutang demands the disbandment of the Communist-led forces before the one-party dictatorship is abolished, he is substantially demanding the disbandment of the party.

All this Lin knows quite well, though nowhere does he explain it. Against this background, and relying largely on his own "guesses," hearsay, and material drawn from a book written by "Chen Chung," whom Lin himself apparently does not know, he draws up this indictment of the guerrillas in North China: the Chinese Communists began the war (Lin quotes Sun Fo) with about 40,000 to 50,000 troops; their rule is feared by the peasants because of its "regimentation and terror"; their leaders are undemocratic; the people hate them because, among other things, women have equal status with men; they have rarely fought the Japanese, but have taken fifty towns from the Chinese for every one from the enemy; they commit numberless atrocities against innocent people; they destroy Chinese culture and have no reverence for Chinese history; they have driven Kuomintang troops out of most of the north; and the Kuomintang cannot make peace with them because they won't give up their arms.

Lin admits that all Communist expansion has taken place behind the Japanese lines. He admits that the Eighth Route and New Fourth (Communist) armies have been blockaded by Kuomintang troops since 1940, that they have received no aid from the government, that they have had no help from either Russia or America. Nevertheless, despite these handicaps, somehow those 40,000 "terrorists" have destroyed, according to Lin, most of the Kuomintang troops in the north—originally supposed to number some half a million. They have occupied an area commanding the support of about 80,000,000 people, organized millions of Chinese youths, and increased their own forces to about half a million. Lin fears that they may soon control half of China, especially if America should give them arms, food, medicines, and financial help, instead of unqualifiedly supporting the Generalissimo. What a potent "40,000"!

Lin asserts that the Communists constitute China's "only problem of national unity." Wang Ching-wei, deputy chief—second only to the Generalissimo—of the Kuomintang, became Japan's puppet leader at Nanking, together with a host of other Kuomintang adherents, but there were no Communists there. From Kuomintang armies Japan recruited the bulk of its puppet troops. Among the Kuomintang generals who joined the puppets was Pan Pin-hsien, once field commander of Chiang Kai-shek's anti-Communist campaigns. But such minor deviations are no threat to "national unity" in Lin's view.

At the beginning of his book Lin promises to "try to be fair" about Chinese politics and to "give a good balanced judgment." Everywhere he goes, however, he stays with Kuomintang officials, while nowhere does he give evidence that he lived with workers or peasants for even a few days. Toward the end, he says ingenuously, "I am all for the government [the Kuomintang]. The government has launched an anti-Communist program as a basic part of its state policy for the last seventeen years." This includes the entire period of the anti-Japanese war.

Lin's whole trouble is that, after seventeen years of this anti-Communist vigil, half of which he has spent in comfortable America, he never ventured into the zone of conflict to see how it was with his people. During the present trip, he states, he heard a machine-gun fired "for the first time in his life." He heard it then, ironically enough, not at the front, but when he was a guest of General Hu Tsung-nan, at the "model concentration camp" for Communists at Sian. There Lin, who elsewhere "does not think it [the Kuomintang] has ideas of rule of terror and force," was "happy and relieved" to find that his fellow-Chinese were being treated with "no unnecessary cruelty or inhumanity." He can't understand why Americans say this is a "fascist" feature of Kuomintang rule.

Lin gives us a long synthetic account of Chinese atrocities, which he blames entirely on Communists. Nearly all his material is a rehash of old Kuomintang propaganda, but Lin insists that it is "news" and asserts that in the past the Kuomintang tried to "hush up" stories of internecine strife.

tagnes des Maures toward Le Luc and Le Muy. Soon the whole Maures massif was encircled by Allied troops with their spearhead pointing toward l'Estrel. The beachheads and the terrain through which the troops deployed had been chosen by the French Forces of the Interior, who had shown good judgment. From then on everything went along quickly.

On August 17 the Americans entered Drolguignan, which had been liberated by the F. F. I. on the sixteenth. Avoiding frontal attack, they by-passed the two big ports of Toulon and Marseille and advanced toward Brignoles and Manosque. They occupied Castellane on the seventeenth and Digne on the nineteenth. At Digne General Butler took command of a column consisting of panzers, tank destroyers, excellent artillery, and a few gliders, and captured Sisteron, Gap, and Corps on the Route Napoléon. Resistance was weak and from two to four thousand prisoners were taken in each town; only Corps was fiercely defended.

Two columns then marched on Grenoble, which was taken on the twenty-second. Another swung toward Die, Crest, Saillans, along the Drôme River, and established itself in the hills above the road from Montélimar to Lorient. About two hundred tanks, cannon of all calibers, and machine-guns were massed there.

All this had been so carefully planned and was accomplished in such secrecy that the Germans had no idea what was happening around them. Ahead of them the Drôme joined the Rhône. The Americans, together with the F. F. I., dynamited the bridge, blocked the road with a few armored cars flanked by a small contingent of men, and waited. They waited for two long days and nights, anxious lest their guess had been wrong.

Then suddenly through the trees they saw the mighty German column advancing, preceded by tanks and accompanied by five armored trains mounting 260- and 380-millimeter guns. The men at the road block started a skirmish. Then, on a given signal, American tanks, mobile artillery, and machine-guns poured their deadly fire into the convoy. Taken by surprise as they were, the Germans fought back fanatically all the afternoon. During the night they pushed forward with such desperate energy that the Second Panzer Division, though it suffered enormous losses, managed to break out of the trap.

As I stand here on a hill above the Rhône I can see the wreckage of the battle spread over the country below me. A vast graveyard of vehicles extends for twenty kilometers along the road. Many cars, even some of the biggest, have been thrown into the fields and lie there wheels in the air. Others, smashed till they are nothing more than junk heaps, clog the ditches. Some have their metallic guts hanging out; others reach steel arms toward heaven. Wood and iron are burned out or blackened, but some of the camouflage branches are still strangely green and alive, mocking the destruction.

And the men? Fresh earth covering long trenches marks the place where they were laid, misplaced and anonymous. For five or six thousand of them the retreat ended in death. Six thousand were taken prisoner.

Negro troops whose task it is to dispose of the corpses still move about the graveyard of cars. They have not yet finished their work. A stifling odor of burning and decay envelops the whole countryside.

The Battle of the Rhône will be remembered by the Germans as the beginning of the end.

China to Lin Yutang

BY EDGAR SNOW

THIS is a day of regret for me, because I have to offend a writer whom I have admired and respected, and who has been a friend of mine, for many years. But what else can you do about a book written with such unexpected smallness of faith in a man's people, so full of mischief, and so lacking in dignity and pride?

For "The Vigil of a Nation" by Lin Yutang (John Day, $2.75) libels some of our best allies among the Chinese people, allies who happen to be led by Chinese Communists—who happen to have renounced, years ago now, any intention of establishing communism in China in the near future, and have an administration which is, according to most people who have seen it, more nearly democratic than any China has yet known. Simply because of Lin's anti-red tirade, his book will be exploited by ignorant and reactionary groups here which ordinarily take no interest in China's welfare. And because the people whom he attacks are permitted no representative in this country who can refute him, it is obligatory that the few Americans who know the facts should seriously hold him to account.

In the present volume the author leaves his role of compiler of ancient wisdom and wit to enter a new métier, that of polemicist and party propagandist. True, in one place he does call this a travel book, and when he isn't bewailing Chinese peasants and workers—the 80,000,000 led by the Communists—as "Bundists," there is some "booster"-like praise for Chinese food and the cultural greatness of Ch'in and T'ang. But the main purpose of his book is to extol the virtues of the Kuomintang, or National Party, under Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek, as the sinned-against in China, while denouncing the Kungchintang, or Communist Party, as the sinner.

There is nothing wrong with giving the case for the Kuomintang; both sides should be heard. Even after hearing them the outsider has little chance of knowing the whole truth because all war is full of falsehood, with the percentage rising sharply when you get into civil war. Still, you get the shape of a thing better the more angles of its contradictions you see. The trouble here is that Lin's contradictions merely contradict, in the manner of the spoiled child whose best retort to a point of critical logic is to shout, "You're ten times all those things yourself."

Although Lin sets himself up as an authority on the Chinese Communists, he nowhere gives evidence of having talked to any Communist outside Kuomintang concentration camps. He never visited any part of guerrilla China. He ridicules correspondents who at least took the trouble to see what they write about, and he asserts that to find the "evils of totalitarianism" in China "one must go to Yenan"; yet he himself never went there. Lin doesn't even define his political geography very well, and a paragraph of simple home truth is necessary to help the reader locate himself in the scenes described by this self-ycept "cultured vagabond."

The dominating political truth about China is that it is partly a colonial, in the main a semi-colonial, country. The richest and most advanced areas are in Japanese hands—except where guerrillas oppose them. But the country will soon be liberated largely as a result of the destruction, by American arms, of Japanese naval and air power, the main forces of the Japanese army, and Japan's home bases. The question will then arise: what kind of government will prevail in an independent China, after eight years—and in the case of Manchuria fifteen years—of colonial administration?

In the still uninvaded provinces of China the Kuomintang selects and appoints all officials. Chiang Kai-shek is the "leader" of that party. He is also the party-elected chief of state. Nobody in China except a minority of the 2,000,000 members of the Kuomintang Party ever cast a vote to keep Chiang Kai-shek in power. In this picture neither the Communist Party nor any other political party has any de jure existence. It is still a fact that the Kuomintang government has never officially rescinded its anti-Communist laws, which make membership in the Communist Party an offense punishable by death. Under such a regime no political opposition can exist, except with the support of armed forces. When Lin Yutang demands the disbandment of the Communist-led forces before the one-party dictatorship is abolished, he is substantially demanding the disbandment of the party.

All this Lin knows quite well, though nowhere does he explain it. Against this background, and relying largely on his own "guesses," hearsay, and material drawn from a book written by "Chen Chung," whom Lin himself apparently does not know, he draws up this indictment of the guerrillas in North China: the Chinese Communists began the war (Lin quotes Sun Fo) with about 40,000 to 50,000 troops; their rule is feared by the peasants because of its "regimentation and terror"; their leaders are undemocratic; the people hate them because, among other things, women have equal status with men; they have rarely fought the Japanese, but have taken fifty towns from the Chinese for every one from the enemy; they commit numberless atrocities against innocent people; they destroy Chinese culture and have no reverence for Chinese history; they have driven Kuomintang troops out of most of the north; and the Kuomintang cannot make peace with them because they won't give up their arms.

Lin admits that all Communist expansion has taken place behind the Japanese lines. He admits that the Eighth Route and New Fourth (Communist) armies have been blockaded by Kuomintang troops since 1940, that they have received no aid from the government, that they have had no help from either Russia or America. Nevertheless, despite these handicaps, somehow those 40,000 "terrorists" have destroyed, according to Lin, most of the Kuomintang troops in the north—originally supposed to number some half a million. They have occupied an area commanding the support of about 80,000,000 people, organized millions of Chinese youths, and increased their own forces to about half a million. Lin fears that they may soon control half of China, especially if America should give them arms, food, medicines, and financial help, instead of unqualifiedly supporting the Generalissimo. What a potent "40,000"!

Lin asserts that the Communists constitute China's "only problem of national unity." Wang Ching-wei, deputy chief—second only to the Generalissimo—of the Kuomintang, became Japan's puppet leader at Nanking, together with a host of other Kuomintang adherents, but there were no Communists there. From Kuomintang armies Japan recruited the bulk of its puppet troops. Among the Kuomintang generals who joined the puppets was Pan Pin-hsien, once field commander of Chiang Kai-shek's anti-Communist campaigns. But such minor deviations are no threat to "national unity" in Lin's view.

At the beginning of his book Lin promises to "try to be fair" about Chinese politics and to "give a good balanced judgment." Everywhere he goes, however, he stays with Kuomintang officials, while nowhere does he give evidence that he lived with workers or peasants for even a few days. Toward the end, he says ingenuously, "I am all for the government [the Kuomintang]. The government has launched an anti-Communist program as a basic part of its state policy for the last seventeen years." This includes the entire period of the anti-Japanese war.

Lin's whole trouble is that, after seventeen years of this anti-Communist vigil, half of which he has spent in comfortable America, he never ventured into the scene of conflict to see how it was with his people. During the present trip, he states, he heard a machine-gun fired "for the first time in his life." He heard it then, ironically enough, not at the front, but when he was a guest of General Hu Tsung-nan, at the "model concentration camp" for Communists at Sian. There Lin, who elsewhere "does not think it [the Kuomintang] has ideas of rule of terror and force," was "happy and relieved" to find that his fellow-Chinese were being treated with "no unnecessary cruelty or inhumanity." He can't understand why Americans say this is a "fascist" feature of Kuomintang rule.

Lin gives us a long synthetic account of Chinese atrocities, which he blames entirely on Communists. Nearly all his material is a rehash of old Kuomintang propaganda, but Lin insists that it is "news" and asserts that in the past the Kuomintang tried to "hush up" stories of internecine strife.

Evidently a lot of things are "news" to Lin that are axiomatic to the Chinese. He was astonished to hear General Ho Ying-chin called "pro-Japanese" recently, but if he had been in China he could have heard 10,000 students denouncing him as such, as early as 1936, on the streets of Peiping. He would know that as early as 1938 the Kuomintang began sponsoring accounts attacking the Yen-an government as a "traitor party" and "alien party." Since then quite a number of pamphlets and books like Chen Chung's have been published, under party subsidy. As early as 1939 General Chang Chun, head of the War Areas Party and Political Affairs Commission, told me that Chungking had decided to "eradicate" by force all anti-Japanese organizations led by the Eighth Route Army in the guerrilla areas. All such activity was, he said, "illegal."

In that year also the Yen-an government listed various cases in which, it was alleged, Kuomintang forces had attacked the Eighth Route Army. Yen-an requested Chiang Kai-shek to send a military commission to investigate. Instead, the Kuomintang issued a long account of crimes allegedly committed by the Communists. I had no way of determining the truth about most of these conflicts. Having a long familiarity with civil-war propaganda technique I refrained from writing about them, as did other correspondents—not, as Dr. Lin supposes, because both sides did not furnish abundant material, but because of utter lack of means of verification or documentation.

Dr. Lin's ignorance of conditions of battle in China will probably go unnoticed by many of the elderly ladies whose hair will stand on end when they read his book. Take one or two examples. As evidence of Communist treachery, he reports that when Kuomintang troops behind the Japanese lines "passed through certain areas in secrecy, the Communists staged loud cheering processions of welcome to advertise their whereabouts to the enemy."

Compare a story he seems to think proves that Communists refuse to fight the Japs. He quotes an anonymous informant as stating that, in order to "force" an engagement on them, a Kuomintang Party director lured some Japanese troops to a base occupied by the Communists, who, as a result, "suffered severe casualties." This story has a ring of truth about it—though elsewhere Lin insists that it is only the Communists who stoop to such betrayals. Oddly, he seems unaware of the implications of this account, which he describes as "an amusing" story. Yet he complains that leftists in China have no sense of humor.

Lin deplors the ill-fed, ill-treated Kuomintang soldiers he saw in the rear—and the conscription system which enables the gentry to buy their sons from service while peasants are led off with ropes tied round their necks. Yet he thinks things must be better "at the front," where, he has heard, the soldiers "have the best of everything," and can "even grow their own vegetables."

Another example: Lin repeatedly states that government troops never invaded Eighth Route Army territory. Yet in a moment of inadvertence, when trying to prove that the Communist forces don't fight Japan, he reveals that a Kuomintang division was ordered to seize Wutaishan, a base which the Eighth Route Army has held ever since 1937, and which it was originally ordered to defend by the Generalissimo himself. He complains bitterly because the Kuomintang division was defeated in that quixotic venture.

One more sampling of the war observations of a "cultured vagabond." He tells us that the reason the Kuomintang troops in the north were always defeated was because, "not being ready for open war," they were always "taken by surprise." What, then, were they doing behind enemy lines if they were "not ready for open war"? Whence came their supposed sense of security from Japanese attack?

Lin denounces the guerrilla leaders for issuing their own currency, but thinks it is all right that their troops were never paid after 1940. Once he naively suggests that if Mao Tse-tung and Chu Teh, the Communist leaders, had gone to Harvard—as Lin did—instead of living with Chinese peasants and workers all their lives, they would doubtless be no more interested in revolution than he is. He disapproves of Yen-an's policy of "price control," but defends the black market under the Kuomintang. He thinks inflation, based on speculation and profiteering in land and commodity goods, must be handled through the "individualistic and not through the collectivist [state control] approach."

He disapproves of the Communists for collecting data on how many pigs and chickens, and presumably how many royalties, each family has. While admitting that price control "works" in the Communist areas, he says, "The Chinese would resent it." Here as elsewhere he gives evidence of thinking that anybody within the pale of the Communists promptly ceases to be Chinese. Thus, deploring the regime under which millions of Chinese now live in the guerrilla territory, freed from the Japanese, he "hopes that the people of China" will be spared this fate (my italics).

Of course, there is more to the book than politics. There is quite a lot about Confucius and the glory that was. It is astonishing, but apparently Lin recently visited the ruins of Ch'ang An, and the cradle of Chinese civilization, for the first time in his life; and he can't get over it.

Where Lin isn't denouncing the wicked Reds his whole book in China without the redeeming touch of the breath and blood of the nation's goodly youth and awakening peasantry with their sacrifices for a dream of the future; without any sense of what it means to be hungry and hunted and yet not ready to abandon your principles for a rice bowl, to have pus-filled sores on your bare feet, yet keep marching and smiling; to lose legs and arms for want of medicine, to shiver through bitter winters for lack of a padded silk gown, like Lin's, to believe in something for all men more than Confucius believed in all things for the family first.

But I am genuinely unhappy about Lin Yutang. It is a major tragedy for a Chinese writer, gifted as few men are to interpret his country to the English-speaking world, to have thus cut himself off from contact with some of the most vital and regenerative blood of his nation. One is bound to wonder about the reasons why he has suddenly taken this leap.

I do not attach much importance to the fact that Lin now holds a Chinese official passport, and thus is accountable to the Kuomintang. In his book he denies that he is actually paid by the party and that he has ever been compensated by its officials; and who would doubt his word? In fact, Lin voices some criticism of the Kuomintang. He favors a Bill of Rights in China. He also advocates some democracy. He emphatically favors freedom of the press. He has, moreover, spoken personally to the Generalissimo about these shortcomings. He even admits that the Reds have a few good points, such as that they are "organizing the people for self-government, that they have workers' unions, peasant unions, women's unions, and have reduced the interest on loans." In contrast to that he thinks there must be "no freedom of speech, no freedom of belief" under the Chinese Communists.

To have the right to "organize for self-government," to form labor unions and peasant unions, to give women equal status with men, may not seem important for someone who doesn't have to make a living working on the yellow soil of China, or in a sweatshop, but it is certain that without such means of expression no label of "democracy" on a government would mean anything for the vast majority of Chinese people. Dr. Lin, in his status, may not think such rights are in themselves an end worth fighting for, but if so he mistakenly identifies himself with a nation of men and women who do.

"Nowhere in Kuomintang China," reports Lin, "have I yet seen or heard the common people of China played up as all-important individuals. . . . Yet until the people of China are made to feel that the 'little people' are the important people, China will fail to qualify for the title of democracy." There is also no doubt whatever that in guerrilla China Lin, had he looked there, could have found a society preaching just that doctrine—and to a large extent practicing it.

It happens that there is available fresh testimony about Communist-controlled territory in the latest book by Owen Lattimore, formerly adviser to Chiang Kai-shek. Basing his summary on the reports of many independent observers, Lattimore lists these reasons for Communist success: (1) they have survived and expanded, "not because they subdue people by armed force, but because the people support them"; (2) "basic economic conditions are better in Communist-controlled China than in Kuomintang-controlled China"; (3) conscription and taxation are more equally distributed in Communist-controlled territory; (4) few of the many progressive, educated middle-class Chinese who voluntarily entered Communist territory have fled from it; and (5) "it is a fact that governing committees and representative committees are elected, and that the Communists limit themselves to one-third of the representation."

But, curiously, Lin made his choice without giving this big section of his own people a hearing. We may hope that it does not mark a permanent decision in his life as a writer and philosopher. He is, I believe, too honest and too wise, and fundamentally too decent a human being, to defend this indictment of his own people—once he realizes that such is the position in which he has placed himself. His own native skepticism will eventually compel him to reexamine the faulty case he has made out. Meanwhile, it is better to consider his book a temporary aberration induced by a difficulty common to many people who have lived too far from the terms of conflict, the difficulty of reconciling themselves to the social changes quickened by this war.

In the Wind

BETWEEN ATTACKS on the Administration, Representative Rankin of Mississippi adorns the pages of the Congressional Record with rhinestones like this (page A252, Appendix, January 23): "Glorious women of the South. Fashioned in Paradise, wreathed in graces and virtues that blossomed like flowers plucked from the green fields of Eden, led down to earth by angels along a pathway of stars, to be the joy, the blessing, the inspiration of noble men."

ADVERTISEMENT IN THE CHARLOTTE, North Carolina, Observer of February 3: "Stalin is on his way to Berlin. We are not going to Berlin. But! We are giving you McCorkle's Laundry and Cleaning Service."

FROM THE PARIS, TEXAS, NEWS of January 23: "Mount Pleasant, Texas.—A white man was placed under arrest here Wednesday by Sheriff Redfearn, who filed vagrancy charges against him. The man is purported to have called a meeting of Negroes for Wednesday night for the purpose of forming some sort of social-equality organization for Titus County, with membership fees to be charged. Although the organization is a legal one, recognized by both the federal and state governments, the arrest was made on the grounds that agitation for social equality would cause trouble here."

OUR HAT IS OFF to H. B. Fox, editor of the Madisonville, Texas, Meteor and Times, for his hard-hitting editorial in defense of Henry Wallace in the issue of February 1. First he quotes a number of editorials from big-city papers to the effect that Wallace has had no business experience. Then he points out that Wallace built up a three-million-dollar seed-corn business. And finally he says, "Although personal wealth is no gauge of any sort, is no prerequisite for criticism in any field, we'd really like to see a financial statement of all the editors of all the big dailies mentioned above. In fact, we'll bet a subscription to the Meteor against four subscriptions to all the papers mentioned above—practically an even bet—that Mr. Wallace handled ten times as much money last year as any of the editors, which wouldn't prove anything at all except the minor point of course that when it comes to the topic of Mr. Wallace the editors are either liars or ignoramuses."

FESTUNG EUROPA: A rule at the Grini concentration camp in Norway requires prisoners to "greet" all Germans, whether in uniform or in civilian clothes, in the following manner: at a distance of six paces the prisoner removes his cap; he marches past the German with head erect and eyes forward; three paces beyond the German he replaces his cap. . . . An editorial in the Oslo newspaper Nationen laments, "We who have accepted the Nazi policies expect to be shot sooner or later."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.]

The Nazis' Next Twelve Years

BY HORST MENDERSHAUSEN

FOR Nazi Germany World War II has come to an end. It ended with von Rundstedt's unsuccessful attack in the Ardennes. His failure to break through to Antwerp marked the inability of the German army to regain the strategic initiative. The great break-through of the Russians in Poland and their sweep through Silesia and East Prussia revealed the extent of Germany's military inferiority to Allied power. The struggle for Berlin and north-central Germany now raging will take several weeks and so will the struggle for the lower Rhine and the Ruhr, but any protracted defense of northern Germany has become a military impossibility. A junction of the Russian and Anglo-American assault armies somewhere west of Berlin cannot be prevented for long, although it can be made a bloody task.

What then? For Germany to lose the industrial areas of Silesia and the Ruhr means inability to continue the war on the present scale. Its war machine will be deprived of its chief heavy-industry bases, especially of coal supplies. Germany will not be able to maintain panzer forces and air fleets adequate for mobile warfare in open country. The coming conquest of Berlin, Magdeburg, Hanover, and Leipzig will tear vital manufacturing centers out of the German system. These prospects raise hopes that the days of Nazi power are numbered, that military and political collapse will soon make German fascism a thing of the past, or at least a negligible quantity. Let us see to what extent such hopes are justified, and whether we have made sufficient allowance for wishful thinking.

Most of us believe that the military defeat of the German armies will lead (1) to surrender, (2) to Allied occupation of the Reich and disarmament of the Germans, (3) to the breakdown of the political power of the Nazis. Actually not one of these results can be expected with any certainty.

Will defeat lead to surrender? German soldiers, officers, and generals, individually or in groups, will give up and be taken prisoner. Some will even fight the S. S. for the right to surrender. The groups may be companies or even divisions. But will there be a surrender of Germany's armed forces as a whole? Such a surrender can be made only by the political leaders of Germany, that is, the Nazi leaders or somebody who steps into their place. The high command of the German army cannot effectively surrender unless it has gained political supremacy over Hitler, Himmler, and their aides. Generals can desert, they can keep their troops inactive, arrange for their capture, but they cannot make the whole army surrender unless they can arrest the Nazi leaders before they are arrested by them. It is probable that many German generals wish to surrender. The inevitability of complete military defeat in the current operations must be obvious to them. But their ability to force this decision on the political leaders or to deprive the Nazis of the political leadership is open to serious doubt.

There is no evidence that the Nazi leaders have ever thought or think now of throwing in the sponge and bowing to the victors. Last June they weathered an attempt on the part of army men to capture or kill Hitler and to dethrone the party. Hitler and Himmler asserted their power over the army leaders by removing, arresting, and killing "traitors." The purge has gone on right through the great Russian offensive. It will continue. The penetration of party men into the high command is accelerating. Non-party generals hold their commands on sufferance.

If the Nazi leaders cannot be talked into surrender, and if they cannot be removed by a coup d'état, surrender can be brought about only by the marshaling of a popular revolutionary force. Apparently the generals do not wish to rely on such a force. Even if they did, they would by now have a hard time finding it. The Nazis still hold political control to an unheard-of degree. They do not want to surrender, and they will not.

Will military defeat lead to the occupation and disarmament of Germany? Certainly the conquering armies will occupy the territory they are wresting from the enemy. But in the absence of general surrender, they will not occupy all of Germany at one stroke, to say nothing of Austria, Bohemia, and northern Italy. Instead, there will be fronts till the last large city is taken, and there will be a Nazi maquis even after that.

We have become painfully aware of the probability of a German maquis. The Nazis are organizing it with all their thoroughness. They have studied as well as fought the French maquis, the Russian and Balkan partisans. In the last issue of The Nation Alfred Kantorowicz asserted that instead of carrying on resistance through an armed underground the Nazis would feign collaboration with the Allies until the withdrawal of the occupation forces—that is, follow the strategy of Mihailovich rather than of Tito. I believe they will attempt both, according to time and circumstance. Some of their clandestine units will merely meet and train in cellars and woods, commit Fehme murders, and keep out of sight. Others will openly defend a suitable area against Allied or German forces. Still others will attack trains, supply centers, villages, and towns, kill anti-Nazis, take hostages, and perhaps occupy new territory. Only under stable political conditions can they be expected to lie low for long or to disintegrate. To assume otherwise is to credit them with less daring, stamina, and determination than the Yugoslav partisans and the French resistance forces.

While we tend to underestimate the political danger of the Nazi underground, we are right in not granting it much military importance. After all, the Germans held their centers and communication lines in France and the Balkans with minor occupation forces. We should not, however, underrate the strength of German military resistance after the fall of Berlin and the Ruhr. Where will the stand be made? It is apparent from recent Nazi moves that the nucleus of open resistance will be in southern Germany. Berchtesgaden, to which ministries and records are being removed, is the symbolic center. But Hitler's mountain fastness has other advantages. There are industrial bases in Thuringia, Austria, Bohemia, and Bavaria—chemical and metallurgical industries, iron mines, and oil supplies. All of them together cannot replace the Ruhr, Silesia, the Berlin area, and north-central Germany. They cannot support prolonged defense against such assaults as the Russians and we are capable of. But together with sizable stores of arms and supplies, they can feed a war of slow retreat, of stubborn defense interrupted by withdrawals. The fronts will be in the mountains of central Germany receding to the Main, in the Black Forest, in the Sudeten mountains and the hill country of Bohemia, perhaps in the Bohemian forest after the Russians have forced their way to Pilsen; later in the Austrian Alps. Under attack the fronts will recede and converge, the territory held by the Nazis will contract. But unless each front is attacked by large forces it will exist for many months. Our experience in Italy indicates how long the Germany may hold out in territory favorable to defense if no overwhelming force is thrown against them.

Will the Allies be ready to employ overwhelming forces to drive the Nazis out of their mountain strongholds? Or will they consider such operations of small importance, to be carried through at the rate of the war in Italy? After Berlin and the first-class industrial areas of the north are conquered, will they settle down to a war of attrition? The answers to these questions will determine the duration of the German war. They depend in turn upon political developments in Germany.

Will military defeat bring the political breakdown of the Nazis? It is as true today as it was in 1939 that Nazism cannot be destroyed until its military forces are completely defeated. Yet its political débâcle is not insured by military defeat. If it were, we should by now see the political effect of Stalingrad, the loss of the Ukraine, the defeats in France, Poland, and eastern Germany. The German people do not hope to win this war, to drive the Russians back to the Curzon line and the Western Allies into the sea. Nazi propaganda does not veil the dismal prospect. But the despair of the people, while a prerequisite to the overthrow of the Nazi regime, will not bring it about unless the people have the vision of an alternative way of living. Such a vision is lacking.

The Nazi leaders find widespread belief when they say that surrender in this war means the end of the German nation, the physical destruction of the German people, the razing of their industries, enslavement, "Siberia." They have been assisted in their propaganda by our inability to devise anything as attractive as Wilson's Fourteen Points. Worse, the German anti-Hitler forces have not been able to give the people a vision of a post-Hitler Germany that can live or to provide an organization that can create it.

The situation differs radically from 1918. There are as yet no new political guiding principles, agreeable to the victors, that would enable the Germans to put their house in order and to rally for meaningful tasks and a productive role in the world. There is nothing that promises survival to a most highly organized and industrialized people. Western notions of economic and social organization appear to Germans hypocritical and unworkable—at best a fair dream of days gone by. The ideal of liberal capitalism seems anachronistic in an age of corporate empires, cartels, and planned economies; professions of political democracy and international law are questioned for their meaning and sincerity. The ambivalent concepts of conservative nations pragmatically groping for readjustment and gradual social change make little appeal to a people that has been caught in a revolutionary storm since 1933.

Soviet ideas seem more workable, especially to labor and the intelligentsia, but there is little hope that Germany could apply them to its own benefit. Giving in to Russian ideology means Russian rule. The Free Germany Committee is the most effective propaganda instrument used by the Allies; and there is the German Communist Party. But it is doubtful whether these agents can do more than drive wedges into the German people. There is no immediate prospect of their gathering a substantial number of political activists, uniting the German people in revolt and doing at least as effective an ideological job as the Social Democrats did in 1918. They still have to point the way convincingly toward a free, unexploited Germany; they must prove they are not Russian stooges.

Undeniably the political power of the Nazis has survived the shattering military defeats they have experienced. It is evident in the stubborn defense on some fighting fronts, in sabotage and espionage in conquered territory, in intimidation of sincere German collaborators and Fehme murders, in the maintenance of order despite terrific bombing and streams of refugees.

Nazi post-war policy. Is this a senseless, suicidal struggle? It may turn out to be, but for the present it is a highly deliberate, cold-blooded policy. It is not merely the last fight of a gang of criminals cornered by the police. The military and political policy of the Nazis has entered the post-war stage. It is directed toward victory in a new phase of the international civil war.

The pattern of the Nazis' post-war policy can be seen in their actions, their propaganda, and their philosophy. They firmly believe that the victorious United Nations cannot pacify and organize Germany—or Europe. The Allies, they think, will threaten and appease; they will be unable to cope with the German political reality; they will fall out among themselves over differences in objectives and methods. German anti-Nazis will be weak, not only because of the holocaust they went through, but because of their confusion and the inability of the Allied powers to agree upon groups to be favored. The Nazis expect the Allied authorities to waste their German collaborators, to discredit them by demanding that they suppress spontaneous political activity, especially among the workers in the western districts, or by forcing them to carry out punitive tasks, mobilize a labor army for Russia, make work in Germany even less attractive than work in Russia. With the country in a state of political chaos, increased by the barriers between the occupation zones, the Nazis count on an equally chaotic state of production and transportation.

National Socialism will remain the only symbol of national unity, social equity, and organizational efficiency.

In this hell the Allies will work at cross-purposes and in mutual suspicion. They will grow occupation sick; civil war will break out within and between their zones of occupation. The Nazis will operate in such a setting as underground organizers, as "experts" and "collaborators," as saboteurs and Felme judges. They will exploit discords among the Allies and present themselves as the only force capable of making order, perhaps as true anti-Bolsheviks in one place and true pro-Russians in another. Outside Germany they will attempt to build centers of organization and finance to feed the civil war in Germany and to exploit political conflicts, national and international, all over the world. They will appear as journalists, traders, research workers, and brothel keepers. And they will receive support from native fascists.

These Nazi calculations are far too realistic to be laughed out of court. Thanks to their greater experience in such matters the Russians are likely to combat the Nazi underground more effectively than the British or Americans. But a confused and deadly struggle may develop within the Free Germany Committee and similar bodies between Nazi converts and Nazi stooges. Any German force of national and socialist integrity will be in constant danger of being denounced, torn apart, or crushed by the Russians, the Nazis, the Western Allies, or all of them.

The current war and propaganda strategy of the Nazis fits these expectations. One thing they want to avoid at all cost is surrender under the direction of the Nazi Party. That would destroy their claims to political leadership more effectively than anything else they could do. Hitler propaganda hammers home: there must be no repetition of 1918; surrender means the death of the nation. His military strategy is that of continuing war, war that ends never and nowhere. Obviously, such warfare is meaningless, futile, according to the standards of limited, sportsmanlike war. But it has an economy all its own, from the saving of arms to the mass forging of identities of Nazi functionaries, from scorched-earth policy to suicidal, spectacular military action. It includes the building of a war chest abroad, now proceeding via exports of valuables to Switzerland, Spain, and Argentina.

This new warfare presents the Allied nations with a tremendous task. They cannot enjoy the fruits of victory unless they can defeat the political challenge of fascism. The military defeat of the German armies without surrender and political breakdown will prove that this war can be won only if we fight it as a purge of humanity from fascism. Otherwise it will be a permanent war.

Far-reaching conclusions are to be drawn from these facts. We must pursue the war relentlessly till we obtain the complete destruction of the Nazis' armed forces. To foil the Nazi post-war strategy we must lift it off its political hinges. The main source of the Nazi threat is Nazism's political hold on the people. There must be an effective German counterforce with reasonable freedom of action and with a national and social outlook that fits the experiences and ambitions of the German people. Such a force may begin to gather in the final stages of the fighting or the early stages of occupation.

The earlier it appears and the more it contributes to the fall of this town or the smashing of that S. S. unit the better its political chances. Only Germans will be able to carry through the colossal job of sorting out the sheep from the wolves in sheeps' clothing, of encouraging the former and punishing the latter, of making converts, of establishing an order that is not Nazi order.

We need Allied statesmanship which will permit the formation of such a force in the framework of general, realistic cooperation among the Allied powers. Some of the recent AMG policies are very unwise and should be changed. For one thing, the AMG cannot go on suppressing the political activity of workers, as announced in its message to German civilians of December 15, 1944, without feeding fresh energies into the Nazi organization. It cannot afford to drive the anti-Nazis underground. It cannot afford to tolerate Nazis in office even where military expediency does not compel its officers to give in to popular demands for their removal.

And since the new war of the Nazis is an international civil war, we must not forget what is going on in neutral countries and right here at home. Our diplomats and the FBI should be watchful and aggressive. They have to crush the heads of the hydra. To starve its body, we must steer free from economic depression and social crisis that would foster foreign aggression and encourage alliances with the master-racers. The Nazis are teaching us the scope of this war in time and space. To defeat them we must learn the lesson.

Secret Diplomacy

A SECRET CLAUSE in the Italian armistice agreement which reserves certain rights to the House of Savoy caused the Socialist Party to withdraw voluntarily from the Bonomi government, according to a sensational accusation made by a representative of the Italian Socialist Party, Signor Buffoni, at an international Socialist conference in France. During the first phase of liberation the House of Savoy tactfully avoided making use of this clause. But now that it feels more secure, it insists on its strict application. This was shown during the last Cabinet crisis, when the Lord Lieutenant of the Realm, Prince Umberto, insisted on his full sovereign rights.

Open Diplomacy

SEVERAL LATIN AMERICAN COUNTRIES are determined to discuss Fascist activities in the Western Hemisphere thoroughly and openly at the coming meeting of Foreign Ministers in Mexico City. They have therefore suggested that a special committee be appointed to deal with this vital subject. Latin Americans feel that the mere exclusion of Argentina from the conference does not settle the highly complex problem of Nazi and Falangist infiltration. They wish to eradicate fascism from Argentina; but they also wish to stamp it out in every country where it has taken root. If the projected Committee on Fascist Activities materializes, the debates of the conference will not lack sensational revelations.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

BY CHANCE I got hold of a copy of "The Unquiet Grave," a book published in a limited edition by Horizon, the English literary monthly. It is identified as A Word Cycle by Palinurus, but I think that any reader of Horizon would recognize in its pages the style and temperament of the editor, Cyril Connolly. "The Unquiet Grave," to quote the jacket, "describes a year's journey through the mind of a writer who is haunted by the turbulent Mediterranean figure of Palinurus, the drowned pilot, whose uneasy ghost demands to be placated." It might also be described as the journal of a modern man who midway in the path of life found himself in a dark wood and sought to write his way out.

The book consists of three extended series of notations—statement, confession, reminiscence and evocation, regret, resolution, and epigram, including many quotations from the masters of Connolly's particular and personal choice. There is, finally, a rueful Epilogue in which the author studies "the Psychiatrist's confidential report" on Palinurus.

It is extraordinarily good reading, this "self-dismantling" of an intelligent, pleasure-loving, volatile, dismayed, but irrepressible spirit tossing in the unquiet grave of the modern world, for it speaks to all the moods, high and low, expansive and trivial, of other tossers. There are not many patently "cheerful thoughts" in Mr. Connolly's calendar, yet the end effect of this witty, penetrating, and often lyrical record of his attitudes toward art, love, nature, and religion is that of purgation, which can be very exhilarating. Even misery, in good company, can yield a bitter sweet of gaiety.

Connolly's selected masterpieces, which infuse the air he lives by, are, as he says, mostly high peaks of the secondary range—masterpieces which "contain the maximum of emotion compatible with a classical sense of form," such as the Odes and Epistles of Horace, the Eclogues and Georgics of Vergil, the Testament of Villon, the Essays of Montaigne, the Fables of La Fontaine, the Maxims of La Rochefoucauld and La Bruyère, the "Fleurs du Mal" and Intimate Journals of Baudelaire, the poems of Pope and Leopardi, the Illuminations of Rimbaud, and Byron's "Don Juan." He does not include Pascal in his list, though he frequently invokes him. "We can deduce," he writes, "that the compiler of this list should set himself to write after these models. Even though none of the conditions for producing a masterpiece be present, he can at least attempt to work at the same level of intention. . . ."

He has made a good try, and in his pensées he has spared himself least of all. By rights he should now be on the plain of Purgatorio ready to ascend the mount.

MR. CONNOLLY SUFFERS, among other things, from the ordeal of being a civilian in war time. Not to be involved, or to be only indirectly involved, in the prevailing condition of man, whatever one's opinion of that condition, is painful and frustrating. (That is at least one reason why the civilian has such a conscience about the G. I. Conversely, when the condition shifts to peace, his feeling of responsibility becomes much less acute if it doesn't disappear altogether.)

To have been in London since 1939 is not exactly to have been a noncombatant. Or a combatant either; there's the rub. In Horizon some months ago, Civilian, who sounds very much like Connolly, wrote a bitterly humorous letter to "Dear Victor" in the service, in which he gave vent to civilian "beefs":

. . . you raced through to Benghazi and back, while we pushed our way through broken glass and craters in the blackout and lay awake through those nights of the blitz in our huge dentist's waiting-room.

Of course all this time you had to fight. Don't think I am unaware of all this fighting; it is just that which churns the guilt round and round till it curdles into a kind of rancorous despair. You are always fighting for me, . . . Oh, why can't I fight for myself?

I know one is not supposed to say so, but I don't like flying bombs; . . . they are the final appointment in the dentist's chair, and, casualties apart, they have made London more dirty, more unsociable, more plague-stricken than ever. The civilians who remain grow more and more hunted and disagreeable. . . .

. . . shroud your future movements on French soil in military secrecy. You may liberate Europe, but you can't liberate me.

The advantage, forgetting for a moment the terrible disadvantages, of the person who is actively involved was carried home to me with great force when, a couple of weeks ago, I met three of the eight French journalists who are visiting this country. I hadn't met anyone from the French underground before. The three individuals—Mme Viollis, M. Lombard, and M. Jean-Paul Sartre—could hardly be more different from one another; what they had in common, and what set them apart from everyone else in the room, French or American, was a concentration of personality, so to speak, of feeling, intellect, and attention, which was clearly the result of their experience. Perhaps because they are French, they were quite free of the unpleasant fanaticism of the dedicated. They were humorous and gracious. But they also had the temper and edge of Toledo blades. One felt that every shred of complacency, deadness, dilettantism, whether of politics or art or life, had been burned away. At this moment Europe may be said to be composed of such tempered men and women, whatever their walk of life. But the finest steel gets dull quickly. Let's hope that in spite of the blunting, self-interested maneuvers of the State Department, the British Foreign Office, and the Kremlin the people of Europe will force through the necessary social changes before they relapse into a post-war state of weariness and slackened will.

I asked M. Sartre about Jean Bruller, also known as Vercors and Desvignes. He was indignant when I told him that "Silence of the Sea" had been suspected here of having a collaborationist tinge. That charge, he said sternly, was disproved by the very fact that the book was published by Les Editions de Minuit, an underground press. He went on to say that the author had deliberately chosen to portray the "correct" Nazi in that book in order to make it crystal clear that the Frenchman would not and could not make peace even with the best of the "master race."

M. Lombard, who has a lean, ruddy Western American look, might easily be taken for the editor of the only liberal newspaper in Montana—which is in itself something of an underground activity, since there's seldom more than one extant and it's always on the point of being put out of business by the powers that be.

THE CITY OF KOENIGSBERG is much in the news these days. It is often cited as the birthplace of Prussianism and the capital of the Junkers. Joseph Bornstein has sent me a few paragraphs about Königsberg's other claim to fame, which should not be forgotten.

Few people seem to remember that Königsberg was also the birthplace of the philosopher Immanuel Kant and once the capital of very progressive ideas.

In Königsberg just 150 years ago Kant published a small book entitled "Zum Ewigen Frieden" or "Perpetual Peace." In it the author of the "Critique of Pure Reason" suggested that the nations should form "a special sort of alliance, what might be called a League of Peace." Although some critics, among them the famous Herder, objected that Kant's ideas were not very original, were indeed old stuff, "Perpetual Peace" became a best-seller in 1795. The first edition was sold out within a few weeks, and French, Danish, and English translations were published shortly afterward. Since that time no one has studied the problem of international security without discovering that the essential points had been considered as far back as 1793, in Königsberg.

"A true policy," wrote Kant, "will not take a step without first paying its homage to morality. United to morals, politics is no longer a difficult and complicated art; morality cuts the knot that policy is unable to untie. . . . We cannot divide ourselves between right and expediency. Policy must bow the knee before morality."

Prussianism and the power of the Junkers are perishing in disgrace; these other ideas from Königsberg are still alive—at least in the aspect of a dream that repeats itself again and again. Kant himself was no dreamer. The fate of the world in the one hundred and fiftieth year after the publication of "Perpetual Peace" would hardly surprise him. In one of his essays Kant pointed out that mankind might not be able to learn from experience, that relations between nations might therefore remain as they have always been, and that, in the end, the natural inclinations of the human race might "prepare for us a hell of evils in the midst of a state of highest civilization, destroying this state and all cultural progress by barbaric devastations."

But whether or not perpetual peace is possible, the philosopher of Königsberg maintained, the "moral-practical reason" requires that man should labor constantly toward this end. "It is," he wrote, "our duty."

A REFUGEE SEEKING CITIZENSHIP was asked to define the meaning of American liberty. He hesitated, as even a citizen might, and then replied, "Free enterprise." I'm not surprised. Every public performance these days—right, left, and center—seems to open and close with that magic phrase, "free enterprise."

Concerning the Devil

THE DEVIL'S SHARE. By Denis de Rougemont. Pantheon Books. $2.50.

THIS profound study of the reality and complexity of evil in human history was first published in French and is now presented in the English translation. Its thesis is an elaboration of the words of Baudelaire: "It is the devil's cleverest wile to convince us that he does not exist." In expounding this dictum De Rougemont is able not only to track down the general human trait of self-righteousness but to refute the tendency of modern culture to attribute evil in human life merely to ignorance, sickness, social maladjustment, or what not. De Rougemont believes that man has the capacity, because he has the freedom, to corrupt every virtue and to make any achievement the occasion for a new evil. The devil, he declares on scriptural authority, is legion. One way of obscuring the evil in us is to attribute it to natural necessity, when in fact it arises in the rational freedom of man. Another way is to find it embodied in a particular form in the enemy and therefore assume that it cannot be in us. Thus Hitler has contributed to illusions about evil in history because the depth of evil which he incarnated tempted us to believe that evil was inhuman.

"Hitler," declares De Rougemont, "was not outside humanity but within it. He was in us before he was against us. It is in ourselves that he rose up against us. And once he is dead he will occupy us without striking a blow if we do not admit that he is a part of us, the devil's part in our hearts." One need only consider the ubiquity of evils which arise from the impulse of domination and the various forms of racial and national pride which corrupt the democratic world to recognize the validity of this analysis.

De Rougemont does not, however, make the mistake of assuming that evil is equally embodied in all nations, classes, or individuals or that recognition of the internal and general character of potential evil makes it unnecessary to fight against the more flagrant forms of actualized evil. "If I resemble the criminal," he declares, "this does not justify the criminal but condemns me. . . . I will not let yonder criminal remain at large in order to give myself over to inner reforms." His doctrine is in short no quietistic escape from political and social tasks.

Many observers have called attention to the incipient forms of Nazism which are revealed in the democratic or civilized world in the impulse of imperialism and the pride of race, class, and nation. De Rougemont carries this analysis one step farther and proves that these social and political evils have their root in impulses of which no individual is wholly free.

Some modern readers will fail to profit by the author's profound analysis of the general sources of evil in human history and of the multifarious forms which it may take, because they will be affronted by the poetic and mythical symbols which he uses. But if they follow his logic they may find that these poetic symbols are practically essential tools of his analysis. If evil is thought of merely as cultural lag or natural inertia, these symbols are not necessary. But if we recognize historical evil as a corruption of human freedom, and not merely as some natural sloth which retards freedom, it will become apparent that the "devil" is a meaningful symbol. The devil is a fallen angel, a corruption of something good; and the corruption is caused by an excess rather than a defect of some particular vitality of life.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

BRIEFER COMMENT

American Social History

JOHN ALLEN KROUT and the late Dixon Ryan Fox, in "The Completion of Independence, 1790-1830" (Macmillan, $4), have written skilfully and entertainingly of the social history of the first forty years of the Republic. This volume completes the History of American Life series (twelve volumes, $30) the first four volumes of which appeared eighteen years ago. Under the editorial guidance of Drs. Schlesinger and Fox, and of Carl Becker, who served as consulting editor, this series has become an important landmark in American historiography. The twelve volumes, written by competent historical scholars, nearly all of whom have added to their previous reputation by their contribution to this series, are especially notable for the first satisfactory synthesis of social history, the intelligent use and discussion of illustrations, and the completeness of their bibliographies.

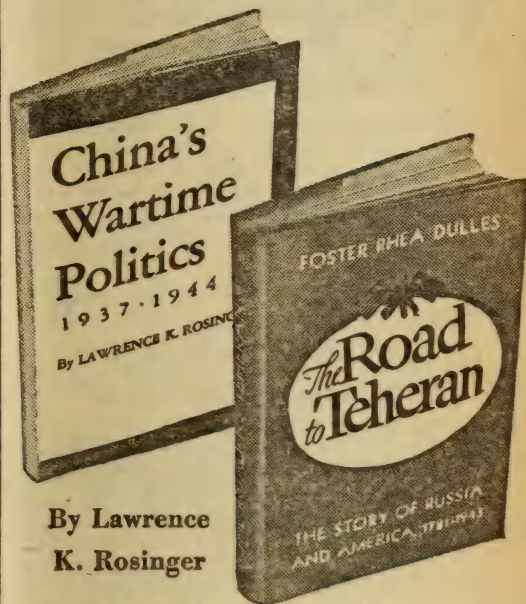

"The Completion of Independence" is one of the better volumes in this series. In 1790 we had established political independence and achieved a new form of government which has stood the test of time. The intellectual leaders of the era realized that that was not enough. They also had to establish cultural and economic independence. Dr. Benjamin Rush commented that the Revolution was not over; Noah Webster urged his countrymen to "unshackle your minds, and act like independent beings. . . . You have now an interest of your own to augment and defend. . . ." Largely ignoring conventional political history, this volume offers the best account we have of the manner in which Americans began the completion of their independence. Farmers and storekeepers, doctors and clergymen, factory hands and sea captains, frontiersmen and authors—these are the people whose way of living fills these pages. Andrew Jackson receives less attention than Jedidiah Morse; Jefferson's views on education get more space than the War of 1812. This book is marked by skilful synthesis, careful scholarship, and a style which varies from competent to brilliant. As with the entire series, this is an important contribution both to the better writing and teaching of American history and to its intelligent enjoyment by the layman.

RALPH ADAMS BROWN

Economic Fundamentalism

PROFESSOR EDWIN W. KEMMERER has delivered yet another sermon denouncing original monetary sin—deliberate currency depreciation—and calling on the nations to repent and return to the simple economic virtues of the Victorian era. In "Gold and the Gold Standard" (McGraw-Hill, $2.50) he reviews the use of gold as money through the ages, noting sorrowfully the perennial disposition of governments to tamper with the coinage. As early as the fourth

For Americans who want the facts on Russia and China

By Lawrence
K. Rosinger

By Foster
Rhea Dulles

● In the midst of the charges and counter-charges that are making Chinese politics more and more confusing to outsiders, this book presents an honest picture of wartime China. An unbiased, fully documented explanation of the most bitterly contested constitutional questions and of the relations between Chiang Kai-shek and the Communists.

NEW REPUBLIC: "The clearest and most concise description of China's major political problems to appear in this country. Fascinating reading."—Agnes Smedley

CHICAGO SUN: "Provides the necessary factual background for clear thinking about the Chinese situation. Well organized, objective, and fully documented."

FOREIGN AFFAIRS: "This book is a welcome relief. Presents in small compass a picture of the balance and tension of political forces in China."

Published under the auspices of the International Secretariat, Institute of Pacific Relations. $2.00

CHICAGO SUN: "Fills a tremendous need. . . . It is in a complete sense the story behind the story of present Russian-American relations. Should be read by everyone interested in the post-war world."

JOSEPH E. BAVIE: (former Ambassador to Russia): "A splendid piece of work. . . . objective, scholarly, fair, and of particular value at this time."—in Soviet Russia Today.

PEARL LUCK: "A valuable book, presented without bias or whimsy."—in Asia.

AMERASIA: "An illuminating study, the first of its kind."

N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE BOOK REVIEW: "Merits the verdict of unreservedly recommended." $2.50

At all bookstores, or

PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS, Princeton, N. J.

Oxford Books

FOR THINKING AMERICANS

ENGLAND IN THE EIGHTEEN-EIGHTIES

TOWARD A SOCIAL BASIS FOR FREEDOM

by Helen Merrell Lynd

"A penetrating and profound study not only of English social history but of the principles of social change in capitalist democracy. It is rare that a book on history reaches so deep and comes up with so much that sheds light on our own plight."

—Max Lerner.

$4.50

GERMANY BETWEEN TWO WARS

A STUDY OF PROPAGANDA & WAR GUILT

by Lindley Fraser

England's German News Commentator in the European Services of the BBC here conducts a brilliant examination of the German version of the inter-war years, a legend by which the Nazi party sought to influence opinion both at home and abroad.

$2.50

CLAIMS TO TERRITORY

IN INTERNATIONAL LAW AND RELATIONS

by Norman Hill

A study of the major territorial controversies of the 19th and 20th centuries, with suggestions for handling claims growing out of the Second World War.

$3.00

MILITARY OCCUPATION AND THE RULE OF LAW

OCCUPATION GOVERNMENT IN THE RHINELAND, 1918-1923

by Ernst Fraenkel

A discussion of the basic problems of the last Rhineland occupation which offers a key to the situation confronting the Allied Military Government in Germany today.

$3.50

century B. C. he finds "a case of monetary debasement suggestive of our American debasement of 1933 to 1934."

Unfortunately, like most preachers, Professor Kemmerer has been content to castigate depravity as depravity and has not troubled to inquire why depreciation, like fornication, has been practiced throughout history as consistently as it has been deplored. Is the reason, perhaps, a fundamental antagonism between a monetary system based on a sporadic supply of precious metals and the monetary needs of a gradually expanding economy? Is there a connection between the historical tendency to depreciate and the desire to escape from the tyranny of compound interest?

For Professor Kemmerer the real Golden Age was the period from 1821 to 1914, during which Britain maintained the full gold standard and the leading countries of the world one by one followed its example. Certainly, this was a period of rapid economic progress; it was also an era of successive discoveries of new gold fields. Without the resultant constant addition to the metallic base of the currency, it seems more than probable either that progress would have been severely checked or that the gold standard would have been overthrown. In the seventies and eighties there was both a slackening in world gold production and a serious deflation of prices. The United States, a new adherent to the gold standard, very nearly abandoned it under pressure from producers of primary commodities. Probably it was only the discovery of the Rand that saved the day and kept Bryan out of the White House.

If Professor Kemmerer wants to restore and maintain the gold standard, he must arrange for a steadily increasing supply of the metal. Providence hasn't been very helpful in this respect, but perhaps the scientists with their atomic alchemies will provide a solution. Unfortunately, however, that might well cause gold to become so common that it would cease to symbolize virtue.

KEITH HUTCHISON

The Great Crusade

JUST AS FRANCES WILLARD was being edged out of her job as dean of the Woman's College of Northwestern University by male members of the faculty who thought her too "uppity," a band of determined women marched down the main street of Hillsboro, Ohio, headed for John's Saloon. In the group were the wives and daughters of the best families of Hillsboro. The time was December, 1873, and the ladies were about to pray, not drink, John out of business.

This was the beginning of the "crusade" which spread so quickly across the prairies that The Nation of March 19, 1874, reported that in the eleven internal-revenue districts of Ohio and Indiana the movement had caused a falling off in receipts for January and February of that year of more than $350,000.

Dean Willard did not take part in the original crusade; but like the war horses in the Bible she could smell a battle from afar, and when the temperance sentiment stirred up by the crusade was organized into the Women's National Christian Temperance Union at a Cleveland convention in November, 1874, Miss Willard joined up. Five years later she was elected president of what was to become under her militant leadership easily the most powerful national and international organization of women the world had yet seen.

The story of her career is set forth in "Frances Willard, from Prayers to Politics" by Mary Earhart (University of Chicago Press, $3.75), and it makes fascinating reading. Under her slogan of "Gospel politics" she took the temperance movement into the dusty arena of third-party politics, worked for a while with the Prohibition Party, went along with the Knights of Labor in their semi-mystical program of temperance, cooperation, trade-union organization, and agitation for the eight-hour day, mesmerized some pretty tough labor leaders into bewildered support of her campaign for sex purity, and always and always worked for suffrage. At one time or another this eloquent, often witty, undeniably charming woman went in for Christian and Fabian socialism, transcendentalism, theosophy, phrenology, and vegetarianism, in addition to her chief interests—temperance, suffrage, and equal rights.

Miss Earhart, a member of the faculty of political science at Northwestern, has done a man-sized (oops, sorry, a woman-sized) job in bringing together these diverse pigments for a sympathetic portrait of an awe-inspiring personality.

MC ALISTER COLEMAN

Latin America—Long-Range View

SHORTLY AFTER THE RECOGNITION of the Soviet Union by the United States a Russian economist, then famous, was discussing the future of this country with a group of American liberals. The Russian had little faith in the ability of the United States to avoid a not very distant catastrophe. Pressed as to whether there was any solution, he thought for a moment and replied, "There is, but you won't take it—the industrialization of Latin America."

"Latin America in the Future World," by George Soule, David Efron, and Norman T. Ness (Farrar and Rinehart, $3.50), recalls that occasion. This is a solid, cooperative effort toward the definition and possible solution of the economic problems of Latin America. It is a thoroughly competent piece of work, as authoritative for the Southern Hemisphere as a whole as Felix Weil's recent book was for the Argentine. It is, perhaps, hardly an entertaining book, though its unencumbered precision and square-standing judgments quite remove it from the category of academic exercise. It contains three parts, of which the first is a documented analysis of the basic problem. Colonial economy and the large-scale ownership of land, inherited from imperial days, have led to appalling poverty and backwardness. Part II studies the effect of the war on this situation, and the final and briefest section contains a review of recommended policies, not exclusively as they concern the United States. Nevertheless, it is clearly understood that the desired industrialization must be brought about in cooperation with North American financial institutions under public control. There is no serious attempt to estimate whether the Soviet economist's negative prophecy will be borne out. Nor does the book estimate the immediacy of the returns upon the policies it suggests. Its utility is perhaps of two sorts: it is a rich storehouse of facts about Latin American society, and it gives a mature, long-range historical view of the problem of hemisphere relations.

RALPH BATES

MOTION PICTURE

G. C. F. presents

MR. EMMANUEL

A Two Cities Films production made in London
Released through United Artists

starring FELIX AYLMER
with GRETA GYNT and WALTER RILLA
Brandt's GOTHAM B'way and 47th St.

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD PRODUCTIONS

"BELONGS ON THE MUST LIST."—Roscoe, World-Telegram.

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Ave. & 59th St. Mat. Thurs. (Wash. Bkdy.) & Sat.

DORBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORE
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Matinee Thurs. (Wash. Bkdy.) and Sat.

+ NOW, more than ever, Red Cross blood plasma is needed to save the lives of thousands of wounded soldiers and sailors, fighting on half-a-dozen fronts around the world. Plasma can send a man back to the fighting lines to continue the battle . . . can send him back, eventually, to his loved ones. And every American can back up his men in the service quickly, easily, effectively, GIVE A PINT OF BLOOD TO SAVE A LIFE. Call your Red Cross Blood Donor Center today, and make an appointment.

An Encyclopedia of the News for BUSY PEOPLE

FACTS • ON • FILE

World News Digest
and Index

Would you like to have every major subject and news event at your finger-tips — condensed, sorted, filed and indexed for ready reference? FACTS ON FILE does it for you by means of a weekly 8-page digest and cumulative index that covers world news in capsule form, stripped of verbiage, opinion and comment.

Complete News Coverage

Available also as bound yearbooks, FACTS ON FILE saves you hours of research time, improves your fund of knowledge, gives you all the news of the world—including:

- WORLD WAR II
- NATIONAL and FOREIGN AFFAIRS
- LATIN AMERICA
- FINANCE
- EDUCATION
- BUSINESS
- SCIENCE
- RELIGION
- SPORTS
- THE ARTS
- OBITUARIES

In handy reference form. Authoritative, concise, easy to read.

Saves You Time

With FACTS ON FILE you can discard your clippings, notes and stacks of magazines. Endorsed by prominent leaders in all walks of life as invaluable for quickly locating facts, checking dates, figures, speeches and names. Busy executives, speakers, governments, schools, libraries, business firms, subscribe to FACTS ON FILE as the ONLY publication of its kind in America. Each weekly Digest comes to you with a Cumulative Index that keeps FACTS ON FILE up-to-date automatically. Annual volumes available for each year since 1941.

Special Offer!

TRY FACTS ON FILE for 5 weeks for only $1.00 (value $2.50). Regular subscribers at $25.00 a year receive a handsome loose-leaf DE LUXE BUCKRAM BINDER FREE OF CHARGE (Size 9 1/4 x 11 1/4 in.). Holds a year's supply of Digests and Indexes. Handsome 550-page bound Yearbooks for 1941-42-43-44, containing complete news summaries and Cumulative Indexes for each year, available at $20 per volume. Send the coupon below with only $1.00 for special 5-weeks' trial, which includes complete Annual Index for 1944 FREE OF CHARGE.

FACTS • ON • FILE
516 Fifth Ave., New York 18, N. Y.

( ) I enclose $1.00 for Special 5-weeks' trial service of FACTS ON FILE, which entitles me to complete 1944 Annual Index FREE.

Name _____
Address _____
Nation _____

Films

JAMES
AGEE

NEVER having read the novel, I can consider "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn" only in its movie version. I think it a more interesting and likable movie than most. It concentrates on poverty, on some crucial aspects of early puberty, on domestic relationships, and on life in a big city, which are rarely undertaken on the American screen, with considerable enthusiasm, tenderness, discipline, and intelligence. It even presents and accepts the idea, unpopular enough even in contemporary fiction, that some antagonisms and inadequacies are too deeply rooted to be wholly explicable or curable. It also develops its main love interest between a little girl and her father, and it presents a drunkard, the father, for once without moralizing about him or reforming him. (The agencies concerned about this are doubtless satisfied with his death.) The film is so interested in taking its proper time, with and between each scene, that a number of important scenes had, I infer, to be dropped for length; I don't otherwise understand such a thing as the barely illustrated relationship between mother and son, in a screen play so obviously careful—not to mention the virtual absence of the symbolic tree of the title, which could have been accounted for in about three extra shots.

The tenement sets and city streets of the movie are as lovingly and exhaustively detailed and as solid-looking as any I can remember. Most of the players, like those in the same studio's "Ox-Bow Incident," clearly believed they had special duties, opportunities, and privileges. I was especially moved and impressed by James Dunn as the father and by the ways, visible and sometimes stammering though they were, in which Peggy Ann Garner and the director Elia Kazan handled what I take to be her rigidity as an actress, turning it into a part of her personal and visual charm, and of the role she is in those respects so well suited for. "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn" also contains single moments or shots so extraordinarily good that they make me wonder why the rest, granted the same eye that made or saved these, need have fallen short. There is a shot of the girl hesitant on a curb which has the lovely authenticity of a wild animal startled by a flashbulb—or of the same shot made by a concealed camera in a real street. There is a shot of Dunn, ghastly drunk in his inky waiter's suit, as painfully inappropriate to daylight, being shoved and shouted along his home street, which is as poetic and individualized an image of a state beneath humiliation as I have seen. There is a shot of Joan Blondell's bent hustling back, the thin dress propped and ridged through her underwear, as she goes in to help deliver her sister of a baby, which is equally successful in its evocation of women in a special and final class and world and predicament.

Yet "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn" is as much a disappointment—even an annoyance—as a pleasure. My heart goes out to the people who reproduced the Brooklyn streets—I could probably lose every other interest in life in the love for just such detail—but try as they will, they only prove, more convincingly because more masterfully than I have seen it proved before, that the best you can do in that way is as dead as an inch-by-inch description or a perfectly naturalistic painting, compared with accepting instead the still scarcely imagined difficulties and the enormous advantages of submerging your actors in the real thing, full of its irreducible present tense and its unpredictable proliferations of energy and beauty. I regret too that with sets even as good as they had they gave only token shots of the city for its own sake, free from the advancement of the plot or the complications of a character; what a wonderful chance they missed to take fifteen or twenty minutes' vacation from the story for, say, the free-gliding, picaresque, and perfect eye for a Saturday schoolchild's cruising of the city. I'm afraid too that they were too calculated in their use of offscreen noise and music, and in those scenes for which there were no accidental offscreen noises.

For the rest, trusting what friends who have also seen the film tell me of the novel, one must be dubious of both, if not with such full hatred, still with some of the same distaste which is inspired by an advertising artist's use of everything that was sweated out from Cézanne on. Ever since certain kinds of sexual sophistication began to qualify for the big-money market in "Anthony Adverse"—very likely it began before that—I have been bothered by how easy it was, cynically or in Miss Smith's case I would believe innocently, to make palatable to the irredeemable enemies of all courage and adventurous perception matters which they had helped crush more original artists and scientists for daring, however unprofitably, to take notice of. "A Tree Grows in Brooklyn" is "realistic" in a way which would have been loathed by the people who will now accept it if they had lived even a short while ago; and if a measure of its still fundamental cautiousness is needed, you can be sure they would still loathe "Greed," for with all its own faults "Greed" never in the least degree tempered its wind to any part of its public.

"The Tree's" attention to poverty and need, though frank as such things go in films, is also temperate compared with the staring facts of poverty and need; the comfortable have always been able to lick their chops over the hunger of others if that hunger is presented with the right sort of humorous or pathetic charm; if certain Christian or Marxian glands are tactfully enough stimulated, they will drool as well. The father-daughter, mother-son relationships in the movie follow a classic Freudian pattern and for once make no phony scientific capital of the fact, but I found the classicism even more pat than it sometimes looks in Freud, and a lot more safely dressed up. The characters themselves bother me most, but here I have an even harder time defining my mistrust of them. It is, roughly, that the imagination has been used a little too glibly to blow up and trim off the presumptive originals of these characters into very comfortably readable, actable, easily understandable creatures, whose faults and virtues are all tagged or neatly braided. I don't forget mentioning that within themselves and in their relationships they are more complex and intransigent than is usual now—and far less vulgarly designed to expound some sociological or political or psychological doctrine. But even this, the respectable beginning at least of a return toward trying to represent human existence, can be so handled as to make it one more asset of a piece of fool-proof entertainment—like those novels whose authors go through half the pockets of the astounded Christian world merely by writing a few hundred pages house-breaking ten lion-like words from the New Testament.

For reasons such as these—or because, like me, they have automatically neglected to read a best-seller—I won't wonder if a good many intelligent people pass up this movie or, even if they see it, dismiss it. For all I regret or dislike about it, I don't think it is to be dismissed.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

IT HAS been my feeling that the basis of Morris Graves's art would not be sufficient to carry it beyond its first impulse. In the first place, nature worship can furnish but scanty and rather irrelevant material in these times—when the main and inescapable problem is urban life; in the second place, gouache on thin paper can do only so much in any one artist's hands; in the third place, the tradition in which Graves works—Chinese painting and Klee—is too narrow and too far removed from the main stream. It was large enough for him to demonstrate that he was talented and original to begin with; but once the demonstration was made there was no place left to go.

Graves's art already began to hesitate several years ago as it eked out its first substance with a strong dosage of Klee. In his latest show at the Willard Gallery (through February 24) it manifests what is almost a collapse. His new kakemonos, which are paintings vertical in design and "mounted on scrolls," either are too derivative of Oriental art or waver awkwardly between decoration and easel-painting. Not enough plastic material is present to indicate, much less fulfil, his intentions—not enough tone, not enough compositional elements. The same poverty weakens his framed gouaches. Graves is subtle—he has to be within the narrow limits set for himself—but subtlety is of no avail when it has to deal with matter so evanescent as hardly to attain the status of the visible. Something very spontaneous, very valid, moves at the bottom of his art, but for the present it does not materialize as anything much more than an impulse, an initial impulse—sometimes only the demi-semi-quaver of an impulse.

Modern experience sets the bounds within which modern art must be practiced. These bounds are considerably wider than those of Graves's painting, but wide as they may be, relatively, they have, since the death of Klee, excluded birds, fishes, and trees. For all its emphasis on inwardness, Graves's eye is not really inward enough; if it were, it would be a positive eye that saw through and beyond pantheism.

• NEXT WEEK •

The Nation's Mid-Winter Book Number

A SPECIAL 40-PAGE ISSUE

SERMON ON A TEXT FROM WHITMAN

An essay by LIONEL TRILLING

THE WIDE PROSPECT

A poem by RANDALL JARRELL

NOTES BY THE WAY

By MARGARET MARSHALL

FICTION IN REVIEW

By DIANA TRILLING

THE ARTS IN REVIEW

By JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH, JAMES AGEE
CLEMENT GREENBERG, B. H. HAGGIN

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

WHILE Lehmann was singing Beethoven's "An die ferne Geliebte" cycle at a concert of the New Friends of Music, I was listening to Toscanini's performance of Berlioz's "Queen Mab" in Studio 8H. No music has in this studio the normal sound that it has in the concert hall; but nothing I have heard has been altered as much and as harmfully as Berlioz's magical scherzo. To avoid the harsh reverberance of the sound on the main floor I sat in the balcony; but there the piece was deprived of much of its evocative effect by the dry, toneless distinctness of the sound, the lack of splendor at the climaxes. N. B. C. may claim the performance had the right sound and effect as it came out of the radios in homes; but the performance of the piece which I heard from my radio last spring sounded only better, not wholly right. From the beginning of Toscanini's broadcasts N. B. C. has contended that what was wrong with the sound in Studio 8H was necessary to make it right for the ears of radio listeners; but that certainly was not true in the first years, when the radio brought into one's home the dry, unresonant sound that had been picked up in the acoustically dead studio; nor has it been true since the change to liveness and reverberance in the studio, which has made a tremendous improvement in the sound from the radio. That sound would be even better without the studio's present harshness; and the best orchestral sound from a radio is the one that is the best at its place of origin—the normal sound of the orchestra in a concert hall. I am sure that a broadcast performance of Berlioz's "Queen Mab" picked up from Carnegie Hall would sound wholly right.

Provided, of course, that it was transmitted properly. Two years ago I heard the all-important balances which Toscanini had labored to create in the performance of Debussy's "La Mer" altered in transmission. Last year a number of broadcasts were afflicted by distortion in the sounds of high pitch, which an engineer I know, with sharp ears for musical sound in addition to his technical knowledge, thought was caused by defective transmitting apparatus. This year I have listened to the performances in the studio; but he has reported to me that the few broadcasts he has heard have sounded dull, unbalanced, and unclear, and that filter tests have shown that the standard broadcasts of the concerts were being sent out with their frequency-range reduced from the 11,000 cycles that is the limit of the transmitting equipment to something around 6,000. He has found this to be true of other N. B. C. programs, such as the celebrated Telephone Hour—which has made it look like policy rather than accident. In this connection he has recalled an article in Electronics of last August, in which O. B. Hansen, N. B. C.'s vice-president in charge of engineering, talked about what was theoretically possible in high fidelity and what was practically attainable and desirable, and reached the conclusion that much less was practically attainable and desirable than was theoretically possible. And Hansen, my engineer friend speculates, may be proving with the reduced range of N. B. C.'s broadcasts that even a frequency range of 6,000 cycles is satisfactory to the public; hence that the 10,000 attainable by standard broadcasting is all that is needed; and—only by implication, of course—that the 20,000 offered by Frequency Modulation broadcasting is not needed. Not, he agrees, that N. B. C. can have any hope of eliminating FM broadcasting; but that it can try to eliminate the possibility of competition from new post-war FM chains.

P. S.: My engineer friend reports that the February 4 broadcast sounded much better—though "Queen Mab" was not wholly satisfactory; and that he found the frequency range extended to about 7,500.

Since this has become a technical article I will end it with a couple of paragraphs for which I had no room in my last record-review. In the first place, I find it advisable to warn readers that recordings which were excellent when they were issued several years ago may be less good when they are bought today. I have already reported a loss of brightness in recent pressings of Columbia recordings of Mozart's Concerto K. 491 and Overture to "Don Giovanni"; a reader informs me that a copy of Columbia's recording of the Concerto K. 271 that he bought recently proved to be "useless"; and a few weeks ago I listened to a new copy of Victor's recording of the Concerto K. 482 and found it difficult to hear the music of the slow movement through the noises that accompanied it. I gather that in some instances the masters (or whatever it is the stampers are made from) have become defective; that in others it is unskilled or inefficient labor that has turned out defective pressings; and that it will probably be some time before replacements of the masters can be secured from Europe and the companies will again be operating with competent labor.

Also, good needles are hard to get nowadays. Apparently ordinary steel needles are no longer being manufactured; but they can still be found in out-of-the-way places, and are worth looking for, since a fresh steel needle for each record-side is still the best. If you must have a longer-playing needle—for example, for a record-changer—look for chromium-tipped needles, which are scarce but obtainable (the Columbia chromiums I used recently wore down much too quickly; I am trying out Victor now). The Rec-O-Ton and Victor Red Seal needles which the stores are well-stocked with give very poor reproduction and have other objectionable features; use them only as a last resort. "Permanent" needles, sapphire or metal, are a great temptation; but resist: my engineer friend, reading the money-back offer for the needle in one of the alluring advertisements, murmured: "And will they give you your money back for the damaged records?" And cactus and other thorn needles also should be avoided: they give very poor reproduction, and after repointing wear down very quickly and can damage a record as much as a worn steel needle.

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language.

MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple; thousands have succeeded. @ $29 LANGUAGES

Send for Free book, Call for Free demonstration LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

The Nation Index

for Volume 159 of The Nation, covering the period from July through December, 1944, is now available. This excellent reference aid may be had for 15 cents.

Send your order for the Index, with remittance, to

THE Nation

20 VESLEY STREET, NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Letters to the Editors

Rebuttal

Dear Sirs: Lee Morris's scathing rebuke, in your letter columns of January 13, to my analysis of the causes underlying the enactment of Florida's anti-closed-shop amendment does not discredit one word of my statement. His attack on the state's A. F. of L. unions is a colossal distortion. The very labor organizations so severely berated by Mr. Morris were almost solely responsible for the near defeat of the hateful amendment, despite the overwhelming support given it by the newspapers of the state, both urban and rural.

However unpleasant the idea may be to Mr. Morris, it is a clear, recognized, and easily ascertainable fact that the urban press of Florida is conservative, pro-business, and anti-labor. By no stretch of the imagination could the Ocala Star-Banner or the Miami Daily News be placed in the liberal fold. The perusal, issue by issue, of their editorial pages discloses that between October 1 and November 7 neither the Ocala Star-Banner nor the Miami Daily News opposed the anti-closed-shop amendment.

On the contrary, on October 25 the Star-Banner supported the proposal with an editorial whose Pegler-like conclusion was, "Whether the amendment carries or is defeated, it will serve as a warning to union labor to clean house, and doubtless some of the abuses which have given union labor a black eye can and will be corrected by statute at the next session of the legislature." In the same issue another colored editorial slashed at labor for striking for higher wages while soldiers are dying overseas. From October 1 until November 7, the crucial days of the election, the Miami Daily News did not carry a single editorial against the anti-closed-shop amendment.

Unfortunately, copies of the St. Petersburg Independent are not on file in the University of Florida library, but any intelligent Florida citizen would greet with nose-holding skepticism Mr. Morris's contention that the St. Petersburg Independent is as liberal and progressive as Nelson Poynter's St. Petersburg Times.

Mr. Morris calls "unfair" what he incorrecly terms my "condemnation" of Florida's labor unions for tardy action against the anti-closed-shop amendment. He then breaches every code of fairness with the irresponsible and untrue charge that "the state A. F. of L. in Florida is thoroughly illiberal and racket-ridden and is more energetic in fighting democracy within its own organization than in any fight for principle." While boasting that his newspaper fought Franco, Mr. Morris forgets that the Tampa A. F. of L. cigarmakers' unions contributed so much to Loyalist Spain that Tampa is recognized as having done as much comparatively as any other city in the United States to uphold democracy in the Spanish Republic. Señor J. Alvarez del Vayo, Foreign Minister of Loyalist Spain, personally appeared in Tampa to thank our laboring people for their assistance.

After Florida's labor unions awakened to the danger that was upon them in the last election, they fought a good fight but lost. In the future they can win if they strike early and hard at their enemies. Is it wrong to try to help our state's young labor movement by exposing the dangers it must overcome? It may be proper for Mr. Morris to use the columns of The Nation to defend a newspaper in which he has a personal interest, but it is highly improper of him to make that defense a springboard for a leap at the throat of organized labor.

WILLIAM H. JOUBERT

Gainesville, Fla., January 23

Mr. Eliot and Mr. Hook

Dear Sirs: I read with interest in the issue of January 20 Sidney Hook's The Dilemma of T. S. Eliot, and if I understand it and Mr. Eliot's essay correctly, I wonder why a future "organic" world culture should depend either on a supernatural religious faith equipped with an ecclesiastical élite or a revamped medieval pattern, or on a purely secular belief in international economic planning, democracy, and the scientific method.

These last seem to me to be necessary means of accomplishing the desired end of a peaceful and fruitful world society, but are not in themselves, I think, capable of supplying their own motive power on a world scale.

That must come, as Mr. Eliot says, through a common religious faith whose values unify life. But this religious faith must be all-inclusive, equally understandable by and equally significant to all peoples of whatever race or degree of cultural development. It must have no administrative élite or priestly class, selected on any basis whatever—only voluntary interpreters.

There may be an idea capable of such universal application in some religion with which I am not familiar; there is such a one, I believe, in the teachings of Jesus, namely, the Universal Fatherhood of God and the Universal Brotherhood of Man. This surely can be a common denominator of all religious beliefs. Special techniques are given for the individual expression of these beliefs in the two great Commandments: Love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and soul and mind; and Love thy neighbor as thyself.

The First Commandment gives complete freedom for individual interpretations of God; it allows scope for all kinds of intellectual theological structures, apparently necessary to some people; it satisfies the mystics, who in all ages, including our own, have felt a divine spirit "closer to them than breathing, nearer than hands and feet"; it releases a great motivating force, capable of achieving economic and political democracy by the scientific method, if the Second Commandment is interpreted in the largest social sense.

Who is to do the interpreting? I agree with Mr. Hook that the teacher, not the priest, will have most to do with strengthening and enriching a common faith, but the teacher must not overlook sources of spiritual power—and the teacher must be a prophet, not a hireling.

LOUISE W. GROVER

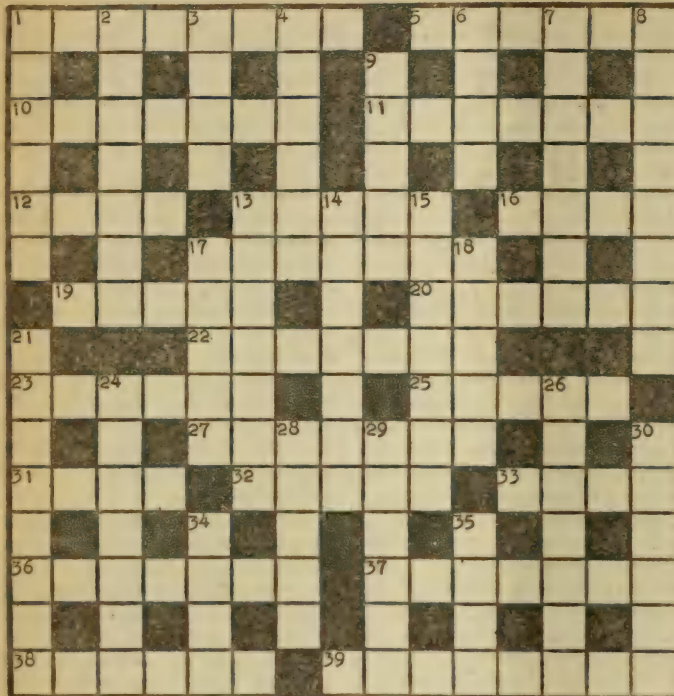

Gloversville, N. Y., January 24

Explanation

Dear Sirs: In the December 2, 1944, issue of The Nation appeared an article submitted by Overseas Press, Inc., entitled Europe's Road to Peace, by Dr. Jan Masaryk, which was supposed to represent the present views on international affairs of Dr. Masaryk, Czechoslovak Foreign Minister. The facts, however, are that the article had been written by Dr. Masaryk at the beginning of 1943, and obviously, inasmuch

Crossword Puzzle No. 103

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 "A drefle smart man" who was true to one party, and that was himself (Biglow Papers) (two words, 7 & 1)
 5 Tom's a/c brings good luck
 10 Where charity is practiced, and almost a nuttury
 11 The Ghost came between her and Hamlet
 12 Copper-hued maiden?
 13 Once given credit for increased corn production
 16 Building in which a cat would be proverbially jumpy
 17 Her name is proverbial for filial ingratitude
 19 She has letters for Alice
 20 Nationality of the first duellists
 22 Sustenance for the inner man
 23 The trouble, we find, with ----- is that you can't see where you're going
 25 Ithrae (anag.)
 27 Jeremy, Bayard and Zach
 31 It goes with hops
 32 Drinks that make you so sad
 33 It's a lot, but under a hundred it's reasonable 36 Equivocation
 37 The "distressful isle"
 38 Might call it an illustrated book, since it's full of figures 39 Just the fellow to give you a whale of a hiding

DOWN

- 1 Be off with you! (two words, 2 & 4)
 2 The one named opens with a negative
 3 Squared circle familiar to The Fancy

- 4 Suitable jar in which to keep electric eels?
 6 Each is present here
 7 Is always in the limelight
 8 Rat in gin (anag.)
 9 All the world loves ----- (especially the jeweler, the florist and the confectioner)
 13 Has been rather put out since the advent of electricity (two words, 4 and 3)
 14 The richest soil (two words, 3 and 4)
 15 Italians who start out with a character
 17 Gulliver became one in Lilliput
 18 Balts who sound willing
 21 "Paint me, warts and all," he said
 24 Jack Dempsey took the title from him
 26 A winker
 23 Offspring seems to declare you no good with brutal brevity
 29 "O, a fish? How idiotic!"
 30 Gave an invitation to another insect
 34 We wouldn't want to be taken for one
 35 She sounds comparatively thin

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 103

ACROSS: 1 MARTYRS; 5 ASHANTI; 9 REFURGE; 10 ANTONIO; 11 EBB; 13 LAUNCH; 15 FOMINE; 16 KIPLING; 17 TREP; 19 BUGS; 20 TIT WILLOW; 21 FLEA; 23 EARP; 26 STARING; 28 RIDDLE; 29 GADGET; 30 ASA; 32 ENRAGED; 33 CHINESE; 34 SAYINGS; 35 SIGNS IT.
 DOWN: 1 MARPLOT; 2 RAPTURE; 3 YORICK; 4 SNEE; 5 ALAB; 6 HOT DOG; 7 NANKING; 8 IRONERS; 12 BILLARDS; 14 HITTITE; 15 INKING; 18 ETA; 19 EWE; 21 FORGERS; 22 ELDERLY; 24 ALGIERS; 26 PATIENT; 28 SLOGAN; 29 GAZING; 30 ADDS; 31 ACTS.

as the political and military situation had changed in the meantime, the article misrepresented Dr. Masaryk's views on current developments as well as the Czechoslovak position.

The responsibility for publishing Dr. Masaryk's article was ours entirely. Through some negligence the Masaryk piece, which dealt with general questions of post-war reconstruction in Europe, got among our current manuscripts and was submitted to The Nation as a newly written story.

We sincerely regret any embarrassment which may have been caused to Dr. Masaryk, the Czechoslovak government, or The Nation by this unfortunate negligence on our part.

OVERSEAS PRESS, INC.

New York, January 31

Good News

Dear Sirs: Qualified Negro nurses are accepted by both the army and the navy. Any who wish to volunteer should write to the Army Nurse Corps or the Navy Nurse Corps, Washington, D. C., to avoid possible local opposition.

If any discrimination is encountered, notify Mrs. Mabelle K. Staupers, president of the National Association of Colored Graduate Nurses, 1790 Broadway, New York.

ETHEL CLYDE

New York, February 5

CONTRIBUTORS

MARGARET STEWART is labor editor of the London Economist.

ANDREE VIOLLIS is one of the eight French journalists now visiting this country at the invitation of the OWI. She represents Le Soir. During the occupation of France she wrote for the underground press.

EDGAR SNOW has been a newspaper and magazine correspondent in the Far East since 1929, most of the time in China. Among his books are "Far Eastern Front," "Red Star Over China," and "People on Our Side." He is also the author of a book in Chinese, "Impressions of the Northwest."

HORST MENDERSHAUSEN is a professor of political economy at Bennington College and author of "The Economics of War."

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • FEBRUARY 24, 1945

NUMBER 8

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

197

EDITORIALS

- The Mexico Conference 200
Yalta and San Francisco by Freda Kirchwey 201

ARTICLES

- The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté 202
The Pell Affair by I. F. Stone 203
75 Years Ago in The Nation 204
The Legal Case Against Hitler by Raphael Lemkin 205
Wise Up, Civilian! by Robert Fleisher 207
Racial Dialectic: Missouri Style
By Carey McWilliams 208
Under What Banner? by John Scholte Nollen 210
In the Wind 211

POLITICAL WAR

- Darlan Over Athens by Philip Jordan 212
Behind the Enemy Line by Argus 214

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

- Sermon on a Text from Whitman
by Lionel Trilling 215
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall 220
The Wide Prospect a poem by Randall Jarrell 222
"An Uncertain Sound" by Benjamin Ginzburg 224
Briefer Comment 225
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 227
Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch 229
Films by James Agee 230
Art by Clement Greenberg 230
Music by B. H. Haggin 231

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 104 by Jack Barrett 232

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

UNTIL WALLACE IS CONFIRMED AS SECRETARY of Commerce, it would be most unwise for liberal and labor, forces to relax their efforts in his behalf. As we go to press, Minority Leader White of the Senate has declared that he will oppose confirmation, and Senator Taft has announced that he will make a major speech in opposition to Wallace. McKellar of Tennessee is the first of the "Republicrats" to announce that he will vote against Wallace's appointment even to the Secretaryship as curtailed by the George Bill, and no doubt some other right-wing Southern Democrats will follow his example. In the House, passage of the George bill without further crippling Republican amendments was not only a triumph for Wallace but a smashing defeat for Jew-baiter Rankin of Mississippi. Rankin had hoped to lead his Republican-Southern Democratic coalition to another great victory and to block the Wallace nomination by blocking the George bill. Speaker Rayburn deserves hearty congratulations on his successful leadership. The Nation likewise applauds Representatives James G. Fulton of Pennsylvania and Richard J. Welch of California, the only two Republican members who resisted the intense pressure of their party leadership and voted against recommitment of the George bill. We believe Wallace will win in the Senate, but we urge his supporters to keep fighting and take nothing for granted. Nation readers should attend the mass rallies for Wallace now being held in all important cities throughout the country. In New York, the Union for Democratic Action is sponsoring a Fight-for-Wallace Rally at the Town Hall on Monday, February 26, at 8 p.m., at which the principal speaker will be Leon Henderson.

★

THE PRESIDENT IS SAID TO BE MAKING A personal survey of the civilian-relief problem in Europe. We hope this report is true, for the economic situation of the liberated countries is becoming increasingly desperate. Both France and Belgium are threatened with further cuts in their meager rations, and both countries are afflicted by serious unemployment almost wholly because of lack of raw materials for their factories. This question has been under discussion for months between high-ranking American and British officials, but as in the case of the President's directive to increase bread rations in Italy, decisions reached in London and Washington fail to get translated into action. France was promised twenty-six shiploads of goods during the first quarter of this year; with half this period elapsed, eight ships have actually reached French ports. Shipping is obviously the crux of the difficulty, and this is the excuse for the reported negotiations between the UNRRA and Spain for an arrangement by which raw wool and cotton would be exported in Spanish ships and manufactured in Spanish mills into blankets and clothing for relief purposes. We imagine Franco is quite delighted with this idea, which would allow him to tag along with the United Nations in a humanitarian disguise. But we can think of nothing that would prove more infuriating to the hundreds of thousands of idle French and Belgian textile workers than to give such a preference to a tricky and unfriendly "neutral." If there are Spanish ships available for carrying such raw materials, let us insist that they be chartered to carry goods to France and Belgium as a condition of continuing trade at all with Spain. And if we must look to any neutral for assistance with relief clothing, let us rather consider Switzerland, which has idle textile machinery and ships of its own plying between America and Lisbon. Switzerland, it may be noted, has just made a friendly gesture to the Allies by blocking German bank balances.

✱

IN REFUSING AN INVITATION TO MEET THE President "somewhere in the Mediterranean" in order to receive a first-hand account of the Crimea Conference, General de Gaulle is reported to have cited French economic difficulties as a reason why he could not leave Paris at this time. No doubt his object was to remind Mr. Roosevelt of the plight of France, though the deeper purpose of his refusal was to express a sense of grievance at exclusion from Yalta. That France has a genuine grievance cannot be doubted. The principal subject under discussion by the Big Three was the future of Germany, in which no country has a greater stake than France; of almost equal importance on their agenda was the problem of the organization of Europe, and as General de Gaulle has repeatedly and rightly asserted, nobody can run Europe without France. Again, while the official communiqué made no reference to the matter, it is reported that the Big Three also talked about "trusteeships" for colonies—a question in which France, as the second-largest colonial power, is vitally interested. But, while we deeply regret the absence of France at Yalta, we shall be sorry if hurt feelings lead the French government to disassociate itself from the decisions reached there. For the Big Three did take a step forward by seeking to include France in the executive commissions they decided to institute. We hope General de Gaulle and his Cabinet will not reject this opportunity but will use it as a springboard from which to reach the select circle of policy-makers.

✱

THE FRUITS OF YALTA BEGIN TO APPEAR—SOME sweet, some bitter. . . . Take Poland. Liberals as a whole have welcomed the Yalta statement which replaces unilateral by joint Allied decision and provides at least a framework for the creation of a democratic Polish state. The London government-in-exile has firmly said no to the Big Three and has received support from General Anders, commander of the Polish Army Corps which has fought with great distinction in Italy. Stanislaw Mikolajczyk, former Premier and leader of the Peasant Party, after expressing general support of the Yalta statement, took exception to certain details in a letter addressed to the London Daily Herald. It is to be hoped that he will consent to go to Warsaw and work out the differences inside the government when it is enlarged to include "other democratic leaders from within Poland and abroad." Meanwhile, Pravda has lost no time in attacking Mikolajczyk and classing him with anti-Russian Premier Arciszewski. This is clearly unfair. In the next weeks, Pravda might well think twice before hurling "fascist" at anyone who dares touch the sacred ark of the Yalta covenant. In democratic practice, criticism of detail is not equivalent to rejection of principle. The elements of disastrous civil strife are still present in the Polish situation. Whether that strife can be avoided depends upon the maintenance of Allied unity and on the emergence of Polish leaders of sufficient vision to take full advantage of the Yalta proposals.

✱

WHAT IS TO BE THE ROLE OF SWEDEN IN THE final stages of the war? The Swedish press has been discussing this question, and the general conclusion appears to be that while Sweden should not actually enter the war, it should be prepared to intervene "so as to uphold order and save lives," as the conservative Sydsvenska Dagbladet of Malmö puts it. This may seem a distinction without a difference, but what the Swedes appear to have in mind is the possibility that the north of Germany will be overrun and the Nazi garrisons in Denmark and Norway cut off from escape. The German military and civil leaders in these countries, together with the local quislings, knowing they could expect no mercy, would no doubt seek to fight to the bitter end: the Norwegian and Danish partisans, ill armed as they are, would certainly redouble their efforts to destroy their oppressors. Since the Western Allies are unlikely to have troops to spare for a relief expedition to the north, the result might well be a period of bloody and uneven guerrilla war in which many Norwegians and Danes would be massacred and their countries still more devastated. It is at this stage that the Swedes might undertake "police measures," for the purpose, as the liberal monthly Nordens Frihet says, "of preventing the Germans after their collapse from causing chaos and destruction." To this end, this magazine recommends that Sweden "immediately inquire of the Norwegian government and the Allied High Command how best she could coordinate her efforts with theirs in order to bring about as rapid and painless an end as possible to Norwegian slavery." Even the once pro-Nazi Aftonbladet suggests that "humanitarian obligations" may make Swedish intervention necessary. On these grounds it could hardly come soon enough, for the Norwegians are suffering bitterly from terror and starvation. Sweden's neutrality, whatever good arguments there may have been for preserving it, has not enhanced its moral prestige. Positive action, even at this eleventh hour, to succor its neighbors might do much to restore it.

✱

PROSPECTS FOR SETTLING CHINA'S INTERNAL conflict have again dimmed as a result of a virtual breakdown in Kuomintang-Communist negotiations. In an effort to place responsibility for the breakdown on the Communists, the Chungking government has issued an official statement declaring that the terms rejected by Yen-an included (1) recognition of the Chinese Communist Party, (2) inclusion of a Communist official in the national military council, (3) inclusion of Communist and non-Kuomintang representatives in the Executive Yuan (the Chinese Cabinet), and (4) creation of a committee with an American as chairman to consider the reorganization of the Communist army. On the surface these terms appear to be extremely liberal and to approximate the kind of settlement which many Americans have long desired. But Chou En-lai, Yen-an's representative in the negotiations, points out that there was a catch in each of Chungking's "concessions." For example, the offer to grant legal status to the Communist Party was made contingent on the surrender of the command of the Eighth Route Army to Kuomintang officers, while the inclusion of a Communist in the national military council was meaningless because that body had never met. Even membership in the Executive Yuan has little significance since the actual powers of government in China rest elsewhere. The crucial issue is whether the 500,000 or more men in the Eighth Route Army are to be equipped and utilized on the same basis as Kuomintang troops or absorbed and destroyed as the armies of Chang Hsueh-liang were destroyed after the Sian incident in 1936. Yen-an is not unreasonable in asking that a true coalition government be established before it places its army under direct Chungking control.

✱

SIR WALTER CITRINE HAS NEVER BEEN KNOWN as one of the more radical spirits in the British labor movement. Consequently, observers at the Blackpool meeting of the Trade Union Congress last October were rather mystified by the warmth of his entente with the Russian fraternal delegation there. He backed the program of the Anglo-Russian Trade Union Committee for a "hard peace" with great fervor, persuading the Congress to reverse its previous stand on this question, and acted in complete amity with the Russians in concerting plans for an all-inclusive United Nations trade union conference. Although this second step was bound to strain relations between the T. U. C. and the A. F. of L., which had bluntly refused any truck with a meeting that included either the C. I. O. or the Russian trade unions, Sir Walter did not flinch. That was four months ago: when the world conference actually convened on February 6, his ardor appeared to have cooled a little. On a number of minor questions he opposed Russian views and on the major question of future international organization of labor he seemed anxious to block any step which would torpedo the somewhat senile International Federation of Trade Unions. Since both the Russians and the C. I. O. are excluded from this body, they not unnaturally want an entirely new world organization. Sir Walter, however, defended the I. F. T. U. and even said a few kind words for the A. F. of L., with the result that the conference was somewhat confused. At any rate, it appears that the general secretary of the Trade Union Congress has swung back to his normal position right of center. This, no doubt, makes him more eligible for such whitewashing jobs as his mission to Greece on behalf of the British government.

✱

THE WILLIAM AND MARY COLLEGE INCIDENT acquires significance from the fact that in the oldest college of the South, founded in 1693, a student editor, with the support of a minority of the faculty and a majority of the student body, should have written an editorial suggesting that the time may come when Negroes will mingle freely with their fellows on that Virginia campus and even "marry among us." Newspaper accounts of the incident failed to recognize that while Miss Kaemmerle's editorial was more forthright than is usually the case, it was by no means an exceptional statement for a Southern campus publication. Not so long ago, for example, an editorial appeared in the student publication at Louisiana State University entitled White Supremacy Must Go. Of particular significance in the William and Mary case, however, is the fact that two Williamsburg clergymen, the Reverend Charles M. Pratt, Presbyterian minister, and the Reverend F. H. Craighill, of the local Episcopal church, promptly supported the students. In fact the Reverend Dr. Pratt proceeded to preach a sermon on racial equality. Student and campus organizations in all sections of the country have rallied to the support of the William and Mary contingent. In view of these circumstances it is disturbing but by no means surprising to note that Virginian Dabney wrote in the Richmond Times-Dispatch that the editorial "has made sound and conservative progress toward better race relations more difficult." Miss Kaemmerle's editorial may well have made "sound and conservative progress" somewhat more difficult in the South; but that it represents progress can hardly be questioned. Not the least important aspect of the matter is that the appearance of such an editorial in a Southern campus publication has greatly encouraged advocates of racial equality in other sections of the country to believe that their point of view is not without support in the South. As one editorial expressed it, "it is as though a bridge had been thrown across a formidable stream while we slept." Bridges are being thrown across this stream every day—while the Southern "liberals" sleep. It is part of the irony of the situation that these liberals may some day rise from their slumbers only to discover that an important vanguard of Southern opinion has already crossed one or another of these bridges.

✱

NEW YORK STATE'S ANTI-DISCRIMINATION BILL has encountered bitter opposition, though the active support of all the Democratic members of the legislature has now been augmented by that of Governor Dewey and some of the Republican leaders. Although significant as a pioneer attempt to outlaw racial and religious discrimination by law, the bill is relatively a weak one. Unlike the Wicks bill of a year ago, it is limited to job discrimination. It declares that opportunity for employment without discrimination because of color or creed is a "civil right" and provides for the creation of a five-man commission to enforce that right. But no penalties can be imposed on an employer who violates that right until "conference, conciliation, and persuasion" have been tried and failed. Employers who refuse to yield to mediation face a maximum penalty of $500 fine or a year in jail. Opposition to the bill has come chiefly from business groups led by the state chamber of commerce, but also from the railroad unions. While no one has yet come forward in defense of discrimination as a principle, opponents insist that attempts to enforce an anti-discrimination policy by law will intensify racial hatred and friction and "make New York a less desirable place for business." Actually the bill not only subordinates penalties to conciliation but sets up elaborate machinery for education as a first defense against racial and religious bias. Experience in the field of labor relations has demonstrated that fair employment practices can be obtained by mediation and educational procedures only if there are legal penalties in the background. Without these legal sanctions, the rights of minorities cannot possibly be protected effectively.

✱

ON A HOLIDAY THAT HAPPENS TO BE MONDAY as well, a newspaper turns up a wonderful collection of odd items. Lincoln's Birthday was particularly fruitful. We selected a few for our own wall newspaper:

MUSICAL EVENT: When a famous Scottish regiment opened up with bagpipes on the western front, a group of Germans, terrified, threw themselves on the mercy of the attackers and walked meekly to the prisoner cages.

EMPIRE STATISTICS: A British report "on the health of Indian Congress Party leaders" revealed that Pandit Jawaharlal Nehru, in prison since 1942, has lost nine pounds.

POST-WAR PLANNING: A C. B. S. correspondent reported from Stockholm that the German announcement of the execution and imprisonment of former party leaders in Bydgoszcz [Bromberg], Poland, was merely a cover for those men to join the organization that the Germans plan to use after the war.

CROP ESTIMATE: "U. S. Seeks Spain's Fruit for Allies."

G. I. HUMOR: A Russian who had been captured at Kharkov and taken to Germany, escaped in September and had been hiding for five months in a pile of grain when the Americans came. The men who found him said he was rolled up "in the shape of a foxhole." . . . "The Ledo stretch, from Ledo in Assam, India, through Myitkyina and Bhamo in Burma and thence to Wanting on the Burma Road in Yunnan Province, China, has been nicknamed 'Pick's Pike' after its builder, Brigadier General Lewis A. Pick, Corps of Engineers, United States Army."

✱

HENRIETTA SZOLD'S CONTRIBUTION TO THE Zionist movement and to the Jewish people transcends the accomplishments of Hadassah during the past three decades. For the idealism with which her quiet personality inspired the organization she founded, both here and in Palestine, and the fruitfulness of her keen, patient mind have already become part of the Jewish culture and heritage. In the next issue of The Nation, Marvin Lowenthal will tell the significance of Miss Szold's career. Here we mark the passing of a distinguished woman, who has created a legend of devotion to a cause.

The Mexico Conference

THE Foreign Ministers' meeting which opened in Mexico this week may well prove more important than all previous Pan-American conferences. There are many political and economic problems concerning the transition from war to peace which require full and frank discussion between this country and its Latin American neighbors. Among the political issues, the primary one is to prevent fascism from entrenching itself in the Western Hemisphere after its defeat in Europe. Despite measures taken since Pearl Harbor to suppress espionage and enemy propaganda, the fact remains that on the eve of victory the Latin American countries like the United States have yet to rid themselves of Nazi agents. Two factors have contributed to this: Argentina's pro-fascist regime has converted that nation into a general headquarters for Nazi activity in America; while our friendship with Franco has resulted in his flooding Latin America with agents and with daily broadcasts designed to increase distrust of the United States and to sabotage inter-American solidarity.

Argentina and Franco Spain are, therefore, two topics which will provide abundant material for discussion at the Mexico conference. Several countries, notably Colombia, at first insisted that Argentina be invited. This did not imply friendship for the Farrell regime but rather the desire to have it appear before the other republics to answer the charges made against it. Washington, however, maintained that exclusion would constitute a more severe condemnation of Argentina's failure to support continental solidarity. But even in its absence the problems raised by the fascist position of the Argentine government will be thoroughly thrashed out. It is not likely that the Farrell-Perón attempt to change the atmosphere of the conference by suggesting the imminence of a declaration of war against Germany will fool anyone at this late date.

Various Latin American spokesmen have rightly maintained that the discussion of the case of Argentina will not dispose of the issue of Nazi penetration in America. We share their belief that the conference must also come to grips with the situation in Bolivia, Brazil, and all countries where dual attitudes exist, combining an official policy of cooperation with the United Nations with fascist methods and dreams of a totalitarian continent. They believe it a matter of special importance that the problem of putting an end to Falange activities be squarely faced. In the opinion of Latin Americans the only way of cutting off this evil at its source is to break relations with Franco.

Several delegations are planning to present resolutions asking for a break. The fact that this feeling is widespread is proved by the unanimity with which leaders of the political parties represented at the recent meeting called by President Grau San Martin in Havana requested that Cuba demand at Mexico collective rupture of diplomatic relations with Franco. When that happens our delegation will find itself in a most awkward position if at the same time the United States is busy concocting a new deal with Franco in order to provide supplies to UNRRA or for any other purpose.

The principal economic issue that the conference will have to consider is that of the transition from war to peacetime conditions, and it will have to develop a plan to meet this coming period of readjustment. United States resistance to the very idea of such a plan, especially among industrialists and business men, is well known. But in the opinion of outstanding Latin American experts, unless a plan is agreed to the process of transition is destined to create innumerable difficulties and much friction between the United States and Latin America. The problems are varied and difficult. Many Latin American countries fear that, once the war is over, we are going to pursue a policy of "dumping" cheap goods that will ruin their newly created industries, many of which were built up at our suggestion and with our help to serve wartime needs. Others fear that, due to pressure from farmers' groups, the United States will close its doors more firmly than before against Latin-American wheat and meat. The only way out is a plan that will place above the particular interests of any group the public interest of the United States and of the Latin American countries.

Americans will do well to follow what is happening in Mexico with close attention and to realize once and for all that Latin America is emerging from this war fully conscious of its rights and not in the least disposed to be satisfied with a few phrases about our generosity and the virtues of the Good Neighbor policy. The first requisite for this policy's success is that not only we, but also the Latin Americans believe in it.

Yalta and San Francisco

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

IT WOULD be fine if we could take the events of the past months and all the problems stretching from Yalta to San Francisco and beyond and remake them to suit our liberal notions of a good world. The editors of The Nation, all by themselves, could if they had the chance cook up a fine set of policies, a splendid collection of happenings. Here at home, for instance, we could at a blow wipe out isolationists and conservatives of both parties. Then, hastily reconstructing our foreign policy to insure the early victory of democratic forces everywhere, we would rewrite the Dumbarton Oaks proposals so as to create a world organization with political power and armed force and a procedure guaranteed to apply with swift certainty any measures necessary to keep the peace. England would have a left Labor government pledged to the orderly abolition of the colonial system and the establishment of friendly relations with new popular governments in Greece and Italy and Spain. Just as a beginning. And Russia, freed of its generation-old fears of capitalist-fascist coalitions, would abandon all unilateral security measures in full, warm-hearted acceptance of the new plans for collective security. As for China and Latin America. . . .

But what's the use? Nobody asked us to fix things; instead, we find ourselves faced with a world that is as it is: a pretty nearly Tory government in England mistakenly trying to shore up its slipping imperial structure by reactionary props at the weak spots; in America a State Department sunk in practices and attitudes obsolete even before fascism was invented and a public opinion heading in the general direction of world cooperation but held back by a heavy sea-anchor of isolationist suspicion; and a Russia determined to protect its bitterly won integrity and power by its own strength—at least until it is finally convinced that Munich is not only a dead city but a dead idea.

Already voices—honest ones—are questioning the Crimean agreement. It included good words about the extirpation of fascism everywhere: but Franco was not mentioned; and when Churchill stopped at Athens on the way home he patted Britain on the back for its share in leading Greece out of civil war. Is this the meaning of the pledge at Yalta—British tanks to establish Tory concepts of freedom? And Poland. Was the agreement about Poland anything more than unconditional surrender to Russia, a unilateral act draped in the language of collective decision? As for the modification of the Dumbarton Oaks decision, what did it amount to since, as far as the facts have been made known, any one of the inner council of major powers will still be able to veto decisions that involve the use of force?

Between now and the meeting at San Francisco lie nine weeks. In this time millions of words will be spoken about the hope of peace and the fate of democracy. But all will be wasted unless they emerge from a desire, stronger even than the desire for absolute justice, to preserve the union that was fortified by the decisions at Yalta. That coalition of force and agreement between the three chief fighting nations is the minimum necessary without which nothing at all will be possible—no post-war security organization, no economic understanding, no relief of starving and homeless people, no fair boundaries, no democracy anywhere, nothing but a horrible collapse into new oppressions, new terror, new wars.

The consolidation of effort effected at Yalta must not be chiseled away by talk which ignores or minimizes this incapable fact.

The Nation has tried with stubborn persistence to prove the indivisible nature of this war. We believe today as we did in 1936 that the fascist revolution can only be defeated when the nations are ready to fight it by revolutionary means. When Churchill makes deals with the House of Savoy in Italy and the State Department throws its support to a fascist dictatorship in Bolivia or even El Salvador, the progress of the war as a whole receives a setback. But we have never given a moment's countenance to the theory that the failure of the Allied powers to support the democratic cause in Italy or El Salvador exempted us from supporting the Allied cause in the war.

This does not mean that we should censor our views on the sort of world that is necessary if peace is to last. Just as the coalition for war has been weakened and its progress hampered by the political mistakes that have cluttered every inch of the road toward victory, so the coalition for peace will be badly impeded if those mistakes continue. The decisions taken at Yalta marked an enormous political step forward; I believe that even the Polish settlement, so galling to many liberals, was a pretty decent compromise. But wherever one looks one sees the debris of Allied political policy piled like the rubble of shell-torn masonry across the map of Europe. Far from believing that the need of inter-Allied unity dictates silence about these mistakes, I consider it necessary that we work harder than ever to clear them out.

To support intelligently the decisions of Yalta, to make fruitful the meeting at San Francisco, we must do our utmost to force a democratic policy toward Europe. Mr. Roosevelt and his colleagues will never make good the promises implicit in the Crimea pronouncement by working through the Comité des Forges or the House of Savoy or a Spanish Bourbon prince or through the remnants of the German cartels. Those instruments are not only anachronistic and out of date; they are dangerous, as an obsolete fighting plane is dangerous. The movement of opinion in Europe, as Harry Hopkins told a surprised audience in Rome, is toward the left. A solid peace cannot be made by opposing that inevitable tendency. The success of the Allied coalition will depend upon its ability to work along with the forces that have proved their strength and their tough dependability during these bitter years of resistance.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THE daring and sustained attack on Tokyo by carrier-based aircraft opens a new and decisive phase of the Pacific war. The immediate conclusion to be drawn from the event is that an invasion of the Japanese home islands is not only possible but probable without a previous landing on the China coast.

Great as the potentialities are, the performance itself and its immediate consequences are thrilling and grandiose enough. The task group which paraded up and down only three hundred miles off the coast of Honshu stretched out two hundred miles over the sea. The size of Admiral Mitscher's force—our old friend Task Force 58—may be judged from the reports of Superfortress pilots who were over Tokyo on the first day of the attack: they estimated that 1,200 carrier-based planes were in the air at one time. Essex-class carriers—the big ones—carry about 90 aircraft; CVE's—"baby flat-tops"—about 36. However you divide 90 and 36 into 1,200, this means a lot of carriers.

Airfields in the Tokyo area apparently suffered heavily, with the American fighters going in low and fast to strafe parked Japanese planes, hangars, ammunition buildings, and supply dumps. The carriers also launch dive-bombers, which can attack airfield installations, factories in the industrial area, docks and shipping in the big harbor. Torpedo bombers are used against shipping or as though they were bombers against ground installations. These three prime weapons make an extraordinarily versatile and flexible team for destruction. The high degree of concentration which is possible in attacks of this kind tends to saturate the enemy's defenses, especially in anti-aircraft batteries; and the carefully timed schedule for bringing planes in over a period of hours tends even more strongly to exhaust the defenders and to compound the difficulties of keeping interceptors aloft and ground fires under control.

Mitscher's carriers, his striking weapons, are well protected by battleships and the other components of a screening force—cruisers, destroyers, destroyer escorts. Effective reconnaissance of the surrounding waters is provided by wide-ranging navy patrol planes and by outlying submarines—tentacles through which no sizable enemy force has much chance of slipping undetected. If such a force should come, we have the word of an official navy spokesman in Washington that Mitscher's force alone is stronger than the entire Japanese navy—that once-mighty fleet which now, to American naval men, is nothing more than "a good-sized task force." This is true despite the fact that all the Japanese ships damaged in the Battle for Leyte Gulf (the second battle of the Philippines) in October have now been repaired. The rising sun has sunk pretty low—not simply through the destruction of so many combat ships in the two battles of the Philippines Sea, but primarily through the astonishing growth of the United States navy. Those low and vulgar fellows the shipyard workers, so often berated for accepting the high war-time wages offered them, might well be given a rising vote of thanks for the tremendous job of construction they have performed.

That construction job means that while Mitscher's fliers are belaboring the whole Tokyo area and his surface-ship men are ready to take on the entire Japanese navy, other ships of Admiral Spruance's Fifth Fleet can bombard Iwo Jima, while ships of the Seventh Fleet cover the army's landing on Bataan. (Spruance's command is designated the Fifth Fleet, Halsey's the Third Fleet; Mitscher's task force is under them alternately.) Hard fighting and a lot of mopping-up still remain to be done on Luzon, and in Manila itself, two weeks after General MacArthur announced the liberation of the city. But already the center of gravity of the Pacific war has moved north and east—back toward Pearl Harbor, by a twist of geography and strategy—to the Volcano Islands. Here Admiral Blandy's task force has been bombarding, after more than seventy consecutive days of air attacks on the same target. Here also is where some of the bloodiest fighting of the Pacific will take place, now that the invasion troops have gone ashore to wrest a fine prize from the enemy.

Iwo Jima is nothing but a concentration of military strength, of enormous value to whoever holds it. From it the Japanese have been able to detect and intercept our Superfortress flights from Saipan and from Tinian, now revealed to be the site of the world's largest airdrome. From it the United States Army Air Forces can bring Japan's war industries under daily attack. The 1,500-mile round-trip flight to Tokyo can be made comfortably not only by what General Arnold likes to call "the last of the small heavy bombers" (Liberators) but by regular medium bombers such as the Mitchell, and especially by long-range fighters. One can safely predict a pattern of aerial bombing over Honshu which will interrelate the missions of very heavy, heavy, and medium bombers, all of them escorted by fighters (Marianas-based Superfortresses will rendezvous with fighters from Iwo Jima en route).

The dispersal of Japanese industry, aircraft industry in particular, has already begun. The landing in the Volcanos will undoubtedly hasten the work. The enemy is still able to produce about 1,500 aircraft a month, more than we are currently destroying: so the situation now becomes a race for time, with the Japanese trying to break down their production into sub-assemblies and the Americans trying to get Iwo Jima's airstrips into operation in time to prevent this.

Tokyo Radio said last week that the United States is trying to destroy the Japanese air force. The naval spokesman in Washington said the enemy might be correct in that surmise. This makes it unanimous.

These developments indicate a gratifying speed-up in the Pacific war. Mitscher's insolent pee-rade off Tokyo demonstrates the extent to which the Pacific fleet has won control of the western Pacific: we now actually have freedom of movement right to Japan's front door. Provided we continue to send out such large numbers of ships, it is hard to see what will tempt the Japanese fleet into action. It has no real hope of inflicting damage serious enough to cripple our moves: even after a fleet engagement in which we traded losses ship for ship, our Pacific fleet would still be the strongest in the world. Some sort of banzai sally is probably to be expected, but it can have no strategic significance.

The difficult and bloody months ahead should see the transformation of the Volcanos from a Japanese bastion to an American springboard. Off the springboard lie the Bonins, even closer to Tokyo; and then Honshu itself.

The Pell Affair

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 18

I POINTED out in last week's letter that the one disappointment in the Crimea communiqué was the failure of the Big Three to agree on joint action for the punishment of war criminals. There are obstacles to effective action in this field. One is the British Foreign Office, and the other is the American State Department. There are three reasons why progressive and labor pressure ought to be brought to bear against these obstacles. One is that the lives of several million prisoners of war and slave workers in the Reich may be endangered if the Nazis are led to believe that the British and American governments will be half-hearted in dealing with war criminals. The slaughter of slave workers, perhaps also of war prisoners, in the final hours before the Reich's fall would fit in with German plans to kill off as many of the non-German peoples of Europe as possible in preparation for a third attempt at world conquest. The second reason for acting quickly and effectively to punish Nazi war criminals is that we can thereby eliminate many of the party stalwarts who intend to go underground and prepare for the next war. The third reason is that the best way to lay the foundations for world security is to punish those responsible for the war and for the crimes committed in it.

The focus of progressive and labor pressure might well be the curious case of Herbert C. Pell, who was the American representative on the United Nations War Crimes Commission in London. Pell's return to London would be a victory for common sense and human decency. Pell was a Bull Moose Republican in 1912, later becoming a Democrat. He served a term in Congress after the last war, served as chairman of the New York State Democratic Committee from 1921 to 1926, and was vice-chairman of the Democratic National Committee in 1936. In 1937 he was appointed Minister to Portugal and in 1941 to Hungary. He seems to be a man of considerable wealth and culture, and seven years in the foreign service have failed to harden his spiritual arteries. He was one of the few men in the service who was sympathetic to Jewish and other refugees, and it is quite clear he is not in agreement with the ultra-legalistic Nervous Nellies who seem to dominate interpretation of international law at the State Department and the British Foreign Office. Sir Cecil Hurst and Pell were the leading figures on the War Crimes Commission, and both were for effective action to punish war criminals. Sir Cecil resigned in disgust with the attitude of the Foreign Office. What happened to Pell is still something of a mystery.

There are, roughly speaking, three kinds of war crimes. In the first category are crimes against the civilians or captured soldiers of the United Nations; the men accused of these crimes are to be returned for trial to the country against whose nationals the crimes were committed. This category is the simplest from the standpoint of law and procedure, though British and American international lawyers may be counted on to mess it up with multitudinous technicalities. In the second category are the deeds of Axis higher-ups responsible for the policies of mass murder, looting, prostitution, and moral corruption applied in occupied countries as part of the German and Japanese war programs. For these criminals, whose crimes were not limited to any one country, special courts and special procedure will be required. The third category, the most difficult from a conventional legal point of view, is made up of crimes committed by the Nazis and German nationals on account of race, creed, or politics. The Foreign Office and State Department seem to be still in a dither on the second and third categories. Pell, like Sir Cecil and unlike many of the legalists, was for punishment of both these categories and returned here in December for further instructions.

As the American representative on the United Nations War Crimes Commission Pell was a Presidential and not a State Department appointee. He saw the President at the White House on the morning of January 9. He found Mr. Roosevelt in agreement with his views. Pell was encouraged and went to the State Department on the afternoon of that same day to pay his respects to Secretary of State Stettinius before returning to London. Stettinius told Pell he could not return to London because Congress had failed to make an appropriation to cover his salary and expenses. When Pell offered to pay his own way and serve without charge, he was told this would be illegal. The expenses of participation in the United Nations War Crimes Commission had been paid out of the President's emergency fund, but under the Russell amendment to the 1944 Appropriation Act Congressional authorization is required for such payments and activities. An authorization of $30,000 asked for the first half of this year had been refused by the House Appropriations Committee, approved by the Senate Appropriations Committee, and then eliminated in conference committee.

It seems strange that so small an item would create such difficulties. A minor State Department official testified before the House committee; Stettinius himself sent a letter to the Senate committee. Could it be that some State Department official privately egged the House committee on to kill this item? Such things happen in Washington. The conference committee eliminated the $30,000 item on December 16. Pell saw the President on January 9; neither knew at the time that the item had been eliminated. Why weren't the President and Pell informed earlier? The State Department interprets the Russell amendment as meaning that where Congress fails to provide an appropriation it automatically withdraws authorization for the activity which would be financed by that appropriation. But if this is the correct interpretation, why did Acting Secretary Grew announce on January 26 that the United States would be represented on the War Crimes Commission by Pell's former deputy, Lieutenant Colonel Joseph V. Hodgson, former Attorney General of Hawaii?

If Pell's elimination is merely due to Congressional action and not to State Department hostility, why did Grew decline to answer when asked whether Pell would return to London if Congress reconsidered and made the $30,000 available? Finally, I would like to note that Chairman Anderson of the House committee says he was under the impression that the State Department did not need the $30,000 but had enough to carry on until the fiscal year beginning July 1. Where did he get that impression? The chairman indicated that he would take a favorable attitude toward a request for a deficiency appropriation in the pending deficiency bill. But though other deficiency items from the State Department were sent to the committee ten days ago, the $30,000 item was not among them. The department blames the Bureau of the Budget. There is something fishy here.

"There will be no diminution," Grew said augustly in the Pell announcement on January 26, "in the interest or activity of this government in the general subject of the punishment of war criminals." Would the editors of The Nation (page the shade of Godkin) permit me less augustly to say "horse feathers"? Pell had been back from London almost two months at the time that statement was made; yet the department hadn't been interested enough to arrange a conference at which Pell and Roosevelt would have a chance to discuss Pell's experience and problems in London with legal and other officers of the department. Nor was Pell given a chance to discuss them with Stettinius or Grew. Grew is the main source of our tender concern for Hirohito, and the State Department's international lawyers live in the shadow of the late James Brown Scott, who joined with the Japanese at the Versailles conference to help save the Kaiser and other heads of state from responsibility for war crimes. These departmental lawyers are more concerned with the hallowed antiquarianisms of academic international law than with punishing war criminals. International law today, like the common law and equity in the past, calls for robust and creative minds with enough faith in themselves to adapt past concepts to new needs. There is little evidence of either quality in the State Department. In London I am sure many Tories fear war-crime trials; were Hess or Ribbentrop to take the stand in his own defense, either might involve a good many members of the British aristocracy. There is also an undercurrent of Anglo-American upper-class hostility to the trial of war criminals; once begun, it would be almost impossible to protect financial and business opposite numbers in the Axis countries from punishment. There is a subtle international solidarity here that is not the least of the obstacles to just punishment of Axis murderers and the men who profited by Axis crimes.

75 Years Ago in "The Nation"

A NEGRO, Mr. Revels, has been elected Senator from Mississippi, and is awaiting the admission of the state to take his seat. . . . There is a touch of the comic in Mr. Revels's being the successor of Jefferson Davis.—February 3, 1870.

SALNAVE, the Haitian political chief, has just died what may be called the natural death of noted Spanish American politicians . . . for he was shot the other day by a file of soldiers.—February 3, 1870.

THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT—which provides that "the right of citizens to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any state, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," and that "Congress shall have power to enforce this prohibition by appropriate legislation"—has received the ratification of the requisite number of states.—February 10, 1870.

WHETHER THE PRESIDENT [Grant] and his Cabinet are so incompetent as Congress seems to think, is a point we will not discuss. Like Horace Walpole, we wonder whether, after all, there may not be a vast deal of cleverness in getting along at all without brains. But, whatever may be the capacity of the present executive officers, it is quite certain that the House of Representatives is not so overstocked with genius as to be able to look down from any lofty height upon them.—February 10, 1870.

ONE OF THE MOST promising signs in the Reconstruction process is an interchange of amenities which lately took place in the United States District Court at Richmond between Judge Underwood and Mr. Henry A. Wise, sometime Governor and more recently rebel general, who appeared as counsel at the bar in an action for damages. . . . The lawyers were somewhat astonished by it, and no wonder, considering the cold, heartless character which legal proceedings have hitherto had. We look forward to see the day when the tedium of every trial will be lightened by instrumental music, an occasional song or anecdote from the bench, and perhaps readings or recitations now and then from female members of the bar, and the introduction of a baby or two to be passed around toward lunch-time.—February 17, 1870. [Ed. Note: Henry A. Wise was the Governor of Virginia who refused to reprieve John Brown.]

AFTER STRENUOUS DEBATE, when debate was surely superfluous, the bill to admit Mississippi was passed on Thursday by the Senate, as it came from the House, by a vote of fifty to eleven.—February 24, 1870.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH: William Morris, "The Earthly Paradise, Part III"; Alfred, Lord Tennyson, "The Holy Grail, and Other Poems."

The Legal Case Against Hitler

BY RAPHAEL LEMKIN

I

INTERNATIONAL law is a body of flexible and uncodified rules of behavior among nations, based upon precedents, customs, treaties, and ethical concepts (laws of humanity). A comparatively new phenomenon in world history, it arose from the enlarged recognition of the need of civilized and sovereign states to live in harmony and justice with one another. The evolution of international law presupposed that states would protect individuals on the basis of acceptable moral standards. The repugnant philosophy of National Socialism has repudiated that implicit responsibility, and it is now necessary for the moral and social health of the civilized community that international law enforce concepts already existing in law and morality. Murder, enforced prostitution, and theft are crimes.

THE EX POST FACTO ARGUMENT

One of the legalistic arguments used against trying Hitler and his associates for war crimes and crimes against humanity is that international law has not provided sufficient procedures and definitions for this purpose. It is suggested that if such machinery should be provided now, it would constitute ex post facto law, and therefore it would be contrary to all legal principles. The principle of ex post facto in criminal law tends to protect the individual's liberty. A person should not be oppressed by the state when he commits an act which seems to him fair and decent and which becomes a crime only through subsequent legislation. Is that the case in the matter we are discussing? Murders and atrocities as such were prohibited also in Germany. Hitler simply exempted his henchmen and himself of responsibility for such crimes. Is the restoration of such responsibility for crime an ex post facto law? Is it a destruction of the guarantees of individual liberty? Do we not adhere to the principle that no liberty can justify crime, oppression, and cruelty? The interpretation of law must have a social and human meaning; otherwise it overrules itself intellectually—it destroys the very foundations of its own existence. Therefore the necessary formulation of international procedures based on preexisting conceptions of right and wrong cannot be interpreted as ex post facto law. Legal technicalities and niceties in international law have been and must continue to be subordinate to the basic principles of human conscience and responsibility. International law should be an instrument for human progress and justice, not an obstacle to them.

When any unprecedented situation in international relations occurs, a parallel necessity for enlarging the scope of international law is presented. After the signing of the Briand-Kellogg pact Secretary Stimson urged the lawyers to work on the implementation of this great international act outlawing war. Unfortunately, not much was done. There is now again an opportunity to enlarge and implement international law. Shall we fail again?

HITLER: HEAD OF STATE AND COMMON CRIMINAL

The argument most frequently invoked and superficially most impressive is that Adolf Hitler has acted in the name of a sovereign state as the head of that state, and that he is thereby relieved of individual responsibility. The immunity of heads of states is based upon international comity and courtesy, and presupposes mutual acceptance. It also presupposes that the head of a state will exercise his powers within the normal framework of civilized society. If we admit that by assuming the immunity habitually accorded heads of states Hitler, or any person, may commit acts which for others are considered crimes, we undermine the very foundations of our society. If, moreover, a sovereign seeks office with a program of crimes against humanity, then his office and his functions become a danger to international life and preclude him from enjoying the privileges granted by the comity of nations. International courtesy cannot go so far as to permit freely the murder of other nations. We should not overlook the fact that in the final analysis what Hitler was advocating in "Mein Kampf" was the destruction of whole nations and peoples. Many authorities on international law also suggest that a head of a state does not continue to enjoy immunity after he has been deposed from office.

Hitler has himself proclaimed his personal responsibility for his program, its enforcement and its authority. By his own declaration, he was the source of the policies of mass execution, starvation through racial discrimination, separation of families, forced labor and slavery, not simply as a necessity of war but primarily as the expression of his mystical vision of the German super-race. The military commanders and the Reich commissioners in the occupied countries were made directly responsible to him, which indicates the importance Hitler attached to the administration of these countries and the extent of his personal responsibility therefor.

Hitler acted with premeditation and deliberation in every one of the crimes that he instigated. He is guilty of organizing murder and torture, prostitution of women, abduction of children, blackmail, pillage, extortion, arson, receiving stolen goods, and false imprisonment. He revived slavery in the technical legal sense, as prohibited by international law. A decree which was promulgated in Riga on March 19, 1942, read:

Section 1. The Jews themselves shall not receive any wages.

Section 2 (1). Employers of Jewish labor shall pay a fee to the Financial Department of the competent District Commissioner, which shall be in accordance with established wage rates. . . .

The effect of such a decree is to make, legally, chattels of human beings. The Jews were put in the same category as work animals, whose owners—the German state—have the sole right to compensation. One should not overlook the fact that slavery is expressly recognized by international law as a specific international crime and that jurisdiction for the trial and punishment of such crime is available before the courts of the nation in which the person accused is apprehended.

Traffic in women, which Hitler fostered for the use of his armies, is also a specific international crime with admissible jurisdiction before courts of other countries.

It is recognized in international law that if a criminal, acting from political motives, commits a crime of an especially heinous character, he cannot claim the privilege of being a political criminal. Hitler must therefore be considered a common criminal. When one man is murdered, it is murder. We cannot accept the proposition that organizing the murder of millions is less than murder.

THE PLEAS OF SUPERIOR ORDERS AND ACTS OF STATE

The crimes of Hitler's associates will probably be defended on the pleas of superior orders and the carrying out of acts of state. A subordinate who carries out the orders of his superior in command may plead that the responsibility for his act cannot rest with him but with the person who issued the order. In German military law this plea is not accepted as an absolute defense. Even within the terms of their own law, members of the German military forces cannot successfully invoke such a plea.

The greatest and most atrocious crimes, however, have been committed by the S. S. and the Gestapo. The special character of these organizations precludes their members from invoking the plea of superior orders. The purposes of the S. S. and the Gestapo were understood by all Germans. They are organizations dedicated to murder, loot, and torture, outside of any civilized legal order. Enlistment was voluntary, and even if the volunteer was naive before his enlistment, the extended probationary and training period made inescapably clear the criminal character of the duties he undertook to perform. Persons professionally engaged in crime cannot defend themselves by pretending to have acted under legal compulsion.

All Hitler's associates will probably also use, in their defense, the argument that their deeds were acts of the German state. In international relations it has been an accepted principle that a person acting in the name of his state and with the authority of that state is responsible for such acts only before the courts of his own state, not before the courts of other states. This defense is inapplicable to Hitler's associates in relation to the crimes they committed while in office. To begin with, the state, as a legal entity, cannot be held criminally liable, and can offer only civil satisfaction. Crime is individual and personal. The exclusive responsibility of the state for its servants before international law can be admitted only if there are substantial grounds for trusting that the state will act in good faith against the criminal involved. It is obvious that these grounds will not exist in Germany. Even in the democratic Germany that emerged from the last war, before the judiciary was corrupted by Nazism, the war-crime trials were farcical.

These genuine technical and political considerations are conclusive. But even more fundamental is the fact that by accepting such a plea we should recognize the implied principle that a state can sanction crime. No civilized order can admit this principle without destroying the very basis of organized society.

[In a second article Dr. Lemkin will take up the question of crimes committed inside Germany against German citizens and of the judicial or political machinery to be applied.]

Wise Up, Civilian!

BY ROBERT FLEISHER

On the Italian Front

ABOUT one month after the assault on the Gothic Line began; a soldier at the front received a letter from his wife. It had been a month of bitter fighting under the worst possible conditions of weather and terrain. We had suffered during that month some of our highest casualties. "Listen to this," the soldier said. "Listen to what my wife writes: 'I am so glad you are in Italy instead of in France where all the fighting is.'"

The general laughter which followed was the loud, spontaneous laughter of the doughboy who has never really lost his sense of humor, but there was an undertone of bitterness in it that was not pleasant to hear. The soldier's letter might have been from a stranger.

Of course there has never been a war when a certain cleavage did not exist between service men and civilians. The division is the natural result of two completely different ways of life which produce a corresponding difference in outlook and perspective. But with millions of soldiers going into their second or third year overseas, the cleavage today is more pronounced and dangerous than ever before.

Any discussion of this phenomenon from the G. I. point of view must necessarily deal with specific gripes rather than with largely unavoidable contributing factors. No one can do anything about the natural resentment of the soldier who feels that others are making less of a sacrifice than he. It is this feeling that leads the rifleman to resent the company clerk, the company clerk to resent battalion headquarters, battalion headquarters to resent the base sections, and so on down the line until the whole army resents the civilian. And it is equally futile to try to stem the general weakening of even the closest ties with home caused by the long separation and a dozen other factors.

What the doughboy is specifically concerned with is the war-time mood of America as it reaches him through the motion picture, the radio, the press, and letters from friends and family. What is the country thinking about the war and about him; what can he expect in the future? In the absence of personal contacts over a long period of time, the soldier tends to rely on public forms of expression in feeling his country's pulse. And it is unfortunate that the same media which once presented America to the rest of the world as a country filled with cowboys, gangsters, and emotionally adolescent millionaires today present America to its soldiers overseas as a country filled with thoughtless, uncomprehending, still emotionally adolescent people who don't understand either them or the war and who don't seem to be bothered by it.

The man at the front is much too deep in misery, in death and blood and burned-out youth, to be dispassionate about any aspect of the war. And whether or not he is getting a true picture of home-front attitudes, he reacts bitterly to evidences of misunderstanding and ulterior motives. He hates his life, but he wants people to understand it. His war is the war around his hole. If he has a quiet day and comes through unhurt, then it's a good war. But if he catches hell and his buddy is blown up by a mine, then it's been tough, even though the day's activities may rate only an "all quiet" paragraph in American newspapers.

It doesn't help his frame of mind to learn that Hollywood, Crispy Crackers, and the Stitchless Sewing Machine Company are, by their own admission, making every sacrifice for victory. Too many people, he feels, are slapping each other, and themselves, on the back for the fine job they are doing, while nobody takes the trouble to learn what he is up against. It may be a selfish attitude, but he knows that his is the greater sacrifice, and recognition and true understanding are among his few rewards.

I once heard a soldier say with great bitterness after viewing a particularly bad war movie, "They make us look like fools. What do they think we're doing over here anyway?" It is typical of the motion-picture industry as a whole that it maintains an expensive research staff to be certain that the medals on King Henry's chest are the correct number of inches from his lapel, yet makes no effort to attain more than fleeting moments of accuracy in filming modern war scenes. And boundless is the soldier's irritation at the steady stream of "look what we are doing for the boys at the front" pictures.

Aside from his natural annoyance at being portrayed in a false light, the G. I. is upset by the thought that the people back home, his family and friends, accept these inaccuracies as gospel. A soldier does not go into battle wearing his ribbons, with his helmet strap buckled under his clean-shaven chin, and with a glory-bound look on his face. He does not stand formations and salute his officers under the eyes of the enemy. Above all, he does not say the things or think the thoughts which seem the stock in trade of Hollywood's war-time movies. The G. I. is firmly convinced that the whole country has these misconceptions. "That is what they are told and that is what they believe." When he says, "They don't know there is a war on," he means that civilians would rather believe the popular fables of the day than suffer the jolt of learning the real thing.

To a lesser extent radio programs and magazine articles, with the accompanying advertisements, are causing the same type of resentment here. Most of our radio programs are non-commercial rebroadcasts, and many magazines have overseas editions stripped of all advertising, but regular editions also find their way here and are so widely passed around that soldiers become familiar with the general character of their contents. In magazines the G. I. is interested primarily in things which pertain directly to him as a soldier—fiction in which the main characters are soldiers, articles about the army or about the soldier and the war. But he is embittered and frustrated by what he reads. Popular magazine war fiction, frankly escapist in nature and meant for home consumption, is no longer wanted even in places where reading matter of any kind is at a premium. The physically miserable and spiritually exhausted doughboy cannot stomach the wonderful life of the fiction soldier with his opportune furloughs to marry the heroine and his experiences that could never happen to a combat infantryman.

Even more antagonizing are the run-of-the-mill war-effort advertisements. The doughboy is proud of his equipment. He recognizes the production miracle which has provided the arms for him and the soldiers of a dozen other nations. But he has little sympathy with companies which feel it necessary to spend thousands of dollars a month to tell the world that their contributions are the backbone of every fight, that they too are making sacrifices, and that they will continue to make sacrifices until the war is over. And when soldiers themselves appear in the advertisement as part of the text or art work, the G. I. looks in vain for a shred of similarity between him and "those guys."

Racial Dialectic: Missouri Style

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

IN December, 1938, the United States Supreme Court ruled that Missouri must either admit Lloyd Gaines, a Negro, to the law school of the University of Missouri or provide, within the state, educational facilities equal in every respect to those available at the state university. The state court made a similar ruling in 1940 on the application of Lucille Bluford to attend the school of journalism at the University of Missouri.

The implications of the two decisions not only for the border state of Missouri but for the entire South were immediately recognized. The leading Southern newspapers expressed the view that there was no point in trying to evade them and that "skeleton graduate courses" for Negroes would eventually have to be established in all state universities. "Time," said the Raleigh, Missouri, News-Observer, "has moved under our feet."

The smallest law school in the world is now functioning at 4300 Ferdinand Street, in the heart of the Negro district of St. Louis. It is the law school which Lincoln University,

He has read, recently, of American business men who sought transportation to Belgium a few days after Brussels fell, to "look after their business interests." He has read of Paris importers eager to open shop at once. It is hardly necessary to report how this affects the fighting Infantryman, who takes out his disgust on the home front in general.

Finally, there are all the miscellaneous bits of information which reach the front-line soldier through his hometown newspapers and service publications. There are the stories of a town in Texas passing the hat so that General Patton may have a thousand-dollar bill to wave in Berlin, of the Sinatra "riots," of dances for prisoners of war. Tales like these come in every week and damage the solidarity between home front and fighting man.

Accounts of the coddling of German prisoners of war have by this time been pretty well discredited. Just how they started and how they reached the men overseas is not quite clear, but they did reach them and were believed, and that drove another wedge into the soldier-civilian gap. The denials, when they were forthcoming, were not nearly so well circulated as the original stories.

And now the doughboy reads of the elaborate preparations being made at home for the celebration of victory in Europe—of barbers planning to leave their lathered customers in their chairs, of storekeepers preparing to board up windows, of arguments over whether liquor stores should or should not stay open. I don't know how the soldiers in the Apennines will react the day Germany capitulates. They will be happy, of course, but I rather imagine there will be a note of dignity in their rejoicing, a quiet thankfulness for themselves and regret for their friends who aren't there. These men aren't sure how people figure it back home, but as far as they are concerned there is always the Pacific.

the state-supported Negro university, set up in 1939 in response to the mandate of the Supreme Court in the Gaines case. Seven students are enrolled—four in the first year, three in the senior year. The all-Negro faculty consists of three full-time instructors, one part-time instructor, and a librarian; there is also a clerical and secretarial staff. The school is housed in a building that would accommodate six or seven hundred students. Enrolment cannot be increased by the admission of white students, for this would be contrary to existing constitutional and statutory provisions, and it is doubtful whether even Japanese American evacuees from the West Coast could be admitted if any applied. Four of the present students are from St. Louis, one from the District of Columbia, one from South Carolina, and one from Louisiana.

In part the low attendance is due to the war, for thirty-four students were enrolled in 1939 and thirty in 1940, 1941, and 1942. The school was closed in 1943 for lack of "properly accredited" students—it is rumored that the failure to approve the credentials of applicants that year was part of a scheme to close the school altogether. There are only two Negro law schools in the country, the other being at Howard University, and Negro students throughout the South have written to Lincoln expressing an interest in attending the law school after the war. A number of Negro soldiers have also indicated their desire to enrol.

It is possible, therefore, that the law school may later become largely self-supporting. To the extent that it does, however, the principle of segregation will become more firmly established. For as the institution and its faculty expand, a new set of vested interests will be created. At present it costs the state more than $2,500 per year, per pupil, to maintain this Jim Crow institution, while the cost of sending students through the regular law school at the University of Missouri is but a fraction of this amount. Credit must be given the state for its compliance with the letter, if not the spirit, of the decision in the Gaines case. The law school is a first-rate institution. It has been approved by the Missouri Board of Bar Examiners and by the Association of American Law Schools. It boasts a law library of 31,000 volumes, one of the three largest law-school libraries in the South; its instructors are thoroughly competent, and its graduates have been readily admitted to the bar.

On the campus of Lincoln University at Jefferson City may be found the nation's most unique school of journalism, created in response to the decision in the Bluford case. Again the state has technically complied with the law. The school is housed in an attractive building; it has a workable library; it receives a large number of newspapers; it has a good print shop; the faculty is excellent; and the students get practical experience in editing a weekly newspaper. When it was first established, the faculty of the school of journalism of the state university at Columbia motored over to Lincoln three times a week to conduct classes, but the school now has a resident, full-time all-Negro faculty. About twelve students are enrolled. I visited a classroom large enough for forty or fifty students in which an instructor sat behind a desk with one student in front of him. It is possible that Negro students in the law and journalism schools are actually getting better instruction—certainly more individual attention—than they would at Columbia. The loneliness, however, for faculty and students, must be acute at times.

It is interesting to note that this ridiculous situation is not looked on with approval by the students at the University of Missouri. When the Lincoln Law School was opened in 1939, white students from Eden Seminary (Washington University) and from the state university established a picket line around the premises and carried placards with such inscriptions as "Old Jim Crow Is Dead" and "Smoke in St. Louis Is Bad—Prejudice Is Worse." In a poll taken at the University of Missouri last spring 60 per cent of the students favored the admission of Negroes to all divisions of the university and 70 per cent favored their admission to the professional schools. When the University of Missouri and the University of Iowa debated the question "Should Negroes be admitted to the state universities?" Missouri upheld the negative with some reluctance. After the debate a vote was taken among the students present. The result was 216 for the affirmative, 93 opposed.

Recently a delegation of white girls from the University of Missouri appeared on the campus of Lincoln University to interview some of the Negro girls. They asked three questions: (1) Would you be interested in attending the Missouri University School of Journalism if Negroes were admitted? (2) Would you expect to live in the same dormitories and belong to the same sororities? (3) Would you expect to date the white fellows on the campus? To each of these questions they received emphatic affirmative answers. The curious young ladies from Columbia seemed not merely satisfied but actually pleased by the answers. One of the delegates, a Jewish girl, said that the answers to the second and third questions had given her some new ideas.

The Missouri pattern of race relations was further complicated when St. Louis University decided last spring to open all its courses to Negro students. At present seventy-seven Negroes are in attendance. Contrary to the predictions of disaster, the non-Negro enrolment, despite the war, has increased 17 per cent since Negroes were admitted; the enrolment of white women has increased from 2,122 to 2,656. There has been no trouble in classrooms or on the campus, and white parents have withdrawn neither their children nor their financial support.

An interesting story lies behind the opening of St. Louis University to Negroes. Over a year ago, in the face of opposition from the hierarchy, notably from the Archbishop of St. Louis, some of the Jesuit instructors at the university began a campaign to force the admission of Negroes. Their efforts reached a climax in February, 1944, when Father Claude H. Heithaus, assistant professor of classical archaeology, delivered a militant sermon on race prejudice at the students' mass in University Church. "Ignorance," he said, "is the school of race prejudice, and provincialism is its tutor. Its memory is stuffed with lies and its mind is warped by emotionalism. Pride is its book and snobbery is its pen. All the hatreds and fears, all the cruelties and prejudices, of childhood are perpetuated by it. It blinds the intellect and it hardens the heart. Its wisdom is wonderful and fearful; for it never learns what is true, and it never forgets what is false." At the close of this memorable sermon—which should be required reading for all Catholics—Father Heithaus made a dramatic appeal to the students. "For the wrongs that have been done to the Mystical Body of Christ through the wronging of its colored members, we owe the suffering Christ an act of public reparation. Let us make it now. Will you please rise? Now repeat this prayer after me. 'Lord Jesus, we are sorry and ashamed for all the wrongs that white men have done to Your colored children. We are firmly resolved never again to have any part in them, and to do everything in our power to prevent them. Amen.' " The entire congregation rose in response to the appeal and repeated the prayer. Copies of the sermon had been printed in advance of its delivery so that no subsequent pressure, however powerful, could force a retraction. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch gave it wide publicity. The profound impression made by Father Heithaus on the Catholic community left the hierarchy no alternative to opening the doors of the university to Negroes.

The action of St. Louis University, with its attendant success, has placed both the University of Missouri and Washington University (largely Protestant-supported) in an extremely embarrassing position. The embarrassment is only enhanced by the curious circumstance that both institutions, while denying admission to Negroes, offer no objection to Japanese Americans. A dozen or so Japanese Americans are enrolled in the various professional schools of Washington University. Sooner or later the absurdity of separate professional schools—emphasized by the successful experiment at St. Louis University—is bound to bring about changes in policy at both Washington and Missouri. What is the University of Missouri going to do when a Negro applies for admission to its school of medicine or its school of mines? In either case, technical compliance, after the current pattern, would involve an expenditure of several million dollars. Fortunately, the people of Missouri will vote on a new constitution this month. Under Article IX of the proposed draft, the legislature could provide, if it wished, for non-segregated schools.

Characterized by one Southern newspaper as "a pebble dropped into a calm pool," the Gaines decision has set in motion a series of events which must ultimately culminate in the abolition of segregation in state-supported professional schools throughout the South.

Under What Banner?

BY JOHN SCHOLTE NOLLEN

IT IS time to bring the discussion of "peace-time military conscription" out of the clouds of rhetoric and generalization and to look at the concrete plans of our military authorities in their factual setting. The army command proposes a standing army of about 300,000 men, an equal number in the National Guard (as an evident concession to state pride), a permanent reserve of 400,000. In addition to this permanent establishment—totaling about one million men, presumably raised by voluntary enlistment—it asks for the compulsory conscription of all boys at age eighteen, amounting annually to about another million, for one year's military training. These young soldiers would then remain in reserve for perhaps six to eight years, receiving refresher training in the summer.*

Thus after eight years had passed, and thereafter in perpetuity, we should have about ten million men actively prepared for military service, and presumably all under training in the summer. This would of course imply an enormous staff of officers, who would need to be professionally trained in order to be kept at the height of ever-developing military science. It would also imply a military equipment somewhat on the scale of our present war equipment.

This grandiose plan for our military preparedness in time of peace can be justified by only one assumption, which is not unnaturally in the minds of our military leaders as an article of professional faith—namely, that there will be another world war within a few years; in which case the military prophets are quite clear that this country would be the first to be attacked. By whom? That question is left hanging in the air.

Meanwhile another presupposition is exercising the minds of the best political and economic authorities in the United Nations—namely, that it is possible to set up an international organization that will bring an assurance of peace, not only by curbing any aggression at the source, but, even more importantly, by removing the common incentives for war. Our country took the lead in implementing such international cooperation by calling a food conference, which was followed by Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks, and will be followed soon by the San Francisco conference. Out of our experience with national political organization, we know that such a world organization will not meet the demands of perfectionists at the start; it will naturally have faults which the future may correct. Can it be relied upon to keep the peace? Winston Churchill said last September to Lord Cecil: "This war could easily have been prevented if the League of Nations had been used with courage and loyalty by the associated nations." If the enfeebled League, without the cooperation of the United States, could have been so used, then surely the contemplated organization of the United Nations, with the active participation of the United States, offers a guaranty of future peace for which no unilateral military preparation by any one nation, however extensive, can serve as a substitute.

The bills for peace-time conscription laid before Congress allege "security" as the incentive for the proposed legislation. But recent history proves conclusively that in modern war no nation can be secure by its own might. France felt quite secure behind its Maginot Line and boasted of the best army in the world. Germany was assured that its invincible, conquering Wehrmacht and preponderant air force placed it beyond any danger of attack. Japan seemed in an impregnable position, shielded by the wide Pacific in its conquest of boundless natural resources. England is an armed camp, powerfully defended by sea and in the air, but millions of men and weapons are no defense against the V-bombs that have devastated London. Uniting against the threat of war is no longer a matter of choice for the nations; it has become a grim and inescapable necessity. There is no longer any such thing as unilateral security. Safety through national defense is a mirage. And the new weapons that are already foreshadowed in this war make the hope of an isolated peace more illusory.

We cannot have it both ways. We must pin our faith either to great military force for our solitary protection or to the pacific organization of the world, guaranteed by the united power of the nations that like ourselves have a will for peace. We cannot pretend at Dumbarton Oaks that we will cooperate heartily in world organization and at the same time by our acts repudiate cooperative effort. The United Nations cannot function in an atmosphere of mutual suspicion and distrust. They represent an act of faith, or are nothing. As a matter of course, we shall be ready to provide our share of the forces that may be needed for the policing of the world after the war. It would be fantastic to suppose that for this purpose we should need the huge armed establishment contemplated in the plans for peace-time conscription. And if it should be suggested that our eighteen-year-old conscripts be used to police the unruly nations, then we should have to repel such a proposal as an invitation to the wholesale corruption of our youth.

* This refresher training every summer would be necessary to keep the personnel up to date.

Universal conscription has been tried by many nations during the past century, and it has never yet produced anything but evil in the long run. It is by its very nature competitive and hence cumulative: it begins with limited objectives and then, as rival nations step it up, it demands ever more time and expenditure, until the burden becomes intolerable. It is an ever-present temptation to imperialist adventure. Our adoption of this obsolete measure would only serve as an added obstruction to the gradual disarmament by other nations which must follow the enforced disarmament of our present enemies.

Meanwhile we can await in complete safety the further steps soon to be taken to organize the world for security and peace. We have incomparably the most powerful navy and the most efficient air force in the world and a finely equipped and well-trained army. We have demonstrated overwhelming industrial power and efficiency. The present Selective Service Act can be extended to cover any real military needs as long as there is fighting to be done. We, above all other nations, can afford to prove our sincerity in the planning of world organization by refraining from an unexampled show of future belligerent power.

The problem raised by the issue of peace-time conscription is not primarily a military problem. It is primarily a political and economic problem, with most important educational and moral implications. For the first time in our history we are working resolutely, with the United Nations, at the solution of the political and economic problem. Our failure to cooperate twenty-five years ago was responsible in large part for the weakness of the League of Nations. We know now that it was a terribly costly blunder for us to withdraw into selfish isolation in that critical juncture. It would be a crime for us to repeat that blunder now. We have pledged our allies the utmost exertion of our national strength in the winning of the war. They need our honest assurance that we shall be loyally with them in the winning of the peace.

[Dr. Nollen's article opens a forum on the important issue of peace-time military training. Next week Irving Lipkowitz will present a different point of view in an article entitled Conscription Is Not the Issue. The Nation will be glad to have the comments of its readers.]

In the Wind

WE'RE ALL IN THIS TOGETHER: A man entered a New York restaurant last Friday and ordered ham and eggs. "No ham today," said the waitress. "This is meatless Friday. You can have frankfurters, bologna, or liverwurst."

IN 1930 HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY published "L'Italia nel Passato e nel Presente" ("Italy Past and Present"), an Italian reader compiled and edited by Ginevra Capocelli. One of the sections under Contemporary Italy, headed Fascism, consisted of three passages from "Social Peace and the Future of Italy" by Benito Mussolini; and under the title of the last section, The Political Organization of Italy, was a quotation by the same author: "All in the state, nothing against the state, nothing outside the state." A revised edition of the book is now being advertised. "Miss Capocelli," say the advertisements, "has substituted for material on Fascist Italy a useful supplementary selection of proverbs and axioms."

BOB PRINCE, a radio announcer on the staff of Station WCAE, Pittsburgh, conducts a news broadcast for Oswald and Hess Company, a local meat-packing firm, every day at 8 a. m. On February 9 he said he was about to report an item of great significance; he would not vouch for its truth, but was reporting it because it had not been denied by the government. The "news" was that the Administration was planning a world-wide Gestapo to which no person's private affairs would be immune. The alleged author of the plan was a sister of Justice Felix Frankfurter. Immediately after the broadcast a transcribed announcement said, "Rosenbaum's suggests you do not repeat rumors. They help the enemy."

ALEXANDER JANTA, author of "I Lied to Live," an account of escape from Nazi Europe, reports that the stories anti-Nazis in the liberated countries are now telling about the Atlantic Charter are of the same unprintable quality as Republican jokes about Mrs. Roosevelt. As for liberation, when a person asks for a match and forgets to return the box the owner says, "Pardon me. You seem to have liberated my matches."

HOW TO GET CIGARETTES: A man in Artesia, New Mexico, mentioned the great American famine in a letter to his son in the Pacific. By return mail he received a package of Japanese cigarettes.

FESTUNG EUROPA: The Nazis have commandeered all baby carriages in occupied Holland, and they are now rolling toward Germany loaded with civilian loot. . . . Anders Eek, a collaborationist pastor at Hedrum, Norway, has resigned. In a letter to his superiors he complained that he had been holding services in empty churches. Pastor Ravnan of Borgund, another collaborationist, has voiced a similar complaint: "Nobody comes to church any more. Yesterday it was only my family." But when an anti-Nazi pastor visited Ytre Rendalen to hold secret services, the church was packed. Thirty-three children were presented for baptism.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.]

Darlan Over Athens

BY PHILIP JORDAN

[Although it was written before the Yalta meeting and before an agreement was reached by the Greek factions in Athens, this article is still valid because it analyzes the basic fallacy in the Allied administration of liberated countries. We are glad to announce that Mr. Jordan, a leading English writer on international affairs, will be a frequent contributor to The Nation.]

London, January 16

EVER since the Allies sailed into the Mediterranean at the beginning of November, 1942, they have been making a mess of things. They began by appointing Darlan—happily, assassinated less than two months later—to the command of an empire which, under the terms of the Atlantic Charter, they were more or less committed to obliterate by moral example; and the list of their consequent follies is not yet complete.

It would be profitless to apportion blame in all but the actually present state of Greece, where the British government is now solely responsible for maintaining the pretensions of precisely those reactionary elements of European society which we had innocently supposed in September, 1939, we were at long last permitted to destroy. Yet even the Greek troubles have their roots in Allied rather than exclusively British policy; and it is worth while digging in historical ground so that we may examine their origins for a moment.

A year ago I was in Turkey, watching—so far as you can watch through the frosted glass of an enemy frontier—what was happening in Greece. Later all my documents were destroyed by fire, and I must therefore paraphrase what I then wrote. (My dispatches from Turkey were not fully published in England, for the editor under whom I then served considered them "indiscreet.")

I wrote then that, so far as it was possible to tell, the grant of co-belligerence to Italy, coming as it did on top of Darlan's appointment—to say nothing of our tenderness to Franco—must inevitably lead to civil war in Greece. The fact that we had treated with and shown exceptional favor to Badoglio, whose name in Greece, whether rightly or wrongly, stood for unpardonable villainy and reactionary corruption, could only encourage the Greek right to suppose that their crimes would be pardoned, and lead the left and center to a conviction that unless they did something about it, they would eventually be returned to the odious state in which Metaxas and their king had formerly conspired together to keep them.

From a military point of view, co-belligerence, the Greeks knew well, meant nothing. They had a somewhat more intimate knowledge of Italian martial qualities than the gentlemen of the British Foreign Office and the American State Department. They knew that, broadly speaking (and here I quote a famous Greek diplomat who escaped from his country in January, 1944), "if God Almighty Himself were to come down from heaven with a rifle in His hands, and on His bended knees were to implore the Italians to take up war on whichever side they wished, they would laugh in His face." They knew also that instead of encouraging the politically conscious workers of northern Italy to revolt, we were, at the risk of prolonging the war, blowing them to pieces with American and British bombs. It was a paradox that might have bewildered better men.

In the circumstances it was natural for them, cut off as they were, to suppose that the pattern of Allied diplomacy was a good deal clearer than in fact it is, and to believe that co-belligerence was a purely political device whose main purposes were to stifle the proper aspirations of the Italian common man and to replace one form of reaction by another. In this belief the leaders of the Greek revolt against the German occupation felt it necessary to reconsider their policies, and they came to the natural conclusion that their internal problems must take precedence over those which were external in their main content. Viewing Allied policy since the beginning of the Allied offensive in November, 1942—when, for the first time, deeds began to replace words as the yardstick of Allied intentions—they reasoned that the Allies were going to win and that unless they hamstrung their internal enemies while they were still weak and isolated from all but an indifferently applied German protection, the right-wing émigré elements and all that they stood for would eventually come sailing into power beneath the guns of the British fleet and would make common cause with the collaborators. An almost entirely right-wing demonstration in Athens on January 14 in favor of Scobie and the so-called truce shows how correct their estimate of the potential situation was.

Their reasoning may of course, on a long-term view, have been mistaken—it is yet too early to say that it was—but at least it was logical; and logic drove them to consolidate their power by attacking their internal enemies, the collaborators, fence-sitters, and other right-wing conspirators, before all these could command assistance from outside. There is nothing notable in the fact that these enemies were drawn from the right or tory element in Greece: the phenomenon of "right-wing collaboration" is common to all occupied Europe, and the only friends these gangsters have found in Britain are the Tory riffraff.

Yet it ill becomes this riffraff, led in Britain by the press-baron brothers Camrose and Kemsley,* to condemn the behavior with which they charge the leaders of the E. A. M., for they were the supporters of the Serbian, Mihailovich, * Camrose owns the Daily Telegraph, his brother, Kemsley, the Sunday Times and the servant girl's Daily Sketch, the three most irresponsible and unreliable newspapers published in London.

when he employed, in an inverted sense to be sure, precisely the same tactics to secure power in Yugoslavia. Mihailovich decided in 1942 that what he called the "Communists," by which he meant the National Liberation Movement, were a greater menace to his idea of Yugoslavia than the Germans, against whom the ill-armed forces of the N. L. M. were ranged, and he thereupon diverted the whole of his energies to their destruction. Whether he did this from wicked motives or from characteristic folly is not yet determined, but the only result of his decision was to turn himself into a German mercenary, and his Chetniks into German auxiliaries.

In lesser degree the Greek left and center diverted a portion of their strength against those whom they believed to constitute the greater menace to the future state; but as, for the most part, these were collaborators, there were times when they killed two birds with one stone. There were times also of course when they killed the wrong bird, and their enemies have wasted no time in proclaiming their inevitable mistakes. If Lord Camrose had cared to spend two pennies on a London telephone call to verify the accuracy of an atrocity story told against the E. L. A. S., he might not have made an ass of himself by publishing it.

All these facets of Allied policy, whose somber light alone seems to have engaged the attention of Greek patriots, gave added meaning to their belief that at all costs Churchill, wedded to the idea of kingship, was determined once more to place their old oppressor, the dull and stupid George, on the throne which he had disgraced. It is natural that they should have thought so, but my own belief is that they have done Churchill less than justice.

This is no place for an analysis of that remarkable man's character, and it would require a lengthy operation to determine the real motives which animate him in this matter; but this much seems clear—it is friendship and liking for the man, rather than a vague attachment to the romance of monarchy as such, that have moved the Prime Minister to stand in the way of an inevitable historical process which even he is not strong enough to halt. It may be that he does not yet understand the full implications of the world revolution in which he has played so notable a part and of the new values that men attach to liberty. As Metternich failed to understand the inner meaning of the French Revolution, so Churchill, it seems, fails to understand that of the new European, which is but part of a world, revolution, whose first results are now becoming visible in Greece and Yugoslavia. If he fails to understand, his fate will be the same as Metternich's; and the tide of universal desire—however much liberals may dislike it—will drown him, for if history has any lesson to teach us it is that no human agency, however powerful, can stem that flood when once it begins to rise, or, when humanity lurches, deviate it from its course.

By his trip to Athens and his subsequent forcing of the regency on a reluctant King, he has shown either that he is retiring to prepared positions the better to defend the last ditch or that he has latterly developed some vague understanding of the real and as yet hardly defined process of modern history. The truculence of his answers in the House of Commons on January 16 would seem to indicate the former. But perhaps it is too early to say which, with any certainty: we can only guess, and maybe it does not matter anyhow. He could not stop that process if he would. Or canalize it. Like the Mississippi it just keeps rolling along.

This diversion is a necessary part of this slight examination of root causes, for the role of Churchill in modern Greece has been somewhat misunderstood. For my part I am convinced that he desired for the Greek people what he conceived to be freedom, but that when for the first time he saw the face that contemporary freedom wears, he drew back from it in horror. It must be admitted also that the conduct of certain E. L. A. S. leaders is not calculated to endear them to decent men. As many Englishmen do, Churchill conceives freedom in the image of British constitutionalism and parliamentary values, and he falsely imagines that that admirable method of government for Englishmen is the desire of all men.

Exactly when he first caught sight of contemporary Greece it would be hard to say. Certainly until the middle of last May, and probably later, there was, by agreement with President Roosevelt, no intention of sending British troops into Greece. A militarily organized relief body, under the command of Major General Holmes, was to be the limit of our commitments. Its orders were to hand over supplies at eight chosen ports to whatever Greek authorities it might find there, and to do no more than provide assistance, when required, for their distribution. In this the UNRRA was to play no part but that of interested observer.

Long before the middle of May, however, it was obvious that the scheme would not work. It was obvious as soon as the Lebanon Conference closed in April that Papandreou could not count on any support from the E. A. M., whose claim, had it cared to put it forward, to become the government of Greece was infinitely better than any that he could make. Papandreou was a British nominee, had taken an oath of allegiance to the King, and in the eyes of the E. A. M. was pledged to the return of the King and all that that meant in renewed persecution of the left and center. Maybe they were wrong—it still remains to determine whether they were or not—but that is how, viewing matters in the light of Allied policy since November, 1942, they saw the situation.

Yet the truth is that by the spring of last year the monarchy had ceased to count: George of the Hellenes was no longer the real stumbling-block, and had no more chance of returning to Athens than young Peter has of returning to Yugoslavia. He had merely become a convenient symbol of Greek reaction, whose scattered elements were finding a new hope in Papandreou. It did not then pass unnoticed in Cairo that Papandreou stated privately that unless the E. A. M. agreed to cooperate with him whole-heartedly, he would beg the Allies to send troops to Greece when the hour of "liberation" should come.

Whether he did or not I do not know. I know only that British policy was reversed, and that British soldiers were used to fight those who had themselves done more to harass the German invader than any other corporate body in the state. Past Allied sins, as the left and center interpreted them, had maneuvered us into a false position from which we could not escape.

Sad and deplorable, yes, but inevitable. When, on, as far as I can remember, November 12, 1942, in a bedroom of the St. George's Hotel in Algiers, I heard General Mark Clark announce with pride that he had just appointed Darlan to the post of High Commissioner for French North Africa, I wondered what tribulation was in store for us. That we should antagonize the resistance forces of Europe and thus prolong the war, I could guess; but that we should force them to fight us I did not dare imagine.

And that is the Greek tragedy, it seems to me. We had to intervene, for by antagonizing our friends and holding out hopes to our enemies we made civil war inevitable; and it became our duty to limit it, regardless of political considerations. Our error was not intervention but the creation of internal conditions which made intervention necessary. And having started down the dirty path of Darlanism, we not unnaturally found ourselves on the wrong side. Yet our shame is not so much due to love of reaction as to fear of socialism; and fear, of course, is always more ignoble than love can ever be. Will the Foreign Office and the State Department please note? Above all, will Robert Murphy note that fact?

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

IN WAR time it is normal to receive little news from the enemy's country. But, paradoxically, we are getting even less from German territory that has been taken away from the enemy. It might have been supposed that with the entry of Allied troops into a German province the shutters would be taken from the windows, that one would be able to find there the first authentic answers to many questions of great import for the future, be able for the first time to study actual conditions and to observe the people's attitude toward the past, present, and future. It might have been expected that Allied public opinion would be given every opportunity to instruct itself freely in occupied German territory.

Just the opposite has been the case. News from German territory now in Allied hands, instead of being more abundant than before the Nazis were driven out, does not come through at all. This is especially true in the east. While Silesia was under Nazi rule, the Silesian newspapers were received in other countries, and much could be learned from the articles, announcements, decrees, and even the advertisements that appeared in them. There were also the correspondents for neutral papers, whose dispatches mentioned various happenings in the province. There were letters from Silesians to relatives and friends abroad. There was business correspondence between Silesian and Swiss or Swedish firms. When the facts thus gleaned were put together in a mosaic, they provided a considerable amount of information, and the province could not be said to be entirely cut off from the world. But all these channels for news were blocked by the Russian occupation, and no others have been opened. The dim-out which prevailed under the Nazis has become a total black-out. If it continues, the German settlement will be submitted to a public opinion in the democracies which has been deprived of any chance to form a picture of conditions in Germany. The settlement will be made in a darkness.

A columnist must bow to this situation. Interesting as it would be to cast a look around that part of Germany now held by the Allies, the only reports at his disposal are about the region behind the enemy's lines. One of these, published in the Arbeiter Zeitung of Schaffhausen, Switzerland, on February 6, is worth repeating. It tells of a twelve-year-old Polish boy whom the Swiss border sentries had found a few days before half frozen in the snow. According to the boy's statement, he had run away from St. Blasien, a little town in the Black Forest, because both his parents had been killed.

The family had recently been moved to St. Blasien, where the father was ordered to work on the construction of secret arms and ammunition depots in the forest. Gradually all who knew of this secret work were killed—shot in cold blood one after the other. Even the mother was not spared. After that the boy fled.

This is the first definite, concrete news of special preparations for resistance in the mountainous region of southern Germany. It may indicate that there is some truth in the rumors that the Nazis will make their last stand there.

Countless descriptions of the "new migration" in the Reich from east to west fill both German and neutral newspapers. Churning through a country picked bare of food, in bitter cold, the human flood presents a picture of misery that, in the words of a Swedish witness, "defies all description and is unprecedented in history." Especially important are the signs of manifold disintegration. A dispatch in the Stockholm Aftonbladet of February 2 runs as follows:

Desertions from the German army in the east have increased to unheard-of proportions during recent weeks. Particularly soldiers from Pomerania, West Prussia, and Brandenburg are making for home to save what can be saved. Because of the millions of refugees the authorities cannot exercise effective control. Informed circles estimate the number of deserters in the past four weeks at more than twenty thousand. Disobedience is increasing in all the front units, and morale has deteriorated strikingly. On Monday the 242d Grenadier Regiment had to be withdrawn from battle because entire detachments laid down their arms.

The Stockholm Expressen of February 6 reports that in all the eastern towns and villages that have been deserted by their inhabitants soldiers enter the houses "looking not only for food but, primarily, for civilian clothes. If they find something they can wear they leave their uniforms and try to make their way westward with the refugees."

The Gestapo seems to have begun the liquidation of all persons who ever had any connection with Russia. The Stockholm Aftonbladet said on February 3 that in the course of this "incredibly stepped-up terror" Count Friedrich Werner von der Schulenburg, former German ambassador in Moscow, had been arrested; also the former German Reichstag member Professor Otto Hötsch, author of several books on Russian history and publisher of a magazine dealing with Slavonic problems. The Svenska Dagbladet reports the arrest of a large number of "former politicians, of all possible shades of opinion, who might conceivably play a role in some future government." The newspaper added that in Berlin a list of ten thousand names has been drawn up—persons "who are considered unreliable and who will be compulsorily evacuated from Berlin as soon as the city is actually menaced. These ten thousand people include many of Germany's outstanding industrial and banking executives, officials, lawyers, and doctors."

BOOKS and the ARTS

SERMON ON A TEXT FROM WHITMAN

BY LIONEL TRILLING

DEMOCRATIC VISTAS" is Walt Whitman's most important single work in prose, yet it has never been familiar to American readers. For this there is some reason. The large pamphlet is the rather awkward amalgamation of two earlier pamphlets; it is often eloquent, but it is all too often marked by that dull explosiveness of syntax which Whitman found appropriate to his prophetic moods in prose; it is full of half-educated words and phrases—we hear of "the ostent," of "orbic bards," of "literatures," of "stores of cephalic knowledge," of the "vertebration of the manly and womanly personalism," jargon bad enough in itself, ridiculous in the man who made so much fuss about literary pretentiousness in others, but forgivable in the genius who was trying, outside the established intellectual order, to see the future and the truth. For all its faults of manner, the little book is great; and in any discussion of the relation of American literature to American life it is a central document.

As its name suggests, "Democratic Vistas" is about the future of democracy. The future of democracy is made to depend, in a sense, on literature. I say "in a sense" because in point of fact Whitman believes that democracy depends on a certain condition of mind or state of being which is not induced by literature alone, but here he is concerned to urge upon literature its duty of fostering this crucial emotion.

Published in 1871, the pamphlet is in part the expression of Whitman's disappointment after his nearly mystical experience of the Civil War. To Whitman, his nation had been justified by the war. The personal qualities of the young soldiers he had nursed in the Washington hospitals seemed to him to have proved what he called the "religious" value of democracy. In terms of human quality—and for Whitman this was the only criterion—the American experiment was a success. Yet the years after the war terribly denied that success. Whitman can admire the glow and bustle of national expansion, but he sees that behind the façade there is reason for dejection and despair. "Society in these states," he says, "is canker'd, crude, superstitious, rotten." He sees a lack of all "moral conscientious fiber." He sees hypocrisy, superciliousness, a false intellectuality; puny bodies; bad manners; tepid amours—"the men believe not in the women, nor the women in the men." The business classes are depraved, the class of civil servants no less so. It is in "Democratic Vistas" that Whitman makes the often-quoted remark about the grandeur of a well-contested American election, but now he feels that politics is no longer spontaneous and representative—"these savage, wolfish parties alarm me."

To find a way of national salvation he turns to literature. In part what he wants from literature is what every nationalist critic wants; it is what Goethe in his nationalist moments wanted—a national "myth," a moral identity for the country, what Whitman himself calls in a hideous but telling phrase, "an American stock personality."

But Whitman wants something more. He is in the great romantic tradition, and he shares as fully as possible the large romantic belief in the political mission of the "literatus." With affinities to Wordsworth, Shelley, Carlyle, and Arnold, his view of the relation of literature to politics is closest to Schiller's. I do not know whether he had read Schiller's "Letters on Art"—and certainly his statement is far less philosophically elaborate than Schiller's and no doubt the better for that—but like Schiller he conceives of literature as the intermediary between the necessary authority of government and the ideal condition of human freedom.

We must remember that for Whitman authority was no bad thing. He says that democracy may be defined by its free diversity, but he is not so naive as to think that free diversity can exist without authority. If "Democratic Vistas" begins with ideas derived from John Stuart Mill's "On Liberty," it goes on to speak handsomely of Carlyle's "Shooting Niagara," that desperate prediction of the anarchy democracy may bring.

The whole pamphlet is a tissue of such contradictions, or, rather, modulations. Whitman is always showing himself as a more complex intelligence than perhaps he wanted to be, or than many of his readers want him to be. We often hear that Whitman's thought is anti-dualistic. In actual fact, he lived in a world of dualisms—body-soul, past-future, mass-individual, liberty-authority, life-death. His characteristic way of thought is to support one term of a dualism, then hasten to protect the other. For him the oppositions, although antagonistic to each other, are not negations of each other. In more senses than one Whitman's view of the world was dialectical: the world as he knew it was the dialogue of the disagreement between the great antagonistic principles. In "Democratic Vistas" what concerns him is the antagonism between authority, the representation of the mass, the average, and freedom or individualism, what he calls "personalism." Democracy can exist only if authority can organize diversity; but democracy dies if authority encroaches on personalism. It is here, at this moment of delicate balance, that the call goes out to the poet.

It is not possible in short space to suggest the full richness and complication of "Democratic Vistas" or even to paraphrase all that Whitman says in it about literature. It is important to remark, however, how subtle a view Whitman took of the relation of literature to politics. He believes that literature is more important than congresses or acts of state, for literature affects the depths of a nation's scarcely conscious soul. He thinks that literature must deal with "the people," yet he does not think that it does its proper work by dealing directly with politics or by exposing social conditions. Indeed, Whitman is very firm against what he calls "the growing excess and arrogance of realism." The true poet, he says, works by "analogies," by "curious removes, indirections." In the face of the common belief that Whitman is the ancestor of the social realists, these words suggest that Marianne Moore, much more than Carl Sandburg, is his true descendant.

I said that Whitman made democracy depend on a certain condition of mind or state of being for which literature had a responsibility. "There is, in sanest hours, a consciousness, a thought that rises, independent, lifted out from all else, calm, like the stars, shining eternal. This is the thought of identity—yours for you, whoever you are, as mine for me. Miracle of miracles, beyond statement, most spiritual of earth's dreams, yet hardest basic fact, and only entrance to all facts." This, for Whitman, is the emotion which guarantees democracy.

It is worth observing that Whitman talks about personal identity, not about personal value. The sense of personal value is something very different. It suggests the comparative, the competitive—all the horrors of the struggle for status into which democracy, as we know it, corrupts itself. What Whitman is talking about does not permit comparison—it is the single absolute in the democratic conception.

Elsewhere in the pamphlet Whitman speaks of this sense of identity as the "centripetal isolation of a human being in himself," and goes on: "Whatever the name, its acceptance and thorough infusion through the organization of political commonality now shooting Aurora-like about the world, are of utmost importance, as the principle itself is needed for life's sake. It forms, in a sort, or is to form, the compensating balance wheel of the successful working machinery of aggregate America."

It lies as he says, "beyond statement," but he knows what it is, and he knows what it does, and he knows how it can be generated. Literature can generate it. But not literature only. Whitman himself got it from Italian opera, or from crossing Brooklyn Ferry, or from certain aspects of the sea. Mark Twain got it from the Mississippi and from Lake Tahoe, Thoreau from the woods—in the American experience it is commonly given by a certain relation to nature. In the human experience generally it is given by the full awareness and valuation of the biological crises—birth, love, death. Whitman, the poet of vital affirmation, got it perhaps most intensely from contemplating death. He thought that the coming American poets must have a deep consciousness of death. Whitman's very best poems are personal in theme; of these the two most remarkable are about death; and of these two even the great lament for Lincoln, When Lilacs Last in the Door-Yard Bloomed, is less fine than Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking, of which an English critic has said that it is "the world's supreme song of separation."

If you pick up Samuel Sillen's recent selection from Whitman—it is called "Walt Whitman, Poet of American Democracy" (International Publishers, $2)—you will not find Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking. Nor can this exclusion be accounted for by lack of space—not when Dr. Sillen gives us 35 pages of his own ideas about Whitman to 125 pages of the poet himself. You will not find it because Dr. Sillen "aims to present Whitman as a living force in the war against fascist barbarism as well as in the peace which America and the other United Nations seek to achieve through unconditional victory." And Dr. Sillen goes on: "Only a volume that is politically partisan in this sense could be truly representative of Whitman." To demonstrate an explicit partisanship Dr. Sillen selects much of Whitman's work that is of merely indifferent quality. We conclude that what is "truly representative" of a poet need not be his best work.

It is in line with Dr. Sillen's own political partisanship that he emphasizes the interest of the Russians in Whitman and Whitman's own considerable interest in Russia. This reciprocal interest undoubtedly has its significance; still, a less partisan editor would have kept it in mind that the French and German feeling for Whitman has been as notable as the Russian; or, remembering that Whitman's interest in Russia was shared by other Americans (Henry Adams and Brooks Adams among them), remembering too that Whitman could say in his large loose way, "The Russians I look upon as overgrown boys and girls," a more critical editor would have used a tone a little less like that of a church father finding in Vergil's Fourth Eclogue the prophecy of Christ. But Dr. Sillen wants a Whitman who is not only the poet of American democracy but also the poet of Russian nationalism and internationalism. He wants a Whitman canon that coincides with the ideals of current Russian thought. Whitman on the size of the country, on national growth, national loyalty, devotion to a leader, sexual acceptance, responsibility for oppressed minorities, confidence in a bulking material future, Whitman patting his country on its broad back—this is the Whitman Dr. Sillen wants, even though it is not always the poetically best Whitman.

And this Whitman Dr. Sillen "arranges"—but only 125 pages of him in a format that is most prodigal of space: the kind of arrangement Dr. Sillen wants requires a minimum of the poet. The arrangement is made "logically" in order to "help clarify [Whitman's] basic interests and attitudes." This language of a sociology major is perhaps odd when used of a poet who was concerned with the arrangement of his own works, although not much concerned with logic. But with such language Dr. Sillen cuts Whitman down to size. Thus, if Whitman says, "Do I contradict myself?/Very well then I contradict myself/(I am large, I contain multitudes)," Dr. Sillen, with a proper disgust at inconsistency, bustles to assure us that Whitman doesn't really contradict himself—this is Whitman for the peace table, at which, as we know, contradictions will be forbidden—and to comfort us with the thought that "the apparent contradictions may be united."

And "united" they are, just as if they were nations. For example, Dr. Sillen wishes Whitman to be as pious as himself in the matter of science and materialism. He quotes: "I accept Reality and dare not question it!/Materialism first and last imbuing/Hurrah for positive science! long live exact demonstration!" Perfectly characteristic—but Whitman

A new national best seller

STORY of a Secret State

BY JAN KARSKI

Poland is not political parties or Lublin Committees or London governments, but men whose hearts can be broken or filled with hope. This book tells the story of the Polish men and women who have lived through five years of war solely to make Poland into a humane, democratic state which will decide for itself who shall govern it. These are the people whose hearts now hang in the balance. This is their book, and only through them can you understand a nation for which Britain went to war and which is today dividing allies.

A Book-of-the-Month Club selection. Price $3.00

Written in Sand

BY JOSEPHINE YOUNG CASE

"The very poetry of adventure and high emprise . . . One of the breathless incidents of American history, handled here with fine understanding and warm psychological perception of character . . . comes very close to being a classic."—Boston Globe

$2.00

Looking for a Bluebird

BY JOSEPH WECHSBERG

A tender, wacky story about the life of a seafaring second-fiddler who fiddled the measure for a steamship company's long-distance joy rides through the Mediterranean. A new Houghton Mifflin Literary Fellowship book. $2.50 could also say, "To the cry, now victorious—the cry of sense, science, flesh, incomes, farms, merchandise, logic, intellectual demonstrations . . . fear not, my brethren, my sisters, to sound out with equally determined voice, that conviction brooding within the recesses of every envisioned soul—illusions, apparitions, figments all!" Dr. Sillen is not unaware that Whitman made statements like this second one. Indeed, his awareness constrains him to qualify his own remarks about Whitman's materialism. But he makes his qualifications in this way: "This is not to suggest that Whitman was a consistent philosophical materialist, for he never did cast off the idealistic elements of his thinking inherited from Emerson and Hegel."

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY • PUBLISHERS

Never did cast off—as if this aspect of Whitman's thought were a dead skin, as if everything that was characteristic of his mind, including the hurrah for positive science, did not arise from his idealistic metaphysics. Democracy certainly does not depend on philosophical idealism, but Whitman's own democratic impulse did spring from his idealistic philosophy. The "I" of Whitman—and this explains why it is often hard to identify ourselves with it as we read—is not always a person: it is often the personal image of the idealistic absolute. That is why Whitman contains multitudes—and contradictions. Walt Whitman, democracy, and the absolute are images of each other. They contain everything, even what Dr. Sillen with a quaint severity calls "devotees of a life relieved of social discipline"—a strange word, that "relieved": is social discipline then so burdensome?—and they contain both the moment when we love science and material things and the moment when we are not satisfied by them. They contain both our impulse of subordination to the interests of the mass of men and our impulse of personal identity, each giving health and value to the other.

One's-self I sing, a simple separate person,

Yet utter the word Democratic, the word En-Masse

These are the first lines of "Leaves of Grass" and they are the first lines of Dr. Sillen's selection. But Dr. Sillen's response is all to the second line: En-Masse delights him but not the simple separate person. As a consequence he omits from his selection Whitman's finest expression of identity, the great elegy Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking.

I am certainly not trying to take Dr. Sillen to task simply for omitting a single poem, no matter how fine. Nor am I trying to say that Whitman is not political or has no political relevance now, for I think quite the contrary is true. All over the world people and peoples, where they have not lost their lives, have lost their sense of personal identity to an extent painful beyond imagination. If a poet can possibly help restore it to them, Whitman is that poet. And as peace seems to approach, we, who will have some part of their fates in our hands, might well refresh ourselves on the nature of the hardest basic fact and entrance to all facts. Further, if the Russians now read Whitman avidly, as Dr. Sillen says they do, what a good sign it is, not merely flattering that a great ally should read our national poet but reassuring to those people, and they are numerous, who have kept some reserve about the Russian polity on the ground of its insufficiency of "personalism." Yes, Whitman is indeed a political poet, and relevant now.

And so I could understand it very well if Dr. Sillen, making a selection of Whitman with reference not only to America but also to Russia, had pointed to Out of the Cradle and said, "We in our democracy have had many failures, as no doubt you in yours. But we have had our successes too, and this is one—this poet of democracy who can feel this way about life, with this intensity, this ecstasy of love and loss, affirming in the song of our American mocking-bird our highest feelings about human life."

Had Dr. Sillen done this he would have been truly a political man, as Whitman was. But he is only a "political" man; he is unable to suppose that the Whitman of contradictions, of deepest simple personal feeling, can have reference either to American or to Russian democracy.

Dr. Sillen is committed to a political tradition of culture, which has, indeed, never looked with favor on the emotion that Whitman thought came in sanest moments, the emotion on which, as he believed, democracy depended. And Dr. Sillen's tradition of culture has of course had a considerable success, especially lately, when it has become demure and non-agitational, adopting—as in Dr. Sillen's introduction—the educational tone of those old professors of ours who knew what they were doing when they put us to sleep so that they could speak to our dreams. The chief reason for the success of Dr. Sillen's tradition is that all of us, latently and unconsciously, fear in ourselves the sense of identity, and wish to lose it.

The signs of this fear may be variously found. What seems now to mark our ultimate political hope is a willingness to give up all concern with the internal quality of the simple separate person and an unwillingness to believe that the adventurous expressions of art have an intimate relation to the adventure of political freedom. For instance, J. Donald Adams, with an eye to democracy, tells us that books of the future will take a certain reassuring shape, specifications to be provided by what he calls "the many." Or the liberal New York Post assures its readers that they do right to sneer at James Joyce: he is hard to read and does not advocate social legislation for the people. Or PM, for many the palladium of progressive thought, gives but grudging space to written literature, on the theory that the people are not interested in it. I remember the fishy—not hostile but perplexed—stare with which a famous liberal editor received my remark that culture was integral with politics; the gist of his polite reply was that some day we would finish with politics and then we would have literature. Of my friends of political good-will it might be said that their tolerant indifference to literature is in proportion to the personal salvation they hope to derive from their feelings of political good-will.

Well, political and social contradictions being now what they are, it is understandable that we should begin to fear even those vital contradictions, incident upon being human, which literature expresses—and why, like Dr. Sillen, we should suppose that they must be brushed aside for something we no doubt call a constructive point of view. For none of us quite likes himself these days, and so we are worried when a poet speaks of the sense of identity as being the miracle of miracles and also the hardest basic fact. Yet it is we, who despise ourselves and who fear the very thing points the road American policy must take if democracy is to win Asia and Asia is to win democracy

OWEN LATTIMORE

SOLUTION IN ASIA

Lin Yutang, Edgar Snow, Joseph C. Grew, Brooks Atkinson, Walter Lippmann, Quezon and many others have all had their say about Asiatic affairs. Who is right? What has happened to the government of China? What should we do with the Japanese Emperor? Will our liberal policy in the Philippines redeem us from the stigma of imperialism? Here for the first time Owen Lattimore reveals the interplay of forces in Asia as he has come to know them during twenty-five years of intimate acquaintance with Far Eastern peoples. This book will be read in every Foreign Office. Chiang Kai-shek will hear of it and so will Mao Tse-tung. The Japanese Imperial Diet will excoriate it and cartel mag-nates will try to dismiss it. Read it and see why.

An Atlantic Monthly Press Book • $2.00

JACQUES BARZUN

illuminates the whole question of our national culture while probing our educational aims and methods

TEACHER IN AMERICA

One of our most brilliant young philosophers and historians writes a provocative, personal commentary on American teaching. In the course of his wise and witty discussion, he includes a great deal that has needed saying about the individual's role in a democracy.

An Atlantic Monthly Press Book • $3.00

Captain FROM Castile

By SAMUEL SHELLABARGER

"There is a touch of Gil Blas in this extraordinary tale of Spanish conquest in the New World, and a savor of Defoe, and a liberal spicing of Dumas. Yet not in a single instance, from the first chapter to the final triumph... is the author without full command of his own authentic narrative, his style, his characters, and the period he recreates."

—Boston Globe

473,360 copies in print, including Literary Guild • $3.00

YOU WILL ENJOY READING

THE GREEN YEARS

By Dr. A. J. Cronin

Top National Fiction Best Seller according to the New York Herald Tribune Book Review. February 18. $2.50

YANKEE from OLYMPUS

Justice Holmes and His Family

By Catherine Drinker Bowen

An Atlantic Monthly Press Book
$3.00

CITIZEN TOUSSAINT

By Ralph Korngold

$3.00

PREJUDICE: JAPANESE-AMERICANS

Symbol of Racial Intolerance

By Carey McWilliams

$3.00

LITTLE, BROWN & COMPANY • BOSTON

that our democratic poet called the product of "sanest moments"—it is we who feel the responsibility of spreading democracy throughout the world. If there was ever a "contradiction" to scare us, here indeed is one within ourselves.

In modern times insurgent poets from Wordsworth through Baudelaire through Joyce have dealt in "contradictions" which they have expressed by paradox, strangeness, and even "absurdity." Their purpose has always been ultimately a political one; they wanted to shock us out of the way of seeing forced upon us by the political past and the institutional present. They have appealed beyond the institutional barrier to the sense of identity, knowing it to be spunky, alive, resistant—the basic fact and the hardest, hard enough to be the touchstone of every idea. Whitman was such a poet. I have mentioned Marianne Moore as such another. E. E. Cummings, not now in general esteem with people of high political feeling, is such another. There are many more. If I had the job of instructing anybody in democracy, I would send him first to the generous pages of these poets and say, "There is the hardest basic political democratic fact." And then I would point to Dr. Sillén's volume—not because it is in itself important and decisive but because it represents much that is—and say, "And there, as you will now quickly see, is its negation."

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

The more books we read the sooner we perceive that the only function of a writer is to produce a masterpiece. No other task is of any consequence. Obvious though this should be, how few writers will admit it, or having made the admission, will be prepared to lay aside the piece of iridescent mediocrity on which they have embarked! . . .

All excursions into journalism, broadcasting, propaganda, and writing for the films, however grandiose, are ephemeral. To put of our best into these forms is one folly the more, since we condemn good ideas as well as bad to oblivion. . . . Writers engrossed in any literary activity which is not their attempt at a masterpiece are their own dupes. . . .—Cyril Connolly in "The Unquiet Grave."

THIS is merciless advice, which Mr. Connolly himself does not live up to. He rubs it in with a quotation from Flaubert which is even more merciless:

The strongest have perished here. Art is a luxury; it demands white and calm hands. One makes first a little concession, then two, then twenty. One fools oneself about one's morality for a long time. Then one no longer gives a damn, and finally becomes imbecile.

Yet it isn't a bad idea to have these pronouncements tacked up over one's typewriter in a period when the purist—in writing, in politics, in morals—is in such bad repute, not only with the world at large, but with his own friends. And with himself.

Easy money makes cowards of us all. And one of the characteristics of this amoral age is that temptation is taken for justification. Cold cash has assumed the force of a moral imperative. "They offered me so much that I couldn't afford to turn it down." That statement is the epitome of moral confusion; yet it is generally considered an unanswerable argument.

The frustration and stultification of Hollywood have become one of America's tall tales, but few writers refuse a chance to work there. The temptee always assumes, of course, that he will make his pile quick and then get back to his "attempt at a masterpiece," or do it on the side.

And his friends can usually be counted on to encourage him in this rationalization, partly because they have the guilty feeling that if they were offered a thousand a week they couldn't resist it either, and partly because they are subject to the convention, which prevails in and out of Bohemia, that to turn down a thousand dollars a week for any reason whatsoever is per se foolish—a variety of social indiscretion.

Some people, to be sure, come back from Hollywood. I'm not particularly worried, for instance, about Katherine Anne Porter, who has just gone there.

For most, however, it's a one-way trip. Living conditions, I'm told, are pleasant. It's nice to have money. The climate is wonderful, there are good schools for the children, and the company is congenial, being made up of people with whom one has so many rationalizations in common.

The idea that one will get back to one's own work, though it is not discarded, recedes into the background. A new rationalization emerges. Once in a while you are able to "put over" something; one day you may get away with something really important. And aren't you "taking part in the life of your time"? These illusions combined with $1,000 a week or even $300 are as irresistible as the two halves of a prison gate.

And there's a device you can always fall back on, the device of being cynical about it, of treating the whole thing as a huge joke. Americans in particular have always had a capacity for laughing off their more troublesome emotions.

Hollywood is only the most dramatic temptation, and the most fabulous in terms of money. The business of doing something one has no respect for goes on continuously in other fields—the radio, advertising, mass-circulation magazines, and large areas of book publishing.

Never were the skills and trappings of talent so much in demand—and its real force and essence so little. Item: Almost by definition the talented individual is ahead of his time, at least by a hair's breadth; one of his functions is to push back boundaries. The social and moral code he must write to in films, mass magazines, radio, has long since been discarded even by the less enlightened elements of the population as a whole. Yet "they offered me so much I couldn't afford to turn it down."

I know that writers must eat. It might be a good idea if we invented a new word for writing in order to eat as opposed to writing. That would eliminate a great deal of confusion.

Writing is a marginal occupation and a private affair. The writer who produces a good book which happens to become a best-seller or is bought by the movies is just lucky—unless he thereupon begins to write with the objective of producing a best-seller or a film "spectacle."

I'm aware that much of the talent now being put to the use of "mass entertainment" is of the middling sort and that its possessors' attempt at a masterpiece wouldn't amount to

America's Far Eastern Policy

By T. A. Bisson

There is urgent need for this sound review of our Far Eastern policy, its failures and its successes. Mr. Bisson summarizes the historical background and analyzes recent diplomatic history and key questions of the future. $3.00

BALKAN BACKGROUND

By

Bernard Newman

This study of the complicated, colorful Balkan nations is "the best layman's interpretation of the past, present and future of that vital part of the world that has yet been written."—New York Herald Tribune Book Review. "A clear, authoritative and extraordinarily detached guide to chaos."—New York Times. $2.50

China: After Seven Years of War

Edited by H. K. Tong

Seven authors who know China at first hand tell how the Chinese people look, think, and fight today. They picture concretely the economic, social, and cultural conditions of the China behind the headlines. $2.00

The Journal of Mary Hervey Russell

By Storm Jameson

A subtle, restless, and sensitive mind is depicted in this fictional journal of Storm Jameson's leading character. It is a subjective account of life in Europe, of modern tendencies in art, of the coming of war, of refugee authors, of England under bombs. $2.50

A Submerged Nation

THE UKRAINE

By William Henry Chamberlin

Mr. Chamberlin recounts the Ukraine's history—a story of wars, famines, devastation—and pictures a courageous people with a fierce desire for freedom and national unity. He gives a trenchant analysis of their political prospects as a part of the Soviet Union. $1.75

BRAZIL: GIANT TO THE SOUTH

By Alice Rogers Hager

A unique presentation of Brazil by means of photographs and accompanying text. Not merely a picture book, it takes up systematically the history, geography, and government of Brazil, her peoples, customs, and cultural achievements. Photographs by Jackie Martin. $2.00

Brazilian Literature

By Erico Verissimo

This lively outline not only introduces the important literary figures of Brazil, but also reflects her history, philosophy, culture, and social scene. Written with humor and gracefulness especially for North Americans, by the author of Crossroads. $2.00 much. This tirade is not concerned with such of these as know their limitations and are happy in their work.

I admit that occasionally you do get "something good"—a fine bit of wit, a few hundred feet of first-rate uncorrupted characterization or exposition. But it is always imbedded in a mess of pottage, and so far as I can judge, the writer who thinks that the "something good" he gets away with will eventually raise the over-all quality of the mess of pottage is tripping over his own feet.

The scientist who shuts himself in his laboratory, on bread and water so to speak, in order to prove a theory is still considered a noble figure, even if he fails—though there are always those to wonder why he doesn't go into industry and make a lot of money. The poet in the garret has become the object of reproach and ridicule. Professional poets-in-garrets have had something to do with it. But mainly it is the result of social pressures operating on natural desires.

Society: It's stupid and weak to be poor.

The Writer: I'm as bright as anybody, brighter than most. Why shouldn't I have money too?

Society: Why should you set yourself above and apart from other people?

The Writer: It's pleasant to "belong."

Society: Unless, of course, you're a genius. But you'll have to show your papers.

The Writer: I don't know. I probably haven't anything to say anyway.

In the view of society, genius, like the jam in "Through the Looking Glass," appears only every other day. Every day, that is, except today. Who ever heard of a living genius?

SOME PEOPLE GO SOUTH for winter vacations. A friend of mine has just gone to Naushon Island, off Martha's Vineyard—and her report may divert others as it did me.

You take the 12:45 from New York and sit up all night. You get to Boston at 6:30. You take the 8:10 to Woods Hole and arrive there about 10. You sit a couple of hours in Mr. Tilton's house as he isn't ready to take his boat out yet because of the ice. Mrs. Tilton does not allow you to smoke, and you are too weary and depressed to go out and lean against a lamp post and indulge this vice. You get on Mr. Tilton's boat about noon and go into the tiny cabin while he tries to get unstuck from his mooring, which he finally does.

After a shuddering, groaning journey through three or four miles of water in which your little matchbox boat is acting as Miss Strong Prow, the Ice Breaker, you get to a wharf on Naushon and are bundled off, still in your New York clothes.

But this is by no means the end of the journey. A large lunch, dinner really, is plunked down in front of you. Then you're off again. You sit high up on the seat of a heavily loaded wagon (no automobiles allowed) next to George, the hired man. It is a marvelous drive. The Corniche has nothing on it in some parts. The road winds along the shore line nearly all the way. Sometimes you are high up on the cliffs, sometimes on the beach, where the sand is frozen hard and makes a perfect trotting course. At one point nearly a hundred cattle came in sight. And the deer sailing over the slopes were beautiful to watch. But it is four miles' worth of beauty and delight, and the coldness of that two hours takes part of the joy away.

Today I rode a nice quiet horse along the same road. We rode about eight miles to have a look at the sheep, about five hundred of them, and two new-born lambs.

There's much more to tell you—about a dangerous trip to Martha's Vineyard, about being shot at today by the Oceanographic scientists. . . .

The Wide Prospect

Who could have figured, when the harnesses improved
And men pumped kobolds from the coal's young seams
There to the west, on Asia's unrewarding cape—
The interest on that first raw capital?
The hegemony only the corpses have escaped?

When the earth turns, the serfs are eaten by the sheep;
The ploughland frees itself from men with deeds.
The old Adam sells his hours to an alderman
(Who adds them, in Arabic, down his black books);
Men learn it takes nine men to make a pin.

The star-led merchants steer with powder and with steel
Past dragonish waters, to the fabled world
Whose ignorant peoples tear the heart with stone.
Their lashed lines transport to the galleons' holds
New vegetables, tobacco, and the gold! the gold

That cracked our veins with credit, till the indices
Of old commodities were meaningless as Christ,
Till serf and lord were hammered into States
The lettered princes mortgaged for their lace
To lenders shrewder than Poor Richard, crude as Fate.

What traffickers, the captains! How the merchants war!
Beneath their blood and guilt swim like a shade
Black friars who survey with impartial eyes
The flames where Fathers or the heathen die,
Who bless alike the corpses and the Trade.

Here the horseman—steel, and backed with wings,
The salt sails rising from the centuries—
Holds laws: the tables flash like steel
Under the hollows of the high head, whitening
The eyes that watch unseeing, like coins,

The deaths of the peoples. They are entered in his books;
For them he keeps, as God for Adam, work
And death and wisdom. They are money.
Their lives, enchanted to a thousand forms,
Are piled in holds for Europe; and their bones

Work out their ghostly years, despair, and die.
The mills rise from the sea. . . . The mother and the son Stare past the ponies of the pit, to wheels
Beaten from their iron breath, to shuttles
Threading their gnarled unprofitable flesh like bones—

Whirled on pulleys to the knife, drayed to the shuttling tramps,
Through post or mission, the long bolts of their lives
Run out, run out: the flesh lasts to those last isles
Where in mine and compound the man-eaters die
Under the cross of their long-eaten Kin.

All die for all. And the planes rise from the years:
The years when, East or West, the cities burn,
And Europe is the colony of colonies—
When men see men once more the food of Man
And their bare lives His last commodity.

RANDALL JARRELL

UNIVERSITY

UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS • THE UNIVERSITY OF

IMPORTANT BOOKS

FROM
*Chapel HillTHE WILSON ERA: YEARS OF PEACE,

By JOSEPHUS DANIELS 1910-1917

WHEN Josephus Daniels is talking and the period is one of the great periods in United States history, there is much of entertainment and much of solid value to be had from listening . . . a delightful book, rich in material and mellow in temper."—Chicago Tribune

Illustrated with contemporary photographs and cartoons
2nd printing. $4.00

BLACK WIDOW
AMERICA'S MOST POISONOUS SPIDERBy RAYMOND W. THORP and WELDON D. WOODSON

A BOOK for lay readers as well as scientists, popular in style yet scientifically accurate.
Illustrated. $3.00

WHEN WE'RE GREEN WE GROW

By JANE SIMPSON McKIMMON

THE story of pioneering in home demonstration for farm women, 4-H Clubs for girls, community canneries, and women's markets, told by a North Carolina woman who blazed the trail. illus. $4.00

At your bookstore

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY COOPERATION

By GEORGE N. HALM

THE first full discussion of this subject to include all the proposals leading to and resulting from the Bretton Woods Conference. A definition and analysis of international monetary cooperation, of the gold standard and its possible alternatives as they relate to international trade and peace. $4.00

WHAT THE NEGRO WANTS

By RAYFORD W. LOGAN and others

I STRONGLY urge that you read "What the Negro Wants" . . . a program that can be used by all people of the United States . . . not just Negroes alone."—Chicago Daily News

3rd printing. $3.50

And these outstanding successes

RANGER MOSBYBy V. C. JONES Illustrated. 4th printing. $3.50MY AUNT LOUISA AND WOODROW
WILSONBy MARGARET AXSON ELLIOTT
2nd printing. $3.00PATRICK GEDDES:
MAKER OF THE FUTUREBy PHILIP BOARDMAN
Illustrated. $5.00OUR JUNGLE DIPLOMACYBy WILLIAM FRANKLIN SANDS in collaboration with JOSEPH M. LALLEY
2nd printing. $2.50

UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA PRESS • THE UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA

"An Uncertain Sound"

DEMOCRACY UNDER PRESSURE: SPECIAL INTERESTS VS. THE PUBLIC WELFARE. By Stuart Chase.

The Twentieth Century Fund. $1.

MR. CHASE has devoted this volume of his post-war series to the thesis that our political and economic order is threatened by the group selfishness of the organized pressure blocs, who put special interests—be it of business, labor, or agriculture—ahead of the interest of the nation. He recognizes that it is impossible at this date to do away with group action either in the market-place or in the halls of Congress and return to the pure atomistic society of Adam Smith's dream. But he believes that a solution can be had by legitimizing the various economic interest groups and coordinating them under the leadership of government so as to achieve the common good of all. He would have our post-war economic programs worked out by round-table collaboration among the representatives of business, labor, agriculture, and government.

In the words of E. H. Carr, which Mr. Chase quotes as summing up his own thesis, "the issue is whether to allow social action to depend on the haphazard outcome of a struggle between interest groups or to control and coordinate the activities of these groups in the interest of the community." So stated, Mr. Chase's thesis is as unobjectionable as the preacher's sermon against sin. Unfortunately it is just about as superficial. Of course we always have to contend against the "old Adam" in human nature, but most of the time it is more practicable to eliminate the underlying maladjustment, be it in the life of the individual or in the life of society, before taking on the moral task of the first against sin and selfishness.

Not only does Mr. Chase fail to segregate the fundamental maladjustments of our society before tackling the problem of group sins and group greeds, but he is led to characterize as sins what many people have been taught to regard as virtues. Under the head of pressure-group activities that equally need social control and coordination he lumps together such things as the trend toward monopoly and business men's lobbies for high tariffs and other special favors, the development of collective bargaining by labor and government efforts to help organize labor by legislation, the economic organization of farmers and the various New Deal—and pre-New-Deal—measures to raise farm prices and farm income. All activities which restrict competition by economic or political means are put in the same basket as examples of group selfishness needing to be controlled in the social interest. This is reminiscent of the school of economic thought which used to attribute all our troubles to the "rigidities" introduced by the various economic groups and made no distinction in their condemnation between concerted action by business to raise prices and concerted action by labor to raise the level of wages. Mr. Chase would do well to meditate on Anatole France's observation about "the majestic equality of the law, which forbids rich and poor alike to beg, to steal, and to sleep under the bridges at night."

But granted that all groups, at one time or another and in one degree or another, overshoot the mark in their collective actions and indulge in anti-social selfishness, how important is the whole disease of "pressure-groupitis" in the context of our basic economic problems? "Pressure-groupitis" becomes significant only when we attempt to direct the economy in the path of national interest and national purposes. This is the case in war time, and in war time it may be truly said that the group selfishness of one bloc or another is a threat to the national purposes and that we should work to remove such threats by enlightened round-table collaboration between groups.

But who can say that our peace-time economy is guided by clear-cut national purposes? Everybody who knows the economic facts of life is aware that our economy is run in accordance with the religion of the profit system, the religion of perpetually expanding investment. Under that religion, which has been imposed on the whole community by the business classes, bread and jobs for the many are made to depend upon the existence of opportunities of multiplied profit for the few. When the owners of profits and savings have an opportunity to multiply their possessions by investing in new profit-yielding capital plant and equipment, then the rest of us have a job and eat. When they don't have such an opportunity, there is unemployment and starvation in the midst of plenty.

In the past this religion "worked" in the sense that periods

Why is it hard to get a copy of Ernie Pyle's

BRAVE MEN

WE KNOW that many people are having difficulty obtaining copies of America's No. 1 non-fiction best seller, and we want to explain the situation and suggest a course of action.

By publication day, November 21, 1944, we had shipped 212,736 copies to bookstores against advance orders, and were holding orders for 20,000 more to be shipped in December. This done, we were out of stock many days before Christmas because our 1944 paper quota was exhausted. Orders continued to pile up, and when the new edition was ready on January 20, we shipped 80,000 copies. We are now out of stock again, and holding orders for 50,000 more copies, which will be filled at the end of February.

If your bookseller is out of stock at the moment, we advise you to place an order with him now, to be filled out of his next shipment from us. We are supplying him as rapidly as we can, and as long as our 1945 paper quota holds out. $3.00

362,736 copies sold
exclusive of BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB

of high employment and a full dinner pail alternated with periods of mass unemployment and empty stomachs. Under contemporary conditions, however, the investment religion cannot even produce the "boom and bust" of the traditional business cycle. Without government spending, which they hate, and without high taxation of business profits, which they hate still more, the priests of Baal cannot light the fires of prosperity under the economic altar even on a temporary basis. They couldn't do it under Hoover, and they couldn't do it under Roosevelt—and still less will they be able to do it after the war.

That is the situation we face, but that is the situation nobody wants to talk about. Instead, we find reactionaries and liberals alike all talking about eliminating sin and getting around the table to work for the common good. Reactionaries do this as a way of distracting people's attention from the fundamental problem and preventing action on it. Liberals like Mr. Chase do this, I suspect, as a cover for the attempt to smuggle in a few feeble treatments for the underlying malady.

This type of deception may serve the reactionaries' purpose of preventing action. But how can it serve the liberals' purpose of facilitating constructive change? As the recent hearings on Wallace showed, the reactionaries aren't fooled one bit by the liberal talk of "let's all pull together and we'll make the profit and investment system work better than it ever did before—and we'll reduce taxes and pay off the debt, too!" They continue to sit on the lid and hold on to their power. At the same time the liberals forfeit their one chance of mass support for a program of peaceful, constructive change in advance of collapse and chaos, by failing to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. "For if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself to the battle?"

BENJAMIN GINZBURG

BRIEFER COMMENT

"I Muse Upon My Country's Ills"

IT IS WELL KNOWN that Herman Melville was more of a poet in his prose than in his poetry. Whole passages from the novels fall into a blank verse which, by comparison with the formal poetry, is richer in imagery and bolder in movement. The following, which I print as verse, is a passage from "Moby Dick" on the Pacific Ocean:

And meet it is, that over these sea-pastures,
Wide-rolling, watery prairies and Potters' Fields
Of all four continents, the waves should rise
And fall, and ebb and flow unceasingly . . .

It is true that in the next clause the meter breaks down; but so it does in numerous passages of the actual poems; yet there is no evidence that Melville as a poet was a vers-librist on principle. His verse is nevertheless worth studying, and F. O. Matthiessen's "Herman Melville: Selected Poems" (New Directions, $1) is admirably edited and prefaced. Oddly, Melville seems to have regarded verse as primarily a medium for speculation on politics, history, and religion; and much of his thought consists in reflecting on this country's destiny. Thus there are the reflective Battle Pieces, inspired

"Packed with dynamite"

—Chicago Sun

The Secret History of

THE WAR

By

WAVERLEY ROOT

DID YOU KNOW—that in 1942 a group of German generals formed a junta with the purpose of upsetting Hitler—and that these were the same men who appeared again last July in the attempted assassination of the Führer?

DID YOU KNOW—that a guerilla army of 8000 Koreans is fighting the Japanese in Manchukuo?

DID YOU KNOW—that Germany's first plan for taking over Austria was to murder von Papen, her own ambassador in Vienna, and blame Austria for it?

DID YOU KNOW—that German foreign minister von Ribbentrop was sure England wouldn't fight when Germany attacked Poland?

These are a very few of the scores of hitherto little known or unchronicled facts described at length in Mr. Root's fascinating volumes—a work that is vital to a better understanding of the bewildering and cataclysmic world events of the past five years.

"Root has done a magnificent job. He has integrated seemingly isolated phenomena of a world gone berserk into a single coherent story which makes sense. . . . Encyclopedic though it is in scope, it makes enthralling reading."

—John Courmos, Chicago Sun

Two Volumes, Boxed $10.00

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York

by the Civil War; the curious poem, The House-Top, which is magnificent in its specifications if not in its doing and which was provoked by his distress at the violence of the draft rioters in 1863; and the long philosophical dialogue, Clarel, of which Mr. Matthiessen prints several fragments. Yet Melville appears never to have reached any clear diagnosis of America's ills. Faith in the country's future merges into black misgiving; belief in the common citizen gives way to platonic fear of the mass state; love of country is counterbalanced by the typically Melvillesque yearning for a state of paradisiac innocence, and in a speech given to one of the characters in Clarel this Eden wish is fused with the theme of national pessimism.

They felt how far beyond the scope
Of elder Europe's saddest thought Might be the New World's sudden brought
In youth to share old ages' pains—
To feel the arrest of hope's advance,
And squandered last inheritance;
And cry—"To Terminus build fanes!
Columbus ended earth's romance:
No New World to mankind remains!"

Melville said of Benjamin Franklin that he was grave without being serious. Melville himself was surely both; and some of the greatness of his temperament appears, however garbled and attenuated, in his poetry.

F. W. DUPEE

40,000 COPIES IN PRINT

"A surprisingly honest book for a democracy to be able to produce in the middle of a war."

—Joseph Bernard,
Herald Tribune Books

Under the General Editorship of

Sumner Welles

● "The best current book promoting an understanding of the peoples of the world."

—Board of Judges of East & West Association

● "A grand book and a 'must' book, full of vastly valuable knowledge."

—Frederick L. Schuman, PM

86 Countries • 61 Maps • 8" x 11"

$3.75 at your bookstore

THE DRYDEN PRESS

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Text for Germans

IN "GERMANY BETWEEN TWO WARS" (Oxford, $2.50) Lindley Fraser has tried to make "a study of propaganda and war guilt," to contribute to Germany's reeducation (his book is intended to be read by Germans after the war), and to guide British and American officials who will be in contact with Germans. In addition, Mr. Fraser has made use of propaganda broadcasts which he delivered to Nazi Germany in his capacity as news commentator of the B. B. C. The result of this potpourri of purposes is an incomplete study of propaganda and war guilt whose educational value remains doubtful. Mr. Fraser devotes a large part of his book to the stab-in-the-back and other German legends about World War I, but he does not even mention such basic facts as the fateful role of the first President of the German Republic, Fritz Ebert, whose alliance with the generals frustrated the German revolution and prevented a thorough house-cleaning in Germany. Where Mr. Fraser deals with Nazi propaganda proper and the origins of World War II he runs the danger of boring his expected pupils—certainly more liveliness is needed for educational purposes. Such statements as "For the National Socialists, in fact, propaganda was primarily and essentially a means to an end" leave the reader wondering what else propaganda should be. In talking about the future Mr. Fraser has the bad taste to refer the German to the hypocritical slogans of the old sinner Pétain. In fact, Mr. Fraser, viewing the future, overlooks the same point he has missed in viewing the past: nations do not condemn themselves. Their normal means of breaking with the past is revolution. The "spiritual purification" Mr. Fraser desires for Germany will come when the Germans themselves purify their hands with the blood of their former leaders. Such action was prevented in 1918 by fear of disorder. Will it be prevented again?

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN

Slavery and Economics

THE BRITISH INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION is a field well plowed by historians, but Professor Eric Williams of Harvard University proves that the intensive cultivation of special plots can still yield a worth-while crop. In "Capitalism and Slavery" (Chapel Hill, $3) he has given us a scholarly but incisively written study of the part played by the slave trade in the growth of capitalism and of the part played by a ripened capitalism in the downfall of slavery in the British West Indies.

In his preface Professor Williams asserts that he has not undertaken "an essay in ideas or interpretation" but "strictly an economic study." Be that as it may, he reveals himself as a hard-bitten economic determinist who refuses to see much virtue in the Abolitionist movement beyond its recognition that the game was up.

While it lasted, the triangular trade between Britain, West Africa, and the West Indies, a trade in which the middle and most essential link was black man-power, was a very profitable game indeed. It laid the foundations of some of the most respectable family fortunes in England; it provided part of the capital which financed the Industrial Revolution. But in that fact, as Professor Williams points out, lay the seeds of the system's decay. Britain's new factories were geared to world trade. They were hampered by the monopolies and restrictions of the mercantile system; they wanted to sell everywhere and buy in the cheapest market. Thus the vested interests, which in 1750 were ranged solidly behind the institution of slavery, by 1830 had turned solidly against it—at least in so far as it acted as a prop for the West Indian sugar monopoly. There was no objection to buying slave-grown cotton from the Carolinas or Brazil.

Professor Williams, I think, pushes his economic determinism too far at times. True, the Abolitionists could make little headway as long as the economic climate was adverse. But their efforts certainly hastened the end, and most of the active "saints" were truly disinterested even if rationalized self-interest was the motive of some of their financial backers. However, we can agree about Wilberforce, one of the most disagreeable "do-gooders" in history, whom Professor Williams finds "small" and "smug" and, as a leader, "addicted to moderation, compromise, and delay."

KEITH HUTCHISON

Western Childhood

WHEN HE ISN'T TANGLING HIMSELF UP in child psychology, Harvey Fergusson, in his "Home in the West" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2.75), tells an interesting story of his pioneering forbears and his own childhood and youth in Albuquerque, New Mexico. Mr. Fergusson apparently decided to go to town in this book and give us, with the help of Freud, John B. Watson, and Harry Emerson Fosdick, no doubt, the results of what he calls "an inquiry into my origins." He even has an Appendix telling about split personalities and all.

It is hard to see what all the psychology is about. Both Mr. Fergusson's grandfathers were personable; his father, a Democratic Congressman, bored him with his speeches; his mother was a good sort who let him alone. There is a chapter, reminiscent of Lincoln Steffens, on how he liked to ride horses and go off by himself on long hunting expeditions. He was apparently a brooding little boy (how come he omits, "The thoughts of youth are long, long . . .?"), and he says that he was a "rebel," though he admits that he was not clear about what he was rebelling against. One appealing passage in the book is his description of his detestation of the military school he attended, which gave him a lasting aversion to military life.

But surely almost every boy, whether he grows up in Albuquerque, New Mexico, or Baraboo, Wisconsin, or West Seventy-third Street, New York, likes horses, likes to go off by himself, has his rebellious moods, and likes to chase giggling little girls through darkened parlors.

It seems to this reviewer that the author makes an undue fuss about these matters, especially the last. He has a whole chapter about his early sex life called The Dark Flower. Mr. Fergusson uses none of the words which he calls "forbidden," and we are glad to hear that he emerged "pure" from the various bordellos to which his evil-minded companions dragged him, but we don't quite understand why he brings up the subject at all, in view of the highly inconsequential results of his dalliance with venery. His is the feeblest of wolf songs.

Strangely enough, Russell Maloney in a recent issue of the New Yorker devoted more than a devastating page to pointing out that Mr. Fergusson is superficial. Mr. Maloney says that the book, with all its detailed description of life in the Southwest, leaves out Mr. Fergusson. But how does Mr. Maloney know that Mr. Fergusson has been left out? I would say he's all there.

MC ALISTER COLEMAN

FICTION IN REVIEW

JUST as my response to Edith Morris's much too sensitive and poetical first novel, "My Darling from the Lions," was divided between impatience with its feminine excess of style and admiration for a talent that asserted itself quite despite so much artfulness, so my response to Mrs. Morris's new book, "Three Who Loved" (Viking, $2), is again compounded almost equally of irritation and compelled respect. The volume contains three stories on a common theme—the power of love to irradiate the world. In Kullan the animal joy of a little country serving girl is made to transform the lives of the city women she works for; in The Melody an idiot child works the spell of love on a bitter loveless village; in A Blade of Grass love of their teacher performs miracles upon a group of benighted slum children. Love, love, love: so much virtuous motive bound into one small volume would alone be enough to turn me against it. But in addition Mrs. Morris continues to write in an all-on-tiptoe-with-wonder-at-life prose which is perfectly matched to her ecstatic material. Yet it is within her power so sharply to project a mood that, for long after I put down something she has written, it reverberates—and with considerable pleasantness—in my memory.

As I say, this also happened with "My Darling from the Lions," and I have been wondering what accounts for Mrs. Morris's ability to involve and charm me against, as it were, my better judgment. In part, of course, it must be simply—or not so simply—the communicating power of her creative intensity. But I think it is also in large measure the Swedish setting of her stories, her use of an environment that is so lacking in the usual touchstones of sordid reality that it becomes a Never-never Land of poetic possibility, a fairy-tale country where there is just enough of the recognizable paraphernalia of our own lives (birth, death, bread, cheese, flowers) to give point to the moral lesson. I very much doubt that the stories in "Three Who Loved" would maintain their fairy-tale appeal, or exercise the charm they do, if they were to be translated from their present setting to the familiar world of, say, Rhode Island or Illinois.

In quite a different direction I have also been trying to explain to myself why I enjoyed another of the books I read this week, "Two Solitudes" by Hugh MacLennan (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $3). I have a pronounced distaste for fiction that undertakes to educate, and here is a novel which is not only pedagogically inspired but has a subject that, to my poor political imagination, has never seemed very urgent. Mr. MacLennan writes about the problems of Canada, which, compared with all other sections of this sad earth's surface—or so I like to comfort myself—has no problems; yet he not only impresses me with the importance of his theme but makes the instruction palatable. The double loneliness of his title refers to the separation between the English Canadians and the French Canadians; and such drama as the book achieves is evolved from this stupid division of a house against itself. "Two Solitudes" has little true drama, however; nor is it by virtue of narrative, characterization, prose manner, or any other of the expected skills of fiction that it makes its way; on any of these counts Mr. MacLennan's novel is more workmanlike than gifted. I suspect, then, that what we have in this case is one of those rare instances in which an author's seriousness and decency do a very good job as proxy for art.

DIANA TRILLING

MOTION PICTURES

Yes! SHE'S REAL, ALIVE
AND LOVELY
in a Walt Disney
picture with Donald and his pals in
the same scenes!
It's amazing, wonderful
and thrilling!

The Three Caballeros

NOW! Brandt's GLOBE Theatre
Doors Open 8:30 A.M. Broadway at 46th Street.

G. C. F. presents

MR. EMMANUEL

A Two Cities Films production made in London
Released through United Artists

starring FELIX AYLMER
with GRETA GYNT and WALTER RILLA
Brandt's GOTHAM B'way and 47th St.

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD PRODUCTIONS
"BELONGS ON THE MUST LIST."—Roscoe, World-Telegram.

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 59th Street. Matinee Wed. & Sat.

BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Staged by HASSARD STREET
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th Street, West of B'way
Matinee Wednesday and Saturday

"Splendid evening in the theater."—N. Y. Mirror

FRANCHOT TONE and JANE WYATT in

Hope for the Best

FULTON 46th Street, West of Broadway. Circle 6-6360.
Evs. 8:40, $4.20 to $1.20. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

CORRECTION: In reviewing Waverley Root's "The Secret History of the War" Ralph Bates wrote, "The Pacific war is not treated proportionately," not, as it appeared in the issue of February 10, "is not treated at all."

CONTRIBUTORS

RAPHAEL LEMKIN, author of "Axis Rule in Occupied Europe," was formerly a member of the International Office for Unification of Criminal Law and later head consultant to the Foreign Economic Administration. He is now lecturing at the School of Military Government in Charlottesville, Virginia. The opinions expressed in his article are his own.

SERGEANT ROBERT FLEISHER is combat correspondent on the Italian front for the army newspaper, Stars and Stripes.

CAREY MCWILLIAMS, The Nation's new contributing editor, has written a number of books on inter-racial problems, of which the latest is "Prejudice: Japanese Americans."

JOHN SCHOLTE NOLLEN is president emeritus of Grinnell College, Iowa.

PHILIP JORDAN, formerly chief foreign correspondent of the London News-Chronicle, has spent a large part of the last two years in the Near East, the Balkans, Italy, and France.

LIONEL TRILLING, assistant professor of English at Columbia University, is the author of "E. M. Forster" and "Matthew Arnold."

RANDALL JARRELL, formerly an instructor in English at the University of Texas, is now in the Air Corps. He is the author of "Blood for a Stranger," a book of poems.

BENJAMIN GINZBURG, a Washington economist, was formerly an assistant editor of the "Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences." He is the author of "The Adventure of Science."

F. W. DUPEE, formerly a member of the English Department at Columbia University, is now teaching at Bard College.

JOSEPH BORNSTEIN was for many years managing editor of the Tagebuch in Berlin and later became editor-in-chief of the Pariser Tageblatt.

[Last week we credited Edgar Snow with having written a book in Chinese. He informs us that he has not mastered the difficult art of writing in Chinese.]

Drama

JOSEPH
WOOD
KRUTCH

THE title of "One-Man Show" (Ethel Barrymore Theater) is obviously intended to have a double meaning. Secondly the play is about a successful art gallery and about that minimum of skulduggery which is necessary to run it. Primarily it is about the relationship between the able proprietor and his able daughter, about the process by which the girl finally frees herself from the influence of this man who has become, in everything except physical fact, her husband rather than her father. Only at the end does she realize that it is he who is preventing her from falling in love with anyone else, and only when she is able brutally to break the bond between them can she begin to have any life of her own.

Once this would have been a sensational theme. It was that when Sidney Howard wrote "The Silver Cord" and pleasantly shocked an audience very much interested in seeing taboos broken. These days, I suppose, progressive schools discuss the problem in 2B, and to the credit of the present play it must be said that sensationalism is not its object. Unfortunately, however, the effect of a competent and sober treatment is to raise the question whether the problem, considered merely as a problem, is interesting enough to make a really substantial play once there has ceased to be anything particularly "daring" about the willingness to treat it at all.

Like most of my colleagues of the daily press I found "One-Man Show" interesting enough to hold the attention, and with them I agree that while some of the earlier scenes are very deftly written, the last act is obviously contrived rather than logically convincing. But the real reason for the play's failure to be more than moderately successful seems to me to be less any technical defect than the simple fact that the subject is too small and too specialized to engage very profoundly either the intellect or the emotions so long as it is the inherent interest of the subject upon which everything really depends. Given characters and situations otherwise sufficiently arresting, there is, of course, no reason why any one of the now classical complexes should not form part of the complication; but when, as is here the case, the persons seem merely invented to illustrate the problem, the problem itself is hardly important enough. Constance Cummings, recently returned from England, does what she can to make the girl interesting in herself, and Frank Conroy as the suave father contributes what is probably the most convincing of the portraits. But the story is still a story about a psychological problem rather than a story about interesting people, and the problem is no longer fresh enough to carry a play.

It happens that "Hope for the Best" (Fulton Theater) also suffers from somewhat similar limitations inherent in its conception. The author is William McCleery, Sunday editor of PM, and it is therefore appropriate enough that his subject should be the growth of political consciousness in a popular columnist previously specializing in homespun sentiment. So far as I know, this is Mr. McCleery's first produced play, and it exhibits a rather greater facility in handling the more usual tricks of the trade than one might expect. But here again is a case where the subject is expected to carry a play and where it is not really capable of doing so. No doubt new and arresting things might be said about the duty of every citizen to do his political duty in whatever station of life it has pleased God to place him, but in "Hope for the Best" only the rather obvious things actually do get themselves said. No doubt, on the other hand, the obvious things would be enough if the columnist concerned were a sufficiently vital person in himself and if the young girl who saves his soul by taking him away from a designing female were similarly interesting in her own right. But as in the case of "One-Man Show" it is all too obvious that all the principal personages in "Hope for the Best" are rather insubstantially constructed to serve as pieces in a theoretical demonstration on a chessboard. One of these personages happens to be a rather tiresomely quaint music teacher with a mania for constructing what he calls "dramagrams." Two are exhibited on the stage, and one of them is a row of progressively taller blocks which topple over one after another when the least of them fails to stand up. The trouble with the play as a whole is simply that it too is rather too much a dramagram, rather too little a play. Franchot Tone attempts not too successfully to give the columnist personality enough to make it seem important whether he writes about politics or his love of the old home town. Jane Wyatt contributes her own beauty and charm to the role of the girl who persuades him to do his civic duty. But neither of them gets a great deal of help from the author.

Ad Astra Per Ardua

New 28,000-word booklet.

Price 50 cents

Reveals "A Modern and American 'Mein Kampf.'" Contains author's photo. Not sensational. Instead, merely provocative, controversial and—invariably to a great many—inspirational.

First of a series to appear quarterly during the year, another in late April will have chapters titled, "The Church: 'Upon This Rock'"; and, "Beulahism: 'So I will Marry Thee.'" Subjects included in current work are, "Need For A New Entity"; and, "The State: 'Our American Democracy.'" 3 for $1.00

LOY VINCENT

Box 2833,

Denver, Colo.

Alcoholics ARE Sick People

ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.,

Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist

JOHN HOPKINS HOSPITAL

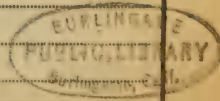

ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS

2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.

Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.

- ☐ copies $1.00 paper bound
☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound

Name.....
Address.....
.....
.....

Critics and ordinary playgoers alike sometimes wonder why so many dramatists return again and again to the simple boy-meets-girl or lover-meets-wife formula, but it does not require much experience with topical plays to understand some part of the answer. The conventional subjects are so conventional that, as subjects, they have almost ceased to exist, and the playwright who uses them cannot hope that they will in themselves carry his play. He must try at least to give us something else in the way either of character or wisdom or wit.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

OBJECTIVE BURMA" is the story of a group of American parachutists who, after locating and destroying a Japanese radar station, try to walk out, through difficult country thick with the enemy. I can see no unconquerable reason why this shouldn't have been a great movie. But there are plenty of reasons why it isn't.

The main reason is that the players, by always saying the apt line at the apt moment and by almost every other means possible, continually remind you that they are, after all, just actors, and that none of this is really happening. I must also mention the simple lack of the sort of talent which would have made it possible to tell wonderfully well, in an hour or so, what is here pretty well told in two hours and twenty-two minutes. Lack of adequate talent is of course all the more irrelevant to criticism when the makers of a film are so clearly and honorably doing the best they know how. But it is hard to understand why such sincere and generally skilful people stop so far short of the chances for improving their work which are open to people of every degree of talent. I am embarrassed that it is necessary for an amateur to offer the following suggestion.

However good they may be, known actors in this sort of semi-documentary film inevitably blunt the edge of your best hopes and intentions. If you are forced to use actors, known or unknown, at least put them, and yourself, and everyone else involved in making the movie, through an inch-by-inch study of the faces and postures and total images of actual warfare, as they appear in record films of the war. If, in spite of such study, you find that your actors—for instance—or you yourself cannot recognize or cannot very greatly narrow the innumerable and great differences between the real thing and the well-meaning, over-professional, over-expressive imagination of it, you are most thoroughly to be respected if you give the whole project up.

The people who made "Objective Burma" are by no means specially to be criticized on these grounds; the criticism applies with equal justice to every American fictional war film I have seen. Indeed, "Objective Burma" is one of the best of them. Its actors are always actors; but in their actorish idiom they play, generally, with restraint. In the story-telling there is more than usual recognition of the value of detail and process; there is also some good sense. Often the camera prowls and veers along façades of vegetation which are freighted with the threat of imagination and possibility but which properly seldom turn out to contain any actual danger. And at the climax, a night attack, the screen is nearly dark enough and, during the build-up, nearly quiet enough, to give the audience an adequate sense of ignorant, strained, global anticipation. Even better, it is obvious in one shot after another that the people who made the picture are using every resource they have. This sense of the whole heart and hope involved, rather than merely the assignment, and salary, and reputation, can of itself give fulness and even a kind of nobility to a piece of work, especially during a time of artistic cowardice and cynicism and despair. It makes this picture moving and good, for all its outright faults and sorry limitations.

"Roughly Speaking" is, I fear, a faithful history of the American middle class. It glories in the idea that this is still a country where you don't get shot for dreaming. The one dream worth about 90 per cent of its footage is the making of money. The most nearly respectable object of all this dreaming is to make sure that the boys get to Andover and Yale. The whole thing depresses me beyond words. Jack Carson, however, is likable, as he always is.

"The Thin Man Goes Home" and "Having Wonderful Crime" are harmless comic detective stories. It is physically easier to read such things in bed; it is less boring to watch them on the screen. I can't see that anything is to be gained, either way; but I realize, from a great deal too much personal experience, that gain is no part of the idea. The real point, I presume, is to find your own special hermetic nirvana of boredom.

In an adults-only theater, recently, I saw two elderly movies, "The Lash of the Penitentes" and "Glamor for Sale." The former contains some genuine and interesting shots, suspended in an aspect of terrifyingly pitiful and funny ineptitudes. The latter, a melodrama about the female escort business written by John Bright, is worthless and crisply nostalgic.

I want a bit tardily to recommend March of Time's "Report on Italy," which contains the mobbing of Caretta, the execution of Caruso, and enough suffering and unaccusable faces of human beings who happen to be Italians to blast the brains out of a script twice as stern as this one is, with its talk about "the Italian penance." If people of the peace-making sort knew or cared in the least how to look at faces—or dared to—the exhibition of such films at the peace conference could supply more valuable evidence, and hope for the future, than anything else I can think of. But like most of the two billion people who will suffer the effects of the post-war arrangements I am, I must grant, an amateur.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

AS TIME passes, the break between modern and Renaissance-naturalistic painting seems to become less sharp, though remaining definite nevertheless. Ultimately a picture by Picasso has to satisfy the same demands—demands involved by the nature of easel-painting—as does a Rembrandt. A continuity, historical and social as well as technical, is to be discerned even when modern painting is confronted with that of the seventeenth-century Dutch, which is in one sense its direct antithesis. For the Dutch school—if anything so various can be called a school—explored more consistently and thoroughly than any other the possibilities of contriving the illusion of deep space and of light in deep space on a two-dimensional surface. It did the most to annihilate the spectator's consciousness of the flatness of the picture plane—that flatness which the moderns have so literally and drastically reasserted.

The seventeenth century in Western Europe was inspired by a new perception of the infinity, intangibility, and continuity of space. What its painters explored pictorially—and Milton poetically, with his exotic place names and allusions and his vision of Satan soaring and diving between infinite height and infinite depth—was investigated practically and theoretically by the square-rigged ship, discoverers, geometers, and philosophers. But nowhere was this new sense of space, and of light as the description of space, bodied forth so consummately as in Dutch painting. Space and light are the themes not only of Dutch landscape but also of Dutch genre and interior painting, with its dramatic intervention of light amid enveloping, limitless shadows—or, as in the cases of Vermeer and de Hooch, with the recession of flat planes according to the modulation of light.

Modern taste has charged the Dutch—save for Vermeer and de Hooch—with lack of design; but twentieth-century taste, under the influence of Cézanne and the Oriental example and in reaction against the presumed amorphousness of the impressionists, has conceived of design too exclusively in terms of solidity and line, the ultimately decorative arrangement of mass, volume, and opaque plane—in all of which the Dutch were largely uninterested, even as they were uninterested in sculptural effects and the nude. What caught them was the play of light on surfaces and in atmosphere, and out of that play of light, registered in the varying densities of neutral tones—grays and browns—they created design as firm as any in pictorial art.

Two landscapes at the very good show of Dutch painting now at Knoedler's (through February 24)—one a river scene with boats by Salomon van Ruysdael, the other a view of Arnhem by Jan van Goyen, both of them almost identical in size—achieve the perfection of this type of design—framed on gradations of dark and light against which delicate, restrained color beats an oblique as subtle as any in music itself.

And yet the charge of neglect of design is to some extent borne out: particularly by Rembrandt, who sometimes paid for his most striking effects precisely by sacrificing design. His remarkable portrait of Gerard de Lairesse has too much space at the bottom—not to mention its overpowering directness of psychological vision, which, being far in excess of the capacities of physical vision, renders the unhappy subject a monster of physiognomic nakedness; his otherwise excellent Young Girl Standing in a Room shows too much space around the figure, while his Still Life with Dead Game is put out of joint by the clumsily handled empty space on the left-hand side. Rembrandt's concentration on the high lights and his habit of surrounding them with great areas of "brown sauce" proved a hypnotic example to his followers, and a destructive one, for it was a style much too risky for anyone but a genius. It was dangerous enough to Rembrandt himself, whose true masterpieces come relatively few and far between.

Dutch still-life painting, too, sacrificed design, at least in the decorative sense, but in such a marvelously executed still life as Willem Kalf's the eye discovers its delight as it goes from one detail to another. Were it to draw back to take in the picture at a single glance, everything would collapse. The picture has to be read chronologically, its points of paint examined one at a time. The dexterity of Kalf's brush and the richness and juice of his pâte overcome the eye's resentment at the absence of decorative design. And it is characteristic of the Dutch school that the very workmanship of the artist, the good quality and permanence of his pigments, glazes, and varnishes, the skill, patience, and conscientiousness with which he has applied them—all these contribute somehow to the pleasure.

Other good works at this exhibition are by de Hooch, Metsu, Victoors, and Ochtervelt. There is a second, and almost equally successful, river scene by Salomon van Ruysdael, a fair seascape with ships by Willem van de Velde, and an interior by Terboch and a genre scene by Steen that just barely manage to come off.

Albert Cuyp's two landscapes are clumsy and lifeless, though well-painted in spots; while a self-portrait by Barent Fabritius, a disciple of Rembrandt, falls into monotony and over-smoothness in its browns, for all the charm of its high-lighted parts. Frans van Mieris, who excelled in "silks and satins, luster, plate, and jewels," is represented by a small Lady with a Parrot whose shortcomings demonstrate why Kalf's still life succeeds so well. Each object in Kalf's still life is painted almost perfectly within the naturalistic terms Kalf set himself; within the same terms Mieris has superlatively rendered the satin and velvet of his lady's clothes, but her head and the parrot are handled with a weakness the rest of the canvas cannot make good.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

IT HAD not been my intention to discuss Webster Aitken's second recital; but the performances that were cheered by the audience call for some comment here. I imagine the audience must have been impressed by the completeness with which every performance was achieved both in musical conception and in pianistic execution: one heard a progression, clear and powerful in its musical logic, in which every detail had its place and meaning and was produced from the piano with unflinching perfection and with flawless beauty of sound. I don't share Aitken's feeling about Schubert's music—which is to say that I think the fast movements of the posthumous A major Sonata call for the relaxed spaciousness of Schnabel's treatment of them in his recorded performance, rather than the intensity and drive that Aitken imparted to them. But that doesn't prevent me from appreciating the superb things he made of those movements in accordance with his own feeling; and the intensity produced a hair-raising statement of the extraordinary middle section of the slow movement. Concerning the performances of Debussy's "Images," on the other hand, there are no dissents, no qualifications: I have never heard in any other performances what Aitken's imagination discovers in Debussy's music and conveys through the riches of sound that he commands from the piano.

The Metropolitan's Saturday afternoon performance of "Die Meistersinger" was scheduled for 1:30; and turning on the radio at 1:25 I found that I had caught the finale of an Eddie Condon jazz broadcast, with Jess Stacy—whom I had not heard in years—playing the piano, and playing it as excitingly as ever. At 1:30 there was a reminder from the announcer about the Metropolitan Opera broadcast at 2:00; and at 2:00 my fears were confirmed: the broadcasting companies will cancel scheduled programs to make time for broadcasts of baseball and football games and boxing matches, but not for an opera; and the Blue Network's broadcast of "Die Meistersinger" picked up the performance in the middle of the first act. Moreover, while everyone else knows the importance of the orchestral part of a Wagner music-drama, WJZ's engineers do not; and the performance was transmitted, as always, with the

Crossword Puzzle No. 104

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 A bacterium
- 5 "I cannot tell what the ----- his name is" (Merry Wives)
- 9 What are you trying to do now?
- 10 A writer of contemptible verse
- 11 Lamenting (anag.)
- 12 Japanese seaport
- 13 Shakespeare wrote of "----- pied and violets blue"
- 15 Something to close a bottleneck
- 17 Peas can make tasty snacks
- 19 Cuts into equal parts
- 21 Sheep in a drain
- 23 Composer of the sparkling and energetic Gaite Parisienne
- 25 Might make an eel lament
- 26 Size of the white of an egg
- 27 Aromatic form of descent
- 28 Birds which give shrieks

- 6 Shellfish or nothing is put before us!
- 7 Something more than you bargained for perhaps
- 8 Follows the personal name—followed it a long time after, in fact
- 14 I claim to be flawless, but am just the opposite!
- 16 How some small children ride their daddies
- 17 "When the ----- finished jumping on his mother, He loves to lie a-basking in the sun"
- 18 Leopards are this naturally
- 19 Hoodwinks
- 20 Balls
- 22 At which place we embraced her
- 24 African river. Looks like reign, doesn't it?

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 103

ACROSS:—1 GINERAL C; 5 MASCOT; 10 ALMONRY; 11 OPHELIA; 12 ANNA; 13 CERES; 14 KILN; 17 GONERIL; 19 CELLA; 20 GERMAN; 22 ALIMENT; 23 ROWING; 25 OTHER; 27 TAYLORS; 31 MALT; 32 SODAS; 33 HEAP; 36 EVASION; 37 IRELAND; 38 LEDGER; 39 THRASHER.

DOWN:—1 GO AWAY; 2 NOMINEE; 3 RING; 4 LEYDEN; 6 ACHE; 7 CALCIUM; 8 TRAINING; 9 LOVER; 13 COAL GAS; 14 RED MOLD; 15 SIGNORS; 17 GIANT; 18 LETTS; 21 CROMWELL; 24 WILLARD; 26 EYELASH; 28 YOUNG; 29 OAFISH; 30 SPIDER; 34 RIDE; 35 LENA.

DOWN

- 1 Sympathy without relief is like ----- without beef
- 2 What happens when an irresistible body meets an immovable object?
- 3 It beat Mrs. Partington in an unequal struggle
- 4 The true use of speech is not so much to ----- our wants as to conceal them, said Goldsmith
- 5 A tippler turns up with a song for two voices voices blanketing the orchestra—which meant not only that much of the lovely orchestral detail one wanted to hear for itself could not be heard, but that the vocal part was often deprived of the orchestral context which it needed to give it meaning. But this time the sound was not distorted unpleasantly, as the sound of "Don Giovanni" had been last November, when defective transmitting apparatus had made the violins wiry and harsh and put an extra-sharp edge on Florence Kirk's tremolo-ridden shrieking.

Then, listening to a WNYC broadcast from the Frick Collection of a performance of Mozart's G minor Piano Quartet by Nadia Reisenberg and members of the Budapest Quartet, I found that the sound of the strings was fairly good—with a little distortion of the violin, and some over-emphasis of the cello; but that the piano sounded as though it were wrapped in blotting-paper, and often could not be heard behind the strings. I am sure that the way the performance was picked up and transmitted had something to do with this; but I also had the impression that Miss Reisenberg was playing with excessive delicacy to start with, and the dullness of the sound may have been produced in part by the left pedal.

And finally I got to Town all in time for the second half of the New Friends of Music concert of Mozart sonatas played by Szigeti and Arrau. In the broadcasts of their performances of Beethoven sonatas last year Arrau's style seemed wooden; in Town Hall this time that style was made even worse by what the radio and phonograph apparently conceal: his wooden—that is, hard, dull, percussive—tone. Now I understood the anguished complaints of some New Friends subscribers last year: it was something really painful to listen to. And this time the dead weight of Arrau's playing seemed to be more than Szigeti could carry.

This reminds me that in speaking of Schuster's fine performance of Debussy's Cello Sonata a couple of weeks ago I should have mentioned how well the piano part was played by Hellmut Baerwald, who impressed me last May with the remarkable playing he did with Rethberg, and who is, then, still another pianist whom the New Friends might have engaged for sonatas with Szigeti. Also, I might have mentioned last week that the defects of Studio 8H as compared with a concert hall can be heard in the Toscanini NBC Symphony recordings made in that studio and in Carnegie Hall.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 3, 1945

NUMBER 9

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

233

EDITORIALS

The New International

235

American Supplies and Chinese Politics

236

Memo for Congress by Keith Hutchison

237

ARTICLES

The Army and the "Reds" by I. F. Stone

238

This is the Face of War by Charles G. Bolté

239

What Hope for Small Powers? by Paul Malles

241

50 Years Ago in The Nation

242

Henrietta Szold by Marvin Lowenthal

243

The New South on the March

244

by James A. Dombrowski

Needed: A Citizens' Army by Irving Lipkowitz

246

In the Wind

247

POLITICAL WAR

Torture in Argentina by John W. White

248

The Italian Partisans by Mario Bellini

249

Behind the Enemy Line by Argus

250

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Full Employment—Beveridge Model

251

by Mordecai Ezekiel

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

253

Briefer Comment

254

Films by James Agee

257

Drama Note by Joseph Wood Krutch

257

Records by B. H. Haggin

257

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

258

CROSS-WORD PUZZLE NO. 105 by Jack Barrett

260

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

The Shape of Things

WITH THE ATTACKS OF THE AMERICAN FIRST and Ninth armies across the Roer, the long-awaited western-front offensive has got off to a promising start. The necessary preliminaries to this action on the important central sector of the front were capably carried out on both flanks of the main thrust: to the north the Canadian First Army cleared the tip of the Rhine-Maas triangle, swinging into position to cut between the northern Siegfried Line and the Rhine, and in the south the American Third Army moved into Germany in the Eifel-Moselle region, clearing another triangle at the Saar-Moselle. These actions pinned down the Germans above and below the Cologne plain and threatened to roll the German flanks slowly back toward the vulnerable but well-defended center. The Germans are about through collecting dividends from their December offensive, but the dividends have been real; the disorganization of the Western Allies enabled them, at first, to shift to the east troops which helped halt the Russians on the Oder, and, second, to reorganize their consequently thinned defenses in the west before Eisenhower could mount this major offensive.

✱

IT WILL THUS BE HARD GOING BEFORE THE Anglo-American and Red armies can join hands on the North German plain. Allied aircraft are doing a massive job of isolating the battlefield in the west, making it difficult for the Germans either to reinforce or to withdraw; and it may be possible for Eisenhower to fulfil his stated intention of destroying the enemy west of the Rhine where he stands. This would make the Rhine crossing and break-through to the heart of Germany far simpler, but if the Germans run true to form they will fight a large-scale delaying action on the Cologne plain while pulling the bulk of their best troops back to the Rhine's east bank. In this case there will be a repetition of what has happened east of Berlin—another pause for regrouping, the gradual swinging up of the Allied battle line along the river, and a bitter fight to get across. The Russians have been occupied with the first part of this operation for the past two weeks, broadening their front along the Oder and mopping up in their rear before taking the last plunge toward Berlin. One milestone was passed last week with the reduction of Poznan, whose fall should ease Zhukov's supply problems considerably, but progress toward Berlin should probably not be expected until the Russian line runs roughly north and south from Stettin to Görlitz.

✱

THE INTER-AMERICAN CONFERENCE IN MEXICO entered its second week with the encouraging prospect of general agreement on several main issues. The need of an international organization that would ban aggression and use force to stop it was stressed by almost every delegate, showing how far the Latin American countries have moved from the days when the isolationist point of view, dominant in North America, found a loud echo in the rest of the hemisphere. Even when the Dumbarton Oaks plan was subjected to criticism, as in the speech of the able ambassador from Uruguay in Mexico, Mateo Marques Castro, it was with the purpose, not of limiting the share Latin America should have in the maintenance of peace, but of enlarging it. Uruguay asks that the charter of the new international organization should contain a general guaranty of the territorial integrity and political independence of all members. The same unanimous approval greeted the proposal, embodied in the opening speech of the Mexican Foreign Minister, Ezequiel Padilla, to deal courageously with "the Dantesque spectacle of men without homes, eaten away by tuberculosis, malaria, malnutrition, and silicosis," the perpetuation of which makes absolutely illusory any talk of safeguarding democracy and freedom in Latin America. It is time the problem of fighting totalitarianism should be attacked from that angle and that one government spokesman should utter the great truth that as long as the Latin American masses are condemned to live in their present poverty, the ground will be ready for Nazi agitators to carry out their work in the Western Hemisphere—even after they have been smashed in Germany.

★

BUT AGREEMENT ON MAIN ISSUES SHOULD NOT be allowed to obscure the immense mistrust of the United States that still prevails and that found expression even during the first week of the conference. Although Secretary of State Stettinius won the sympathy of his audience by facing the problem of Nazi-fascist infiltration with greater frankness than the State Department usually employs and by stressing the need of giving Latin America a full part in the organization of peace, a great deal of resentment still surrounds the controversial question of Argentina. As we said editorially last week, very few delegates disagree with Washington on the pro-Nazi character of the Farrell-Perón regime. The Gestapo methods catalogued so precisely by John W. White on another page of this issue are well known in Latin America. What they object to is the fact that our diplomacy has handled Argentina's case as if it were under our exclusive jurisdiction, presenting the conference with what amounted to a fait accompli. It may be that our attitude toward fascist Spain has also contributed to the discomfort of certain delegations. Informally Washington has denied that the American delegation intervened to prevent the presentation of a resolution asking for a break with Franco. But some mysterious maneuver has undoubtedly taken place. Two delegations at least—Cuba and Guatemala—had decided to introduce such a motion; the Cuban resolution was already on paper and many people in Mexico had seen it. Has someone among our delegates, perhaps, been whispering to the Latin Americans that "the Franco regime was running into its last months" (we quote a New York Times dispatch) and that consequently it was not worth while to face the issue of breaking with Madrid?

IF FURTHER PROOF WERE NEEDED OF PRESIDENT Benes's political perception, it was provided by his farewell speech to the British in which he described the kind of government he intends to establish in Czechoslovakia. It will be composed exclusively of elements of the forces of resistance, who have carried the chief burden of the war. As soon as President Benes arrives in Czechoslovakia his Cabinet will resign and the ministries will be taken over by men chosen by those who have lived and fought within the country. The Czech government in exile, with leaders like Jan Masaryk, certainly cannot be reproached for appeasement of the fascists. On the whole it has represented better than any other exiled government a people fighting for freedom. Nevertheless, Dr. Benes realizes that the problem is not only one of ideas but of emotions; that people who have suffered German occupation are in a different spiritual state from those who have fought from abroad. He wants no antagonism to arise between the forces of resistance and the political leaders in exile. And so he is asking the people inside Czechoslovakia to take over the government at once. The Nation has known about this plan for many months, although we were not at liberty to refer to it. Obviously, the decision was not improvised at the last moment but is the result of mature thinking. But although this was an old idea of Dr. Benes, the experience of other European governments returned from exile gives added weight to the wisdom of his solution.

★

THE LIQUIDATION OF FEUDALISM IN THE Balkans and in other areas liberated from the Nazis is a fact whose political and social implications can hardly be overestimated. In Poland, Rumania, and Hungary the great landed estates which for centuries formed the backbone of a class economy are rapidly being dissolved and the land distributed to the peasants. Up to now we have had no detailed information about what is happening in those East Prussian territories occupied by the Russians. But it is logical to assume that the Junker estates, those traditional breeding grounds for Prussian militarism, will also be demolished. In other words, an economic process which normally would have taken many decades has been rushed toward fulfilment by the pressure of events. Those who have thought that the old social order could somehow be rescued out of the general destruction of the war should watch this development with profound attention. Just how the feudal system will be liquidated is of secondary importance in comparison to the historic fact. Perhaps it will be necessary after the war to apply different regulations to the distribution of land from those now being put into effect. Perhaps the complicated problems inherent in any agrarian reform will demand the formulation of new economic solutions; in some countries it may lead to collectivization, in others to the creation of small farms. But no matter what the final pattern may be, the important thing to note at this moment is that a revolution is in progress which, in some countries at least, is wiping out in three months the social injustices of three centuries.

★

MANPOWER LEGISLATION SEEMS TO GROW MORE tangled weekly. While the House has passed a work-or-fight law applying only to men between eighteen and forty-five, the Senate Military Affairs Committee has reported an entirely different kind of bill applying to all working men and women. The principles and many of the provisions of the latter measure have much to recommend them. The Senate bill would strengthen the powers of the War Manpower Commission to enforce employment ceilings and to move both men and women from non-essential to essential employment. The bill would give statutory power to labor-management committees, protect the seniority rights of workers in the jobs from which they are moved, and pay the transportation costs of displaced workers. It would also tighten up the War Manpower Commission's authority to conduct labor utilization surveys in both private plants and army-navy arsenals and shipyards, and also in the military services—where too many able-bodied young men are filling desk jobs. We dislike those provisions which would continue the privileged position of agricultural employers under the Tydings amendment and the extraordinarily harsh penalties (up to five years in jail and $10,000 fine) imposed on farm workers who leave their jobs. This provision and confusion as to whether the general penalties of the bill apply to employees as well as employers foreshadow quite a wrangle on the Senate floor.

✱

THE WAR LABOR BOARD'S ACTION IN REFUSING to adjust the Little Steel formula has provoked the expected violent opposition from both the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. Labor spokesmen point out that in many industries wages are below the danger level and that if overtime is eliminated after victory in Europe millions of families will be faced with destitution. Against this the WLB public members strongly uphold the view that any breach in the formula would endanger the entire stabilization program and thus imperil the living standards of all workers. While it is perfectly true that millions of workers still receive substandard wages, most of these are unorganized or weakly organized, and they are thus precluded from bringing their case before the WLB. The chief pressure for the revision of the Little Steel formula comes not from these groups but from the highly organized unions whose members have already won comparatively high wages. Relief for substandard wages, both in industry and among white-collar workers, can best be afforded, as the WLB points out, by amendment of the Wages and Hours Act to provide a higher minimum, a step that has already been proposed by Senator Pepper. Labor's argument that it will be left holding the bag after the war ends in Europe will not bear too close analysis. As the WLB points out, not only weekly wages but average hourly wages have risen more than the cost of living. Elimination of overtime may cause hardship but will not have the effect of reducing living standards below pre-war levels. Barring the enactment of a 60,000,000-job program, labor's overall prospects for the post-war period are indeed bleak. But labor leadership should be enlightened enough to recognize that the scuttling of the stabilization program will only intensify labor's hardships in the reconversion period.

The New International

THE voice of labor should be far more powerfully heard in the post-war settlements than it was last time, thanks to the birth in London last week of a new international trade-union organization. Technically, perhaps, one should say conception rather than birth, but the period of gestation promises to be less than the normal nine months, with delivery certain in September, when the World Trade Union Conference reconvenes in Paris. Meanwhile a continuations committee of forty-one with a smaller administrative committee will be working on a draft constitution and pressing the claims of the embryo organization to take part in the San Francisco conference and to be heard on all issues of war and peace.

The resolution embodying these steps toward the formation of a new organization means, in effect, the end of the International Federation of Trade Unions. Sir Walter Citrine, general secretary of the British Trades Union Congress, and a few European veterans hoped to save the federation by broadening its constitution so as to make eligible for membership the Russian unions and national movements like the C. I. O. which had been excluded under the rule "One country, one organization." But both the Russians and the C. I. O. favored a new start, and they were supported by the Confederation of Latin American Workers and the representatives of a number of European countries who criticized the inactivity of the I. F. T. U. during the war. It should, they considered, have rendered far more assistance to unions in countries overrun by Germany.

In the face of this opposition Citrine backed down but saved face with a reservation clause stating that the resolution was "in no way binding on the unions attending the conference, which have the right to accept or reject the constitution of the proposed body." It seems most improbable, however, that there will be many dissentients, and the next full meeting of the I. F. T. U. is likely to be devoted to its euthanasia.

This situation leaves the A. F. of L., the one notable hold-out from the world conference, in a completely isolated position. George Meany, its secretary-treasurer, has declared that the A. F. of L. will consider the new world group as "a rival organization" to the I. F. T. U., but it is difficult to see what rivalry there can be between the kind of vigorous youth the yet unnamed organization promises to be and a rather sad corpse. Quite obviously a movement which includes the Russian, British, French, and most of the European and Latin American unions, the C. I. O., and the growing trade unions of the colonial countries has a better chance of being accepted as the voice of labor internationally than a federation composed of the A. F. of L. and a few oddments. Realism should make the situation plain enough to the A. F. of L., but we fear that pride and obstinacy will keep it from taking the place held open for it in the new group.

One of the chief objectives of the new international labor organization is to claim a share "in determining all questions of the peace and post-war settlements." "Organized labor, with so great a part in winning the war," a manifesto approved by the London conference declared, "cannot leave to others . . . the sole responsibility for making the peace." In line with this a request was made for effective trade-union representation in the assembly of the proposed world peace organization, and the association of the movement with the social and economic council envisaged in the Dumbarton Oaks plan. The conference also made a very specific demand for consultation on the question of the future of Germany. It wants the occupying authorities to listen to trade-union advice in regard to the payment of reparations in kind and to the rebuilding of a democratic German trade-union movement. In particular, in the event of direct use of German labor in making good the devastation wrought during the war, the conference called for international supervision with trade-union participation. This is of the utmost importance if such labor is not to degenerate into slave labor, undermining the standards of workers everywhere. Here is one example of the many post-war tasks which a fully united and inclusive world organization of trade unionists can undertake.

COMING IN THE NATION

Who Are the Partisans? by Milton Bracker

American Supplies and Chinese Politics

MANY fundamental changes have taken place in the Chinese situation since the furor over the recall of General Joseph Stilwell last fall. For the most part these changes have been favorable. Hundreds of new trucks and thousands of tons of badly needed war supplies are rolling into China over the newly opened Burma-Ledo road. The reorganization of the Chinese army under General Chen Cheng has involved not only plans for expanding the army by five hundred thousand men but the establishment of six specialized training schools where American officers are busily engaged in training tens of thousands of Chinese troops in modern military methods and doctrines. The food supply for the army has been improved; pay has been raised; and discipline has been tightened. On the economic front there are reports that the new Chinese War Production Board established by Donald Nelson has been successful in bringing about some increase in war output. Even on the military front an improvement has been reported, although most of the Chinese "victories" appear to have been the result of Japanese withdrawals.

But the American public should be on guard against shifting from over-pessimism to over-optimism. Although relations between American and Chinese officials are much happier than they were a few months ago, the underlying causes of conflict have not been removed altogether. General Wedemeyer has been permitted to attend meetings of the Chinese general staff—a privilege not granted to Stilwell—but Chiang Kai-shek has never put into effect his promise that the American general should be in command of all Chinese forces under the Generalissimo. Although the removal of Ho Ying-chin as War Minister was generally interpreted as an indication that Chungking was determined to speed up its participation in the war, his retention as Chief of Staff and his recent appearance as commander of the ground forces that are supposed to support an American landing on the China coast are most disquieting. Ho Ying-chin is the leading proponent of the idea that China's interest would best be served by sitting back and letting its allies win the war against Japan.

Moreover, the chances of a military or a political agreement between Chungking and the partisans of the Northwest seem more remote than ever. The failure of the recent Kuomintang-Communist negotiations was a serious setback to Ambassador Hurley. At first it looked as if Hurley might be able to achieve a settlement where Nelson and Stilwell had tried and failed. Hurley was personally liked by Chiang Kai-shek and spent many week-ends with him. He was also initially popular with the Communists, but his popularity is said to have waned when it became evident that he was seeking to bring pressure on them.

The collapse of Kuomintang-Communist negotiations at a time when American assistance can be greatly stepped up as a result of an opening of the Stilwell Road raises a serious problem with respect to American policy. As long as our assistance was limited to what could be transported over the hump by air, the effect of our assistance on the Chinese internal situation was of minor importance. General Stilwell appears to have followed the general policy of earmarking supplies for the troops that were actually engaged in fighting the Japanese. Very little in the way of assistance reached the Communists, but this might be ascribed as much to geography as to politics. Today, however, the flow of supplies is much greater; it will be greater still as soon as we seize a port on the China coast.

Unless present policy is changed, most of these supplies will continue to go to the Chungking armies which are now being retrained under American officers. Many of these officers—particularly those who have been to Yen-an on official business—are convinced that the partisans, if properly armed, would prove useful allies against the Japanese. They would of course have to be brought into a coordinated military effort and almost certainly under American top command.

Now, the sole military concern of the United States in China is to mobilize the maximum military strength against the Japanese. Our war supplies must be directed to building up this maximum military strength. They must not be permitted to play a part on one side or the other in the smoldering civil war. We cannot think that with the present extent of American military direction in Chungking any of the supplies now going over the Ledo Road are being permitted to be used against the Yen-an forces. If they are—which to us would seem incredible—the way to correct such negligence would hardly be to send equal supplies to Yen-an. We are not a party to civil war in China; we are engaged in war to the death with Japan. It is the critical point reached in that war which makes a working measure of political and military unity in China imperative. Without such unity the maximum force cannot be directed against Japan. War supplies to China can no longer be calculated or divided in terms of the needs of Chungking or the needs of Yen-an but only in terms of the total plans of the Allies for victory in the Far East.

Memo for Congress

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

IT IS never a bad idea to listen to the other fellow's point of view, and Congress, in considering the Bretton Woods proposals, might profitably give heed to British as well as American criticisms. In this country there is a general notion that the international monetary plan approved by forty-four nations last summer is, underneath all its technicalities, just another semi-charitable scheme for helping bankrupt foreigners out of their difficulties. Orthodox bankers and economists, together with opponents of any kind of planning, national or international, charge that the proposed international monetary fund violates all the principles of sound finance. It will, they say, permit other nations to borrow good dollars, giving no other security than their own probably worthless currency. This affords a cue to our nationalists, who are always anxious to scream that Uncle Sam is being made a sucker.

Britain has its economic nationalists, too, but they are quite sure that it was John Bull who was taken for a ride at Bretton Woods. To their way of thinking the final plan represented almost a complete victory for the United States and was so contrived as to reinforce America's domination of world trade. This view draws intellectual support from a number of Britain's advocates of planning and some of its leading economists. Bretton Woods, they assert, threatens to envelop Britain once again in a strait-jacket of gold and to deprive it of freedom of action in planning for full employment and the vital restoration of its foreign trade.

Criticisms of this kind are not confined to British radicals. They may be heard from the members of all political parties, and they are to be found, in modified form at least, in the respectable editorial columns of the London Times, the Financial News, and the Economist. When I was in London last fall, I was told on good authority that Mr. Morgenthau had asked the British government to seek quick ratification from Parliament of the Bretton Woods agreement with the idea that such action might encourage Congress to follow suit. Preliminary soundings, however, revealed such extensive opposition that the Cabinet decided not to risk a debate at that time.

To appreciate the point of view that inspires this opposition one must realize that, for the British, the main issue is, in the words of the Economist, "whether, in the post-war world, any universal, multilateral, stable-exchange-system currency system will be possible or desirable." For Americans, both supporters and opponents of Bretton Woods, there is no issue here at all; such a system is the only one which promises the kind of trade expansion they are hoping for. But many Britons with whom I discussed the question, while agreeing that freely convertible currencies and multilateral international trade represented the ideal, hastened to add that they were not prepared to sacrifice full employment to attain it. Unless, therefore, the United States was willing to join Britain in adopting positive plans to insure full employment, they felt that the disadvantages of Bretton Woods outweighed its advantages, for free exchanges were the swiftest carriers of the germs of depression.

Perhaps because so much of their information about American opinion is derived from cabled extracts from a handful of metropolitan newspapers, Britons are overawed by the strength of "free enterprise" in this country. They expect it will resist successfully all efforts to inaugurate a planned economy after the war and that, as a result, a period of booming business with some degree of inflation will be followed fairly rapidly by a slump worse than that of 1929. In an effort to put off this evil day, it is anticipated that, instead of seeking to expand consumption at home, America will attempt to market its surplus production abroad, thereby, in the popular British phrase, "exporting unemployment." Unless prompt measures are taken to increase American imports to an equal extent, the upshot will be savage competition with countries like Britain—which, as I have recently explained in The Nation, must export to live—and a renewal of the drain of the world's gold into the vaults of Fort Knox.

British economists who argue on these lines are not particularly impressed by suggestions that the United States may reduce its tariff after the war and so make it easier for other countries to sell their goods here, earning dollars with which to pay for American exports. The tariff, they suggest, is no longer a major impediment. American imports are made up mainly of raw materials and luxury goods, both of which are extremely sensitive to changes in the national income. If national income is maintained at a high level, there will be a large demand for imported commodities, tariff or no tariff; if it is allowed to slump, as it did in the early thirties, almost the first shock will be felt by America's foreign suppliers.

Believing that the United States will not even attempt to smooth out its trade cycle and stabilize employment at a high level, one vocal and influential school of thought in Britain urges a policy of insulation. Its starting point is the fact that under peace-time conditions Britain is the world's greatest market. The prosperity of a large part of the Empire and of a considerable number of foreign countries is irrevocably tied to Britain's purchasing power. But that in turn is dependent on Britain's ability to sell its goods in much greater volume than before the war. Therefore, it is argued, instead of depending on the vagaries of multilateral trade, which under present circumstances might mean that Britain did most of the buying on the world market while America did most of the selling, Britain should turn to bilateral trade agreements. This would enable Britain's buying power to be used as leverage in promoting the sale of its exports. An extension of this idea is the transformation of "the sterling area," which has existed as a war-time expedient, into a permanent international club. Its members would trade among themselves on multilateral lines, keeping their accounts in British pounds, but would agree not to use foreign exchange acquired inside the area for dealings with those outside.

Obviously such a plan as this is totally incompatible with Bretton Woods; equally obviously it would be considered a declaration of economic war by those countries left outside the charmed circle. The British government is well aware of this fact, and one of its chief economic advisers snorted bitterly to me about "the bilateral boys who proceed on the calm assumption that Britain by clever bargaining would be able to get away with negotiation of a series of barter agreements without provoking unfavorable reactions and counter-measures."

The official government policy is to stand by its pledges under the Atlantic Charter and the Mutual Aid Agreement to work for the elimination of all trade and exchange barriers. If Congress passes the Bretton Woods legislation, it is almost certain that the agreements for the international monetary fund and the international bank will be presented to Parliament with the Cabinet's "Must" stamp on it. But if Congress listens to the American bankers and either rejects Bretton Woods altogether or amends the plan in conformity with the recommendations of the American Bankers Association, then Britain might move toward the bilateral solution. For this action would be taken as a sign that the United States was not going to cooperate in reconstruction and the rebuilding of world trade unless other nations adjusted their internal economies to conform with Wall Street notions of sound finance. This would give the British opponents of Bretton Woods their chance. As one of them, Dr. R. P. Schwarz, wrote in the Fortnightly of October, 1944, "It appears that American opinion in influential quarters, still dominated by the sucker complex, is again in fear of being duped. As things are, it is desirable that it continue under this delusion. If it led to a rejection of the agreement by Congress, such a move would save the debtor countries from the undeserved reproach of ungratefulness which otherwise would certainly be voiced. By such action Congress, if for the wrong reasons, would at least do the right thing."

The Army and the "Reds"

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, February 25

THE Congressional rumpus over the army order lifting the bars against Communists will reverberate unpleasantly abroad. For some time it has been suspected, from the dog-house treatment accorded certain volunteers and draftees, that the army was discriminating against soldiers suspected of being Communists. The picture was a mixed one, and seemed to depend in part on commanding officers. Some persons close to or actually members of the Communist Party were given important military assignments for which they were well fitted by past experience. In other cases persons suspected of being Communists were left behind when their units were sent abroad. There were no leaks that I know of which made available to the liberal or left press instructions to keep suspected Communists from commissions or active service in foreign fields. That there were such instructions is now made clear by the leak to the Chicago Tribune and the Washington Times-Herald of new instructions providing for a more liberal policy toward Communists. For these new instructions the War Department deserves public support and applause. Major General James A. Ulio, adjutant general of the army, explained in a letter to Congressman Dondero that in liberalizing the old instructions "consideration was given to the fact that persons in the army suspected but not proved to be Communists had not proved to be a source of any difficulty and were loyally supporting the war effort." As much cannot be said for the newspapers which "exposed" the new army policy. It will seem depressingly significant abroad that the section of the American press which has championed the seditionists and time after time paralleled the Goebbels line should have enough political power to create trouble for the new army policy in Congress.

I do not wish to imply that Chairman May of the House Military Affairs Committee, who has ordered an investigation, is in the Chicago Tribune class. But it will not escape notice that the Congressional committee chairman aroused by the prospect of fair and equal army treatment for Communists, whom he considers subversive, is the same May of Kentucky who made trouble over the circulation among the armed forces of the pamphlet on the races of mankind. This pamphlet taught the American doctrine of equality in contradistinction to the Nazi philosophy of superior and inferior races. The loudest protest in Congress over the new army policy was from the member who has come closest to following the Nazi line—the unspeakable Shafer of Michigan. Characteristically, nowhere in the discussion of this affair has any inquiry been made about army policy toward Bundists, fascists, Christian Fronters, Silver Shirts, or members of other anti-Semitic, pro-Axis termites organizations. The army seems to have been solely concerned with a political party linked emotionally and ideologically with one of our allies and not at all concerned with groups linked emotionally and ideologically with our enemies. That doesn't make sense.

In the army's defense it may be argued that its action was determined by the Hatch act, which forbids the employment by the government of persons who advocate the overthrow of the government by force and violence. If so, that is additional evidence of the complete inadequacy of the "force-and-violence" formula to deal with the genuinely subversive movements of our time, movements which will be stimulated after the war by the Nazi underground. (I am convinced there will be one.) As a matter of fact, despite Attorney General Biddle's ruling of May 22, 1942, in the Bridges case, the Communist Party neither advocates today nor has for a good many years advocated the overthrow of the government by force and violence. The courts have never ruled that it comes under the Hatch act, and prosecuting authorities would be hard put to prove that it does. Those portions of the act were designed to provide a political weapon against leftists of various shades, including New Dealers, and they were so designed by rightist sources which include some elements in sympathy with Nazism and fascism. Political provisions of the Hatch act thus reflect the covert anti-democratic forces on whose aid and sympathy the Axis long relied. The sooner we get rid of those provisions the better. They are a potential fascist weapon for the post-war period.

As the Hatch act is interpreted by the rightists in this current dispute, it would logically require exemption of Communists from military service. The army, under its earlier orders, had merely barred Communists from commissions and from certain confidential posts. But the Hatch act speaks of employment by government. If army service is employment within the meaning of the act, a buck private is as much an employee as a captain. Would the rightists exempt Communists from military service? And how far would they extend the term? Some of the difficulties are made clear by the confidential letter sent officers on January 31 last outlining procedure for "the disposition of subversive and disaffected military personnel." "No action," the War Department instructions say, "will be taken that is predicated on membership in or adherence to the doctrines of the Communist Party unless there is a specific finding that the individual has a loyalty to the Communist Party as an organization which overrides his loyalty to the United States." "No such finding should be based," the instructions continue, "on the mere fact that the individual's views on various social questions have been the same as the views which the Communist Party has advanced." I know of some bitterly anti-Communist liberals who have suffered in the army from the application of just such loose standards.

In the army, as in civilian life and government employment, to discriminate against persons because of their political views—unless those views are an enemy's in war time—is to embark on a course which must ultimately undermine free government. Anti-Communist leftists who think they can use this weapon against their hated political opponents and get away with it are badly mistaken. The right will set the standards, and the standards will be broad enough to encompass leftists of many varieties. In the immediate context, discrimination against Communists in the army is particularly idiotic. Everywhere in the world, underground and in the armed forces, Communists have distinguished themselves by their zeal. Even a man like Rankin of Mississippi seems to recognize the logical difficulty involved in treating Communist soldiers as "subversive and disaffected"; his own remarks as extended in last Monday's Congressional Record would make it appear that he is concerned solely with "Trotskyite Communists." "Remember," Rankin said in attacking the new army instructions, "that while they were plotting the overthrow of this government, they were also plotting to get rid of Stalin and put Trotsky in his place." It is unnecessary to add that the Chicago Tribune is not worried about Trotskyites. Rankin merely added the final imbecilic flourish to this affair.

Suppose, is the question put by Shafer, we were fighting the Soviet Union? People of Shafer's ilk find it hard to recall that we are not fighting the Soviet Union but, despite their best efforts, the Axis. The war of their dreams is a war against the Soviet Union. And they do what they can to hurt American relations with the U. S. S. R. The committee appointed by Chairman May to investigate the army's new orders—the careful reader will note that they are still somewhat ambiguous—can do a great deal to poison Soviet-American friendship. I hope that friends of Allied unity in the House will fight the committee if it tries. Discrimination against soldiers thought to be Communists will create a sour impression in more places than Moscow. There is China, where we are trying to bring about cooperation between the Kuomintang and the Communists. And there are the liberated countries, where men of various political shades have fought side by side with Communists against the Nazis. An ugly outburst in Congress on this issue, from sources tainted by Hitler-like ideologies, would not increase popular confidence abroad in America's dependability as a bulwark against fascism.

This Is the Face of War

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

ON WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY Staff Sergeant David Dempsey, a Marine Corps combat correspondent, cabled from Iwo Jima:

"The invasion beach of this island . . . is a scene of indescribable wreckage—all of it American. For two miles extending north from Mt. Suribachi at the southern tip of the island is a thick layer of debris. Wrecked hulls of scores of boats testify to the price we paid to get our troops ashore on this vital island. . . . Japanese artillery, rockets, and heavy mortars . . . had been aimed at the beach long before we landed. They couldn't miss and they didn't. Volcanic sand on this beach is so soft that many of our vehicles were mired down before they had gone ten feet. . . . One can see amphibian tractors turned upside down like pancakes on a griddle, derricks brought ashore to unload cargo are tilted at insane angles where shells blasted them, anti-tank guns were smashed before they had a chance to fire a shot. Even some bulldozers landed too early to clear a path for following vehicles. Artillery could not be landed for twenty-four hours.

"Packs, clothing, gas masks, and toilet articles, many of them ripped by shrapnel, are scattered across the sand for miles. Rifles are blown in half. Letters are strewn among the debris.

"Scattered amid the wreckage is death. . . .

"The boys who did it, as the saying goes, deserve a medal, but a lot of them won't be around when the medals are passed out."

This is the face of war. What Sergeant Dempsey could not tell in his dispatch was how the men of the Third, Fourth, and Fifth Marine divisions felt: the landing barges blown up in the water and the quick panicky plunge into the sea with equipment pulling your body under; the deadly mortar fire on the beach pressing your face, belly, thighs, and toes into the sand; the short dashes through the volcanic ash with the nearby objective seeming to recede and the Japs shooting everything off at you personally; the men on right and left being hit in quick succession, not by small-arms fire, which makes neat, clean holes, but by shell fragments and rocket blast, which tear the flesh deeply and cause profound shock, demanding immediate first aid, morphine, and plasma; the medical sections being wiped out on the beach before they can reach these wounded; the empty, outraged feeling of being pinned down by the heaviest and most accurate kind of fire after the air forces have bombed the damned little island for seventy-two days and the navy has poured 8,000 tons of ammunition into it, only to have the Japs crawl right out of their caves—Saipan all over again—and shoot at you. Then the cross-fire from Mt. Suribachi to the south and the second fighter strip on the plateau to the north, with no Japs surrendering and every cave to be dynamited—if you can get there before the fire from above cuts you down; the fitful sleep in the crater beside a dead man, equally dead whether friend or foe; the terrible confusion of the counter-attack at night, with the Japs getting behind you and on both sides of you and the American and Japanese fire mixed up together—this is called infiltration; and then going on, uphill, in the early morning, with your feet lead-heavy and your head turned to wood, the bowel-loosening fear gone, replaced by fatigue and the cold, skilful rage of a man still alive after twenty-four hours of it, and therefore a combat veteran.

The Marines sustained 5,372 casualties on Iwo from Monday morning up to Wednesday evening. Most of these were probably in the veteran Fourth and the predominantly green Fifth Division, since the Third Division was held in reserve and did not land until Wednesday morning. This compares with 2,950 casualties on Tarawa, but there was only one division on Tarawa, so the percentage in casualties has probably been somewhat lower on Iwo: perhaps 15 per cent in the two assault divisions. Figuring casualty percentages on a divisional basis, however, presents a false picture, since even in a combat division only about half the men can be classified as assault troops; the others are in supporting arms (mortars, artillery, anti-aircraft) or are non-combatants (orderlies, staff, signals, cooks, drivers). On Iwo the "non-combatants" will have plenty of casualties, but the bulk of the 5,372 are probably from the 15,000 or so troops who composed the rifle battalions of the first two divisions ashore. One man of three, then, who started for Iwo did not get off the island under his own power.

Of the approximately 20,000 Japanese left to guard this key to the home islands, on the other hand, perhaps only one man in a hundred will leave under his own power. Two hundred Japanese prisoners out of 20,000 would be better than average. There is no use denying that the Japanese die well; but we can feel that theirs is the rat's death, defiant in a corner until all fails and then suicide, while the Marine's is a proud man's death, in the open, advancing, for such simple, noble, and old-fashioned reasons as love of comrades and of corps or ambition to set the flag atop bloody Suribachi. It is the best way to die.

"A man can die but once; we owe God a death . . . and let it go which way it will, he that dies this year is quit for the next."

There was also death in Manila last week—8,246 American and 24,000 Japanese casualties in the week ending Wednesday. The last pocket of enemy resistance in Intramuros was reported wiped out Saturday; General MacArthur announced in his communiqué, "This operation, following the catastrophic defeat in Leyte, dooms General Yamashita's Philippine campaign and presages the early clearance of the entire archipelago."

In reading this statement it is proper to recall that the 8,246 American casualties occurred after the General announced the liberation of Manila, twenty-one days before he subsequently announced the "destruction of the trapped garrison" of Intramuros. I don't like to run down General MacArthur, but I wish he'd let Admiral Nimitz write his communiqué.

The Manila battle seems to have been well conducted; choosing Leyte for the initial landing was extremely clever, the subsequent movements to Mindoro and Lingayen Gulf, always catching the enemy off guard and gaining excellent strategic results through economy of effort and concentration of forces, underline the General's ability as a commander-in-chief. But he continually mars his big achievements by little stupidities: not only the pompous and inaccurate communiqués, but careless planning, excesses of overconfidence or of caution, failure to press home advantages on some occasions, unnecessary exposure of troops and especially of supplies on others; constant jockeying for personal and political gain.

The last is most serious. There is a feeling in some navy quarters that the invasion of the Philippines at this time was unnecessary from a military point of view, that it was dictated by political reasons involving not only the liberation of the Filipinos but the security of the President from home-front snipers quick to resent any imagined slur on the General—who, whether through fault of his own or not, is the darling of our most virulent obstructionists.

This is distasteful to discuss in the open, especially when military security prohibits documentation of most of the General's shortcomings: but the length of the Pacific war, and its eventual cost in casualties, may well depend on the outcome of the secret struggle between MacArthur and the navy as to who shall lead the way into Tokyo—will Halsey get to ride Hirohito's white horse, or will the General arrive on one of his own?

On the record the navy has shown itself well ahead of the army in the Pacific as regards training, planning, execution, supply; its assault force, the Marine Corps, is probably the most capable body of fighting men in the world. If we take, as we evidently may, one of the short roads to Tokyo—from the Marianas through Iwo and the Bonins to Honshu, or from the Marianas and Iwo through the Ryukyus to Kyushu—it should unquestionably be a navy show, with the army troops under its command just as the Marines are. Nimitz, Halsey, Spruance, and Mitscher have a happy gift for taking calculated risks; and the risks from Iwo to Tokyo will have to be calculated carefully, neither dismissed nor worried over nor smoke-screened with bombast.

The entrance of Turkey and Egypt into the war is the last straw on Hitler's back. No nation could stand up under the overwhelming array of military might now presented. The Turk and the Egyptian, slow to anger. I suppose it is wise to make the new world as inclusive as possible, but this business of buying seats with tardy and empty gestures reminds me too much of the Alexandrine shopkeepers, frantically rubbing the victory V signs from their windows in 1942 when Rommel was rushing east from Tobruk.

What Hope for Small Powers?

BY PAUL MALLES

IN CONSIDERING the problem of the small powers in Europe the general public divides into two groups. The first takes the view that in a "shrinking" world small states are doomed to disappear. Their petty quarrels are a nuisance and a danger, for the great powers are constantly forced to interfere in their affairs. Unable to defend themselves, small states constitute zones of insecurity in the defense system of their big neighbors, which for that reason try to extend their "spheres of influence" as far as possible beyond their borders. The existence of small states thus becomes a powerful factor in the rivalries of the great powers, and it follows that the sooner the small states disappear from the map the sooner a real security system can be established.

The argument of the other group attempts to prove just the opposite. Small nations, it avers, have the same right to a free and independent existence as big ones. Their quarrels would have subsided long ago but for the constant interference of the great powers, which use them as pieces on the chessboard of power politics. Therefore any form of international order which does not guarantee to small nations the same degree of sovereignty, security, and economic opportunity that big countries enjoy is undemocratic and will be the background for renewed wars.

The element of truth in both arguments is obvious. The trouble is that they are based on two different political principles, which, in our present society, unfortunately appear to be antagonistic—power and right. When shall the twain meet, if ever? That precisely is the basic problem of the small states.

Both arguments use dangerous generalizations. Is it actually true that the "shrinking" of the world, the shortening of distances and the growing economic interdependency, must lead to the disappearance of small states? After all, the world has been "shrinking" not only in the last fifteen years but for more than a century. The technical revolution of the nineteenth century, with its integrating effect on the economic life of the world, has certainly not been surpassed as yet by the developments of the twentieth. Far from forcing small nations into greater units, the Industrial Revolution opened to them avenues of economic progress which converted disorganized and nearly bankrupt states like Sweden, Denmark, and Switzerland into thriving communities of exceptional political and social stability. Whatever the reasons, one cannot overlook the fact that these small states, and even new ones, like Czechoslovakia, weathered the storm of the last great depression better than most of the big nations, even to the extent of solving economic and social problems with which the great powers were still grappling at the beginning of the present war.

The eternal problem of the small states is not economic or social stability but security. It is often difficult to say when, in modern European history, the trend toward large political units has prevailed over the opposite trend, for integrating and disintegrating forces have been continuously at work. But one thing can be seen clearly: the establishment of small nations as independent states is definitely encouraged whenever weapons of defense gain superiority over weapons of offense. In the middle of the last century the Czech patriot and historian Palacky defended the Austrian Empire because he understood clearly even then the threat to the small Slavic nations offered by a unified Germany. But in the second half of the nineteenth century defensive strategy developed immense superiority, and the Czechs and other small nations could in 1918 actually gain their independence not only because the Central Powers had been defeated in World War I but also because the successful defense of these new states seemed feasible. While the old small powers of Scandinavia believed that World War I had demonstrated the futility of all wars of aggression, the new small powers of Central Europe, less optimistic but not less deluded, scrambled for odd bits of land of so-called strategic importance and spent millions of their national income on elaborate defense systems which a decade later proved no more useful than the "border guards" to which the Danish army had been reduced.

What will be the fate of the small powers at the end of this war, which has so amply demonstrated the futility of their defense measures? Their economic problems will be difficult, but they can be solved. The small powers of Europe, among which defeated Italy must now be included, have enough industrial and agricultural importance both as sources and markets to force the great powers, in their own interest, to put them on their feet again. But their security problem is worse than ever before. In fact, it seems insoluble in a world system which, whatever the form of the new international security organization, is based on power relationships.

One does not need to succumb to the pessimism expressed today in liberal circles and expect a new world war in five or ten or fifteen years. But it is completely illusory to think that in our present form of society the relations between nations can be based upon anything other than power. Thus the struggle for international security is unavoidably taking on a social-revolutionary aspect, which will be most apparent where the need for external security is greatest, that is, among the small European nations. This is what both the right and the left mean today when they utter the half-truth that Europe is going to turn "Communist."

This prediction ignores Masaryk's dictum that "states live by the ideas through which they have been created." Most of the European small states were created by the forces of the national-liberal revolution of which the American Revolution was a part. They will scarcely subjugate themselves willingly to either external or internal dictatorship. It is true, however, that the Soviet Union, because of its social-revolutionary basis, will have the greatest possible attraction for the small European nations, especially those which have not yet achieved the social stability of the small northern democracies. And this attraction will persist as long as the Western powers are unwilling or unable to guarantee the small nations a system which combines individual and national freedom with social and national security.

Dumbarton Oaks reflected only too well the disparaging attitude taken today by the great powers toward the small nations. While the charter of the old League of Nations maintained the complete legal equality of small and big powers—a practical absurdity—the Dumbarton Oaks draft leans to the other extreme. It reduces the "Assembly" to a debating society in which even the topics to be discussed are prescribed by the great powers. At the same time it vests all power in the "Security Council," in which the great powers are sacrosanct to all practical purposes. It seems clear enough that the great powers are pursuing a policy of "100 per cent realism" which, combined with the present helplessness of the small nations, makes all of them completely dependent on the Big Three.

As in other cases of so called "realism," it may well turn out in the long run that the present policy of the great powers is one of extreme unreality. While the small powers may be negligible factors in power politics just now, they may not remain so in a changing Europe. They are strongly conscious of their rights and may very well become important as negative factors of perpetual unrest and obstruction. Poland and Greece are warning examples. Puppet governments may serve to secure an apparent tranquillity as long as they are protected by occupation armies. But sooner or later these armies will have to be withdrawn; and what then? The degree to which the great powers will permit the small nations to be heard in matters of general interest and to have a vote in matters that concern them will be indicative of the democratic content of the new world-security system. The criticism of the Dumbarton Oaks draft voiced quite unanimously in Canada is inevitable. Canada is the only one of the small or middle powers which during the whole war has been on the giving and not the receiving end of the United Nations war machine, and it will also be asked for great contributions in the post-war period. The idea of collective security is certainly not strengthened by asking a country to cooperate whole-heartedly in the new world organization and at the same time denying it the right to decide on actions in which it may become involved economically and militarily.

While it is not feasible to grant all the small and middle powers equal representation, functional representation is a possibility. Canada as a small power has persistently advanced this formula as the basis for representation on the war boards of the United Nations. The principle is applicable as well to the new world organization. It would at least signify an attempt to reconcile power and right.

50 Years Ago in "The Nation"

THERE IS A VAST DEAL of satisfaction that Congress has at last adjourned, albeit tempered by the reflection that the meeting of the next one cannot be postponed beyond the first Monday in December. This satisfaction is expressed in some of the state legislatures by resolutions condemnatory of Congress and congratulating the country on its final adjournment and extinction.—March 7, 1895.

THE EFFECT OF WEALTH on the journalistic mind is a subject of considerable pathological interest which we commend to the Academy of Medicine. The condition of excitement into which the press has been thrown during the past fortnight by the marriage of one rich woman and the divorce of another, in fact, seems hardly distinguishable from a species of dementia. . . . This stuff is greedily read by all classes; and if we infer the character of the population from its consumption . . . we should say that the United States was inhabited exclusively by servant girls, longshoremen, and hackmen.—March 14, 1895.

AN ACTUAL AND BONA FIDE sale of American woollens has been made in Bradford, the great English center of woolen manufacturing. This is said to have been the first shipment of American woollens ever made to Europe.—March 21, 1895.

THE SHOCKING RIOT in the Indiana legislature, in which so many persons were hurt and the ribs of the Governor's secretary broken, was a regular football attempt to "tackle him low," so as to prevent his reaching the Speaker with a bill, and a distinguished football player really won fresh honors in the mêlée. The row arose over a bill intended to substitute a Republican for a Democrat as custodian of the Statehouse.—March 21, 1895.

HARVARD CLEARLY does not shrink from the distinction of administering the deathblow to intercollegiate football. After thinking over the matter for several weeks, the faculty of the university have not only adhered to their former resolution, adopted on February 19, requesting the committee on athletics to put a stop to such contests, but have gone a step farther, and, by a considerable majority, have voted that they "remain of the opinion that no student under their charge should be permitted to take part in intercollegiate football contests." . . . The devotees of the game will weep for a season, but their sorrow will be short-lived, and sanity will speedily resume sway in their minds.—March 28, 1895.

BOOK OF THE MONTH: Theodore Roosevelt, "The Winning of the West and Southwest."

Henrietta Szold

BY MARVIN LOWENTHAL

EVERYWHERE we discern prognostics of the fact that life in the twentieth century will not be easy to live." So Henrietta Szold, then a young slip of a woman, told a Maryland state teachers' convention in 1887. How hard it turned out to be, probably not even the shrewdest prognostics could reveal. On the whole, or at least as we look back upon it, the age in which she was reared appears idyllic and golden—"gilded" though they already called it—and beset with an unchastened optimism.

Born in 1860, the little Baltimore girl experienced only as a childish dream the torment of the Civil War. She remembered picking lint for the wounded boys in blue. From her father's shoulders, in the front parlor crowded with neighbors, she saw the funeral procession of Abraham Lincoln. Her father, a Hungarian-born rabbi who tempered a reformer's zeal with traditional learning and his own native wisdom, had fought on the barricades of Vienna in 1848; and in Baltimore he was dubbed "the rabbi of Timbuku" because, in company with a small society of liberal-minded fellow-citizens, he proposed to help educate the newly freed Negroes. Through him Henrietta learned, more by example than precept, the principles she held fundamental to her life. Adopt, he urged, a central idea and relate everything to it; and, touching her more intimately, he impressed upon her by an unswerving behavior that "Judaism was not only a creed but a way of life."

Her home was a center of intellectual world-planning, world-curing bustle. The opening of Johns Hopkins University in 1876—the educational wonder of its day—brought to Baltimore and her father's dinner table young Fabian Franklin, Joseph Jastrow, and the Flexner and Heilprin brothers. At seventeen she published in a local paper an article on the Turkish-Balkan question which would have done credit to Mr. Godkin's Nation. The German language and much of its culture, as well as Hebrew, French, mathematics, and botany, became familiar passions. Except for her inner gaiety and a deep sense of kinship with the soil, both of which she inherited or absorbed from her parents, she might have passed for a devout little blue-stocking.

At eighteen she entered upon a decade of teaching. She likewise attended the public lecture courses of Johns Hopkins and the Peabody Institute; she became acquainted with prominent educators—Miss M. Carey Thomas, the founder of Bryn Mawr, and Mary Garrett, who gave Johns Hopkins a half-million dollars to open its door to women. Finally she embarked upon an educational innovation of her own. In 1889, the year that gave birth to Hull House, she founded in Baltimore a night school for immigrants—one of the first in the country, and in its Americanization and social programs an embryonic settlement house as well. If social service for its own sake, in itself an ennobling career, had inspired her as the "central idea" she unconsciously sought, she might have taken a place with Jane Addams, Lillian Wald, and a score of other women in the American quest for the better life. As it turned out, her career became unique. There never can be another Henrietta Szold.

The immigrants for whom her night school was created and who formed the majority of its students were Russian Jews—refugees from the oppressions and pogroms of the Czarist regime. Imperceptibly—for she did not wake up one morning a convert—the young immigrant Hebraists under whose direction she guided the school and the graybeards who wrestled with the English tongue in the classes made her a Zionist. Other and earlier influences played a part. Her father's dictum that Judaism was a way of life impelled her to the conclusion that such a life can be normal, productive, and full only if lived freely on a soil of its own and native to its genius. The martial poetry of Emma Lazarus, the contrasting spiritual indifference and snobbery rampant in the American Jewish scene—"materialism" she called it—the grandeur and romance as well as the tears and blood of the Jewish people, gave to her vision of the world and the place of the Jew in it a new and lasting focus. "I realized," she said in one of her early talks on the subject, "that Zionism supplied my bruised, torn, and bloody nation, my distracted nation, with an ideal that is balm to the self-inflicted wounds and to the wounds inflicted by others." From the outset her Zionism was never a narrow tribalistic cult. "Racial Zionism," she maintained long before Hitler turned the concept of race into a hideous mockery, "is a revolting anomaly." On the contrary, her ideal was catholic. It implied a goal which, to use her own words, "is at once spiritual, philanthropic, political, and—in good time—diplomatic."

Largely because she was possessed by the demon of practicality, years elapsed before she translated her Zionist fervor into deeds. She had no talent for oratory and no impulse to become a propagandist in thin air—agitating or organizing in behalf of an ideal which had as yet but slim foothold in reality. She reached in fact the age at which the average person feels set for life—she was forty-nine—when an "accidental" spur to action launched her upon the career that has made her famous.

A journey to Palestine in 1909 brought her face to face with a challenging aspect of Zionist reality. As she and her mother walked through a street in Jaffa on their way to the Jewish Girls' School they saw "a most horrible sight: children with wreaths of flies around their eyes." Yet the children in the school were free of the plague—because, so she learned, they received free compulsory medical attention. As they left the school her mother said, "Here is work for you."

Work it was, and Henrietta Szold was the incarnate soul of work. Upon her return to America she met with a group of thirty-seven women who organized themselves into a society called Hadassah. They chose a motto from Jeremiah: "The healing of the daughter of my people." They adopted as a program the propagation of Zionism in America and the furtherance of health work in Palestine. For years thereafter Miss Szold was its tireless organizer, president, guiding light, and eventually—if the phrase may be used—its saintly tutelary spirit. Today its membership numbers 150,000 American women; and, throughout, its work has been the major factor in making Palestine the healthiest land in the Middle East and one of the healthiest in the world. Child-welfare centers, medical centers, nursing schools, and hospitals have carried the name of Miss Szold, and Hadasah, from Dan to Beersheba among Arab and Jew alike.

Immediately after the last war, at the age of sixty, the indomitable woman—often ill but always resilient—set out again for Palestine. There she took active charge of the Zionist public-health work. Successively she assumed task after task: directing education, organizing a country-wide social service, and occupying an executive post in the Jewish Agency—the body responsible, under the British mandate, for all Zionist activities in Palestine.

As she grew in years and deeds, her people heaped upon her new honors and, more flattering, new tasks. When Hitler launched his murderous war against the Jews of Europe, upon her slender shoulders—she was a wisp of a creature—fell the piteous work of rescuing those youngsters who managed to escape the Nazis and whom the British permitted, under murderously restricted quotas, to enter the promised land. She organized the methods, an exemplary achievement, whereby these waifs were restored to normal existence and prepared for active pursuits in farming or industry. Long ago Miss Szold had written, "I should have had children, many children." By the time of her death, a month ago, the children of the Youth Aliyah—the name of this rescue and rehabilitation movement—the children whom she had mothered into a new birth and a new life, numbered more than 13,000.

The spirit and philosophy of Henrietta Szold is perhaps best expressed in a letter she once wrote when the world and her own mood were at their darkest. "Just now," she said, "I tremble most of the time when I look ahead; but I console myself with the thought that one does not dream for two thousand years steadily without having the strength to live in accordance with the high ideals that made the beauty of the dream." Her reliance on the strength of a dream is the true measure of her practicality. It made her not the social-service leader but one of the builders of a nation.

The New South on the March

BY JAMES A. DOMBROWSKI

THE democratic South, the new South, is finding new spokesmen. Listen to young Governor Ellis Arnall speaking to the Georgia legislators after he had threatened that if they did not lift the burden of the poll tax from the ballot he would do so by executive order: "The voice of the new South will become more audible as the months and years go by. Georgia spoke today for democracy."

Listen to Senator Lister Hill of Alabama: "The Alabama poll tax, because of its cumulative requirements, is the most burdensome, restrictive, indefensible, and undemocratic of that of any state."

Listen to the fifty leading editors and writers of the South meeting at the Atlanta Biltmore on December 21, to discuss "Limitations on the Franchise in the South." Mark Ethridge, publisher of the Louisville Courier Journal, is in the chair. Harry S. Strozier, corporation lawyer and contributing editor of the Macon (Georgia) News, is speaking: "We cannot fight battles for democracy all over the world unless we have it here. . . . I want to see the poll tax abolished and the Negro enfranchised."

All over the South today there is evidence of an upsurge of progressive thought and action. University students are vigorously defending freedom of the press for a college editor at Williamsburg, Virginia, and academic freedom for a university president at Austin, Texas. Southern editors are supporting the Fair Employment Practices Committee and the Supreme Court decision in the Texas "white primary" case. Leading Tennessee ministers are joining in condemnation of the use of religion by the so-called Christian American Association to cloak legislative attacks on the "legitimate organizations of working people," and a protest is going to each member of the Georgia legislature in the name of 22,000 Methodist women urging defeat of the Christian American "right-to-work bill," which the women call a "right-to-work-for-starvation-wages bill." In South Carolina a state senator is actively campaigning for a secret ballot, and the Arkansas legislature has rescinded its action on the "millionaire's tax" resolution.

Without discounting in any way the bold action of Governor Arnall or the courageous words of Senator Hill, I want to point out that the real significance of what is happening in the South will be missed if one fails to understand that behind these leaders is an electorate ready for such leadership. The Georgia legislature acted as it knew the majority of the people of Georgia wanted it to act. Editors reflect as well as create public opinion. The fact that fifty of the outstanding editors and writers of the South were in complete agreement with Harry Strozier on the two questions of abolishing the poll tax and enfranchising the Negro means that Southern attitudes have been undergoing vast changes unnoticed by most of the politicians.

The Southern people have been at least a generation ahead of their leadership for many years. And the politicians who long ago ceased to represent them have remained in office only because so few people go to the polls—in the 1944 elections only 21 per cent of the potential voters. Probably three out of five Southerners have never cast a vote in their lives. In the midst of a great war in defense of democracy, only two out of thirteen Southern states enjoy majority rule. On the other hand, only three of the remaining thirty-five states failed to send at least 50 per cent of their potential voters to the polls on Election Day. Greatly as public opinion has changed in the South, no real progress can be made until the people take a more active part in politics and government. It is encouraging to note, therefore, that they are turning their attention to legislative action and suffrage reform.

Progressive efforts toward a new South were tremendously stimulated in 1938 by the President's Report on Economic Conditions in the South. The facts in this report were so startling that soon after its appearance a conference was called in Birmingham, Alabama, to discuss ways and means of remedial action. The fifteen hundred Southerners who attended—social workers, ministers, educators, a few business men, labor representatives, farmers, editors, and professional people—formed a permanent organization, the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. For the past seven years this organization, led by the South's most distinguished citizens, has worked at the job of mobilizing the liberal South for democratic action. Its present president is Dr. Clark Foreman, who was the editor in charge of the writing of the President's report.

The Southern Conference for Human Welfare was founded on the principle that democracy is good, that the great majority of Southern people want democracy. And it recognizes that democracy cannot prevail in the South until there is suffrage reform. The title of the first anti-poll tax bill before Congress stated that it was introduced by Representative Geyer of California at the request of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. No Southern Congressman could be found at that time to sponsor the bill. After the poll tax became a national issue, the Civil Rights Committee of the Southern Conference was expanded to become the National Committee to Abolish the Poll Tax. This committee, under the leadership of Jennings Perry, editor of the Nashville Tennessean, Mrs. Virginia Foster Durr, and Mrs. Kathryn Shryver, has done a magnificent job, for which the democratic South is grateful. The Conference has also carried on an active educational campaign to obtain state action against the poll-tax evil.

But the poll tax is only one of many restrictions on the ballot. The Conference has fought many battles around specific issues to combat intolerance, anti-Semitism, racial prejudice, and other obstacles to a free and democratic society.

By emphasizing the growth of progressive sentiment in the South I do not mean to minimize the strength of the reactionary elements. Intolerance has always thrived on poverty. It is no accident that native fascist groups have usually had their headquarters in the South—William Pelley and his Silver Shirts in Asheville, George Christians in Chattanooga, the Klan in Georgia, Vance Muse and his Christian Americans in Houston, Texas. The latest of these groups, first active in Georgia, calls itself the Commoner Party. According to its prospectus, "The Commoner Party proposes the formation of a Gentile political-party block to combat the Jew and Negro racial blocks now active in the political affairs of the nation."

Last summer, during the Democratic primary contest in Alabama between Lister Hill and Jim Simpson, the Simpson forces concentrated on the issue of white supremacy. The most virulent and provocative race propaganda was circulated. About two weeks before Election Day, when only one timid editorial voice had been raised in protest at these tactics, the Southern Conference through its Alabama affiliate sent out a statement to about two thousand leading white citizens of Alabama strongly condemning the injection of race into a political campaign and asking for signatures for publication. During one week-end more than four hundred signatures were received.

There was a time when Southern politicians could keep the voters' minds off such subjects as jobs, wages, and social security by raising the issue of white supremacy. But those days are gone. The Southern people are becoming more and more politically literate, and when enough of them can surmount the many obstacles to voting, things will happen in the state legislatures and in Congress. The proof is in the victories of Hill, Pepper, and Arnall, and the retirement of Dies, Starnes, Reynolds, and Newsome.

The Conference is seeking wide publicity for two sets of facts—the enormous natural wealth of the South, and the bitter poverty of its people. More is known of the poverty than of the wealth. The South could be a veritable paradise if its natural resources were converted to the use of the inhabitants. The thirteen Southern states, one-fourth of the total area of the nation, contain half of the nation's farms, 90 per cent of the sulphur and phosphate, two-thirds of the oil and natural gas, a fourth of the electric power, 40 per cent of the lumber production, and ample supplies of coal and iron. Having given it in addition a salubrious climate, the good Lord evidently intended the South to be His prize exhibit of the abundant life. What must be His amazement on examining his handiwork to find that the 36,500,000 people on these 800,000 square miles have the lowest living standards in the nation—the worst diet, the shabbiest houses, the fewest toilets, the poorest schools, hospitals, and libraries!

With 27 per cent of the population and about 40 per cent of the natural resources, the thirteen Southern states have only 12 per cent of the manufactures and 12 per cent of the money. Here is a situation that demands help from Washington and wise leadership at home. It is hoped that the agencies in charge of the disposal of war plants will keep the plants in the South going, and that the control will be left with Southerners for the benefit of the South.

The Southern Conference aims to show all groups in the region how enormous are the possibilities if they will work together. If the income of ten Southern states were raised to the national average, the national income would be increased by ten billion dollars! What would that not mean to the nation at large in terms of increased purchasing power? Such an achievement, of course, is dependent on education for all, training in new skills for all, new industries, high wages, reasonable profits that can be reinvested in Southern industry. Everyone, white and colored, must progress together or remain where they are. Fortunately, many business men, such as Andrew J. Higgins and Louis Reynolds, have long realized the possibilities and have started on the way to make them a reality. It is time for the politicians to wake up and get in step with the new democratic South. It is time for the voters to take action.

Needed: A Citizens' Army

BY IRVING LIPKOWITZ

THE controversy over peace-time conscription has forced into the background the more crucial issue: are we going to have a citizen or a professional army? Conscription is being considered as an isolated question, as though it were an end in itself. The title of a recent article epitomizes this approach—Does This Nation Want Compulsory Military Training in Peace Time? In that narrow frame of reference it is easy and seemingly virtuous for many to condemn conscription and raise once again the familiar arguments used before the war against the R. O. T. C. and big armies. Discussions on that plane get nowhere because they miss the undeniable fact that conscription is the only means thus far suggested for building a citizen army. Consideration of conscription as a self-contained issue is a dangerous reversion to the pre-war idea that the smaller the army the better. A broader view is necessary because much more than a recruiting method is at stake.

The problem is not one of military semantics but of a durable peace. Many of those who oppose conscription are for a peace settlement fully implemented with enforcement machinery. During the early, most critical post-war years that "machinery," we all know, is going to consist primarily of armies. No matter what we say or do within our own country, the world is going to have an armed peace for some years to come. Under the circumstances those who advocate an enforceable peace cannot honestly evade the responsibility of helping to shape the post-war army.

This is a strange new burden for the American citizen. Until this war military affairs were assumed to be a specialized problem, to be handled by an expert few in Washington. Never before did the army loom as an important influence on our political and economic future. The road ahead will be especially rough for liberals because their contempt for appeasement and their advocacy of intervention have not obliterated their traditional antipathy to all things military. There is still a tendency to consider the mere existence of an army as militarism. To persist in that view is defeatism.

The immediate job ahead is building the right kind of post-war army. Opposition to conscription will not achieve that objective. A large professional army is a much greater threat to democracy and peace than is conscription. Success in the current battle against conscription will be a Pyrrhic victory if it prepares the ground for a professional army and creates a civilian-versus-military class consciousness.

The citizen army is a better bulwark against fascism and militarism than just "no conscription." A citizen-reservist army helps to keep military affairs in the right political perspective. Military service becomes the part-time civic duty of the citizen instead of the full-time job of a special group. The broader the class of reservists is, and it would include the thirty-year-old alumni as well as the active twenty-year-olds, the less chance there is of building up a powerful clique of full-time professionals. All who are or have been reservists will be much more alert, as civilians, to the way military affairs are handled. With the public circulating through the army, that institution is bound to be more democratic in outlook and more sensitive to civilian opinion than a strictly professional army could ever be.

Moreover, militarism is better served by professionals than by reservists. The citizen who chooses to be a reservist rather than a full-time soldier has obviously decided to make his place in the civilian world and is not likely to seek glory through war. On the contrary, he will be extremely desirous that there shall be no next war. Eagerness for a "good fight" is more likely to develop among full-time regulars who spend all their time preparing for one. Those who oppose conscription claim that the period of training will make militarists of our youth. But there is no reason to assume that a short period in the army will influence their attitude more than the years of civilian life before and after their term of service. The absence of a military tradition among the people of this country is further assurance that conscription will not necessarily bring such a change. The existence of a professional army creates the illusion among civilians that perhaps they will not be called upon to serve if war comes and so lessens their interest in preventing war. If war does come again, the civilian must be conscripted into the army anyway, and the country, not the enemy, pays the price of last-minute extemporization.

The citizen army also has the advantages of flexibility and youth. As reservists grow old, they automatically become inactive; the professional army cannot rid itself as easily of its over-aged regulars. And since the size of the citizen army can be more quickly adjusted by extending or shortening the periods of training or of active reserves, it will be easier to keep the citizen army large enough to enforce the peace and yet small enough to keep ourselves peaceful.

The superiority of the citizen-army pattern over the professional is so pronounced that it must be established even if the price is conscription. The method of recruiting is not going to determine whether or not we become militaristic. The political and social atmosphere in which it is conducted, especially the attitude of the civilian and the soldier toward each other, will be the controlling force. We have had conscription for more than four years, and no one can say that it has fostered militarism or fascism among us. If those conditions did not develop in war time, there is no reason to assume that they will in peace time, when civilian controls over military affairs can be more extensive.

The creation of a true citizen army is not a quixotic project. Democracy and military strength are not irreconcilable. The last election showed that the army is not a political bloc in this nation. The army's demobilization plan, based on the preferences of the common soldier, and the expanding program of discussion forums are further examples of what can happen in the army of the United States.

Until a sincere and vigorous effort is made to establish a citizen army, nobody is justified in taking the position that it cannot be done. In fact, a beginning has already been made by General Marshall himself. A policy directive on the post-war army, released to the public by General Marshall on September 2, 1944, declared that the citizen-army pattern is to be "the basis for all plans for a post-war peace establishment." Some of General Marshall's reasons for favoring a citizen army reflect a concern for political democracy and for keeping the military an arm of the civilian government. He points out that with citizen reserves blending the military forces into the civilian population, "an intelligent and widespread public opinion is provided as the basis for the determination of all public questions relating to military affairs." Many groups, from the saber-rattlers at one extreme to the undiluted pacifists at the other, have in past decades encouraged a priesthood atmosphere among the military which insulated military affairs too much from public opinion. The army, like the government, can be made responsive to the public will by the participation of the citizen in its activities.

General Marshall's directive is not a guaranty of a true citizen army but an opportunity to build one. Such an army will never materialize unless there is strong, broad, and constant public support for it. Our congenital distaste for military matters in peace time must be disciplined. As in so many other fields of citizenship, a new attitude, much more positive than the old-time cynicism, must be shaped. The time has come to recognize that the army and navy will be powerful elements of our post-war government—and that they will be as wholesome as the American people make them, no better and no worse. Military affairs must become as much everybody's business in peace time as they are today.

Whoever is for a citizen army cannot be unequivocally against conscription unless he can show specifically how that type of army can be built on a volunteer basis. Those who take their stand against conscription without suggesting alternative methods of recruiting a citizen army are for all practical purposes advocating a professional army.

Postponement of a decision about our post-war army until after the war, as some suggest, would be a serious error because the delay would prevent the perfection of the peace-enforcement machinery and of plans for demobilization. The transition to a peace-time army needs as much advance planning as does reconversion of our production resources. The army cannot perfect its plans for demobilization until those in charge are given a clear idea of the kind and size of army Congress and the people will support. Those now in uniform who may want to continue in military service also have a right to know what kind of peace-time army there is to be. The real question, however, is whether the public is going to enrich plans that are now in the making with its views or, by default, hand them over to the military specialists. Instead of shelving the army problem, the American people ought to be giving it their most serious attention.

The rest of the world does not fear military aggression by the United States; after four years of conscription and three years of war the predominant desire of men at the battle fronts and in the war plants is to get back to peace. The other nations do fear that we may withdraw from international affairs, as we did after the last war, and if we leave the crucial question of our peace-time army unsettled, their fears will grow stronger. On the other hand, a clear-cut decision, a commitment to build an adequate citizen army, will be a convincing sign to other peoples that we mean to do our share in the creation and maintenance of peace.

No middle course is open to the United States. We either help shape the peace or take it as others make it. If we are to help fabricate the peace, we must be ready with the necessary machinery, including the right kind and size of army.

[Last week The Nation printed an article by John Scholte Nollen against peace-time conscription. Further discussion of the question will appear in subsequent issues.]

In the Wind

IN THE FIRST EDITION of the Nashville Tennessean of January 22 an editorial headed Commerce for Wallace? urged the Senate to get in step with the times and confirm Henry Wallace's appointment. The editorial was missing from all subsequent editions. Next day the paper ran an editorial, headed A Blow to Confidence, which said it would be in the nature of a national disaster for the Senate to confirm Wallace. Marvin W. Strate of St. Paul, to whom we owe this information, remarks, "It's a wise editor who knows his own mind, and an even wiser one who knows his owner's mind."

ONE OF THE MOST IMPRESSIVE speeches on social and economic questions at the World Trade Union Congress in London was made by Wallace Johnson, a Negro from Sierra Leone, Africa, who had just been released by the British after five years of imprisonment and exile for union activities.

IF YOUR LOCAL DAIRY is running advertisements to the effect that there would be plenty of butter if the OPA would only raise the ceiling price, it is most probable that the ads were written in Chicago. The American Dairy Association, with offices in that city, is supplying its members all over the country with ready-made layouts to which they need only add their names. It's part of a national campaign to raise prices.

THE NAME of Lieutenant General George S. Patton was mentioned in company with those of Bach, Handel, and other composers of sacred music in the New York Sun's Saturday column, The Choir Loft, on February 10. The General has written a hymn, "God of Battle," which has been set to music by Peter De Rose and recorded by Phil Spitalny and his All-Girl Orchestra.

FESTUNG EUROPA: In Oslo a box of matches costs six kroner ($1.25). . . . So many Germans have fled to Prague from points southeast that a special newspaper, Der Deutsche aus dem Südosten, has been established for them. This is a typical editorial comment: "Your special political mission as an active all-Germanic outpost is only interrupted. It will live again, later."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.]

Torture in Argentina

BY JOHN W. WHITE

[In view of the attempts of the Argentine dictatorship to impress the Conference of Foreign Ministers at Mexico City and American public opinion by hinting that it may declare war against Germany and permit democratic elections, Mr. White's exposure of the Gestapo methods of the Farrell-Perón regime has special interest and timeliness. It is the first of several articles by Mr. White; the next one will deal with the political situation in Bolivia.]

THE Gestapo's barbarian use of torture and intimidation has been transplanted successfully to the Western Hemisphere. Since torture has always been an essential part of the Nazi technique, it should not be surprising, perhaps, that it accompanied totalitarian ideology to the Nazi-fascist bridgehead in South America. Most of us have assumed, however, when watching the less revolting techniques of Gestapo agents exposed in the movies, that nothing like that could happen here, and "here" includes those republics to the south which we have blessed with our good neighborliness. But it has happened; both torture and intimidation have become flourishing state institutions in several Latin American republics, chief among them Argentina.

Torture is not a recent innovation in South America, of course. In its milder forms it has always been used by the police of all the republics, just as it is used today by the police in the United States. Italy and Germany, however, showed Latin America's fascists what really could be done to a naked prisoner if some serious thinking were given to the subject.

Argentina set its clock back nearly a century by the coup d'état which overthrew President Castillo and installed the present military regime. The regime's brutal treatment of all political prisoners and its assassination of the more troublesome ones is a return to the days of the bloody tyrant Juan Manuel de Rosas, whose well-organized gang of cutthroats, called the Mazurka, would have had little to learn from the Gestapo of today.

After General Uriburu's pro-fascist revolution of September, 1930, the Buenos Aires police department set up a so-called Special Section to rid the country of the "Communist menace." Under Uriburu, as under Farrell and Perón, anyone who dared oppose the government or even question the wisdom of any of its dictatorial decrees was a "Communist." In the 1930's, however, Argentina was not yet ready for Nazi-fascism, and Uriburu was ousted and fled to Europe. The Special Section persisted as one of several active groups which preserved and cultivated the virus of anti-democracy until it could be loosed on the country again in the pro-Nazi revolt which overthrew President Castillo in June, 1943.

Soon after the Farrell-Perón regime came to power, leading operatives of Himmler's Gestapo who had been assigned to Buenos Aires suggested that the Special Section be reorganized and "modernized." Under their expert guidance it was expanded from a city detective bureau into a great national organization specializing in persecution and torture. It has set up concentration camps for political prisoners similar to those in Nazi Germany, tortured thousands of victims guilty of nothing more serious than belonging to labor unions or democratic political parties, killed or caused the death of hundreds of people bearing Jewish, Polish, or Russian names, and caused the disappearance of other hundreds.

The Montevideo and Santiago branches of the Argentine underground movement have published from time to time the names of many of the political prisoners and described in detail the almost unbelievable brutality of their torture. Recently a letter was made public that had been written by prisoners confined in the cold, wet cellar of the city jail at La Plata, capital of the province of Buenos Aires. The letter declared that there were so many prisoners in the cellar that most of them had to remain on their feet while a few slept on the floor. They were given insufficient food of poor quality, and the physicians who were called in to attend the worst sufferers explained to the prisoners that they dared do no more than prescribe medicine.

Despite the revolting nature of most of the torture techniques now being used against political prisoners in Argentina, it seems advisable to make them known as evidence of the extent to which Nazi methods have already been established in the Western Hemisphere. The following account of some of these techniques has been sent to certain United Nations governments by their diplomatic agents at Buenos Aires and can be accepted as true, though perhaps incomplete.

The "electric spur" is the favorite instrument of the new school of native sadists who have been trained by Gestapo experts. It is a simple electric cable with several fine steel needles at the end. These electric needles are applied to the most sensitive parts of the naked body, such as the eyelids, the sexual organs, and the rectum. The torture usually is applied at two or more parts of the body simultaneously and has such terrific effect on the entire nervous system that it frequently produces insanity. In less extreme cases it paralyzes the muscles and causes great painful swellings and deep sores. It is persistently reported that at least five thousand people in Argentina have been tortured with the electric spur.

A simpler but equally effective method is to jab long hatpins through the testicles. Another frequent "treatment" subjects political prisoners, women as well as men, to a third degree in which their naked bodies are burned with lighted cigarettes in an effort to force them to answer questions the way the political police want them answered.

The "cup" is a device in the form of a funnel which is pressed against the body and from which the air is then pumped out. The resulting vacuum causes a huge swelling inside the cup and draws the blood to the surface, leaving a large black-and-blue sore. This device is used on prisoners known to be suffering from heart ailments. When applied in the region of the heart it aggravates the affection and often causes death from "heart failure."

The "bucket" is a huge vat filled with urine and excrement. The prisoner who is given this "treatment" is hung by his feet from the ceiling and then lowered until his head is submerged in the contents of the vat. This particular technique has the attraction of producing two forms of torture at the same time—semi-drowning in filth, and congestion of the brain from the downward flow of the blood.

One form of torture makes use of a familiar office appliance. In many European and South American countries letters, contracts, and other business documents are written in copying ink and preserved in duplicate by being put between the pages of a "copy-book" which is then squeezed between iron plates. The Argentine political police have found this office press a convenient method of smashing the fingers of prisoners who refuse to sign certain declarations.

The "slab" is a torture machine made of two huge sheets of steel. The victim is placed between the sheets, which are pressed together gradually until he suffers internal hemorrhages and vomits blood.

The whip and the rod have been seen in the movies. The long leather whip is usually dipped in water before the lashes are applied; the rod is made of fine steel bars that cut into the flesh like knives.

Professional boxers are employed to beat up certain prisoners since they know how to produce the desired effect without leaving telltale wounds.

One highly refined form of mental torture drives the prisoner almost to the point of insanity without actually causing any physical hurt. The victim usually is awakened at two or three o'clock in the morning and told that he is to be executed by a firing squad. He is then "taken for a ride" in an automobile, accompanied by two or three guards armed with rifles and obviously members of the firing squad. Finally he is stood against a wall and the firing squad is lined up, but at the last-minute he is reprieved and taken back to his cell. (This is one of several techniques which are reported to have been used on the Bolivian tin-mine owner, Maurice Hochschild, after he was kidnapped by members of the young army officers' "lodge" in La Paz last year.)

Sometimes as a variation a prisoner who is to be released is "taken for a ride" in an automobile, accompanied by armed guards. When the automobile gets to a deserted region outside the city, the prisoner is told that he is at liberty. Being familiar with the famous ley de fuga by which prisoners are shot while supposedly trying to escape, he stands there afraid to move and under mental torture that may induce insanity.

La razzia is an importation from the Sicilian Black Hand societies and is used for intimidating the opposition, especially the working classes. Gangs of armed thugs terrorize entire neighborhoods by breaking into and wrecking houses and by storming meetings of associations and trade unions, beating up those present and destroying the furniture and fixtures on the pretext that the meeting is plotting against the government. Schools, libraries, and newspaper offices have been raided frequently, and on two occasions movie theaters in Buenos Aires were stormed while crowded with people. One of these was the Mitre Theater in the working-class district of Avellaneda; the other was the Cine Arte Theater in the downtown section of the city, where an American war picture was being shown. The razzia has also been used frequently in Dock Sud and Villa Crespo, two workmen's districts outside the city of Buenos Aires.

Even when they are not tortured, political prisoners are demoralized and intimidated by being subjected to what is popularly known as el mal trato. Women of the working classes, especially wives and daughters who have refused to testify against their husbands and fathers, are put into cells with prostitutes and women criminals. They are not permitted visits from their families or from a lawyer; nor can they receive decent food from outside the jail.

The mal trato is applied to men prisoners in even worse form. If they are ill they usually are sent to regions where it is certain that their illness will get worse. They are given very poor food or deprived for entire days of anything to eat or drink. They receive no medical attention and may be put into cells with criminals of the lowest order.

So many lawyers have been punished for defending political prisoners in Argentina that it is practically impossible now for prisoners to find lawyers, except the ones who occasionally are assigned as "defense lawyers" by the government. Two of Argentina's most famous attorneys—Rodolfo Araoz Alfaro and Samuel Smerkin—are in concentration camps because they attempted to defend political prisoners.

The Italian Partisans

BY MARIO BELLINI

IN A recent speech before the House of Commons Mr. Churchill dealt at some length with the problem of the resistance movement in Europe. From the spirit of his speech it was evident that the Prime Minister favored the guerrillas as long as they limited their activity to fighting. He referred to the "brave men who have been fighting and maintaining guerrilla warfare in the Alps" and added that they had fought "very desperate battles." Prior to this Mr. Churchill had consistently minimized Italian guerrilla activity because of its anti-monarchist character. He had found frequent opportunity, however, to praise the Lieutenant General of the Realm as one "whose sincerity and ardor in the Allied cause and whose growing stature in Italian eyes are equally apparent." And he had often spoken of the "legitimate" king, and of Badoglio, whose "behavior is most creditable." All this, while he was telling the Italian people that they must "pay for the faults of Fascism."

Not everyone in England has followed Mr. Churchill's lead, and there have been various attempts to present the true situation. The day after Churchill's speech Aneurin Bevan took the floor in the House of Commons to say: "When Italy is freed, let us remember that it is on record from Field Marshal Alexander that the resistance movement in Italy has been more effective in fighting the Germans than any other resistance movement in Europe. More than 250,000 Italians have lost their lives in that resistance movement. If the men from Milan and Turin march down in order to extirpate their decadent society, would British soldiers be used once more to shoot them down?" The question has remained unanswered.

This was not the first time that members of the British Parliament had an opportunity to hear the truth about the Italian contribution to Germany's defeat. Recently six members of Parliament who were visiting the Italian front were told by a high Canadian officer that "without the efforts, big and small, of the patriots our task would have been doubly difficult and three times as costly."

The Italian Partisan movement derives its strength from a determination that inspires distrust in Mr. Churchill, a determination not only to drive the Nazis out of Italy but to achieve political freedom within Italy. That is why it receives little help, if any, from the Allies.

The efforts of the Italian guerrillas have been far greater than is generally recognized. On September 27, 1944, when Marshal Alexander was besieging Bologna, he ordered the patriots of the city to rise against the enemy. "Allied armies," he said in his proclamation, "are fighting with the greatest determination in the Apennine Mountains and are advancing inexorably toward the Po Valley. The liberation of your town is approaching. Patriots, your task is to attack the enemy wherever you meet him, to hit him singly or in groups. Thus you will hasten your liberation." The Bologna patriots obeyed the Allied commander's orders, but Bologna was not freed and the Germans suppressed the rebellion. On November 20 the Swiss National Zeitung revealed that "on Marshal Kesselring's personal order two Black Shirt divisions arrived from Germany and spent about a month hunting, arresting, deporting, and massacring many thousands of Bolognese belonging to patriotic movements."

Certainly the Allies owe much to the courage and faith of these men who died for the common cause. But they are showing the same unwillingness to understand the true meaning of the Italian guerrilla movement as they showed earlier toward the French liberation movement and the Yugoslav Partisans. This attitude of the Allies was demonstrated when, on November 12, 1944, Marshal Alexander ordered the Italian Partisans to cease large-scale operations.

Captain Ettore Sighieri, leader of a Partisan brigade, correctly pointed out that "to disband the Partisans is a proposal which, aside from any moral consideration, is impossible to realize. When a man joins us, he not only wants to stay but is bound to stay. If the Allies should refuse to help us, if the Rome government should continue to do nothing for us, we would rather fight to the last with the few weapons we possess than go home and be shot by the Germans. . . . We Partisans cannot winter as a regular army. To do so we should have to take cover in villages; but if we occupy a village, the Germans attack us in great strength, forcing us to retreat, and then they destroy the village in reprisal. We cannot remain in the mountains because in the winter we find nothing to eat and the cold is too bitter. To return to the plains would mean to be sentenced to death or at best to be deported to Germany. In order to survive we have to fight." (Italia Libera, Rome, November 17, 1944.)

It was not with people like these that General Eisenhower signed the unconditional-surrender terms. The patriots' aim is not to save the dynasty through the protection of a foreign power but to help their country. It is largely owing to them that after twenty years of Fascist tyranny a democratic Italy is now emerging.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THERE has not only been a Crimean proclamation but a German counter-proclamation, issued officially by the German News Bureau on February 13. It bore the title "The Yalta Hate Program" and the subtitle "The Chief War Criminals, Churchill, Roosevelt, and Stalin, Concoct a Fresh Crime Against Mankind." The document began by pronouncing judgment on the Yalta communiqué:

This program of hatred is the greatest political murder conspiracy of all times. . . . Diabolical intention to destroy the center of Europe. . . . We are here faced not only with an orgy of hatred against Germany but with a crime against mankind, a crime far surpassing even that perpetrated by Churchill, Roosevelt, and Stalin in provoking this war.

It then gave a summary of the communiqué's contents:

The statement declares in detail that Germany is to be utterly crushed by brute force and then dismembered. German industry is to be carried off. Sham courts are to be set up to continue the mass murder of German men, women, and children. Pending trial, Germans are to be forced into slave labor for foreign tyrants. This in a nutshell is the import of the hate-inspired Yalta program, whose keynote is "unconditional surrender"—the demand that the German people voluntarily subscribe to their own extermination.

The driving force of the Crimean conference was unmasked as "truly Biblical Jewish hatred":

This plan to destroy Germany has its origins in international Jewry. That alone can explain the complete harmony among Washington, London, and Moscow. The driving force behind Roosevelt, Churchill, and Stalin is the Jew, that eternal Jew who has brought such infinite suffering to the people of this earth during the several thousand years of his existence. The Führer's prophecy is now to be confirmed. The Jew is out to exterminate the Aryan. That is one of the aims of this war. But the actual result will be extermination of the Jew in Europe.

Finally the reaction of the German people was predicted:

The news of the hate-inspired plan of Yalta is spreading inside Germany like wildfire. Never—this is our vow in this hour when our enemies have dropped their mask and we see the mocking, diabolical leer of the Jew—never shall this plan to murder Germany be executed. Never shall this attempt against the future of the European nations be actually carried out. Our wrath will grow into a wild national fury. Ninety million Germans will stand fast on their native soil and, arms in hand, shatter this plan, the most diabolical of all time.

What can the German people expect to gain from such a "wild national fury"? What can now change the outcome of the war? The things urged as ground for hope become more and more mystical and foolish. As the front drew near to the Saxon border the greatest newspaper in the country offered its readers this proof of the certain prospect of a change: "German leadership faces developments at the front with iron nerves and calmness. By this attitude it proves incontrovertibly that it still has the trumps with which to master the dangerous situation." A Pomeranian newspaper presented proof of equal validity. "Let us remember the plight of England and the Soviets a few years ago. Every blow a nation receives only makes it stronger and more determined. A decisive change is bound to occur."

BOOKS and the ARTS

FULL EMPLOYMENT—BEVERIDGE MODEL

BY MORDECAI EZEKIEL

FULL EMPLOYMENT IN A FREE SOCIETY. By William H. Beveridge. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.75.

THOSE who fear the Murray bill as "establishing a collective society" will view Sir William Beveridge's "Full Employment in a Free Society" with equal alarm. But all who realize the urgency of an effective yet democratic solution for this central problem of our times will find this epochal work a stimulus to clearer thought and an arsenal of arguments to overwhelm the doubters.

The publication of the American edition is an event of equal importance with the appearance of Keynes's "General Theory" itself. The book has a significance for contemporary America far greater than the brief notices from England had implied. Already the father of social security, Beveridge is now firmly established as master of the whole problem of employment and unemployment.

Sir William marshals the varied facts about the persistence of unemployment before the war, and states the case for governmental action to sustain markets for all that the economy can produce at full employment. Up to this point he follows the Keynesian analysis, and buttresses British and American proposals based upon it—the British White Paper, the President's last budget message, and the Murray bill (now the Murray-Wagner-Thomas-O'Mahoney bill). But he breaks new ground to conclude that public fiscal operations are not the only condition necessary to maintain full employment. "The first condition of full employment is that total outlay should always be high enough to set up a demand for products of industry . . . using the whole man-power of the country . . . this must be made a responsibility of the state." Beyond this basic need two subsidiary measures are also needed—"controlled location of industry and organized mobility of labor." "It is better, and less of an interference with individual lives, to control business men in the location of their enterprises than to leave them uncontrolled and to require work people to move their homes for the sake of employment." In addition to state control of the location of industry, the mobility of labor must be organized so as to flow into the right industries and, if necessary, into the right areas. "Use of unemployment exchanges . . . should be compulsory [for] all persons under eighteen, so that the flow of adaptable youth into industries may be wisely directed. Changes in the demand for labor are inseparable from progress. . . . Organized mobility means that if and when change is necessary, men and women should be willing to change their occupations and their places of work rather than cling to idleness. It does not mean perpetual motion." Beyond these three basic propositions, examination of the international implications of full employment in England leads Beveridge to two further propositions—not quite so clearly high-lighted in his summary: (1) that if England and other countries are to follow full-employment policies while carrying on uncontrolled multilateral trading among themselves, they must retain the right to protect themselves "against the contagion of depression by discrimination in trade and by other measures . . . [such] protection . . . cannot make the ultimate condition of the depressed country worse"; and (2) that stabilization of "the production and marketing of . . . food and raw materials is an essential step for preventing fluctuation in industrial countries." But since all fluctuation in overseas demand cannot be eliminated, Britain must establish measures "for varying home demand to meet variations of overseas demand."

These basic proposals are supported by a marshaling of relevant facts on all aspects of the subject, especially British and American, which would be Teutonic in its thoroughness if it were not lightened by British conciseness and wit. "I have made the use of indispensable technical language as painless as possible by giving in Appendix D an explanation of terms." Despite the deep seriousness and even passion with which Sir William states his case, you are still aware of the irrepressible twinkle in his merry eye. The book is a very readable one, especially the initial forty-page introduction and summary. That is doubly fortunate, for first-hand understanding of this crucial subject is a "must" for many persons who never have attempted to master the technical jargon of economics.

Despite the wealth of statistical and economic erudition with which he supports his conclusions, Sir William's approach is deeply humanistic. Unemployment is not only an economic problem but a social disease. "The . . . Report takes as its aim freedom from idleness." While inability to find workers when needed is merely an inconvenience to the employer, causing "annoyance or loss," inability to find a job is "a personal catastrophe . . . idleness even on an income corrupts; the feeling of not being wanted demoralizes." The work men are put to must not be merely made work or leaf-raking—self-respect demands that they have work that they can see is useful and counts. Man-power must be used to produce products or services of the greatest significance to the community—"the objective is not simply outlay but wise outlay." But overriding this objective is work itself—men left hopelessly idle rot and perish (or create revolution, as in Germany, the reviewer would add).

Despite the additional facets which have been stressed, the dominant theme is the need and method of maintaining adequate market demand for all that the economy can produce. The use of public expenditure to maintain full employment is essentially a conservative undertaking—"full employment is in fact attainable while leaving the conduct of industry in the main to private enterprise, and the proposals made in the Report are based on this view." The public budget must be so established that "after estimating how much . . . private citizens may be expected to lay out on consumption and private investment" there will be "public outlay sufficient, with this estimated private outlay, to employ the whole man-power of the country" (p. 136). This involves a clear break with the old principle that state budgets should be as small as possible and should balance income and outgo each year. So long as laissez faire is assumed to create effective demand for all the productive resources, "the state cannot prudently use . . . these resources for its own purposes without depriving private citizens of their use. But once the possibility of deficient private demand is admitted, the state . . . must be prepared to spend more than it takes away from its citizens by taxation, in order to use the labor and other productive resources which would otherwise be wasted in unemployment." Deficit expenditure, however, is not essential to state assurance of full employment—various models of British taxation and expenditure (prepared by Nicholas Kaldor) show that heavy state expenditures backed by heavy progressive taxation could maintain full employment and balance the public budget at the same time. While Sir William concludes that "it is better to provide the means for outlay by taxing than by borrowing," he has no fear of borrowing. Rather he emphasizes that "the state in matters of finance is in a different position from any private citizen or association of private citizens; it is able to control money in place of being controlled by it. . . . An internal national debt . . . does not and cannot reduce the total wealth of the community. . . . [British] national debt could be expanded at the rate of not less than £775 million a year . . . without involving any increase in tax rates to meet the additional charge for interest . . . a rate of borrowing far in excess . . . of anything needed to maintain full employment in peace time. . . . To submit to unemployment or slums or want, to let children go hungry and the sick untended, for fear of increasing the internal national debt is to lose all sense of relative values" (p. 148).

"DAMNIT, YOUNG MAN, WE MUSTN'T PUT THE CART BEFORE THE HORSE!"

Nor is taxation merely a means of raising money. "Taxation . . . should be looked on as a means of reducing private expenditure on consumption and thereby freeing real resources for other uses. . . . The decision as to how money required for public outlay should be raised depends really on the decision as to how money can be spent to best advantage," publicly or privately, that is, planned or unplanned. This decision will vary with time and circumstances; for England in the immediate post-war period he feels that publicly planned objectives will take precedence.

The annual national budget which Beveridge proposes is similar in most respects to that proposed in the Murray bill, though it is classified somewhat differently in groups which add up to (1) consumption outlay, (2) business investment (including public expenditures of a "self-liquidating" type), and (3) "communal outlay" on publicly produced or purchased "non-marketable goods and services." To these he adds a new type, "joint consumption outlay," under which the state would place orders with private producers for food, fuel, and other necessary products, "with a view to reselling them later to private consumers at a price which may at need be lowered by a subsidy." This method "combines the advantage of social guidance of outlay with consumers' freedom." This would be an alternative to, or extension of, the school-lunch, special-milk, and food-stamp plans used here and abroad. While Beveridge's public underwriting of private production bears some superficial resemblance to the general underwriting of basic industries which I proposed some years ago, he does not visualize the detailed industrial planning which my proposals assumed, or the simultaneous underwriting of as many sectors of industry.

Beveridge brings together his recommendations for England in a "long-term program of planned outlay" which would cover current expenditures by taxation at rates slightly heavier than in 1938, and capital items by borrowing at declining rates, with a substantial sinking fund. It includes "public business investment . . . in all monopolies so complete that they are taken over for administration by public corporations," regulation of private business investment through a National Investment Board, some subsidies to consumer goods, and a series of specific public measures including social security, national health service, nutrition "to insure to every person in the community a supply of essential foods suited to his special needs," fuel and other necessities "by guaranteeing a market and a price" through a public coal-marketing corporation, education, town and country planning, housing, and transport. These measures in the field of assured demand, plus controlled location of industry and organized mobility of labor, make up his specific post-war program.

Conservatives will not like Beveridge's book. Men of faint heart who want full employment to mean five million unemployed will not like his definition of full employment—that there must be more jobs waiting to be filled than there are unemployed men looking for jobs. Industrialists who feel that complete dependence on private enterprise with abandonment of all public efforts to support collective bargaining or to distribute income more widely is the sure way to better times will not like his steady insistence on measures to increase the purchasing power of the masses. Nor will they like his frank willingness to extend the area of public ownership and operation. Those brought up on the old doctrine of budget balancing will condemn his willingness to employ the unbalanced budget whenever circumstances demand. But all those who approach the economic problems of today with an open mind and a willingness to hear both sides of the argument will find this a challenging and a stimulating work. Though frankly written for England, it recognizes the somewhat different problems of the United States as well. It probes the problem more deeply than our students have done for us. All who are trying to invent social devices to guide our course in the future, such as the Murray bill, and all who honestly criticize or challenge such devices should give it their careful and thoughtful attention. In Beveridge's concluding words, "The British people can win full employment while remaining free, but they have to win it, not wait for it. Full employment, like social security, must be won by a democracy. It cannot be forced on a democracy or given to a democracy. . . . It is something that the British democracy should direct its government to secure at all costs save the surrender of the essential liberties. . . . If full employment is not won and kept, no liberties are secure, for to many they will not seem worth while."

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

THE MOST CURIOUS THING my eye has caught in The Nation lately," writes an old friend and critic in Great Britain, "is M. M.'s paragraph about her dislike of Sunday. For my part I can't begin to understand it; nor, I think, have I ever known a person—man, woman, or child, in England or America—who did not rejoice over the day. Even in my boyhood, living in a puritanical London household, attending church twice, and Bible class, I always found Sunday the best day of the week; and at all stages since it has been so, as a rule with an underlying sense of thanks and well-being. . . . I should guess that among readers of The Nation there are almost none to agree with M. M."

As a matter of fact a Nation reader or two wrote in to protest. They thought I was attacking religion. But most of the readers who took any notice of my remarks shared my feeling. I'd say that in general it's one of those private feelings which one doesn't bother to mention first. Still I know of at least one man who found a London Sunday, a rainy Sunday, to be sure, less than bearable, and said so. De Quincey first took opium on that day. "It was Sunday afternoon, wet and cheerless; and a duller spectacle this earth of ours has not to show than a rainy Sunday in London."

I RECENTLY PICKED UP the biography of Mentor Graham, "the man who taught Lincoln," which was published some time ago by the University of Chicago Press ($3.75). It was written by Kunigunde Duncan and D. F. Nichols, who traveled 7,000 miles in three states in their search for material about the man whose name, Mentor, was so appropriate to his calling. (He had a sister named Minerva.) The authors' long and loving account of Graham's forbears, his early life and family affairs, will be of interest to few but his descendants and their relatives. The essential story—that of his asso-

THE POSTWAR WORLD

● If the most successful peace treaty only lasted thirty-three years, what can we expect in the postwar world? What are the factors and special considerations involved? Thirteen experts present their understanding of the problems, the results and the probable costs. Among them are Robert S. Lynd, Francis B. Sayre, Joseph L. Hromadka, T. A. Bisson, Vera Micheles Dean, John L. Childs, et al. $2.00

AT YOUR BOOKSELLER

ABINGDON-COKESBURY PRESS

Sir William Beveridge

Full Employment in a Free Society

The author of the famous BEVERIDGE REPORT now offers a complete plan for ending unemployment without sacrificing any of the essential liberties of a free society. Specifically discussed are questions relating to the adequate total outlay required for full employment, the controlled location of industry, organized mobility of labor, and necessary changes of government machinery. Everyone who read the earlier plan, everyone interested in social problems, will profit from this clear exposition by one of the world's leading political economists.

At all bookstores $3.75

"BOOKS THAT LIVE" W. W. Norton & Co., 70 5th Ave., N. Y. 11

ciation with Lincoln—could be contained in a very small book if not an extended essay. But that essential story and the figure of Mentor Graham, the schoolteacher in the wilderness, are extremely interesting. Mentor Graham, whose passion for learning, for teaching, and for discussion often annoyed his wife and puzzled his fellow-pioneers, met Lincoln in 1831. Lincoln, then twenty-two, said he had a notion to study grammar, and the fat was in the fire. He walked six miles to get the other copy of Kirkham's grammar that Graham knew about. In 1833 Lincoln moved into the Graham household. According to his biographers, Graham by that time had collected a remarkably complete library. It included originals and translations of the classics, histories of America, Europe, and the Orient, volumes of biography, poetry and prose, philosophy, books on chemistry, botany, algebra. Lincoln read, and the two of them talked in sessions that went on into the small hours night after night, while Mrs. Graham complained. They borrowed books and took turns reading aloud. Graham, having found the ideal pupil, rode him hard. He made him give reports, written and oral, of what he had read. He made him "parse every word" of Paine's "Age of Reason" for instance, and examine its logic just as minutely. He trained him in public speaking. Graham and Lincoln not only read "great books." They had endless discussions of the issues of the day; and there was a debating society in New Salem.

It would be fascinating to have a complete list of the books in Mentor Graham's library. But even without such a list, it is obvious that Lincoln received, when he was most ready to absorb it, a remarkable education at the hands of a tireless tutor.

The tutor had his reward. He sat on the platform when his prize pupil was inaugurated President of the United States. He must have been, in a way, chief mourner when the man to whom he had given so much of himself was assassinated.

We tend to forget that many pioneers carried, along with their household goods, a live coal of the culture they left behind. They named their children Mentor and Minerva. They held out for grammar and Latin against terrific odds, and often passed on a tradition of respect for learning, an interest in ideas, which they themselves had not the time or opportunity to implement; except in practical and political affairs, of course, where many an old idea was taken for new. Lincoln, the statesman, did not spring full-fledged from a split rail. He had been, among other things, the student of Mentor Graham, one of the more conscious carriers of the heritage of human thought.

I SUPPOSE it was because I had just read a review of William H. Beveridge's "Full Employment" that I was so struck by an advertisement for "idle diamonds." It's a nice phrase. A diamond which is busy in industry cutting glass or doing whatever else diamonds do may be said to be fully employed. But what about the diamonds in earrings, necklaces, clips, and bracelets? Are they idle or busy? The answer is obvious. They are the hardest-working diamonds of all. They are not only taking care of vast quantities of that excess purchasing power I hear so much about. They are also among the most reliable known generators of social security.

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Widow

IN 1934 AN EPIDEMIC of newspaper stories made the average American familiar with at least the name of the Black Widow spider. A hairless, shiny black creature with a body about the size of a pea and a red hour-glass-shaped spot on the under side, it is far less dangerous looking than the common wolf spider, to say nothing of such monsters as the so-called tarantulas which occasionally emerge from bunches of bananas. But for once it is almost as dangerous as people commonly suppose almost any snake or spider to be. Whereas neither the banana spider nor, so far as is known, any native American spider except the Widow is capable of causing more than local discomfort, she—and it really is only the female who is dangerous—can cause agonizing pain lasting for days, and sometimes death.

"Black Widow" by Raymond W. Thorp and Weldon D. Woodson, two amateur but apparently competent and informed investigators (Chapel Hill, $3), includes a certain amount of picturesque spider lore but is chiefly devoted to a summary of the scientific and clinical data available concerning the Widow, her habits, and the effects of her bite. Certainly spider poisoning is not one of the major threats to life in America, but cases are common enough to make the subject a serious one, and the creature is known in each of the forty-eight states. Serum treatment is not conspicuously successful, and the tourniquet is useless even if applied immediately following the bite. The most successful treatment includes the production of a copious sweat, and if, as the writers speculate, it was really a spider of this genus rather than a tarantula which was responsible for the dancing cure of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, then that cure may have had a rational basis. Black Widows build a messy web, usually in dark corners and frequently under the seats of outdoor privies. No methods of chemical or biological control have so far proved very successful. The advice of the present authors seems to come down to this: if you see a Black Widow, swat it. The present reviewer, most of whose friends regard every milk snake as a copper head and every hog-nosed snake as a cobra, would like to add: make your own life easier by remembering what a Black Widow looks like.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Once More the Balkans

SINCE THE WAR BEGAN several volumes dealing with the Balkans have appeared which seem to confirm the standard opinion that those "eternal European squabbles" which isolationists hold responsible for the world conflagration start in that traditional powder barrel. Disproving this scapegoat theory, Bernard Newman in his latest book, "Balkan Background" (Macmillan, $2.50), stresses that "every one of the Balkan wars was impelled from without, not within." In spite of the author's inclination to whitewash Balkan kings and to find a common denominator for the ethnic medley, his book is an up-to-date, careful study of this intricate problem. There are slight inaccuracies—the Bulgars are unquestionably of Ural-Altaic origin, Transylvania became united with Hungary in 1848 and not in 1868, Papandreou proved no success—but the author hits upon the answer to the Balkan riddle when he points to the economic distress of the peasantry, to the barren soil from which they must derive support, and to the minority problem which results in ethnic clashes because nationalism, having begun much later than in Western Europe, is more passionate.

The remedies suggested by the author are obviously sound. Agrarian reform, mechanized agriculture, special education coupled with industrialization must be undertaken in order to alleviate the misery; a Balkan or a Central European federation based on "some kind of declaration of the rights of man" must not only eliminate racial feuds but deter aggressors and prevent the use of the little states as puppets of the great powers. It is true that Russia has been unfavorable to federal schemes, but recently it appears that this opposition is directed only against "premature and artificial linking of small countries." Russia certainly cannot tolerate a cordon sanitaire on its western frontier, but the author's argument seems to be irrefutable: no Central European federation is conceivable without Czechoslovakia, and no federation which included that republic could ever be directed against Russia. In discussing the six Balkan countries—of which Rumania is indeed geographically no part—Mr. Newman gives a succinct but scholarly account of their history and of their political and economic structure. Since he draws upon his personal experience as well as his studies, his book is pleasant reading. Its lesson is the old one—either the Balkans must become Europeanized or Europe will become Balkanized.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

China's Future

REALISTIC APPRAISAL of China's potential strength in the post-war world, especially as it affects the security problem in the Far East, is a not unimportant task. In "China Among the Powers" (Harcourt Brace, $2) David Rowe makes clear the obstacles still to be surmounted in the creation of a strong China. Material factors—raw materials, transport, and techniques—are not favorable to rapid industrialization, and the first of these might even set limits to its eventual scope. Emphasis is laid on the equally significant difficulties presented by the social organization of Chinese agriculture and the nature of the ruling bureaucracy. In a noteworthy summary generalization Rowe writes: "To gain such military strength, [China] must raise greatly the level of the physical and technical efficiency of her manpower and increase agricultural production while altering radically the system of distribution of agricultural income. The present agricultural system is the first point of attack for the creation of that technical and economic advance, and that social and political unity, which are so necessary if China is to attain the power to provide for her own security." In the light of this conclusion, it is surprising that the author virtually ignores the gains made in these directions by a new social and political order established during the war for some ninety million people in the North China provinces. The prospect for China's future indicated in this study might be far less dark if the reforms instituted by the Chinese Communists became the accepted pattern for a united China operating on the basis of democratic principles and practice.

T. A. BISSON

Public Debt and Public Policy

BETWEEN THE ALARMISTS who regard the size of the public debt as a national disaster and the sanguine advocates of perpetual deficit financing it is refreshing to find an economist who goes to the heart of the matter: people are worried about government borrowing because it affects the distribution of wealth.

In "The Public Debt" (John Day, $1.75) Professor Withers thoroughly refutes the viewers-with-alarm, taking them up one by one and answering their arguments in specific terms. But he is only a little less impatient with those who regard the debt as unimportant because we owe it to ourselves. As he says, management of the debt may have equally disastrous results if it leads to pronounced inflation or deflation.

Even if the debt is stabilized, the collection of taxes from one income group to pay interest to another group which owns most of the bonds affects not only the distribution of current income but also the pattern of consumer spending. The consequences of a $300 billion debt would be negligible only if taxes were collected in exact proportion to individuals' and corporations' bond holdings.

Management of the public debt is therefore a basic instrument of public policy. Some general knowledge of government finance has become essential to a healthy democracy, and "... a stimulating book."

—Journal of Philosophy

METHODOLOGY OF THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

By Felix Kaufmann

Professor, Department of Philosophy of the Graduate Faculty,
New School for Social Research

"... a penetrating discussion that throws much needed light on a number of fundamental questions connected not only with the social sciences, but with science and the theory of knowledge in general... written throughout with admirable clarity... a very able piece of work indeed."—C. J. Ducasse, Brown University.

At all bookstores, $3.50

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. 11

it is unfortunate that not only the public but also the leaders of public opinion are so woefully ignorant of the subject. Professor Withers has condensed it into 109 pages, which cover the ground more thoroughly than most full-length textbooks.

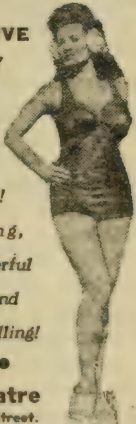

The first chapter is marred by a few rather hasty generalizations such as, "War unavoidably increases the political powers of business men because military mechanisms are dependent upon the factories that they manage." Dealing with his main subject, the author is much more objective; the book is a real contribution to intelligent citizenship, and it is written for the intelligent citizen. CHARLES E. NOYES

MOTION PICTURES

Yes! SHE'S REAL, ALIVE
AND LOVELY
in a Walt Disney
picture with Donald and his pals in
the same scenes!
The Three Caballeros It's amazing, wonderful
and thrilling!

NOW! Brandt's GLOBE Theatre
Doors Open 8:30 A.M. Broadway at 46th Street.

G. C. F. presents
MR. EMMANUEL
A Two Cities Films production made in London
Released through United Artists
starring FELIX AYLMER
with GRETA GYNT and WALTER RILLA
Brandt's GOTHAM B'way and 47th St.

Paramount Presents
Veronica LAKE
Sonny TUFTS
Eddie BRACKEN
Marjorie REYNOLDS
in
"BRING ON THE GIRLS"
IN TECHNICOLOR
NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

In Person
The Ink Spots
Ella Fitzgerald
Buck and Bubbles
Cootie Williams
And His Orchestra
Lead Your '45 with
WAR BONDS

"Enthusiasm . . . tenderness . . . discipline . . . intelligence."
—James Agee, The Nation
A TREE GROWS IN BROOKLYN
NOW PLAYING ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

Steig's Cartoons

THE MATING of drawing with caption has produced a new but very dependent and transitory pictorial genre. The future will be more informed than delighted by it. We can still relish the brush-drawing on a Greek vase for its own sake as a drawing—whether fitted happily or unhappily to the shape of the vessel. But to appreciate William Steig's cartoons you have to get their point, and to get their point you have to be intimately acquainted with the contemporary American literate middle classes. And yet in spite of all this, Steig's cartoons push and strain against the social and psychological limitations of the cartoon form, and strive to become self-sufficient, time-transcending art. The quasi-abstract drawings in "All Embarrassed" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2) are, though not necessarily the best, those which most visibly embody Steig's aesthetic yearning. A good deal of automatism has gone into them as well as a full acquaintance with Klee, Picasso, and particularly Miró, yet they do not manage to escape the neatness and the formalization of the cartoon—nor will they until Steig forces himself to leave his forms more open and to take into greater account the shape of the page. It is no accident that the cartoon called Organism and Environment is the best in the book as a matter of drawing and picture composition.

Once in a while Steig's wit makes all the above irrelevant. I submit the cartoons called The Conversation Lags I, Misunderstanding, and Intrusion. If, however, Steig were somewhat more susceptible himself to those dangers of middle-class existence he too triumphantly points out, he would score much more frequently.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD PRODUCTIONS
"BELONGS ON THE MUST LIST."—Roscos, World-Telegram
UP IN CENTRAL PARK
Book by HERBERT LYRICS by DOROTHY FIELDS MUSIC by SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 98th Street, Matinee Wed. & Sat.
BOBBY CLARK in
MEXICAN HAYRIDE
By HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th Street, West of B'way
Matinee Wednesday and Saturday

"Splendid evening in the theater."—N. Y. Mirror
FRANCHOT TONE and JANE WYATT in
Hope for the Best
FULTON 46th Street, West of Broadway, Circle 6-6360.
Evs. 8:40, $4.20 to $1.20. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

BETRAYAL FROM THE EAST," a spy melodrama about an ex-soldier who pretends to get for Japanese agents the plans for the defense of the Panama Canal, is supposed to be a true story. I am perfectly willing to believe it is, but my willingness is seldom encouraged by the way it is presented on the screen. If two Japanese spies employed in an American newspaper office in Tokyo are settling down to their daily eavesdropping, surely they don't bother to exchange a glance of villainous complicity. If an experienced reporter has to try to get back alive to the States with some mortally red-hot information, surely the idea of memorizing it doesn't elude his intelligence for a couple of hundred feet or, when at last he thinks of it, strike him as remarkably brilliant or brand-new. If two Army Intelligence agents meet in a hotel room to feed false dialogue to a planted enemy dictaphone, surely, once they are dead certain that no hidden camera or slanteye is trained on them, they stop trying to suit their actions to their words. If still another agent is being steamed to death in her Nazi ex-lover's beauty parlor, surely she would take prompt care, on principle or by instinct if for no better use, to get next the floor, where breathing lasts longest and the heat is least oppressive. If such minor oversights were rectified in advance of release, stories much less plausible than this one could be made to seem true, and even interesting. There is, on the other hand, no sort of harm in the movie, and it is a pleasure to see Lee Tracy again, and Nancy Kelly's famous shoulders. I may be presumptuous with that adjective, but they have always been famous with me.

"Bring on the Girls" is a hard-polished color musical about a susceptible millionaire (Eddie Bracken), his bodyguard (Sonny Tufts), and a predatory woman (Veronica Lake). It isn't much, I suppose; but I enjoyed a skit by a couple of subhuman quacks (Porter Hall and another very good, familiar face whose name I can't remember); Eddie Bracken is so likable, and knows his work so well, that he can't even walk out on a diving-board without getting sympathy and a laugh; and Sonny Tufts sings well. I have an idea he could become almost as good as Crosby, on almost as broad a range.

"Pan-Americana" is another of those buckets of good-swill that make me wish some Latin American movie people would come north, for a change, and take fair vengeance on the United States; a job at which I would be only too happy to help out. In some other respects, however, I rather liked the picture. There is a general air of casual lousiness about it—the aching dreariness of the climactic stage tableaux for instance—which seems very friendly and fresh compared with the high-finished pink granite gravestones which are normally released as musical comedies. The song-and-dance numbers are mainly poor, but with the fierce unembalmed poorness of the real thing, as you see it in night clubs. The love story is a classically heartless record—set up as merely cute—of fifth-rate conduct between a professional seducer and an even less scrupulous nice girl; but some of it is written and directed, and is played by Philip Terry and Audrey Long, as if such a relationship were worth honest observation, as indeed it is.

Drama Note

THE STRANGER" (Playhouse) is another mystery-horror play with a Victorian scene. Without being exactly first rate it has its points, of which one is a good gas-lit atmosphere and a collection of amusing caricatures, all of which are vivaciously enacted with broad effectiveness by an excellent cast. The scene is a dismal workingmen's club in Whitechapel, and the excitement is contributed by the Jack the Ripper who is busy slitting throats just off stage. There is rather more amusement than terror to be got out of the affair, and this suits me well enough. I did, however, object somewhat to the casual way in which the misleading clues were brushed aside. The procedure is a bit too suggestive of the Oh-that-was-just-put-in-to-make-it-harder explanation.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

COLUMBIA has made its first two releases of the symphonic recordings that have been made since the end of the Petrillo ban. It has issued a set ($58; $5.50) of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 6 ("Pathétique") performed by Rodzinski with the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra; and another ($57; $5.50) of Beethoven's Seventh performed by Ormandy with the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Beginning with the "Pathétique," I was glad to hear the natural sound of an orchestra, clear and bright, instead of the muffled, hollow, distorted sound from Columbia's pre-Petrillo-ban recordings of the New York Philharmonic. This was true of the first side, and the second, so that I was unprepared for the dull, unclear sound from the third side, after which brightness and clarity returned with the fourth. The variation in quality continued: in the second movement, for example, the passage at the beginning of the sixth side had a brilliance which it had not had at its previous appearance on the fifth. In addition there was another defect, of which some of the worst examples occurred at the very beginning: in relation to the pp of the string basses the pp of the solo bassoon was much too loud (it was not even p but f), and the crescendo of the strings too great; a moment later, in relation to the pp of the solo horn the p of the woodwinds was too loud; and throughout there were other instances of such alteration of the relative degrees of loudness prescribed by Tchaikovsky in his score. Some of them, I suspect, were caused by the way the performance was recorded (microphone placement, etc.); but things like that excessive crescendo of the strings were in the performance which the recording picked up. For it is a performance with violences and crudenesses, large and small, which are characteristic of Rodzinski and also part of the traditional way of misperforming Tchaikovsky. The Ormandy and Furtwängler performances are better, and are better recorded.

As for Beethoven's Seventh, Ormandy seems to have listened to the tempos of Toscanini's recorded performance and to have agreed with them—all of them, including not only the somewhat faster-than-usual tempo of the Allegretto but the much faster tempo of the trio of the scherzo movement that has bothered some listeners. If this conveys the impression that Ormandy has tried to produce an exact copy of Toscanini's performance, let me hasten to correct it—to point out, for example, that Ormandy follows his own practice of announcing things with preparatory retardations and pauses which are not to be heard in Toscanini's performance. And that is one reason for the important thing—which is that Ormandy does not give the movements the organic coherence and sustained intensity that Toscanini does. Nor is the inferior performance to be preferred because of superior recording: the loud passages of Ormandy's performance are reproduced with a coarseness and stridency that one doesn't get from the loudest climaxes of the Toscanini recording, or from the couple of Victor recordings of the Philadelphia Orchestra in my possession. I should mention also that side two of the first movement is tremendously louder than sides one and three; side five of the second movement is louder than four and six; and side eight of the third movement is louder than seven (but the extremes of loud and soft are troublesome in the Toscanini recording); and that my review copy has some sides with noises and swishes.

All that Victor has issued is a new picture album (979; $5.50) in which it has assembled a number of Melchior's previously issued Wagner recordings. They include the second-act duet from "Tristan und Isolde" with Flagstad, and the Forging Song from "Siegfried," which is one of the engaging moments of the "Ring"; and these are all that I care to hear; but for those who want them there are also Lohengrin's Narrative, the Hymn to Venus and the Rome Narrative from "Tannhäuser," and the Steersman's Song from "The Flying Dutchman."

CONTRIBUTORS

PAUL MALLES was for several years a correspondent in Central, Eastern, and Southeastern Europe for the Stockholm Social Demokraten (now the Morgonbladet). He is now doing war work in Canada.

MARVIN LOWENTHAL is the author of "Henrietta Szold: Life and Letters," "The Jews of Germany," and "A World Passed By," dealing with Jewish culture in Europe and North Africa.

JAMES A. DOMBROWSKI is executive secretary of the Southern Conference for Human Welfare. He was formerly principal of the Highlander Folk School in Tennessee.

IRVING LIPKOWITZ is an economist with the Department of Justice. The views expressed in his article are his own and do not reflect official government policy.

JOHN W. WHITE has represented American newspapers in Santiago, Chile, for many years and recently concluded a trip through South America.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

G. B. Shaw's Vinegar Method

Dear Sirs: The extermination of flies and fascists raises the age-old question of honey vs. vinegar. The Pétaïns, Darlans, Badoglios, and Greek Monarchists derived much-needed strength from lapping up tons of honey supplied by the British and American governments. And those fascists that have been destroyed got hold of some strong vinegar. When in power, fascists themselves are never bothered by this problem; they invariably mix a hellish, poisonous brew for their natural enemies: laborites, liberals, anti-fascist churchmen, members of minority groups, and other decent people.

George Bernard Shaw, who used vinegar against Victorianism with such success, is the greatest living exponent of the vinegar method of dealing with vermin. He has given labor movements in Allied countries a prescription for a powerful germicide which, if used, would help keep world fascists under control.

Shaw's prescription is set forth on page 59 of "What I Really Wrote About the War," addressed to British labor during World War I. It is applicable to world labor now:

The Labor Party, then, need have no hesitation in raising all the standing controversies between democracy and Junkerism in their acutest form, and taking advantage of the war emergency to press them to a series of parliamentary victories for Labor, whether in negotiations with the government whips, in divisions on the floor of the House, or in strenuously contested by-elections. No doubt our Junkers will try to disarm their opponents by representing that it would be in the last degree unfair, un-English, and ungentlemanly on the part of the Labor members to seize any tactical advantage in parliamentary warfare, and most treacherous and unpatriotic to attack their country (meaning the Junker Party) when it is at war. Some Labor members will be easily enough gulled in this way: it would be laughable, if the consequences were not so tragic, to see how our parliamentary beginners from the working class succumb to the charm of the Junker appeal. The Junkers themselves are not to be coaxed in this manner. . . . The Labor Party will soon learn the value of these polite demonstrations that it is always its duty not to hamper the governing classes in their very difficult and delicate and dangerous task of safeguarding the interests of this great empire; in short, to let itself be gammoned by elegant phrases and by adroit practices on its personal good nature, its inveterate proletarian sentimentality, and its secret misgivings as to the correctness of its manners. The Junkers have already taken the fullest advantage of the war to paralyze democracy. If the Labor members do not take a vigorous counter-offensive, and fight every parliamentary trench to the last division, the labor movement will be rushed back as precipitately as General von Kluck rushed the Allies back from Namur to the gates of Paris. In truth, the importance of the war to the immense majority of Englishmen, Frenchmen, and Germans lies in the possibility that when Junkers fall out common men may come by their own.

Applied to the current situation, Shaw's formula tells us to look to the American State Department; to cut off the supply of honey going from America to Europe's quislings; to make an end to cartels; to intensify labor's political activity; to encourage government ownership of industry; to obtain a voice for labor at the peace table; to make labor a partner in the management of American industry. He challenges the British labor movement to work for internal reforms; to set India free; to support forces of democracy in Italy, Greece, France, Belgium and Spain. And to all the unclean-handed ones who decry using the war emergency to accomplish social reforms he says "phooey." WALTER WILSON

East Chatham, N. Y., January 15

Federal Aid for Education

Dear Sirs: Everyone who accepts the American principle of opportunity should give support to the bill for $300,000,000 of federal funds for education to be expended under control of the states. The bill provides that part of the funds must be spent specifically to raise the salaries of teachers. Their salaries have not been raised either in proportion to the increase in the cost of living or to the increase in the total pay including overtime of workers in war industries. Unless teachers receive increased pay, many will leave their professions and thousands of schools in rural and low-income areas will be forced to close; classes will be so overcrowded that the quality of education will suffer seriously.

Part of the federal funds is to be used to raise the educational level in states where educational facilities are now poorest. At present states with the lowest per capita income have the greatest educational burden but the least ability to carry that burden. "The kids are where the cash ain't," as one homespun philosopher put it; and this bill is necessary to help equalize educational opportunities throughout the nation.

Because policies determined in Washington more and more affect the lives of all of us, and because ignorance tends to be represented by ignorance, it is to the interest of American citizens anywhere to see that American citizens everywhere get a good education.

Write to your Senators and Congressmen to support S. 181, the Hill-Thomas Bill for Federal Aid to Education.

ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

New York, February 9

For the Tens

Dear Sirs: We are studying race discrimination. We are studying it all year. It is interesting but terrible to find out what hardships the Negroes, Jews, and other minorities are going through. We got very much concerned when a Negro boy went to one of the boys' houses who is in our group. The elevator man made him walk up the back stairs. The white boy felt very bad. So he started a club called the A. L. C. O., which means Abraham Lincoln Carries On. We would appreciate it if you would print this in your paper to help us in the fight.

GEOFFREY BROTHERS,

For the 10's, Little Red School House
New York, February 14

In Memoriam

Dear Sirs: Lieutenant Lowell Bready, formerly a reporter on a morning paper in Santa Cruz, California, was killed in action at Cherbourg on June 25, 1944. He had saved enough money for a down payment on a newspaper, and, in the midst of war, he had written the introductory announcement for his post-war venture.

Here is what he intended to announce to the people of a community in western America:

My friend, a newspaper photographer, warned me that one cannot earn a living running an honest newspaper today.

He said that perhaps an editor in an American community could condemn Nazi tactics in Europe, but that he must not be too critical of undemocratic tendencies in his home town.

He meant an editor can defend the right of workmen to strike against Little Steel in the Middle West, but cannot risk his investment when there's a strike in the biggest industry in his home town.

He meant that the right people can kill stories. He meant that you can't be honest all the time on any newspaper today because honesty doesn't pay.

Perhaps he is right. Maybe honesty hasn't paid because too few men have had the courage to try to make it pay.

What does it mean if an editor doesn't tell the truth when there is a labor dispute in his home town? It means everything. His failure is the world's failure to tell the truth.

His failure means that for a larger income, for fortifying his investment, he is willing to give up voluntarily the same thing France, Greece, Norway, and others, lost and must now spill blood to regain—freedom of expression, honesty of expression.

I could have said this whole thing in a few words. More and more editors must prove that the photographer was wrong. I wanted to be one of the editors who help to prove it. I'm here to help prove it in this corner of America.

The (name of newspaper) will play ball in building this community in every above-board way it can. It will play ball in giving you the best all-around newspaper it can turn out. It will play ball in getting everything for you and me that we want and deserve in the way of a better life. But if someone should try to pressure us into taking what we believe is the wrong side of any question; if someone should try to pressure us into hushing any important information—then, right then, we will be through playing ball.

SUTTON CHRISTIAN

Somewhere in Asia, December 13

Watch the Pope!

Dear Sirs: In reading Gaetano Salvemini's informative and interesting article, No Vatican Plan for Italy? it occurs to me that we are paying too little attention to the dangerous role played by the Vatican today and in the years preceding fascism's rise to power.

It is unfortunate that in our plans to punish those guilty of supporting and spreading the terror across Europe and the Americas we have not included certain pro-Axis Jesuits among the criminals. The Vatican has only been interested in saving its own political and religious power at the expense of so-called democratic countries overrun by the fascist advance. The Vatican has never been anything but pro-Axis from the start, and all of us, civilian and military, should govern our actions and opinions accordingly. If we do not, like the pre-Hitler Germans, we may find that we have traded our plowshares for blackjacks.

SERVICE MAN

February 15

I Bin Thinking . . .

Dear Sirs: I bin thinking. In all maps use 30 miles to the inch on the western front and 100 miles to the inch on the eastern front—it will keep up the morale.

American generals rely on steady pressure, Russian generals rely on quick, heavy punches, and English generals on afternoon tea.

The Germans have won the war four and a half times already, and after three more of those supreme victories they hope for a draw. We will soon eliminate the Nazis. Of course as they are the only ones available with experience we will also put them in charge in Germany. Why not reward Hitler, Himmler and Co. with fine incomes, residences in Berlin, and of course, with guards. Germans could not then make martyrs out of them as they will if we obliterate the gang. This may be hard on the "haters," but it is a good way to kill Nazism.

JOHN BUCHANAN

Berwick, Nova Scotia, February 9

Cummington Pays Its Way

Dear Sirs: We have received copies of F. W. Dupee's review of recent poetry from your issue of February 10, and thank you for them.

We're glad Mr. Dupee liked Robert Lowell's poems, but sorry for a misstatement in the article's first sentence: we are not subsidized and, on the contrary, are trying rather desperately hard to make a living on the sale of our books. Most of these are printed here, another way in which we are unlike New Directions.

HARRY DUNCAN,

Manager, the Cummington Press
Cummington, Mass., February 8

Clothes for Liberated Peoples

Dear Sirs: The need for clothing in the recently liberated countries of Europe is very great. Our first appeal for clothing met with the most generous response; we have already shipped several thousand pounds of warm clothes to France and Italy. Yet the need is so acute that we must appeal once more to our friends to send us any additional garments that can be spared. We are glad to receive all packages by Railway Express collect at our warehouse, 103 Orchard Street, New York 2, N. Y.

SHEBA STRUNSKY,

Executive Secretary International Rescue and Relief Committee
New York, January 31

Warning

Dear Sirs: Your paragraph on cooperatives in the issue of December 23 is in an optimistic vein, but ominous

"HEAVEN AND HELL"

The most definite teaching on the certainty of immortality and on the life hereafter is to be found in the Writings of famed scientist, philosopher, theologian and statesman. His book on HEAVEN AND HELL, FROM THINGS HEARD AND SEEN, may be obtained by new readers at the introductory price of five cents.

EMANUEL SWEDENBORG

SWEDENBORG FOUNDATION, INC.

Room 1636, 61 East 42nd St., New York 17

Crossword Puzzle No. 105

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Men are most apt to believe what they least -----, thought Montaigne
 6 No wonder there's a shout when it's a hundred all!
 10 An error in taste is almost bad for me (two words, 3 and 4)
 11 Sic ----- gloria mundi
 12 Stuff non-inflammable bricks are made of 13 Elgar, large, glare and lager are its anagrams
 15 Trimmed
 17 The works
 19 Of especial interest to those contemplating marriage (two words, 4 & 5)
 21 There are trees and a steer in the compound
 23 English county, in short, where opals are found in confusion (not profusion)
 24 Slow and laborious
 27 Silvery inside covers?
 28 I've coin, as the price list shows
 29 "The extravagant and erring spirit ---- To his confine" (Hamlet)
 30 Far short of being one of the herbalist's sovereign remedies

DOWN

- 1 The boss on the shield
 2 What Dawkins, in Oliver Twist, reduced to an art
 3 Only river of Europe in which a heron may be seen
 4 Usually attached to an ultimatum

- (two words, 4 and 5)
 5 Spruce
 7 Getting the point of one is no joke in Zululand
 8 Barrie interior (two words, 6 and 4)
 9 Dorothy Sayers called it the graveyard of good cooks
 14 He resolved to live to be a thousand, or die in the attempt 16 These domestic articles are of little use without brushes
 18 He cheerfully takes over the cares of others
 20 A medley started by me
 22 Halloo! Tally ho! Yoicks! and another hunting cry
 24 Out of date, or nearly so
 25 A plunger, but not on the Stock Market
 26 Certain place which it is impolite to mention here

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 104

ACROSS:—1 MICROBE; 5 DICKENS; 9 SOLVE; 10 POETASTER; 11 ALIGNMENT; 12 OSAKA; 13 DAISIES; 15 STOPPLE; 17 CANAPES; 19 BISECTS; 21 SEWER; 23 OFFENBACH; 25 ELEMENTAL; 26 GLAIR; 27 SCENTED; 28 SHRIKES.

DOWN:—1 MUSTARD; 2 COLLISION; 3 OCEAN; 4 EXPRESS; 5 DUETTOS; 6 CLAMOROUS; 7 EXTRA; 8 SURNAME; 14 IMPERFECT; 16 PICKABACK; 17 COSTER'S; 18 SPOTTED; 19 BAFFLES; 20 SPHERES; 22 WHERE; 24 NIGER.

clouds are gathering on the horizon. Big business in Canada has forced the appointment of a royal commission to give the cooperatives in Canada a good dragooning. Big business up here is thoroughly alarmed and aroused. This commission business is not a reconnaissance; it is an all-out assault designed to cripple the cooperatives for the next fifty years. If they succeed up here it will galvanize the enemies of co-ops in the United States to deadly emulation. So while we mount the barricades, keep your own powder dry. The Nation should sound the tocsin in the United States. There will be dirty work in the clinches.

OWEN O'CLOUTARD

Moncton, N. B., Canada, December 30

"Our Lives Are Gray..."

Dear Sirs: Will The Nation raise its tempered and ringing liberal voice in behalf of the unglamorous prison officer in uniform? We say unglamorous, because the press and radio have done so much to enhance the values of our social cousins, the members of the police and the FBI.

We too get killed; we too get maimed. Nobody sings hosannas, nobody gives us medals, and yet life-insurance rates on us are higher than on the police. We are trying to get out of the Middle Ages. Our lives are gray, grim, and colorless, hopeless, baffled as are those of the unfortunates in our charge. Prison officers in general are a seedy lot, in home life, clothing, spirit. We are the conscience of society, and therefore society turns its back on us. There is something unsavory about us, and our work, and yet it is a necessary work.

A bill to give us a pay boost is scheduled to be introduced in the New York legislature. Such has not been done for many a year.

We ask the editorial support of the great and liberal Nation. Many reading what you have to say may come forward to help us get our bill passed. The offender, too, will benefit. Nobody knows better than the prison officer the sham and the shame in which the inmates live; how false are our rehabilitative statistics; how lying our rehabilitative departments. We are hopeful that a better-paid prison job will attract to the profession a better-prepared prison officer. The unfortunate offender will benefit as well.

DANIEL A. HARVEY, President,
 Uniformed Prison Officers Association
 Ossining, N. Y., December 30

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 10, 1945

NUMBER 10

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

261

EDITORIALS

John L. Lewis Rides Again

263

The Fight Ahead by Freda Kirchwey

264

ARTICLES

The War Fronts by Charles G. Bolté

266

Chapultepec Love Feast by Anita Brenner

267

The Legal Case Against Hitler, II, by Raphael Lemkin

268

25 Years Ago in The Nation

270

Should Veterans Have Legs? by Edward M. Maisel

271

Who Are the Partisans? by Milton Bracker

273

Dalhousie Drops a President by Judith Robinson

274

In The Wind

275

POLITICAL WAR

Brazil Plays at Democracy by A. Del V.

276

Vargas in Modern Dress by Samuel Wainer

277

Behind the Enemy Line by Argus

278

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

279

Briefer Comment

280

Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling

283

Films by James Agee

285

Music by B. H. Haggin

285

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

287

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 106 by Jack Barrett

288

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 18, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 818 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THE ACT OF CHAPULTEPEC SETTING UP A security plan for the Western Hemisphere is a very tentative document, but even so it represents a revolutionary change in inter-American relations. For it clearly pledges all the nations of the hemisphere to act together, using force if necessary, to protect the independence and territorial integrity of any nation threatened with aggression. The pledge holds only for the duration, and the whole plan must be fitted into the larger framework of a world security agreement. But meanwhile it involves commitments that certainly go far beyond anything the United States delegation to the Mexican conference anticipated or probably wanted. The fact is, the act was something of a political coup. It arose out of the widespread feeling of insecurity and resentment created by the State Department's handling of the Argentine issue. Without previous consultation, the United States had practically forced the Latin-American countries to support our quarantine of the Farrell government. But a policy which was safe and easy for a great power four thousand miles away was packed with danger for Argentina's neighbors. Undoubtedly the security plan first proposed by the Uruguayan delegation was in large part an answer to these unilateral tactics: it gave notice, in effect, that if the United States insisted upon exposing the Latin-American countries to the threat of armed attack the least it could do was to sign a pledge of mutual defense. The original proposal called for a permanent, unequivocal collective-security agreement. This our delegation could not accept, first, because it would probably conflict with the provisions of the United Nations charter, and second, because it would have to be submitted to the Senate for approval. By clever diplomacy and quick footwork, the delegation produced the compromise finally adopted. It serves at least to demonstrate our good intentions, but the future of Pan-American security lies not in Mexico City but in San Francisco.

✱

THE ECONOMIC CHARTER OF THE AMERICAS proposed by the United States delegation at the Inter-American Conference in Mexico City is full of fine phrases about "rising levels of living," "economic liberty," and "the abandonment of discrimination." But, as Anita Brenner observes elsewhere in this issue, the Latin-American countries are not much interested in generalities; they want assurances against sudden cancelation of war orders and aid in developing greater industrialization, without which they can have little hope of improving their standards of living. On these questions the charter conspicuously fails to get down to earth. In the matter of new industries, it accents heavily reliance on private enterprise and includes a pledge by the signatories "to refrain from the establishment of state enterprises for the conduct of trade." This sounds like an attempt to impose our economic system on our neighbors as the price of any aid we may afford them. With regard to the problem of commodity surpluses, which may become acute after the war, the charter does recognize that laissez faire is not a sufficient answer. Consequently, it suggests that a solution may be found in "agreed national and international action looking to the expansion of consumption and the readjustment of production, with due regard to the interests of consumers and producers and the requirements of an expanding world economy." Obviously, this question, like so many others touched on by the charter, is much more than an inter-American one. We hope that eventually it will be tackled by a world conference on economic planning and in far more concrete terms than have been employed at Mexico City.

✱

GENERAL DE GAULLE, ABSORBED IN PLANS TO restore the power and glory of France, appears increasingly anxious to postpone consideration of fundamental changes at home. In a speech to the Assembly last week he accepted the necessity of state control of key industries during the war but indicated a desire to avoid "changes in structure." The program of nationalization, he declared, must await the advent of an elected Parliament, and any measures taken in that direction he regarded as purely provisional. This speech proved extremely disappointing to the Assembly, which is largely composed of leaders of the resistance. The resistance movement in France was not solely concerned with throwing out the invader; it was deeply conscious of the urgent need for radical social and political changes. In its clandestine meetings, in its underground press, there were long and earnest discussions of the causes of the moral and material collapse of 1940. And one conclusion common to almost all the resistance groups was that the industrial and financial monopolies in France, which had constantly thwarted the popular will, must be taken over by the state. Since the controllers of these monopolies to a large extent were also collaborationists, the liberation offered a matchless opportunity to break their power forever. But six months after the liberation little has been accomplished in this direction. The program of socialization drawn up by Pierre Mendès-France, Minister of National Economy, has been shelved, and all too many of the big industrialists who collaborated eagerly with the enemy remain at large and in full control of their enterprises. With large numbers of French workers unemployed, with nearly all of them hungry, the dangers of a policy of inertia are self-evident. The moral energy created by the resistance movement is being dissipated; social fissures are again threatening national unity; cynicism is returning. It is time General de Gaulle turned his attention to the domestic scene, lest the foundations of the French renaissance crumble beneath him.

✱

THE PLOT TO RETIRE HENRY WALLACE TO private life has happily been frustrated. Voting in the Senate on his confirmation as Secretary of Commerce followed more or less party lines, but it is interesting to note that the Republicans were more split than the Democrats. In the end only five nominal supporters of the Administration broke away to vote against Wallace, while ten Republicans, or more than a third of those present, gave him their support. Shorn as the Commerce Department is of the accretions of power which Jesse Jones secured when he merged it with the RFC, it still remains an important bridgehead from which to launch an offensive against unemployment and depression. Within its walls are such agencies as the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, the Census Bureau, the Bureau of Standards, and the Patent Office. There are able public servants on the department's roster, but their brains and energies have been frustrated during the reign of the last two Secretaries, Harry Hopkins, who was in bad health, and Jesse Jones, who had other fish to fry. Mr. Wallace, however, is sure to breathe a new spirit into the department just as he did when he took over the Department of Agriculture in 1933. Incidentally, now that the battle is over, we notice tributes to the new Secretary's abilities from unexpected quarters. Thus a Washington correspondent of the Wall Street Journal writes: "Visionary or not, Mr. Wallace is regarded by most Washington officials as a competent administrator. In the Department of Agriculture . . . he showed pretty conclusively that he could handle day-to-day questions with practical solutions. . . . Those he hires are usually men of vigor and intelligence, though again they are often men of controversy who would as soon innovate as follow precedent. Above all they are men who have, or gain, great loyalty to him." Coming from such a source that is not a bad testimonial. Republican papers please copy!

✱

IN THE DAYS OF THE WAR-DEBTS DEBATE, SOME twenty years ago, there was a funny story about a Congressman who insisted firmly: "We don't want their gold, we don't want their goods; we want their money." Life, however, has a habit of being stranger than fiction; so we are not surprised to find Clare Luce saying that she's for "cold cash on the barrelhead" from Germany rather than "reparations in kind" as proposed by the Yalta agreement. How would you like to take your change, Clare? In German marks? No doubt you'd prefer dollars. But how do you think Germany will get the dollars except by selling goods directly or indirectly to us? We hate to bother your pretty head with these abstruse matters, but as a member of Congress you really ought to know more about them than you appear to have learned in your previous careers as "playwright, author, journalist, foreign correspondent, and lecturer" (Congressional Directory). Why not ask Henry to have one of the tame but intelligent economists he keeps around his Fortune office explain the whole thing to you?

✱

MANY GERMANS DO NOT WANT TO GOVERN themselves, regard Germany's future as an Allied problem, and hope to be treated as a sort of United States colony. These are some of the findings in unofficial reports from three American educators attached to the Psychological Warfare Branch of the Twelfth Army—Dr. Karl Padover, Dr. Paul Sweet, and Lewis F. Gitler. The three, who have held extensive conversations with hundreds of Aachen civilians, say that many of them look upon Nazism as foreign rule established by Hitler, himself a foreigner. Racial indoctrination has had as little effect as the effort to create a super-nationalism; given the opportunity, German girls are quite willing to marry Americans or even Russians. As to anti-Semitism, several said: "When the Jews were here they had stores and you could buy things. Now you can buy nothing in the stores." Teen-agers, who might be expected to be most fanatical, generally expressed anti-Nazi sentiments. The young people do not discuss democracy, a word they cannot define, but they speak of a longing for fun, for freedom from regimentation. Properly channeled, these desires might become powerful tools in the regeneration of Germany. With Aachen schools about to open, the opportunity is immediate, the problem difficult. Recently Allied officials were pleasantly surprised to receive a memorandum from three Aachenites, one a teacher, advocating that education be reorganized on the basis of truth, whose meaning had been lost under Hitler. But investigation revealed that the teacher had been a member of the Brown Shirts. In Aachen only ten teachers were to be found who had retired rather than teach the Nazi way. Where are the other teachers to come from? Possibly only those Germans interned in concentration camps for refusing to betray the principles of truth and liberty can now be trusted to revive a love of freedom and the humanities in Germany. Or are their beliefs too heretical even for the liberators?

✱

THE DEATH OF JACQUES DORIOT, FRENCH FASCIST leader, announced in Berlin, found officials in Paris rather skeptical. One of them was quoted as saying, "I would like to see the corpse." There was something suspicious even in the wealth of detail lavished by the Berlin radio on the Allied air attack that killed the most hated of all collaborationists. Two other French fascists of lesser rank, also reported killed by Berlin some time ago in similar accidents, later miraculously came to life in the guise of parachutists who had dropped in French territory with the purpose of starting a new fascist organization. Obviously the well-developed Nazi plan of distributing agents throughout the world even before the fighting in Germany is over has as one of its details the "death" and "burial," with all honors and the greatest possible publicity, of men assigned to missions abroad. Thus to the Hitlerite slogan, "Fight to the Death," has been joined a new one—"Fight Even After Death!" It fits well in the macabre tradition of National Socialism. But it more than justified the French official in asking for a tête-à-tête with the corpse of Doriot. Indeed, all the Doriot who betrayed their country to serve Hitler can be considered no longer dangerous only when they fall, not under the bombs of a remote Allied plane, but under the bullets of an anti-fascist firing squad.

✱

NEW YORK STATE TOOK A LONG STEP TOWARD the abolition of racial discrimination when the Assembly, after a bitter debate, passed the Ives bill by an unexpectedly large margin of 109 to 32. Although the measure was initiated by the Republican leadership and backed by Governor Dewey, all the negative votes were cast by Republicans. The triumph of the measure without crippling amendments had been assured at a public hearing on February 20 which had been forced by the opposition in the hope of disclosing popular antagonism to the bill. To the consternation of its opponents, the hearing provided a remarkable demonstration of the wide backing which the bill had obtained. Representatives of the Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish faiths joined with delegates from both factions of organized labor, civic organizations, and representatives from Negro and other minority groups in powerful support for the measure. Although racial intolerance cannot be stamped out by legislative action alone, passage of the bill should make it impossible for the intolerant to deny others an equal right to a decent livelihood.

✱

Hula dancer, grade A, female, is usually a young but experienced worker. . . . The most common apparel is the leaf dress or sarong encircling the shapely trunk with bare skin between the top of the garb and a band six inches or more wide which sometimes restricts migration of the upper forward side of the worker.

There is little movement of the shoulders, stress being on the middle section as the hula progresses.

[Hula dancers, grade B, female] are fully trained, possessed with intense desire, but due to accumulated torso bulges, the speed has greatly moderated.

The worker uses less of the foot work, knee bend, and rotary movements of the hips. Instead, considerable emphasis is directed on the straight forward and backward pull and push motion, interspersed with the Cuban grind.

These vivid if rather self-conscious paragraphs are quoted from the proceedings of the War Labor Board in Honolulu, which has been sorting out hula girls for the purpose of determining wage raises. Maury Maverick once complained that government literature ran to gobbledegook, but we are sure he would agree that such a phrase as the "migration of the upper forward side of the worker" has its charm, even though it flouts that old rule about the shortest distance between two points.

John L. Lewis Rides Again

JOHN L. LEWIS has lost none of his cunning in industrial warfare. Opening his spring offensive, he has made a number of moves which have caught his opponents off balance. First, by filing a thirty-day strike notice he complied with the provisions of the Smith-Connally act and so secured his rear from legal attack, unless the government once again takes over the mines. Then, instead of launching the expected direct assault on the Little Steel formula, he drove at its flank by putting before the operators a series of demands all of which, since they do not involve an actual increase in hourly wage rates, could be regarded as "fringe" cases. Taken one by one, each of these demands seems reasonable enough; woven together they form a fringe equivalent to a good, thick blanket increase.

Among the financial demands in the eighteen-point program put forward by Lewis a leading item is payment for all time spent underground at the full rate, with rate and a half after seven hours a day and thirty-five hours a week. At present under the "portal-to-portal" formula miners get only two-thirds of the rate for underground-travel time and nothing for the fifteen-minute lunch period. Other proposals include premiums of ten and fifteen cents an hour for workers on the second and third shifts respectively; free supplies of explosives, special clothing, and so forth; vacation pay of $100 instead of $50 and pay for six holidays. None of these involves any new principle.

However, Lewis has made one demand which breaks new ground—the proposal for the payment to the union of a royalty of ten cents per ton to enable it to provide medical and health services, insurance, rehabilitation, "and economic protection" for its members. This would mean a payment to the union treasury of $60,000,000 a year. There is a great deal to be said in favor of levying a charge on coal production to be devoted to the welfare of the men who dig it. Living for the most part in isolated communities, they have been cut off from many of the amenities and services available to other citizens. They need and deserve improved facilities for health and recreation. In Britain this fact was recognized twenty-five years ago, and a Miners' Welfare Fund was established which is now financed by a levy of two cents per ton on salable coal and 5 per cent of coal royalties. But this is a statutory fund controlled by a government-appointed commission which includes representatives of the miners, the operators, and the general public.

This seems to us the proper basis for such a scheme. A statutory fund is a permanent fund; it is not liable to be discontinued at some future time when the coal operators are in a better position to call the tune than the miners. Moreover, a levy on the production of a commodity does not come out of profits; it is always paid by the general public. This fact was, indeed, admitted by Lewis when he said that the net cost of the royalty to the owners would be $24,000,000 after tax adjustments and this sum could be passed on to the consumer. It seems to us, therefore, that citizens as a whole, through their government, should have something to say about the disposal of any fund raised by such means.

We realize, of course, that this would not suit John L. Lewis's book. While no doubt anxious to get all he can for the welfare of "his" miners, Lewis is certainly not blind to the power aspects of the proposal. The addition to the union treasury of a fund of this size, with no legal strings attached to it and under the sole control of the union officials, which means Lewis himself, would be a weapon of incalculable value. It is just for this reason that the operators must be expected to fight the proposal tooth and nail even though it would not cost them a penny.

If the royalty proposal raises an issue which seems incapable of settlement by negotiation, the conglomeration of wage demands appears to add up to a sum which the War Labor Board cannot approve without dealing a final blow to the weakened structure of wage and price stabilization. The actual cost of the miners' demands is still a matter of debate. The operators' representatives have estimated it at 55 cents a ton, excluding the royalty, or about $2.70 a day per worker; the miners' figures are only 18 cents and $1.08, but even on this basis the increase in the cost of producing coal would amount to over 6 per cent. It is probable, therefore, that a grant of the wage demands would mean a rise in coal prices and thus conflict with the order of Economic Stabilization Director Fred F. Vinson to the War Labor Board not to approve "fringe" demands which force an increase in prices.

We have, then, the makings of another major industrial conflict in which the government will be bound to intervene. In giving strike notice Lewis declared, "We will work diligently and forthrightly for the next thirty days to prevent, if possible, interruption of coal production so vital to the prosecution of the war." But for all this apparent recognition of his responsibilities, he has made it clear that peace in the coal fields can only be achieved on his terms. When he put his demands before the operators his manner was so truculent, his references to the stabilization program so scornful, that it is reasonable to assume he was deliberately challenging the government to take over the mines and invoke the penalties of the Smith-Connally act.

Lewis has won in the past great benefits for the miners. They have reason to believe in him and they will probably back him to the limit. But while in the short view his leadership may seem to justify itself, we question whether in the long run it will prove beneficial to either the miners or the labor movement as a whole. As the undisputed boss of the United Mine Workers Lewis has a monopolist's grip on an industry vital to the national safety. He is threatening to use that monopoly irresponsibly, to exploit the nation's needs to gain his ends. This is a challenge to the community apt to provoke counter-measures of a kind which would make the Smith-Connally act, which Lewis calls "that grotesque slave statute," look very mild indeed.

The Fight Ahead

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

THE President is in for a fight on Yalta. His report to Congress last Thursday was received respectfully but not with great enthusiasm. Comment in the newspapers and over the air has been guarded. This is partly to be explained by the speech itself. Mr. Roosevelt's manner was friendly and informal—perhaps a little ostentatiously so—but the substance of the address seemed thin and the total effect rather loose-jointed and inadequate.

He was at an obvious disadvantage. As usual he had been scooped by his journalistic colleague, Winston Churchill, and the Prime Minister's report to Commons two days earlier was so massive and complete and politically astute that the President could hardly help producing an anti-climax. Indeed, I think Mr. Roosevelt is always at a disadvantage when he is forced to compete with Mr. Churchill. By contrast he seems, in spite of his enormous experience, a political dilettante. He lacks the poise and thrust you feel in Churchill.

But the storms he is going to face are not of his making. He could not have dissipated them by a better speech. Indeed, his promptness in reporting to Congress and his almost open appeal for cooperation made a favorable impression. They announced clearly that Mr. Roosevelt will neither ignore Congress nor slight the Republicans. He is going to do his best to carry the legislature into the peace-making process as it goes along instead of coming before it with demands for its indorsement of accomplished facts. And by starting this process while the war is still being fought, by absorbing it into the very texture of the war, he makes effective opposition still more difficult. Yalta, he has said in effect, is a part of the final phase of the fight against Germany; you may question some of the decisions made there—I'm not altogether pleased with all of them myself—but you dare not challenge the agreement as a whole or threaten the unity of the three powers on which it depends. Mr. Roosevelt's position is immensely strengthened by the realization on the part of all but the isolationist maniacs that this is the truth.

But if the facts of the case tend to minimize opposition, they will not silence it. Already one can see lines being drawn, in the country and in Congress, alliances being formed, ammunition being piled up. The big fight will come later; perhaps it will be delayed until after the San Francisco conference. But its outlines and the plans of campaign are already visible and should be studied.

By and large the attack on Yalta and all that may emerge from it at San Francisco will be waged on the issue of democratic rights and aimed particularly at the dominating position of the three big powers. Behind this will lurk hatred of Britain and fear of Russia—twin bogies of the whole nationalist-isolationist party. Poland will become their mascot. And an immense effort will be made to organize the fight around the demands of the smaller nations for an effective share in the new world organization. Already you find Burton K. Wheeler solemnly sponsoring a United States of Europe, and crying to heaven against the Allied betrayal of Poland—he who opposed every form of cooperation to prevent this war and dismissed the German attack on Poland as hardly worth a protest. And you find men and women of honest liberal convictions rallying to the same position on the ground that a new league of nations will fail as the old one did unless it is built on a completed foundation of international justice.

In this fight, in which cold partisan tactics will be inextricably tangled with idealistic appeals, the tendency will be for supporters of collective responsibility to rush to the other extreme and reject all criticism of Yalta and Dumbarton Oaks. Already I have heard one of the most effective advocates of the President's program urge liberals to soft-pedal their doubts and demands at least until after April 25.

I am against this strategy. It seems to me more than merely dishonest; by refusing to consider or discuss the obvious imperfections in the security plans so far made, you abandon the whole field to the enemies of any security system. Two weeks ago in this page I discussed the intimate relationship between our foreign policy and a workable security system. The most impressive and substantial United Nations structure that can possibly be built at San Francisco would soon crumble under a continued attempt on the part of Britain and the United States to rule Europe through reactionary puppets like Franco and Papandreou. Equally important are such changes as will give the lesser nations an effective role in the new world organization. A full-fledged rebellion against three-power dictatorship might easily prevent the security plan from being carried through.

What is needed, in my opinion, between now and April 25, is a full and careful examination of the most controversial issues affecting world organization—the Yalta decisions specifically included. The State Department, through its radio forum and all its other educational activities, should stress, not minimize, those issues. It should encourage persons who support the general principles of collective action to criticize specific aspects of the program. It should initiate discussions of the treatment of Germany. (Is the United States going to favor using the German army to restore areas devastated by it? The Nation urged such a plan many weeks ago. In a press conference held the day after his address to Congress, Mr. Roosevelt casually suggested that it might be a good idea. But surely it is worth serious debate, as are the other problems involved in the control of enemy territory.) The State Department should arrange to have the various views on the position and role of small nations freely circulated. Fifteen Latin American nations have agreed on a set of proposals on this issue to be presented at San Francisco. The Dutch have submitted a note to the United Nations suggesting definite changes in the Dumbarton Oaks plan. The French have opinions of their own on this and other provisions; they have even refrained from joining the other major powers in issuing the invitation to the conference in order to retain complete freedom to raise questions at San Francisco. The whole problem presents another issue on which the conference may well founder if it is not dealt with both fairly and radically. It should be talked about in advance—and not only by isolationists or Anglophobes who use it to prove that as long as colonies exist, no international organization is worth having.

I suggest that the State Department promote this discussion for several reasons. First, because it has launched a campaign into which such a debate could easily be fitted. Second, because the State Department is the focus, and with good reason, of many liberal fears and suspicions, and it might partly overcome hostility by providing a forum for conflicting opinions. Third, because the government should take the lead in insisting upon and even dramatizing the flexibility of the security programs so far drawn up. This is obvious political strategy—by far the best way of disarming opposition.

As for the rest of us, our job is clear. Starting from the double premise that a security organization must be formed and that it must rest upon solid agreement between the great powers, we have not only the right but the urgent duty to try to clear out all the impediments to a decent working plan that we can possibly get rid of. For those impediments would not only stand in the way of effective action by a world organization; they might easily prevent such an organization from coming into existence by providing its enemies, in Congress and out, with the weapons they need to bring it to defeat.

The War Fronts

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THE past three weeks on the western front have presented a pretty good model of how a military campaign should look. It is not surprising that the Russian military mission visiting the front—one of the first fruits of Yalta—was impressed: the operation has many of the earmarks of a first-class Red Army performance, combining careful preparation, extensive artillery barrages, simultaneous advances on different sectors of the front, and then breakthrough, encirclement, and pursuit.

The preparation for the main effort across the Roer River and the Cologne plain was especially noteworthy. The Canadian First Army, under the good Canadian General Crerar, carried out a very effective little amphibian war in the marshes at the northern end of the front, pushing steadily southward between the Rhine and the Maas. The American Third Army, under General Patton, continued eastward, after eliminating the German salient in Belgium, through the rough Eifel country down the Moselle; the high point of this operation to date has been the swift seizure of Trier.

Meanwhile the main show had got under way against the center of gravity of the western front—the Roer line anchored about Düren and Jülich. This line, marking the closest and most dangerous approach of the Allies to a vital spot of the Reich, the Ruhr-Rhineland region, was something the Germans simply had to hold. As long as they possessed the trump cards of the Roer dams, they were fairly safe: if the Americans manifested a desire to cross the river, the Germans could release the dammed-up waters as an additional barrier before their fortifications on the east bank; or if the Americans actually crossed the river, the Germans could release the water and cut the Americans off from their supply base.

Once the dams were lost and the water released at the last moment by the retreating Germans had subsided, there was no longer any question about where the blow would fall. The way it fell, however, the swift and daring manner in which the river was spanned by boats and bridges, may have startled the enemy. The fighting on the east bank must have been hard during the early days of last week. But the Americans were bringing more troops and supplies over all the time as the advanced units worked through the cities and strong points back from the bank; Allied aircraft dominated the skies; and the two holding attacks on the north and south prevented any movement of reinforcements to this most-threatened area.

Von Rundstedt knew he could not hope to hold the ground between the Rhine and the Roer for long, once the Roer defenses were gone. He apparently left second-class troops to fight as long as possible while he pulled his élite outfits back behind the Rhine. When the Roer line finally went, it went quickly, as these things always do, and General Simpson's Ninth Army tanks broke into open country—the dim, familiar reaches of the news blackout, which always means very good or very bad tidings on the way to us. This time it was obviously good, and we woke up Saturday with Americans on the Rhine.

Meanwhile those holding attacks developed into real ground-gainers, especially on the north, where the Canadian First broke clear away to the south. It was met by the American Ninth, swinging up behind Roermond and Venlo, two bastions on the east banks of the Roer-Maas which the Germans must have been chagrined to lose to a flanking sweep. Between them these two armies pinched out the big German salient bulging from the Rhine through Geldern, a complicated operation whose success displayed a new facet of Marshal Montgomery's skill in handling a large army group spread out over a considerable area. The holding back of the British Second Army, deployed across the Maas from the Germans who were winked out in this pincers, was a sound and rather crafty decision, probably inducing in the Germans a certain sense of false security which it is quite useless to enjoy when one faces Montgomery. Sir Bernard often moves exceedingly slow, but when his mind is made up and he has a good day, he is nobody to fool with.

The most important advance, of course, was that of the Ninth's main force around and through München-Gladbach to Neuss, across the Rhine from Düsseldorf, and Krefeld, on the way to Duisburg. These are the approaches to the great industrial centers of the Ruhr, whose loss, on top of the loss of Silesia's, would render the German war machine incapable of replenishing its basic matériel.

So now there is a new watch on the Rhine. What of General Eisenhower's objective—to destroy these Germans west of the Rhine where they stood? The three northern Allied armies, from Düren to the Hochwald, took 40,000 prisoners in a week; figures for killed and wounded must have run comparatively high on the Roer. But evidently the bulk of von Rundstedt's forces got out in time, as usual. Rundstedt might have made the crossing of the Cologne plain a bloody and expensive business, fighting from every village; in which case it would have taken longer and cost more for the Allies to reach the Rhine. But they would have reached it, and left Rundstedt depleted for the far more important business of defending the Rhine's east bank. He therefore chose the militarily sound course in pulling back so many troops. This is not much comfort to the soldiers who must now fight their way across the Rhine, thinking bitterly that Jerry always seems to get away with enough troops to make a stand on the next ridge or river line. However, there is comfort in the thought that Rundstedt will have fewer troops to hold a longer and more twisting line, from Arnhem to Cologne and the south. There is further comfort in the thought of the fresh British Second Army, no doubt well supplied with boats and bridges, and General Brereton's Airborne Army, the bulk of which has had a long rest. A river line is not, actually, any better than the troops and weapons which control it: no obstacle is real unless it is covered by a field of fire, and Eisenhower will have the attacker's advantage of picking the spot where he wants the Airborne Army to drop and establish a bridgehead to which the ground troops can cross.

Allied control of the air has played a large part in the success of the action thus far, and will continue to do so. The isolation of the battlefield may well be air power's most substantial contribution to warfare at its present stage of development: when aerial superiority approaches the shining goal of aerial supremacy it can seriously cripple the flow of supplies and troops, and do much damage on retreat-clogged roads. Recent operations against railway marshaling yards, switch points, rail lines, and highways have been far more extensive than those which preceded the Normandy breakout last summer, and the effect on German movements has been correspondingly more stringent. As was the case in the Normandy battle, the Allied air forces are ranging well behind the battle zone—as far back as Berlin, Magdeburg, Leipzig, and Nürnberg. These attacks, now that the squeeze from east and west on Germany has really begun, directly aid the Red Army as well: an attack on Berlin, which is long-range and therefore "strategic" for the Western Allies, is close-range and therefore almost "tactical" for Zhukov's armies only forty miles away.

These armies have been enjoying their "creative pause" while Eisenhower's troops have been sweeping up to the Rhine, there to enjoy their own "creative pause." The great potentiality of the situation thus unfolding is that Zhukov's flanks will be finally cleared at about the same time that Eisenhower is ready to go forward again. A truly combined brace of offensives against Berlin and the Ruhr will then unfold naturally.

Chapultepec Love Feast

BY ANITA BRENNER

Mexico City, March 2

THE road to collective peace and security has led through Bretton Woods and Dumbarton Oaks to Chapultepec Park. But so far Chapultepec Park cannot be described as a clearing. And it is still impossible to see the forest for the trees. The representatives of twenty nations gathered to consider inter-American problems of war and peace have had a week of glorious speeches and intoxicating vistas of economic and political brotherhood, with the boyish friendliness of Nelson Rockefeller and the almost priestly benevolence of Ezequiel Padilla keynoting the scene. Noble resolutions and more practical proposals have flowed through the steering committee by the hundred. Filtered by this committee, which consists of the heads of all the delegations, the proposals being considered still number 150, with the case of Argentina far down on the agenda. However, the proposals run mostly along similar lines, indicating a real community of problems and points of view, and much previous consultation. The only maverick resolutions have been demands for a break with Franco and Cuba's appeals in behalf of Poland and Palestine, invoking the principle of security of minor peoples. All these have been cut off with the formula that they are not inter-American affairs.

Padilla, as president of the steering committee, blandly shelved the Franco question, thus relaxing Mexico's previously stiff policy and souring the happiness of those delegations that have specific mandates to insist on a break, principally Uruguay, Colombia, Cuba, and Guatemala. The concerted break proposed is out, though there may be bloc action. The Franco question often reappears riding on amendments to approved proposals, such as the United States plan to check the activities of enemy agents. A definition that would include phalangists will probably go through with hedging qualifications. Unexpectedly, the case of Argentina has not overshadowed the deliberations. Feeling about Franco runs much more strongly, but this, too, is secondary to the four themes repeated again and again in the resolutions submitted—mutual economic safeguards, protection of the rights of states, protection of the rights of individuals, and prosecution of the war.

At the start of the conference two things infused it with an extraordinary spirit of frankness, earnestness, and goodwill. The first was the urgent desire to have again open covenants openly arrived at; in this spirit all the principal committee meetings were thrown open to the press. The second was the strong hope that the United States would express a clear-cut post-war economic and political policy that would leave weaker nations less vulnerable to military and economic might. As the first fresh bloom of enthusiasm evaporated, this hope became a determination to get at least as strong a commitment from the United States and as much general accord on the fundamental problems as possible. What Latin America fears most is that its economic and social organization will become a shambles, first, because markets will collapse, as Peru puts it, "with the explosion of peace," and next because chiefly agricultural or raw-material-producing nations will be unable to compete with the United States industrially.

In its production of metals, rubber, oil, coffee, cotton, henequen, sugar, and other raw materials for the world market Latin America must compete with Oriental coal-labor after the war. Its only lifeline, it believes, is the diversification of production through industrialization. In order to maintain the price of vital products and at the same time obtain needed industrial equipment, Latin America wants a tight economic alliance with the United States, insuring, first, price stabilization through stockpiling and clearing arrangements and, second, priority in the purchase of machinery. The United States delegation has answered these pressing demands with declarations and proposals that seem to promise sweeping compliance but actually promise nothing except "we will do the best we can for you."

Assistant Secretary of State Clayton paid homage to all the sacred cows of the free-trade doctrine and at the same time promised stockpiling, continuation of controls, and government banking, thus creating considerable confusion. Our more ambitious document, the economic charter, is only a declaration of fine principles and was received as such. Since even the labor clause, which declares that workers ought to have the right everywhere to organize and bargain collectively, can be subscribed to by such nations as Brazil and Peru in principle, it seems evident that the United States wishes to eat its cake and have it too. So the principle makes a mighty talking point at least and may have far-reaching effects, particularly with the addition Mexico proposed—to continentalize the right to strike. The San Francisco conference may offer better bargains in political positions and above all in commercial arrangements than are found in the hemispheric preferential set-up asked for by Latin America. The corollary of such a development would be strong post-war bidding from other nations for Latin American markets. The other conflict in what was announced as the first important statement of United States foreign economic policy seems to be between the old catch-as-catch-can imperialism and the newer doctrine of industrialization and wage increases to create a consumer market.

In the political field, except for the Franco scandal, we have done relatively little weaseling. A mutual-aid agreement protecting national sovereignties and boundaries, with strong machinery to implement it, will probably go through; in Latin American eyes the Monroe Doctrine will then have been replaced by the Declaration of Chapultepec. The re-organized Pan-American Union is to be a real league of American nations, functioning through specially appointed representatives holding regular meetings and consultations, and implemented for emergencies. The permanent council has been given authority to act on any matter concerning American nations. This puts substance in the good-neighbor policy and is besides of immediate importance to some nations which fear imminent aggression. One of Uruguay's delegates told me that his country, lying between strongly armed Brazil and Argentina, feels like Belgium, with the extra hazard of having a liberal, democratic regime in a neighborhood where democracy is not popular.

So much can be chalked up to the credit of the streamlined State Department. It was not, however, a difficult job, since the United States and Latin America were in agreement. The utter absence of even the appearance of Machiavellianism in Nelson Rockefeller's manner has warmed the cockles of many a delegate's heart. In this mood Latin America has accepted the United States policy as progressive while clearly recognizing it for what it is—the official version of Luther Johnson's plea for meeting the under-dog halfway and giving him something before he bites. Fundamentally what motivates this conference and draws the delegations together is the basic fear of today's governments—the fear of revolution. Thus its success or failure will not be measured by diplomatic victories but by the degree to which the peaceful industrial progress blueprint in the proposals prevents the violence simmering in many parts of America from erupting.

The Legal Case Against Hitler

BY RAPHAEL LEMKIN

II

THE traditional war crimes fall into the following categories: (a) crimes committed against prisoners of war; (b) acts contrary to the rules of warfare, such as the use of poison gas, the torpedoing of hospital ships, and the like; (c) crimes committed against inhabitants of the occupied countries. Because Germany has had demographic aims and tried to change the European balance of populations in its own favor, the most numerous and monstrous of its crimes fall into the third category. The fear of reprisals has also kept it from acting as ruthlessly against prisoners of war and in violation of the rules of warfare as it has acted against the captive nations.

In addition to the traditional war crimes, Hitler and his associates since 1933 have been guilty of murder, loot, torture, false imprisonment, and other crimes against residents of Germany hated or feared because of their religion, race, or political affiliations. The problem arises now whether the Allies can punish crimes of this kind, and by what means.

The opinion has been advanced that a state's treatment of its own nationals is an internal matter and of no concern to other states. The evolution of international law and international relations in modern times does not, however, justify such an isolationist view. There have been many instances of states expressing their concern about another state's treatment of its own citizens. The United States rebuked the governments of czarist Russia and Rumania for the ghastly pogroms they instigated or tolerated. There was also diplomatic action in behalf of the Greeks and Armenians when they were being massacred by the Turks. States have even entered into international treaties by which they assumed obligations as to the treatment of their own nationals or undertook to protect the citizens of other states against their governments. In a treaty with Spain in 1898 the United States assured the inhabitants of the ceded territories "the free exercise of their religion." In 1919 and 1920 several treaties were signed under the auspices of the League of Nations for the protection of racial, linguistic, and religious minorities in Europe. The Declaration of the Eighth International Conference of American States provides that "any persecution on account of racial or religious motives which makes it impossible for a group of human beings to live decently is contrary to the political and judicial systems of America."

CRIMES AGAINST GERMAN NATIONALS

The doctrine and experience of modern international law on this subject have been summed up in a study published in 1944 under the auspices of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. The ruling principle is compellingly stated: "Each state has a legal duty to see that conditions prevailing within its own territory do not menace international peace and order, and to this end it must treat its own population in a way which will not violate the dictates of humanity and justice or shock the conscience of mankind." Since 1933 Germany has consistently flouted this principle. The concept of the "master race" which has the right to oppress and degrade "inferior peoples" was expanded to justify the conquest of other nations. The Germans started with the Jews and ended by enslaving all Europe. Even before the war the Nazi persecutions disturbed normal international relations. Large numbers of German citizens were expelled and had to be taken care of by the countries to which they fled and such organizations as the Evian Conference on Refugees and the International Red Cross. Wholesale confiscation of the property rights of entire groups of German citizens has been detrimental to the property rights of their foreign creditors and undermined international trade. Clearly the problem is not Germany's private concern.

Not even the Nazi state has dared to legalize crimes recognized in every penal code—common murder, mayhem, torture, false imprisonment, loot. The German penal code defining these acts as crimes has survived intact. The Nazis have tacitly admitted that these acts are illegal. When the disgraceful pogroms swept over the country, especially in 1938, the German government disowned responsibility for the "spontaneous indignation" of its agents who had robbed and tortured helpless people. The Nazis have simply arrogated to themselves a de facto impunity for their crimes. To restore law and order such impunity must be abolished. Order and safety cannot exist while masses of criminals remain at liberty.

The authority to restore law and order was granted to an occupying power by Article 43 of the Fourth Hague Convention, which reads: "The authority of the legitimate power having in fact passed into the hands of the occupant, the latter shall take all the measures in his power to restore and insure, as far as possible, public order and safety while respecting, unless absolutely prevented, the laws in force in the country." After the defeat of Germany the Allies will assume the rights of an occupying power, either by the fact of occupation or by an armistice agreement. Thus no legal difficulty bars them from punishing the Nazis for crimes committed against German nationals. Use of the authority granted by the Fourth Hague Convention is the simplest and most direct way to achieve the end sought.

JURISDICTION—ALLIED OR GERMAN COURTS?

The Allied military courts should conduct the trials. Persons who refer to jurisdictional obstacles to trying German war criminals in other than German courts cite the case of Coleman v. Tennessee, which was decided by the United States Supreme Court in 1878. In this case a soldier of the Northern army who had committed a murder in Tennessee had been brought to trial in Tennessee. The Supreme Court denied that a Tennessee court had jurisdiction after the end of hostilities between the Northern and Southern states, holding that the courts of formerly occupied territories had no jurisdiction over dismissed members of the occupying army.

In Belgian and French cases dating from the First World War, however, the opposite view has been expressed. An outstanding instance is the case of Bockstegen ("Pasicrisie belge," 1920, I, p. 104). Bockstegen, a former member of the German army of occupation in Belgium, was recognized by a Belgian soldier with the Belgian army of occupation in the Rhineland as the murderer of several people in the Belgian's native town. The accused was returned to Belgium to stand trial for his deeds and was duly sentenced. In an appeal to the Belgian Cour de Cassation he asserted that only German courts had jurisdiction, but the appeal was rejected, the court holding that Belgian courts could try men who committed crimes in Belgium while members of the German occupying army. It is obvious that this Belgian case is more to the point than the Coleman v. Tennessee case. Cases growing out of the First World War show a closer analogy to the present war-crimes problem than cases growing out of the American Civil War.

In addition to legal precedent, which supports the jurisdiction of Allied courts, there are strong reasons why the Germans should not be allowed to try their war criminals in their own courts. After the First World War the Germans extorted a similar privilege from the Allies despite the express provisions of the Treaty of Versailles that war-crimes trials should be held in Allied courts. A list of 896 war criminals was submitted to the Germans. By clever bargaining the Germans got the number reduced to forty-five. Only twelve were actually brought to trial in Leipzig, and only six were convicted. Farcically light sentences were imposed.

Moreover, the German judiciary has been morally depraved by the Nazis. Under the present regime German judges have enjoyed a large amount of discretionary power. They have had the right to establish their own definition of a crime when an express criminal provision was lacking in the penal code, and they have misused this right by sentencing thousands of innocent persons to death or hard labor. To let the German judiciary act in these cases would be like setting one criminal to try another.

The argument may be advanced that no precedent for the establishment of a tribunal for trying war criminals is available in international law. Actually such tribunals were provided for by Articles 227-30 of the Treaty of Versailles. Yielding to German pressure, the Allies consented to the trial of German war criminals by the Reichsgericht in Leipzig, but they expressly reserved the legal right enunciated in those articles.

The Germans have estopped themselves from using the ex post facto argument against the establishment of a tribunal for trying war criminals by their promulgation on December 13, 1919, of a special law providing for such a tribunal; this was an ex post facto law for dealing with crimes committed in 1914-18.

PUNISHMENT BY POLITICAL INSTEAD OF LEGAL ACTION

A suggestion that the leading Nazis should not be brought to trial but "disposed of" by political action has aroused considerable discussion. One argument for this course is based on the doubtful legality of the proposed trials, but it is difficult to see how political "disposition" has a firmer legality than the judicial process. Another argument, much more dangerous, holds that the singular impressiveness of the crimes committed justifies action of an equally impressive character, that is, political rather than juridical. The case of Napoleon is cited as comparable in political significance to that of Hitler and his henchmen, who should therefore receive similar treatment. Napoleon, however, was not charged with any war crimes, nor were his armies accused of cruel or unusual behavior. And the transformation of European political and social institutions under Napoleon can in no way be compared with the destruction worked by Hitler's policies.

An additional reason for favoring the judicial process is that if Hitler and his associates should escape, their extradition could be more effectively demanded on juridical than on political grounds. It should be remembered that the Dutch government refused extradition of the Kaiser after the First World War because the request was formulated as a political one.

Moreover, the German overlords have deposited their ill-gotten gains in various neutral countries and under various legal fictions of title. Eventual release of this property can be obtained only through verdicts issuing from legal action against the criminal depositors.

It is the obligation of our generation to bring Hitler and his associates to trial. It is necessary for us to put on record a moral evaluation of their acts and to clarify the standards by which international society can live. The conscience of shocked humanity demands that justice be done. Also, although Hitler is guilty of the murder of millions, he must be tried and sentenced as a common criminal to preclude as far as possible his survival in German history as a martyred hero.

The Nazis have destroyed whole nations, a crime for which the present writer has coined the word "genocide"—in analogy with homicide and fratricide. The world should feel and express its solidarity in the condemnation of so monstrous a crime. Expression of such solidarity might well take the form of an international treaty, to be signed by the United Nations and the neutrals, in which "genocide" would be placed on the list of international crimes, along with piracy and trade in women, slaves, and narcotics. The crime of genocide should be made extraditable. Thus neutrals, as signatories to such a treaty, could not grant asylum to escaping war criminals or treat a demand for extradition as an infringement upon their sovereignty.

[The first part of this article appeared in the issue of February 24.]

25 Years Again "The Nation"

IN A WASHINGTON DISPATCH to the New York Evening Post, Mr. Mark Sullivan writes that the railway legislation "is a sign of the strongly conservative state of public opinion in the United States at the present time." This is probably an accurate analysis, except that some people will be disposed to substitute for "conservative" the stronger word "reactionary." The present state of public opinion in America is due partly to the fact that we suffered less and learned less in the war than did Europe; partly to the natural continuation of despotic methods to which the war accustomed us at home; partly to great industrial prosperity which silences criticism and discontent; and partly to extensive insidious propaganda intended to prejudice the public against the new political and economic ideas with which the rest of the world is throbbing.—March 6, 1920.

IT WOULD BE TOO OPTIMISTIC to assume, merely because the leaders in the House of Representatives have decided to omit universal military training from the army bill this year, that the demand for such a program is dead. . . . In any event, time will run in favor of the opposition. As the war fever cools, and as workmen realize that one of the motives behind the demand for conscription is not fear of foreign aggression but desire to have an army to use against organized labor, the chance of foisting this sinister plan on the country will dwindle.—March 13, 1920.

THE BELGIAN CHAMBER [has] granted suffrage in communal elections to women twenty-one years of age, with an amendment excluding women of "notorious misconduct." All Catholic members voted for the measure, all but two Liberals against it, while the Socialists were divided.—March 13, 1920.

FOR THE MILITARIST COUP in Berlin the responsibility rests not upon Ebert or Erzberger, nor upon any political forces within what remains of Germany, but upon the Big Five and the Supreme Council. . . . Throughout the war Mr. Wilson called upon the Germans to throw off the Hohenzollern yoke and to take into their own hands the reins of government. They did so, but it availed them not. . . . Mr. Wilson, Mr. Lloyd George, M. Clemenceau, and Signor Orlando acted as if they desired chaos in Germany and Austria, as if the best way to enthrone order and stability in Berlin was to weaken and humiliate the Ebert government in the eyes of its people.—March 20, 1920.

PRECISELY as was to have been expected, the Lusk committee has fizzled out in its report to the New York legislature. It admits that "the laws already on our statute books, if properly enforced, are adequate to protect the institutions of this state and to preserve the constitutional rights of its citizens." Exactly so. . . . Nothing but politics is behind the various bills which the committee has submitted to the legislature in order to justify its existence.—March 27, 1920.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH: H. L. Mencken and George Jean Nathan, "The American Credo"; Edwin Muir, "We Moderns."

Should Veterans Have Legs?

BY EDWARD M. MAISEL

THE Senate Subcommittee on War-Time Health and Education, under the chairmanship of Senator Claude Pepper, announced last week a full-scale investigation into the needs of returning veterans. One of the first items which the committee should take up is the artificial-limb industry's sabotage of improved mechanical appliances for the crippled. Encouraged by governmental indifference, this has developed into a first-class scandal.

As the casualty lists come in from Iwo Jima, they should make us realize the tremendous number of permanently crippled and disabled men we shall have in America after the war. Booby traps, mines, and high-explosive shells don't make nice clean wounds; they shatter legs and arms and hands. On February 11 Dr. Sterling Brunnel, consultant to Secretary of War Stimson, told an army surgical conference that more than 15 per cent of all battle casualties have been hand injuries.

But veterans are not the only ones who need artificial limbs. Secretary of Labor Perkins reported last week that about 2,250,000 persons were disabled by industrial accidents in 1944, and a considerable number of these probably suffered amputations. Furthermore, the 1944 epidemic of infantile paralysis was the second worst in the recorded history of the disease in this country, and some of its victims will undoubtedly want to replace a withered, useless limb by an efficient prosthetic appliance.

In spite of optimistic stories, progress in the design and construction of artificial limbs has been slow. The aims of the manufacturers have changed little from Civil War days, when bracemakers fashioned crude peg legs for men who had lost a leg in battle. A serious need for intensive research in the mechanics of artificial limbs has long existed, as both the physically handicapped and the orthopedists know only too well.

Betsy Barton in her admirable book on the problems of disability, "And Now to Live Again," referring to the "medieval" equipment with which the handicapped must learn to manage, voices the thought of many a disabled veteran. "It has always surprised me," she says, "that the construction of invalid equipment, which ought to call for all the care and inventiveness that a Bel Geddes puts into discovering a new way to make light invisible in our homes, should be so devoid of imagination. The lame and weak and helpless of the world are pushed into back bedrooms and left because no one has taken care or time or trouble to look into their deepest needs and help them invent something which would make their ability to get around a little less tiresome and limited." Even such advances as have been made, Miss Barton points out, create a problem, because "the prices of all these things are still exorbitant, not easily accessible to the vast majority of people who are needing and going to need them."

The necessity for scientific investigation in this field and the responsibility of government for such research were plainly acknowledged during World War I. An official report in the National Archives (S.G.O. 442-3, Artificial Limbs) in Washington outlines the technical complications of the subject: "The study of the general action of artificial limbs and the determination of the relative value of the many different devices for obtaining a natural knee- and ankle-joint movement are questions that can be solved only by long and patient investigation. The undertaking is obviously not one to be considered during war but offers a very proper subject for the attention of the government in time of peace."

In time of peace, however, this turned out to be a responsibility which the government failed to discharge. Research was left mainly to the sporadic and uncoordinated efforts of the limb manufacturers. Surgical Business, in its issue of September, 1939, described how this peace-time research was in the main conducted. "In the mad rush to secure the profitable private amputee market," it said, "quite a few makers have resorted to 'secret' processes and new 'inventions' designed to attract the interest of prospects. These developments unfortunately often exist merely in the mind of the manufacturer. Often they are merely a springboard upon which to launch a new selling effort. It is obvious that, given an opportunity, any worth-while development will stand on its own feet, and bring prestige and profit to the inventor. On the other hand, some hoard a 'secret' process for a lifetime and very often die with it."

It is shocking that after three years of war the spasmodic research efforts of the limb manufacturers, augmented by contributions from the army, navy, and Veterans' Administration, still provide most of the experimentation in this field.

There has been only the most inadequate investigation of the possible utilization of plastics. The "Celastik" process, for example, which appears to have been effectively demonstrated in South Africa, uses a plastic material which is molded while soft about the stump of the amputated limb. After the mold has solidified, it is removed and inserted in the artificial limb, assuring an exact fit. A new Celastik insert can be made whenever the stump shrinks or alters. This method not only gives a better fit but greatly reduces the time required for adjusting an appliance to the wearer.

What the scattered victims of accidents endure in normal times is universalized in time of war. As their ranks are swollen by the wounded soldiers, their plea mounts in volume and begins to make itself heard. In 1942 the annual convention of the American Legion adopted a resolution which frankly stated: "Improvement in the manufacturing of artificial limbs has not kept pace with mechanical progress shown in many other phases of engineering; and progress in mechanical construction of artificial limbs cannot be expected because the manufacturers have neither the resources nor the equipment to engage in extensive research engineering work unless government agencies will assist in the research so that scientific talent can be applied in solving this urgent and important problem." The resolution went on to indorse all efforts "to establish a laboratory for scientific research in artificial-limb manufacture and . . . to secure federal and other funds in order to establish this laboratory immediately, so that victims of this world war can be the immediate beneficiaries of this much-needed service."

With the enormous influence of the American Legion behind this injunction, what happened to sidetrack the immediate setting up of the "much-needed service"? On November 14, 1942, Chester C. Haddan, president of the Association of Limb Manufacturers of America, received a letter from Brigadier General Frank T. Hines, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, regarding the resolution which had been adopted at the American Legion convention. Mr. Haddan gave this report of the letter's contents: "General Hines stated in his letter to me that it had been his impression that competition was particularly keen in artificial limbs, and that he supposed . . . each manufacturer of artificial limbs would be under the necessity of making a product that would attract and hold patrons, and . . . would be alert to such improvements of his product as would extend his market. The General said further that it had been his impression that the artificial limbs, of certain manufacturers at least, have attained a high degree of ingenuity and design, and that he was not aware that the improvement in the manufacturing of artificial limbs has not kept pace with the mechanical progress known in many other phases of engineering."

Needless to say, the president of the Association of Limb Manufacturers of America hastened to assure the General that he was entirely correct in his "impressions," that the American Legion was indeed all wet, and that progress in the limb industry had exceeded even the General's generous estimate. He added that some of the members of his organization "maintain a research department and have spent many thousands of dollars year after year in research." (It is hard to discover any members who have spent thousands of dollars year after year in research. They have certainly issued no regular scientific reports embodying the results of their costly research.) In conclusion Mr. Haddan revealed the core of his worry: "It would appear that there is absolutely no necessity for the allocation of any federal funds for research in this field at the present time."

Thus so powerful an organization as the American Legion was thwarted in its declared intention of establishing a "much-needed service," essential to the welfare of the disabled veterans of World War II.

"This is an illustration," Mr. Haddan informed his associates after further correspondence with General Hines, "of how the association can protect its members by promptly and properly meeting such things as this at the time they arise." It was a little unfair to take the full credit; a certain amount of callousness and indifference in the Veterans' Administration was also needed to produce the desired result.

Though Mr. Haddan called the issue "closed," criticism was not entirely strangled. In November, 1943, therefore, the Association of Limb Manufacturers founded the Research Institute Foundation, Inc., a non-profit, scientific-research organization. Prodding from the National Research Council of the Office of Scientific Research and Development is believed to have been a potent factor in this change of heart. In view of Mr. Haddan's strong repudiation of the need for research, there is grim humor in the prospectus of the new institute. "The need for a scientific organization of this kind," it says, "has long been apparent; it remained, however, for the urgencies brought about by World War II to bring such an organization into being." And after Mr. Haddan's denial of any "necessity for the allocation of any federal funds for research in this field at the present time," there is irony in his announcement of plans for financing the enterprise: "The foundation will be financed by contributions from interested persons or organizations, grants, bequests, and donations; or by allocation of federal and state funds."

Thus far the project has been poorly financed. The National Association of Manufacturers expressed interest but took no action.

At their convention in Chicago on January 30 and 31, 1945, the limb makers were unable to point to any substantial accomplishments of the foundation since its establishment in 1943. Moreover, the existence of "special interests" makes hopeful developments from that quarter seem unlikely. For example, two of the most prominent manufacturers and a colleague in Canada are reputed to be interested in British patents on metal limbs. They will certainly not encourage research that might lead to the adoption of plastic or other novel types of appliance.

It may be too early to judge the new institute, and to decide whether the board of governors recruited from civilian orthopedic surgeons as well as from the army, navy, and Veterans' Administration will be able to rise above the mediocre level of research that has hitherto satisfied the limb industry. It is not too early, however, to repeat the original recommendations of the American Legion. Improvement in the design of artificial limbs is too vital to the happiness and well-being of our disabled veterans to be left to any private group of this kind, however well-intentioned. It is a task for the most extensive, solidly financed, and disinterested research.

Puritan Poem

New York, February 27. Commissioner Paul Moss insisted on the closing of the play "Trio" as a condition of renewing the lease of the Belasco Theater.

Commissioner of License Moss
Of public morals is the boss.
He constitutes himself the law
On what is clean and what is raw,
And if he thinks a play is pruri-
Ent, he acts as judge and jury,
And saves us, thus, by finer vision,
From a possibly fallible decision.

And yet, we would not mourn our loss
If he were ex-Commissioner Moss.

MELVILLE CANE

Who Are the Partisans?

BY MILTON BRACKER

Rome, February 20

WHAT—and why—is a partisan? That is a question which demands an immediate and accurate answer, because the answer will help to provide a solution for acute international problems which refuse to lie quiet until the war's end. Nobody can pretend that the attitude of the Allies toward the "partisans" in Greece and Belgium, and to a lesser extent in France, no matter how "painfully necessary" it may have been, points the way to a harmonious post-war settlement of Europe's troubles.

The word "partisan" used to conjure up a picture of a ragged minute man, unpaid, poorly armed, and ill fed, who ignored incredible hazards to harry the enemies occupying his native land, long after organized resistance had ceased and the nation's leaders had fled. Lately, the term has been in danger of coming to mean something less noble, a sort of political bandit who seeks freedom—if, indeed, freedom is what he is really seeking—as if it were "a harlot to be picked up in the streets at the point of a submachine-gun."

No partisan I ever met quite fitted either of those descriptions. Partisans almost always are men and women who consider it far more important to kill Nazis and traitors than to play dubious roles in "tragic situations." Partisans almost always are Greeks or Belgians or Yugoslavs or Frenchmen or Italians before they are Communists or royalists or collectivists or anarchists or any other form of "ists."

It might help Americans to understand what a "partisan" is if they were reminded that there have been partisans in every age. When a foreign army or a dictator's gang occupies a man's home town he is likely to become a partisan overnight—or no longer a living man at all. A partisan is as old as tyranny, as strong as the spirit of freedom—as weak and imperfect as all mankind.

The men who dumped the tea into Boston harbor were partisans. So were the Carolina patriots who followed Francis Marion through the cypress swamps. Today's partisans, too, fight for an ideal. It may be obscure, confused, ultimately corrupted or even lost sight of, but deep in every man it exists; and it is the very fuel on which they fight. Not even the most bigoted critics of the E. L. A. S. in Greece or of Tito's informal legions in Yugoslavia can accuse them of fighting primarily for territory or money or a strategic harbor or personal gain or prestige. Basically, they fight for the ideal of running their own country and their own people in their own way.

Early in October I sat just outside Patras with Vasilios Riovolas, second in command of all E. L. A. S. forces in the Peloponnesus. He was then known by the impressive mythological name of Hermes; and his enormous beard, glittering eyes, and jutting dagger made him seem almost as exalted a figure to his first interviewer as to the followers who had never seen him. To Hermes, puffing an American cigarette and crossing glossily booted legs, there was no difference between Germans and anyone who ever flirted with the thought of being "in their camp." Perhaps in terms of human loathing, if not of military justice, his feeling was even greater against "Greeks who tried fascism" than against the Germans.

Up to this point Hermes might have been a Norwegian, Belgian, Dutchman, Frenchman, or Yugoslav. Only when he went into the matter of arms and equipment did the picture tend to particularize. He insisted that the mere possession of anything that the E. L. A. S. might want implied the obligation to give it up if even the least responsible E. L. A. S. man required it. Here obviously was no question of communism. Call his attitude personal, call it even Greek. Whether the views of the E. L. A. S. were right or wrong, there was nothing to indicate they were dictated by Moscow.

The essential fact is that the partisan in every country is an individualist. In the last analysis his only resort is to himself. He cannot go to the dispensary when he is sick or to the quartermaster to draw a pair of gloves to replace those he lost. The tragedy and the glory of the partisan are peculiarly his own, and it is simply not possible to superimpose the hard shell of power politics and expect it to fit the tortured human substance beneath.

The fact that Russia is interested in Greece and Yugoslavia does not mean that every patriot in both countries is a Communist and that one must make up one's mind about the E. L. A. S. or Tito as if communism were the sole issue. The predilection of human beings to misuse the very words for which they will die—democracy, for example—is not new. But probably never in the history of language has a word been used more carelessly than "Communist" when it is applied to partisans of any country, particularly to those of Italy and the Balkans.

Who, then, are the partisans? They are men and women, yes, and children, who fight fire and steel with flesh and spirit. They are the expert Dutch saboteur who taught his infant just two words, Pappie dood (Daddy's dead), so that when the Gestapo came to wheedle information from the child that was all they would learn; the wizened French grandmother, Mme Marr, who hid seventeen American and Canadian soldiers; the Yugoslav poet-editor who after letting a Chetnik escape eleven times was asked why he hadn't shot the man and replied, "Don't be ridiculous; we got eleven rifles from him."

They are the men and women whose songs brought tears to my eyes in the broken-down truck which took us from Katakolon to Pyrgos—on stolen German gasoline—the day I made the original landing with the British in Greece. They are the priest, the banker, the storekeeper who rode with us the next day all the marshy way to Araxos, past children weak with hunger and malaria. They are the infuriated intellectuals—yes, some were Communists—who before my eyes smashed two store windows on the Via delle Convertite here and put up prepared signs reading, Spie degli Tedeschi (German spies).

They are those other young Italians, with grenades and pistols in their belts, who, crowded into another truck decked with red, white, and green, tried vainly to accompany us into Rome from shell-shocked Centocelle—vainly, because on June 4 last year, as now, Allied authorities here couldn't quite make up their minds about partisans.

They are students, clerks, doctors, lawyers, and bakers; fools, thieves, ne'er-do-wells, and saints; Catholics, Jews, atheists; Communists, Socialists, Democrats, Actionists—and countless others who might literally be called non-partisans because they are certainly not politicians.

They come largely but not by any means entirely from the poorer strata of society. Most of them want a better society to follow their anguish, even if it means hurting some of their own countrymen as well as the invaders. When they were ordered by Field Marshal Alexander to call off organized fighting for the winter, they retorted that their work wasn't "summer sport" and fought on—in Genoa and Turin, in uneasy Bologna, and among the bomb-loosened rocks of the Brenner Pass. They still fight on with a grim patience, for they think that once the north, particularly Milan, is free, the knotty question, "Who is a Fascist?" may for a change be easier to answer.

Here are portraits of three Italian partisans whom I believe to be representative. I have spoken with two of them and I know their families.

Maria never belonged to any party and distrusts politics now. Her husband was captured before her eyes north of Lucca a few months ago; fortunately, her three young daughters are safe. A woman of grace and beauty, in her middle thirties, a fine linguist, she has been risking her life for months acting as liaison worker between armed partisans in the mountains and the silent patriots of the villages. She has seen children hung by steel wire, and watched partisans perform amputations on wounded comrades without anaesthesia. She never thinks of what would happen to her if caught. "The important thing is to act, always to act, never to think of failure," she says.

Bruno, barely twenty-five, lean, intense, crippled in a parachute jump, is the son of a professor. He has two degrees and was what might be called an "intellectual Socialist" or parlor pink. Now he has graduated from another school, an Allied sabotage school, where he learned to plant mines and booby traps. He doesn't know how many Nazis he has killed so far—except that it isn't enough.

Inez Versari loved and followed Silvio Corbara, a Robin Hood of the Romagna. With him it was a question of resistance, not of the politics of resistance. When Silvio and his intimates were ambushed by Fascists near Castrocaro, Inez killed one officer and wounded two others. Then she turned the gun on herself, just in time to cheat the Nazi puppets of the obscene thrill of hanging her in public. They hung her corpse in the piazza at Forlì, which the Eighth Army captured several weeks later.

Idealistic, ignorant, embittered, brave, the partisans are death to the oppressor but easy prey for the demagogue. Beyond question they are, as Anne O'Hare McCormick said when she was here recently, "more than lines on the map; these are the young people who will make the future pattern of Europe."

Dalhousie Drops a President

BY JUDITH ROBINSON

IN THE week of February 11 most Canadian dailies published on a back page a small news item from Halifax, Nova Scotia. This was an announcement by the Board of Governors of Dalhousie University, Halifax, that after fifteen years in office Dalhousie's president, Dr. Carleton Wellesley Stanley, had resigned. Thus unobtrusively a battle that had gone on for months between anonymous wealth and a college president came to a bad end for the president.

But the end did not come before a member of the British House of Peers had aimed a few buzz bombs at Halifax in support of academic freedom. When Carleton Stanley resigned, the Atlantic cables were still warm with remarks upon the shortcomings of Dalhousie governors sent prepaid in duplicate by the richest and most generous of the university's graduates and benefactors, the Right Honorable Richard Bedford Bennett, Viscount Bennett of Calgary, formerly Prime Minister of Canada.

Lord Bennett's object of attack was the Board of Governors' majority resolution to resign unless President Stanley did. The reason given for the board's action by the chairman was that a committee of five governors charged with preparing a campaign to obtain financial help for Dalhousie's medical school had reported it useless to ask for contributions while Dr. Stanley, who had said things that antagonized rich people and prosperous corporations, was president.

Lord Bennett regretted further that he could not now withdraw the gifts he had made to Dalhousie and turn them over to some institution which considered providing educational facilities more important than alleged antagonism to the president. That one must have shaken up Dalhousie's governors a bit, for last year Lord Bennett gave outright to Dalhousie three-quarters of a million dollars to endow chairs of law and medicine. Recall that in the past he has given, or inspired, gifts of almost a million more, and has promised at least a quarter-million in the future, and it will be seen that the old alumnus was dropping his bombs close to the committee of five. He went on dropping them.

He inquired how many wealthy persons had declined to subscribe to Dalhousie's financial campaign because Dr. Stanley was president. He asked what sums had been promised if he were got rid of. He warned that if Stanley's resignation were forced on such an issue no really competent man would again accept the presidency of Dalhousie. He charged that since he had refused to be a yes-man, Carleton Stanley had never had a square deal at Dalhousie. He exhorted the chairman of the board not to let the enemies of Stanley do irreparable injury to the university's fame in their efforts to injure the university's president.

The chairman of Dalhousie University's Board of Governors is Colonel Kenrick Laurie (Indian Army, retired), a wealthy Haligonian by birth and inheritance. His mentor in university affairs is the ex-chairman of the board, James McGregor Stewart, O.B.E., K.C., one of Halifax's most successful lawyers and a director of many far-flung companies. It was J. McGregor Stewart who framed the unanimous report of the committee of five that it was useless to approach any wealthy Maritimer for money for Dalhousie while Carleton Stanley remained as president. It was J. McGregor Stewart who pulled the Premier of Nova Scotia into the fight against Stanley by a smart piece of board politics.

Dalhousie is not provincially supported, as are most of the larger universities in Canada. Its founding endowment was provided involuntarily by American citizens more than 130 years ago. The college was established in 1816 by the ninth Earl of Dalhousie, Governor of the Canada of that day, and its foundation funds were takings of the War of 1812-14. Privateers out of Halifax made a good thing of raiding the New England coastal trade in those war years, and the government's percentage on their prizes was collected at the port of Castine, after that Maine village was seized from the Americans. When peace came, Governor Dalhousie endowed the college named for him with the Castine fund.

Last summer, when President Stanley launched the public appeal for funds, he made a direct request to the governments of the three Maritime Provinces to bear an adequate share of the cost of maintaining the medical and dental schools that served all. J. McGregor Stewart seized the opportunity to move at the next board meeting that A. Sterling MacMillan, Premier of Nova Scotia, be made a governor of Dalhousie University. Opposing the motion on principle, President Stanley was left in the ungrateful position of barring from a place on the university governing body the head of the government to which he was applying for money. The Stewart motion was shelved because of Stanley's opposition, but its mover had what he wanted—one more enemy for the president where enemies could do him most harm.

It is admitted by all who know him that Carleton W. Stanley is not a tactful man. He is difficult, exacting, inclined to be high-handed with his staff. But he has resolutely defended the integrity of his university from outside interference. Dalhousie's scholastic standing has risen under his presidency, its endowment fund has doubled, its service to the whole Maritime community has been enlarged, and its part in the war has been played magnificently. What, besides personal dislike, has inspired the successful vendetta against him can best be guessed by glancing at one of the current examples of his lack of tact, the new Dalhousie Labor Institute.

The Dalhousie Labor Institute was inaugurated last spring, first of its kind in any Canadian university, "for the purpose of labor education." Its models were similar institutes already functioning at Harvard and Yale. Its funds were from a Rockefeller grant. Its intention, declared by President Stanley in his annual report for 1944, was to equip union officials with better knowledge of social and economic trends so that they might better serve organized labor.

The biggest single employer of labor in the Maritimes, and one of the five or six biggest industrial concerns in Canada, is the Dominion Steel and Coal Company, known as Dosco. Dosco heads are at present attempting to prove to a federal-government commission that the corporation cannot continue to mine coal, smelt steel, and bless the Nova Scotia worker with employment after the war unless miners' wage rates are cut. Among the union representatives presenting counter-arguments to the federal commissioner are some who have already made good use of Dalhousie's new Labor Institute. Among the leading citizens of Halifax who have had and hope still to have pleasant and profitable relations with Dosco, its subsidiaries and affiliates, is J. McGregor Stewart, ex-chairman of the Board of Governors of Dalhousie University.

In the Wind

AMERICAN LEGION POST 591, Hollywood, recently elected to membership a wounded World War II veteran of Japanese descent. The Legion's district commander refused to recognize the election. The post is fighting to have it recognized, and Los Angeles Chapter No. 1 of the American Veterans' Committee has passed a resolution commending the post and criticizing the district commander.

THE AMERICAN BROADCASTING STATION in Europe, announcing the first free election in occupied Germany, reports that an officer of the AMG suggested the title of Führer for the German member of the food commission at Aachen. The local farmers didn't like the idea. They gave their man the title of Vertreter (representative).

THE MOST SCATHING INDICTMENT of the wrestling industry we've ever heard was uttered by a five-year-old boy in a newsreel theater last week. As the wrestling match on the screen ended he said, "I'm glad that's over. Now we can see some fighting."

FROM THE OBITUARY of Bert Schultz, a farm hand, in the Lagrange, Indiana, Standard and News of February 1: "Lucille Hope became his wife, by common law, and three children were born to them. . . . The deceased was a faithful and hard-working man, though of humble station in life. He was not permitted to marry on account of having some Negro blood."

ATTORNEY GENERAL TOM WATSON of Florida advised the state executive committee of the Democratic Party on February 22 that it would be wise to repeal the poll tax. Such a move need not necessarily improve the Negroes' social or economic position, he said. "It can be done in a way that will reduce the evils. You can carry segregation to the nth degree. You can make them register separately and vote separately. If we do it right we can make history. . . . We can do it right. We've got the brains and the patriotism."

FESTUNG EUROPA: Late last year a Nazi meeting was called at Oslo to discuss anti-sabotage measures. One collaborationist, Svendsen Mö, suggested mass executions. Before voting on the proposal the delegates adjourned for lunch. When they returned to the auditorium Mö found a note on his chair saying, "You will be the first." Word has just arrived from Norway that a few days later Mö "departed this life in a rather unpleasant way."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.]

Brazil Plays at Democracy

DICTATORS all over the world are busy preparing their democratic costumes in order to make an effective entrance at San Francisco. So we were not greatly surprised to learn that Getúlio Vargas had suddenly lifted the press censorship in Brazil. But there are certain illuminating details connected with this change which have not as yet been published and may interest our readers.

The news first reached New York through a telephone call from Rio de Janeiro to Octavio Mangabeira, former Brazilian Minister of Foreign Affairs, who together with Paulo Duarte represents in the United States the Uniao Democratica Brasileira. Mr. Mangabeira has been living in New York since the outbreak of the war, aiding the United Nations' cause in every possible way but totally ignored by the State Department, whose policy has always been to brush aside the very men destined ultimately to direct the affairs of their countries, men with whom the United States will have to work. As one of Brazil's most outstanding and responsible statesmen, Mr. Mangabeira has remained quietly confident that one day he would be summoned by his people to resume active political life. But he did not expect that this summons would take the form of a telephone call from Rio while Getúlio Vargas was still President of the republic.

It was the powerful, pro-Ally Diario de Noticias which telephoned. It called to tell Mr. Mangabeira that the government had just lifted the press censorship and that the following morning the Diario would demand the full reestablishment of democratic liberties and genuinely free elections. The Diario editorial and the editorials of four other papers were also supporting the candidacy of General Eduardo Gómez for the presidency in opposition to Vargas. Having remained aloof from all political struggles, Gómez is unknown in the United States outside of limited military circles, where he is considered one of the best officers of the Brazilian army. But in his own country his disapproval of the dictatorship and his pro-Ally sentiments are common knowledge. He was opposed to Vargas's 1937 coup d'état; yet despite his attitude Vargas promoted him from colonel to brigadier general and later to full generalship. Gómez never visited the War Department to express appreciation for his various promotions. The first time that he ever paid a call on General Dutra, Minister of War, was one month ago. The occasion of his visit was to say that since Vargas had promised elections he wished to inform the Minister that he, General Gómez, intended to be a candidate for the presidency. He added: "I hope that this announcement of elections is not merely a maneuver. If that is all it is and if it is meant only to deceive Brazil once again, then I shall not be a candidate for the presidency but for the leadership of a coup d'état against the dictatorship."

General Gómez's visit to General Dutra has played an important part in recent developments. On the one hand, the fact that the Minister of War failed to take any action against Gómez was an indication that Vargas is losing ground even among his closest collaborators. On the other hand, it gave the opposition a man around whom pro-democratic elements in Brazil might gather. Although, under other circumstances, a civilian candidate might have been preferred by certain groups, the fact that Gómez, although a general, is known for his lack of personal ambition and is favored by a large part of the army, has resulted in rapidly increasing support for his candidacy. Today he has become the spearhead of the military and civilian opposition to Vargas.

Vargas's every political gesture is naturally suspect. Already the constitutional amendments decreed by him on February 28, when he announced that the date of the promised elections would be fixed within the next ninety days, have all the characteristics of a maneuver. A political poll carried out by the Diario da Noite among the opposition groups brands this "constitutional reform" as a political trick designed not to change but to reinforce the fascist constitution of 1937, under which honest and free elections can never take place. His opponents are therefore demanding that the lifting of the press censorship be followed by the restoration of other democratic guaranties. In a statement made in response to the telephone call from the Diario de Noticias, Mr. Mangabeira said that "in order for freedom of the press and all other freedoms to become truly effective, they must not be bestowed as favors by the government but must be guaranteed by the existence of a democratic and firmly established constitution." In the same statement Mr. Mangabeira welcomed "with enthusiasm the movement in favor of Eduardo Gómez," whom he considers "capable of presiding, with the support of all Brazilians, over the task of national reorganization."

Possibly the Brazilian dictator is aiming at something more specific than improving his position at the Mexico and San Francisco conferences. Possibly, while passing through Rio, Secretary of State Stettinius made it clear that Brazil would encounter difficulties in obtaining the position it desires on the council of the new international organization if the present regime should be continued in power without change. But whatever his purposes Getúlio Vargas has been forced to make concessions. The press is already using its new freedom with far more fervor than the regime expected. Besides publishing severe criticisms of the domestic policies of the nine-year dictatorship, it has come out for the immediate destruction of the centers of Nazi agitation still remaining in Brazil. It has also initiated a powerful campaign in favor of a general amnesty for political prisoners. If Vargas attempts to regain ground for the dictatorship after the San Francisco conference he may find that it is too late. The collapse of his regime would have a great repercussion throughout America, especially in Argentina. It would be one of the people's victories of this war.

The article which follows, by Samuel Wainer, gives a clear, up-to-date picture of the Brazilian dictatorship.

A. DEL V.

Vargas in Modern Dress

BY SAMUEL WAINER

SURVIVAL of the Vargas regime after the defeat of the Axis would mean that Brazil would continue as a model and inspiration for fascism in America. For Argentina it has already served these purposes. In an article in Rio's O Jornal, Caio Cesar Vieira, Perón's intimate friend, quoted the Argentine dictator as having said that he was "inspired by the processes and methods of the Estado Novo to consolidate his own regime." The ousting of Vargas and the reconquest of the Brazilian people's fundamental rights would, on the other hand, lead to the democratization of more than half of South America and shake the foundations of remaining dictatorships. Brazil's two million industrial workers could then immeasurably strengthen the four million members of the Confederation of Latin American Workers in their struggle for freedom. In a speech made last May Vargas inadvertently revealed the strength of the workers' resistance to the Estado Novo when he stated that less than 20 per cent of Brazil's workers belonged to the government-controlled syndicates.

Vargas's totalitarian state, the first American version of fascism, is closely linked to its European prototypes and is based on the systems evolved by Mussolini, Salazar, Pilsudsky, and Hitler. It is not, as some would have it, a personal caudillo dictatorship of the type that occurs periodically in Latin America. Vargas, who was forced into the war against the Axis when the pressure of foreign events stimulated internal resistance, still hopes to survive the peace. He cleverly utilizes the prestige accruing to him from Brazil's participation in the war. Each laudatory morsel from the United States is fully exploited; at one time all newspapers were ordered to feature excerpts from "The Time for Decision," in which Sumner Welles expressed ardent admiration for Vargas's regime. In April, 1944, however, popular pressure forced Vargas to announce that he would permit elections "with the objective of completing the existing institutions" (the constitution) of the Estado Novo.

In the following months pro-democratic organizations increased their efforts, and last week Vargas announced that the date of the elections would be set within the next ninety days. He also lifted the press censorship. The elected President is to be inducted thirty days after the polling and Congress sixty days after. The question of modifying the present constitution or creating a new one is left to the new Congress. Did Vargas at last recognize that democracy is the wave of the future, did he fear a people's revolution, or did he merely wish to strengthen his hand at the Mexico and San Francisco conferences? The next months will give the answer. But two facts are certain: once the lid is off, events will happen quickly in Brazil; and if Vargas is reelected, the elections will have been faked, for the people are overwhelmingly against him.

What Brazil would have been like tomorrow had the people accepted Vargas's April promise of elections "to complete present institutions" is revealed by a glance at Brazil today. Vargas can now annul any Supreme Court decision by simple decreto-lei, a power that he has already used and that is authorized by the 1937 constitution. Political parties have been dissolved and unions incorporated into the state. Union meetings and elections require police approval and the presence of police agents. Strikes are crimes against the state, and strikers are brought before the nine-year-old "Emergency" Tribunal of Justice. The quality of justice handed down by this court may be gauged by its recent sentencing of the journalist Jader de Carvalho to a seven-year prison term because in 1942 he made a public speech hailing the victory of Stalingrad and demanding amnesty for political prisoners. The rigid censorship in effect until last week was a throw-back to the era of Portuguese emperors who closed the colony's ports "to avoid contraband of merchandise and ideas."

But neither censorship nor police activity can control certain war-produced phenomena. In its September 2 and November 11 issues the conservative Revista da Associação Commercial revealed that the cost of living in Sao Paulo, Brazil's wealthiest region, had increased 210 per cent, while wages had risen only 40 per cent; the average monthly wage is 480 cruzeiros, or $24. Coffee, of which Sao Paulo is the world's largest producer, meat, rice, green vegetables, and eggs have increased 140, 125, 130, 161, and 199 per cent respectively. In northern Brazil, where 40 per cent of the population is concentrated, the cost of living has increased more than 300 per cent, while daily wages remain on the starvation level of 50 American cents. Vargas did not seek to remedy this situation by establishing a Brazilian OPA or by taxing excess war profits, which have soared from 100 to 1,500 per cent. His "solution" was inflation: money in circulation rose from 6,646 million cruzeiros in 1941 to 13,667 million in August, 1944. Vargas brought Brazil to the brink of economic catastrophe.

Economic crisis sharpened the political crisis, and police terror was the first answer to increasing popular protests. The people reacted quickly. The Uniao Democratica Nacional was organized to replace the Uniao Democratica Brasileiro, whose principal leaders, expelled by Vargas in 1939, are still in exile. The U. D. N. is "dedicated to bringing together all democratic currents of the country in a United Front with a program for the reestablishment of legal government by means of elections under the democratic constitution of 1934, which Vargas abolished in 1937." Established organizations such as the Order of Lawyers in Rio and Bahia asked for the immediate amnesty of political prisoners. A Congress of Industrialists in Sao Paulo voted unanimously for free elections, for "only with the guaranty of a legal and democratic regime" could the tranquillity necessary for economic development and for the attraction of North American capital and machinery be restored.

The smoldering struggle has now broken into the open. U. D. N. activity is spreading like wildfire, and the underground press is flooding the country with manifestoes, pamphlets, and satirical poems. Last December Vargas was greeted on a visit to Sao Paulo with clouds of paper floating down from the buildings bearing the words: "Down with the Estado Novo. Brazil demands free elections according to the constitution of 1934!" In January General Goes Monteiro, chief of the military group that promoted Vargas's 1937 coup d'état, publicly admitted the need for abolishing the Estado Novo constitution, asked for the election of a Constituent Assembly to write a democratic constitution, and called for a general amnesty.

The initiative had passed to the people. Vargas could not imprison the whole country or solve the situation by demoting the army officers who formed the democratic wing of the tenentistas, those popular heroes of the revolutions of 1922, 1924, and 1930. Neither could he accuse the U. D. N. of communism, for in it are represented the most responsible elements of the old liberal and conservative parties. The failure of increased restrictions and police activity to counteract the rising opposition to his regime finally forced Vargas to grant freedom of the press and free elections.

A firm declaration now by the Inter-American Conference adopting as a permanent common policy Mr. Stettinius's statement, "We do not want fascism in this continent," would greatly strengthen democratic forces inside Brazil in the struggle in which they must now engage to make Vargas's democratic words come true. Dictators generally die hard, but Brazilians are not in a mood to be betrayed again. Let the American republics take notice that if the Brazilian people are again frustrated in their hopes for a restoration of democracy, they may conclude that only by force will Vargas return to the people that which he took from them by force.

Behind the Enemy Line

BY ARGUS

THE question has been asked: what will happen to the German mark after the war? The answer depends on how much power the ruling authority in Germany will have and how this power is used. Even today the very existence of the mark rests on the single fact that an omnipotent government prevents it from being used freely as a standard of value in a free market. If it were permitted to find its own level, the mark would have already reached the last stage of depreciation. For the amount of money in the hands of the people is tremendous and in ridiculous disproportion to the existing quantity of goods. The amount of paper money—banknotes—has risen from 10 billion marks at the outbreak of the war to 50 billion marks at the beginning of this year. And the amount of money in commercial and savings-bank accounts has increased proportionally even more. Moreover, it should be noted that for both forms of money the increase is proceeding at an accelerating pace. The circulation of banknotes, for instance, was swelled by 5 billion in 1942, by 9 billion in 1943, and by 16 billion in 1944. Bank accounts and savings-bank deposits show a similarly accelerating rate of increase.

The reason for this acceleration is no mystery. In a recent speech Dr. Funk, Reich Minister of Economy, admitted that the costs of the war were steadily growing, and that only a diminishing percentage of the expenditure could be covered by taxation. Thus an ever-widening gap has to be filled by inflationary expedients. In consequence the amount of paper money and bank deposits at the disposal of the population is six or seven times greater than before the war. If this money could freely rush into a market catastrophically depleted of goods, its value would rapidly depreciate to nothing. Prices in terms of the mark would rise to dazzling heights, and peasants, manufacturers, and merchants would very soon refuse to sell their goods in exchange for currency.

By enforcing an iron control the government has so far prevented this money from breaking into the market. First it set up a rigid and all-inclusive rationing system which precludes any normal competition between the purchasers of commodities. Secondly, to prevent price rises within the framework of the rationed quantities, it maintains a draconic system of price control, applying to everything and extending to every stage of production and exchange. There still remained the danger that considerable quantities of goods might escape into a secret, illegal free market and that devastatingly destructive prices might develop on this black market. A system of meticulous physical control of the stocks, raw materials, output, purchases, and sales of every single peasant, manufacturer, and merchant has cut down the escape of goods into the black market to a negligible figure. The net result is that while the money is there, it is frustrated. Inflation exists, but the bulk of the inflated money is forcibly debarred from any use and any effect.

For maintaining the internal value of the currency this system has worked fairly well. But it presupposes the existence of an authority fully equipped with the instruments of power necessary for its operation. The enforcement machinery required is tremendous—millions of obedient controllers and supervisors, the assistance of the greater part of the population, each one observing his neighbor, spying and denouncing, and the use of revolting brutality and terror. When the Nazi rule collapses, this apparatus too will collapse. All the dams which have prevented the colossal amounts of existing money from rushing into the market will crumble. Prices will run wild in the practically empty market, and in a very short time the value of the currency will probably evaporate nearly to nothing. To prevent this, the authority succeeding the Nazis—be it the AMG or something else—would have to preserve or re-create their machinery of control. And this machinery would have to obtain the same degree of obedience and assistance, and quickly become as effective, as under the Nazis.

It is hard to believe that this could be accomplished. It is equally hard to believe that the American and British administrations would be very eager to revive Nazi enforcement methods. One must expect, therefore, that after the defeat the German currency will be headed toward rapid and nearly complete extinction. This will add to the chaos in the country, and for the middle classes, in particular, it will amount, as in 1923, to a terrific expropriation. Yet in spite of these very disagreeable prospects the Allied administration may arrive at the conclusion that the wisest course of action is to establish a brand-new currency and not bother at all about the old one. In time some rate of exchange between the old mark and the new currency will automatically develop, infinitesimal as the value of the old mark may be, and in the end the remnants of the old mark may possibly be exchanged into the new currency. This, incidentally, was the method the Germans themselves applied after their currency collapsed in 1923.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

A CORRESPONDENT was kind enough to send me a copy of "The Robe," which is by way of becoming the best seller of all time. A million copies have been printed, and the only limit on its further distribution is the available supply of paper.

I've read "The Robe," and I am impressed again with how hard "easy reading" can be. I've also read an article by its author, Lloyd C. Douglas, entitled Why I Wrote "The Robe," which appeared in the Cosmopolitan. A reprint of it is being distributed by Houghton Mifflin, publishers of the book.

I found Mr. Douglas's article more illuminating than his book. Here are the salient parts:

Stories about Jesus are always welcome.

Authors of successful stories about Jesus need not be persons of great reputation in the literary world. . . . A large, ready-made audience waits to read any new evaluation of the old story, provided it is told simply, sincerely, and with a careful avoidance of the controversial issues which have rent Christianity into 247 separate organizations.

Any time is the right time to do a novel about the Carpenter of Nazareth. Fifty million people in the United States think of Him as their Master.

It is true though that in a time of general calamity, when the customary reliances are in jeopardy if not altogether overthrown, thoughtful people are disposed to examine their religious foundations. . . . They long to recover the effortless faith of their childhood.

It was not easy to decide just how or where such a story should begin. . . . One day I had a letter inquiring whether there was a story about the robe that the Roman soldiers had gambled for while its Owner hung dying on His cross. Instantly it occurred to me that this robe was exactly the right instrument to use in a novel about the Master.

. . . I firmly believe that my use of modern speech had a great deal to do with the apparent readability of "The Robe."

I receive many letters from persons who do not understand that "The Robe" is a novel. . . . They complain that they have gone through the four Gospels with a microscope and have found no trace of the crippled girl, Miriam, who was given the marvelous voice. . . . And to all of these good people I reply: You must remember that "The Robe" is a novel. . . . It is just one man's attempt to draw a picture of Jesus and the people with whom He walked and talked in an age so very like ours that it wouldn't surprise me very much if—somewhere—in one of these wounded, weeping little countries, He should come again to renew His peace terms to a bewildered world.

Mr. Douglas's frank and business-like brochure on how to manufacture a best-seller includes many of the specifications he has used, but not all. For obvious reasons he leaves out some of the most important. In "The Robe" there are beautiful girls, handsome slaves, luxurious houses, royal palaces. There is romance and sex in a nice combination which titillates but never goes too far. He has mentioned the use of modern speech. He also tells his story in "modern" prose—"with Diana's warm and supple contours snuggled close against him" is a sample. The book has what is known as glamour and a very intricate, long-drawn-out plot.

On one level "The Robe" combines the "appeal" of the Little Colonel series, the perennial tale of boy meets girl, the historical novel, and a Hollywood spectacle in technicolor, which "The Robe" will soon turn into. In addition, there is the story of Jesus, which in the course of two thousand years has generated a store of emotion and interest that can be tapped by any writer who cares or dares to tap it. Finally there are the miracles, which here become matters of fact, not legend, for they are performed before the very eyes of the hero, his friends, and the reader.

What Mr. Douglas has devised and carried out, according to his own account, is a bold and quite unashamed exploitation of what the public is supposed to want. He plunges in where a more sensitive man, an artist, say, would fear to tread. He has no inhibitions about staging miracles. And he has no inhibitions, either, about making his Galileans just folks.

I find his miracles dull if only because they are stripped of wonder; his Galilean folks are movie folks; his Romans are drawn from the same Hollywood archives, despite his vaunted research.

And I doubt very much that the average reader is any more convinced than I am by the miracles, the stereotyped characters, the backless prose. Such books fall into the same category of "entertainment" as the general run of movies and the non-comic comics. All are designed to induce a pleasant state of suspended disbelief, to fill the time, to keep the mind, if not exactly occupied, at least passive—and to sell like hotcakes.

TO ME THE SIGNIFICANT THING about the popularity of such entertainment is its indication of the sort of fare in which presumably adult minds can be absorbed. The public taste, as defined by the purveyors of synthetic and sensational fiction, of which "The Robe" is a relatively high-toned example, has always seemed to me partly an invention. I've never felt, in other words, that the natural taste of the ordinary man was as bad as it is said to be by those who make a business of giving the public "what it wants." I still cling to this belief, but I'm beginning to feel that public taste is actually becoming as low as the hucksters of trash have always assumed it was. If so, it is partly because the hucksters have, over a long period, fed the public "what it wants" in overwhelming doses and have at the same time proclaimed more and more openly that their product is literature.

In this activity they have been getting, I might add, more and more cooperation from reviewers. One of the literary phenomena of the day is the review that asserts: This book is good in spite of the fact that it is bad. And vice-versa. For there is also the review, reserved for any book that taxes the mind, which says: This book is bad in spite of the fact that it is good.

BRIEFER COMMENT

Unfinished Debate

PROFESSOR FRANK KNIGHT, an economist, and Professor Thornton Merriam, a teacher of religion, carry on in "The Economic Order and Religion" (Harper, $3) a debate on the relevance of religion to economic life. Professor Knight believes that a democratic society requires impersonal standards of justice, to be arrived at rationally. The Christian ideal of love, in his opinion, is a much too sentimental and personal attitude toward economic and social issues. In this criticism he certainly scores off certain modern forms of sentimentalized religion, but he hardly deals adequately with the source of the will to be just to the neighbor, distinct from rational elaborations of standards of justice. Neither author is concerned with the problem of the relation of ultimate moral principles to relative and historical standards of morals, which is in a sense the crucial issue in any discussion of the relation of religion to social ethics. Knight wisely remarks that "absolutism toward principles and instrumentalism are twin or polar vices of modern intellectual life," but the question how to prevent pragmatism from degenerating into moral nihilism and how to prevent any high sense of moral responsibility from developing too absolute and fixed historical standards is not answered.

Professor Merriam challenges Knight's rather too vigorous laissez faire social philosophy and arrives at a greater emphasis upon social planning, but Knight may be right in suggesting that Merriam has not proved that his social philosophy follows naturally or necessarily from a Christian view of life. Certainly many Christians do not hold it and many atheists do.

The definitions of religion and Christianity are not sharp enough, and the analysis of the relation between ultimate beliefs and social philosophies not critical enough, to be of very great value.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Work in Progress

AN INTERESTING MISCELLANY of subjects is treated in a collection of essays by anthropologists and sociologists entitled "The Science of Man in the World Crisis," edited by Ralph Linton (Columbia University Press, $4). The discussions of the nature of culture, the existence of races, minority problems, colonial administration, the status and future of the American Indian, and associated themes contain some illuminating analysis and comment. As a whole, however, the collection falls short of meeting the expectations aroused not only by the ambitious title but by the much more modest editorial preface. If this is the best fruit frontier thinkers can harvest from their recent labors, they should be thanked for their honesty, restraint, and freedom from sensationalism. But one wonders a little why they didn't wait until they could bring back something of special significance. It is not made clear what "the science of man" is, or how there can be such a science as distinct from a scientific approach to specific human problems by cooperating scientists who care more about carrying solutions forward than about the "proper" limits of their professional discipline. And the "world crisis" remains just as dark and dread as before.

The news from the field of "race" indicates that anthropologists are not making new discoveries about races but are refining their concepts. It is no longer fashionable, and indeed it was never sensible, to say "there are no races." This was a non-sequitur from such truths as that there is no Jewish or Aryan race, that heredity takes place only along family lines, that races overlap in respect to certain features, that races have histories. The whole theoretical problem seems to be largely a matter of semantic clarification and distinction of meanings. It might be well to add a professional logician to the working company of anthropologists and sociologists.

SIDNEY HOOK

French Arms in America

"WE HAVE BEEN contemporaries and fellow-laborers in the cause of liberty, and we have lived together as brothers should do in harmonious friendship." With this quotation from a letter of Washington to Rochambeau, written in 1784, Stephen Bonsal opens and closes his beautifully written "When the French Were Here" (Doubleday, Doran, $3). This history of the French army which, together with the French navy, made Yorktown possible is a rare and happy combination of careful scholarship and fascinating narrative. Mr. Bonsal has followed the army from the time it assembled in Brest in the spring of 1780 until it embarked from New England ports late in 1782.

The descriptions of the siege of Yorktown are good, solid military history. The impressions of the French soldiers in a new country, as revealed in their diaries and letters, together with the reactions of the Americans to their new allies, constitute invaluable social history of the kind too seldom seen. Appraisals of Washington, Lafayette, Rochambeau, and a host of lesser figures, made by their contemporaries, are interesting and significant. The part played in our Revolution by intrigue and diplomacy is made more lucid. A large number of important but nearly forgotten incidents—such as the naval clash between Destouches and Graves off the Virginia capes in March, 1781, and the brilliant, reckless charge by Wayne which saved Lafayette at Green Spring—receive deserved notice. This small book covers a brief period in our history, but its importance far outreaches its span.

RALPH ADAMS BROWN

Facing East

FOR MOST AMERICANS Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor on December 7, 1941, is explainable only in terms of Japanese treachery. Few have any real understanding of the shortcomings in American policy during the crucial thirties which encouraged the Japanese in their belief that they were destined to dominate the Pacific. And in the absence of this understanding very few have a clear idea of how American Pacific policy should be shaped in the post-war period to prevent a repetition of the tragedy of recent years. In "America's Far Eastern Policy" (published by International Secretariat, Institute of Pacific Relations, distributed by the Macmillan Company, $3) T. A. Bisson presents an extraordinarily clear, unvarnished picture of how this country stirred up Japanese antagonism by verbal opposition to Nippon's pan-Asiatic aspirations while providing it with the basic war materials without which its aggressive program could not have been maintained. In this perspective Mr. Bisson considers the basic security problems which this country faces in the Pacific in the post-war period. Of particular significance is his analysis of the prospects for the regeneration of Japan through economic reforms that will strengthen the influence of the farmers and the wage-earning groups within the Japanese population.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

Four Explorers

NEVER WAS THERE such a cluttering of publishers' lists with rubbish as now in the case of books about Latin America. Yet the number of good books also constantly grows. The latest is "South America Called Them," by Victor Wolfgang von Hagen (Knopf, $3.75), which contains well-made accounts of the lives and principal Latin American explorations of four scientists. The first, and the one which I found most absorbing, is a study of the work of La Condamine, the eighteenth-century Frenchman whose expedition was undertaken to settle the dispute between the Newtonians and the Cassinians concerning the shape of the earth. The others are Humboldt, Darwin, and Richard Spruce, the botanist who, together with Wallace and Bates, laid the foundations of Amazonian naturalistic studies. The book also forms an admirable introduction to Southern Hemisphere geography, and because of its author's lively interest in the social life of the time, it will be of very great value to the historical student, especially the first section. The documentation is never less than adequate, and the use of it is responsible. There is an unfortunate tendency to push the story along with unnecessary violence, as in such a sentence as this, "When Humboldt wrote of the electric eels, all Europe gasped in astonishment." Nine-tenths of the book, though, is so absorbing that in these times it must be described as first-rate.

RALPH BATES

Lumber Workers

ABOUT HALF of "Lumber and Labor," by Vernon H. Jensen (Farrar and Rinehart, $3), is devoted to events prior to 1933, and the remainder is taken up with the growth and problems of unionism since the first Roosevelt Administration. While the early material is available elsewhere, the sections dealing with recent events contain much new information not available in monographic or book form. The chapters on the growth and internal difficulties of the unions are full of details on the rise of the new unions, the split and formation of two non-company unions, and the factional controversy within the International Woodworkers of America. Dr. Jensen glides over some of the differences within the C. I. O. union. Officers who were following the Communist anti-war line early in 1941 are euphemistically described as having "an anti-war philosophy." No effort is made to examine the reasons why the same officers were more conciliatory and tractable in the fall of 1941, or to indicate that their new attitude reflected a change in political view by certain union leaders, or that the change was influenced by non-union considerations. On the whole, the author has

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS

HERMAN MELVILLE: THE TRAGEDY OF MIND

By William Ellery Sedgwick

"Will, I believe, not merely take a high place in the canon of Melville criticism; it will be also valued as the expression of a sound type of criticism...I know no other study that achieves such unified excellence."

—Lewis Mumford, N. Y. Times Book Review. $2.75

HARVARD DICTIONARY OF MUSIC

By Willi Apel

"Rates as one of the finest books on music ever to reach print...I don't see how any person seriously interested in music can afford to let it go by." — Boston Herald. $6.00

IDEAS IN AMERICA

By Howard Mumford Jones. "A collection of essays and addresses. Thoroughly honest and readable and often exciting." — N. Y. Times Book Review. $3.00

EDUCATION FOR RESPONSIBLE LIVING

By Wallace B. Donham. "A most challenging and stimulating analysis of the modern university and its place in society... forthright in practical suggestions." — Chicago Sun. $3.00

THE FIRST LINCOLN CAMPAIGN

By Reinhard H. Luthin. "A scholarly study of an important campaign." — Chicago Tribune. $3.50

CHINA ENTERS THE MACHINE AGE

A Study of Labor in Chinese War Industry

By Kuo-heng Shih. "A substantial and most illuminating discussion of the general problem which China faces in changing from an agricultural to an industrialized country." — The Nation. $2.50

A CENTURY OF LATIN-AMERICAN THOUGHT

By W. Rex Crawford. "Finely done... an exciting and useful introduction to an area of inter-American interest largely unoccupied." — Saturday Review of Literature. $3.50

FREUD: MASTER AND FRIEND

By Hanns Sachs. "A warmly intimate portrait of Freud by a survivor of the early group of six close disciples." — Time. $2.50

HARVARD UNIVERSITY PRESS
CAMBRIDGE 38 MASSACHUSETTS

shown much diligence in gathering and assembling a large mass of material, and readers of these pages will be rewarded by much interesting information.

PHILIP TAFT

A Way of Peace

THE TECHNIQUES of psychology and anthropology have been applied to the study of an early and still actively functioning American Indian culture in an important study, "The Hopi Way," by Laura Thompson, an anthropologist, and Dr. Alice Joseph, a neuro-psychiatrist (University of Chicago, $3). The Hopi, a group of 3,500 American Indians living in the remote highlands of northern Arizona on a site they have occupied since about 1150, are one of the most ancient population groups of the American continent. Their name means the "peaceful people," and their intricately balanced organization is oriented toward peace. The methods by which the Hopi maintain a peaceful, democratic society, the gains the individual makes and the price he pays in accepting certain group restrictions which are at once both limiting and liberating are fully explored in this excellent little volume. An understanding of the institutions, types of relationship, and basic concepts that permeate the Hopi way can be highly suggestive to all persons concerned with the immediate and century-old problem of aggressive hostility in the Western world. Although the book is mainly confined to the presentation of its rich material and indulges in few generalizations, its total effect is to reaffirm the belief that democratic peace cannot be achieved merely by means of covenants between great powers. What is even more essential is the constant effort to that end of individuals in societies that are both sufficiently elastic and sufficiently firm to allow for social change and individual expression.

"The Hopi Way" has an introduction by John Collier, until recently Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and is illustrated with beautiful photographs. It is the first of a series of volumes resulting from a three-year collaboration between the Indian Service and the Committee on Human Development of the University of Chicago. VIRGINIA MISHNUN

Facts Only

DARRELL GARWOOD, the author of "Artist in Iowa," a life of Grant Wood (W. W. Norton, $3.50), refers to his subject at one point as the painter who knew more about farmers' overalls than any other painter in this country. This pretty well captures the tone of the biography.

In a book about a painter whose position is by no means unassailable it is not over-exacting to look for some positive evaluation of his work and some indication as to how his work is related to the sort of life he lived—at a level a little deeper than "there was a water can nearby, so that got into the painting too." But little is said about Wood as a painter that would not be just as revealing had he been a photographer. There are a few references to matters of technique that are more misleading than otherwise. The importance of Wood's technique as formed and affected by his outlook as a painter is largely disregarded. Granted that it is difficult to perceive which factors determine which brush strokes, it is none the less an effort to which a painter's biographer is committed. No information on which pictures sold for how much to whom can replace that.

Even more irritating than Mr. Garwood's shortcomings as the biographer of a painter is his consistent and bland incuriosity as the biographer of a man. Wood's protracted adolescence in his relations with women, the failure of his marriage, and the conflicts of his personality with other personalities at the university where he worked certainly deserved more extended treatment.

But if all you are looking for is the facts about Grant Wood, this book will do.

ARTHUR LIDOV

This short, factual book covers

China's

Military Power

Manpower

Agriculture

Industrial Raw Materials

Industrial Development

Transportation and Communication

Government and Social Organization

Place in the World of Tomorrow

CHINA among the POWERS

BY DAVID N. ROWE

$2.00 HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

Doctor and Patient

THROUGH ALL THE HISTORY of medicine, from Esculapius to Jean Hersholt, the ideal has been the humanist as physician; and there has always been a large enough minority of humanists in the profession to give the concept some reality. But latterly we have been rather self-conscious about them, assuring ourselves of their existence by means of movies, radio programs, novels, advertisements, biographies, and all the other modern vehicles of myth. For we are uneasily aware that the doctor who served his community as healer, confessor, and God the Father is becoming extinct. For one thing, the modern community is too heterogeneous to be comprehended by one man; the doctor knows his patients almost as little as they know each other. For another, the growth of medical knowledge has made the family practitioner inevitably dependent on the specialist; the doctor who prescribes for Johnny's cough is neither the one who delivered him nor the one who will remove his tonsils, and Johnny's parents wouldn't want it to be otherwise.

The modern system has obvious advantages. The paradox is that it is often less effective than the makeshift methods of the old horse-and-buggy doctor. An outstanding medical humanist, Dr. Henry B. Richardson, explores all the implications of this paradox in "Patients Have Families" (The Commonwealth Fund, $3). The main trouble, says Dr. Richardson, is that under modern conditions both patient and doctor tend to lose their identity as human beings, the one becoming merely a diseased organism and the other merely a technician; the doctor is not aware that a specific ailment may have social as well as physiological causes, and it doesn't occur to him to prescribe social treatment. Dr. Richardson calls on the physician to recognize his natural allies, the psychiatrist, the social case worker, and the community agencies, and coordinate his efforts with theirs. This takes some imagination; it won't appeal to the high priests of the American Medical Association, whose attitude toward social work would be less shocking if they were bartenders. However, only thus can the modern physician add to his own advantages those of the old-style doctor who brought his patients into the world and stayed with them for life.

J. MITCHELL MORSE

FICTION IN REVIEW

THERE has been a small spate of novels by newspaper correspondents. In recent weeks four have come my way—"The Troubled Midnight" by John Gunther (Harper, $2.50), "It's Always Tomorrow" by Robert St. John (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50), "Return to the Vineyard" by Mary Loos and Walter Duranty (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50), and "The Open City" by Shelley Smith Mydans (Doubleday, Doran, $2.50)—and they have started me wondering, among other things, why so much of a point has always been made of the inability of reporters to write fiction. For if by the ability to write a novel we mean simply the ability to compose a story with some kind of plot and characters, there is no evidence that newspapermen have any more difficulty than other mortals in achieving this questionable distinction; and if we mean something more, if we mean the ability to write a good novel, then it seems to me that the profession of the author is irrelevant: the incidence of creative talent in the journalist's trade is no more interesting or significant than the incidence of creative talent in any other field.

But on the other hand—and I am not being paradoxical—of the four novels I have been reading, two, Mr. Duranty's and Mr. St. John's, are worth discussing only because they are by newspaper people. That is, while Mrs. Mydans's novel and Mr. Gunther's are not good books, we pass this judgment quite without reference to the way their authors earn their livings; but we cannot read either Mr. Duranty's novel or Mr. St. John's without being struck by their lack of the very power which we look for in the trained journalistic mind—the power to understand the political events with which these authors have been professionally concerned.

INTIMATE friends of Gertrude Stein, aware of her indomitable courage and resourcefulness, were not at all surprised when she emerged unscathed from the Nazi occupation of France, with even her Picasso collection absolutely intact, and her poodle Basker wagging his tail contentedly at her heels. But Miss Stein had had her full share of troubles and excitement in the past four years, and it is this unbelievable period that she describes in full in this most graphic and revealing of all her books.

Gertrude Stein proved in her Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas that, when she wants to, she can write straightforward English that any average high-school student can understand. Wars I Have Seen, with a few very minor aberrations, is another such book. The first half, in fact, which conveys an impression that the author was more concerned with foraging food for her dogs than with the fate of democracy, struck this publisher as all too comprehensible. Before long, however, Miss Stein very obviously was caught up in the heroic exploits of the Maquis; her sense of Olympian detachment vanished in the excitement of a battle for liberation; the coming of the Americans gave her the thrill and supreme delight of her whole crowded life.

Bear in mind that this entire book was written in longhand under the very noses of the Nazis. After they were driven out of France, Alice Toklas typed the manuscript and Frank Gervasi, who moved in with General Patch's Seventh U. S. Army, brought it back with him to America. Wars I Have Seen is the on-the-spot story of what the common people of France endured from 1940 to September, 1944.

PRESIDENT, RANDOM HOUSE

WARS I HAVE SEEN

By GERTRUDE STEIN

$2.50, A RANDOM HOUSE BOOK

MOTION PICTURE

G. C. F. presents

MR. EMMANUELA Two Cities Films production made in London Released through United Artistsstarring FELIX AYLMER
with GRETA GYNT and WALTER RILLA
Brandt's GOTHAM B'way and 47th St.

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD PRODUCTIONS

"BELONGS ON THE MUST LIST."—*Encos, World-Telegram.UP IN CENTRAL PARKBook by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG
CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 59th Street, Matinee Wed. & Sat.

BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDEby HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER*MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th Street, West of B'way
Matinee Wednesday and Saturday 2:30

NOW, more than ever,
Red Cross blood plasma is needed to save the lives of thousands of wounded soldiers and sailors, fighting on half-a-dozen fronts around the world. Plasma can send a man back to the fighting lines to continue the battle . . . can send him back, eventually, to his loved ones. And every American can back up his men in the service quickly, easily, effectively. GIVE A PINT OF BLOOD TO SAVE A LIFE.
Call your Red Cross Blood Donor Center today, and make an appointment.

For instance, in "Return to the Vineyard," Miss Loos and Mr. Duranty deal with the theme of the resettlement of a devastated European village. It is a subject to which one would suppose that someone of Mr. Duranty's experience would bring a certain sense of political reality. Yet except for the single insight that it may be difficult, after this war, for the peasant populations of the liberated countries to get the aid of the occupation authorities in resuming their lives exactly as they were lived before the war, Mr. Duranty contributes not a jot to either our emotional or political comprehension of an enormous problem. "Return to the Vineyard" turns out to be a "Swiss Family Robinson" of post-war reconstruction climaxed with a ridiculous sequence of Hollywood gangsterism. Even its parable tone and poster-like characters are an offense against reality. Yet Mr. Duranty—I know nothing about Miss Loos—for years played a major role in forming American opinion about a very important reality indeed, the Soviet Union; it was through his eyes that millions of us saw the workings of the Five-Year Plan, the Moscow trials, the Russian purges. In the light of this sample of his thinking on the subject of post-war Europe, how are we now to evaluate Mr. Duranty's interpretations as a journalist?

The case of Mr. St. John is even worse; in fact, it is much worse. Miss Loos's and Mr. Duranty's novel has at least a serious point of departure, but "It's Always Tomorrow," the story of a newspaper correspondent who falls in love in Poland, loses his love but finds his soul in Hungary, Rumania, and France, and finds a new love and a strengthened soul in England, is from start to finish pointless, exhibitionistic, and vulgar. I have never read Mr. St. John's "From the Land of Silent People" or listened to his broadcasts; this first-person narrative is my only experience of his work. But I think it would be hard to convince me that the mind that deals in the primitive politics of "It's Always Tomorrow" could ever, under any circumstances, give me a political fact or interpretation that I could now trust.

It is difficult to explain why the novels of Mr. Gunther and Mrs. Mydans do not raise this question of their authors' professional authority. Perhaps it is merely because, in the case of Mrs. Mydans's "The Open City," the narrative stays so close to actual experience, and because, in the case of Mr. Gunther's "The Troubled Midnight," the pages of political discussion with which the trivial narrative is larded are sufficiently thoughtful to be reassuring. "The Troubled Midnight" is about the love-life of a young American Lead-Lease worker in Constantinople; its possible allegorical intention—the young woman chooses for her love among a Nazi, an Englishman, and an American—is not supported by its quality of fantasy. "The Open City" is an account of what it was like to be interned by the Japanese; it might much better have been told as simple fact than as such simple fiction. But although neither book is a very good act of the imagination, they still allow themselves to be estimated as acts of the imagination, not as evidence of a kind of professional inadequacy.

Quite apart from all this: for sufferers from late-winter gripe or other complaints which are alleviated by light novels, I can recommend "Miss Dilly Says No" by Theodore Pratt (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $2.50). DIANA TRILLING

Films

JAMES
AGEE

A GOOD movie might have been made from "The Picture of Dorian Gray." Albert Lewin's version is respectful, earnest, and, I am afraid, dead. Lowell Gilmore is close to the mark as Basil Hallward, who tries to be artist, Christian, and bourgeois all at the same time, and I very much like Angela Lansbury as Sibyl Vane. Some people are liable to laugh at her and to think of her as insipid, but I think she is touching and exact in her defenseless romanticism and in a special kind of short-lipped English beauty, appropriate to the period and to Sibyl's class, and evocative of milkmaids in eighteenth-century pornographic prints. In general, too, Mr. Lewin's modifications of the story and his outright inventions seem sensible, and I feel, sympathetically, that he has tried very hard to transfer the tone of the novel to the screen. Yet for all its oddity and outright weakness the novel—which I thank Mr. Lewin for causing me at last to read—is distinguished, wise, and frightening; whereas the movie is just a cultured horror picture, decorated with epigrams and an elaborate moral, and made with a sincere effort at good taste rather than with passion, immediacy, or imagination.

As Oscar Wilde's proxy, Lord Henry Wotton, George Sanders delivers the epigrams almost too expertly. They will doubtless panic the public they were intended to pulverize, as I gather Wilde's epigrams, and most other good ones, always have; but they sound too purely like the nervous merciless rattle of cellophane. In tone and pace that could be good; but it isn't good here, because the shallow clatter completely fails to reveal Sir Henry's boredom and melancholy or his stature as an intelligence and as a moralist. Within these limits I think Sanders very capable, but two better men for the role would have been Robert Morley and the late Laird Cregar; and I suspect Henry Daniell or Alan Mowbray might have done better, for that matter. Nobody can be blamed very severely for the failure to cast Dorian Gray adequately; the only proper actor I can think of is John Barrymore in his early twenties. I realize that Hurd Hatfield represents a most unusually hard try at good casting, and once cast he certainly tries as hard as the wrong man can; but it is sad, like watching an understudy fall short with the chance of a lifetime. My main over-all regret about the movie is its failure to reveal in these two characters the depth and force and meaning that are in each, and to develop between them the philosophical tension and the sense of irresistibly challenging, ambiguous moral vortex without which their story is just an ornately naive tract.

I wish somebody would take book lovers like Mr. Lewin aside and explain to them, once for all, that to read from the text of a novel—not to mention interior monologues—when people are performing on the screen, while it may elevate the literary tone of the production, which I doubt, certainly and inescapably plays hell with it as a movie. I also regret the choice of Ivan Albright—and his brother Szygzy too, if both are responsible—to work out Dorian's portrait in its later stages. I no longer loathe the work of the Albrights as I used to before I realized how innocent it is; but I can't see Dorian Gray, even at his ripe, as a cross between Ivan Albright and the Wild Man of Borneo. I can't see either why Dorian's sinning—aside from the harm he does others—should culminate in a couple of visits to a dive where an old man plays Chopin. I can understand least of all why Mr. Lewin and his associates passed up the best movie chance of all: to let the portrait change before your eyes, rather than bringing it on, changed, at set intervals. At the end, to be sure, it goes through a climactic welter and emerges in its original state. But Hays Office or no Hays Office, if the camera had kept steady watch over the painting while Dorian was off about his undistributable business, it could have put the audience through the whole thesaurus of evil, and scared them stiff into the bargain. Since practically nobody thinks it civilized, or in the interests of the common weal, to believe that there is such a thing as evil any more—in the bright lexicon of youth there are only war criminals, vitamin deficiencies, and similar social diseases which a little common sense will cure—this failure of opportunity is all the more to be regretted.

In Early Issues of The Nation

"The Young Jefferson"

by Claude Bowers

Reviewed by Lionel Trilling

Richard Wright's "Black Boy"

Reviewed by Henry A. Wallace

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE Monte Carlo Ballet Russe has returned to New York's City Center impressively strengthened in repertory and performance. The repertory, first of all, has been enriched by a number of the ballets of George Balanchine, whose inexhaustible invention and originality, imagination, and wit in his use of the dance medium make him the greatest of choreographers. Three of these ballets have been given thus far. On the opening night the company gave its first New York performance of "Ballet Imperial," in which the music of Tchaikovsky's Second (not First) Piano Concerto provides a basis for a grandiose evocation of the atmosphere and style of the St. Petersburg ballet of his period through a rich elaboration of its idiom, against an appropriate "imperial" backdrop of Dobujinsky. On the second night "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme," given in an unfinished state last fall, was presented with its choreography perfected and secure and flowing along with the Strauss music that it uses so well, the magnificently extravagant Berman costumes and scenery properly fitted, hung, and lighted, and all these elements adding up to one of the most delightful of dance comedies. And on the third night there was "Dansees Concertantes" again, in which, thinking in terms of bodies clothed in Berman's wonderful costumes and placed in front of his wonderful scenery, Balanchine realizes the dance impulses of Stravinsky's ugly musical soundtrack in movement that is something special even among the astoundingly original and beautiful things he has done.

As for performance, the company dances not only with engaging liveliness but with newly acquired security and precision; and when the work is properly cast the performance is first-rate. Thus, headed by Danilova and Franklin the company carries off the intricacies of "Dansees Concertantes" with brilliant perfection; and it achieves superb though not unflawed performances of "Ballet Imperial" with Moylan and Tallchief and of "Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme" with Moylan and Krassovska—the flaws being Magallanes's insufficient brilliance in the first, and Bliss's lack of Lazovsky's sharpness and force in the Indian Dance of the second. And there we come to the company's weakness—which is its lack of enough first-line dancers for all the important roles of the repertory. What the management does is to use its lesser dancers—Danielian, Magallanes, Bliss—in leading roles, and its stars—Krassovska, Franklin—in roles for which they are not suited. And the result is a "Swan Lake" with Danilova's sovereign performance, but flawed by the miscasting of Franklin, the gawky darting about and angular mining of Danielian; or an ineffective "Sylphides" with Krassovska, Boris, Etheridge, and Danielian—as compared with a "Gaîté Parisienne" with the brilliance and impact that it has from the fact that its leading roles are danced by the company's great dancers, Danilova, Franklin, and Lazovsky.

Nor should I fail to mention the orchestra—small in size, poor in quality—with which Balaban labors; and the particularly atrocious arrangement of the music of "Les Sylphides."

There is important news about books. Bernard Shaw's "London Music in 1888-1889" has been seen again in bookstores recently; and if you missed it when it was first published, don't miss it now; for the day-to-day happenings of London's musical world were the occasion for some of the most perceptive and readable writing that has ever been done about music. If it is public demand that has led Dodd, Mead to make the book available, I hope this demand will induce that company to issue the three volumes of "Music in London 1890-1994," which it has not even allowed to be imported from England.

Shaw's writing is for anyone who knows music from listening to it; if in addition you have the sort of knowledge that is acquired from study of music you will want one, if not both, of the latest volumes of Tovey's writings published by Oxford University Press; for Tovey is the one scholar whose investigations into the language, style, and form of music proceed from love of music and implement insight into it as an artistic communication, and therefore illuminate and enrich the reader's own experience of it as such a communication. You will certainly want the volume of "Musical Articles From the Encyclopedia Britannica" ($4), with Tovey's general article on music and his articles on melody, harmony, rhythm, and the various forms. And you may want also the volume of "Essays in Musical Analysis: Chamber Music" ($4), with his general article on chamber music (but not, regrettably, the article on Haydn's works) from Cobbett's Cyclopaedia, and his discussion of Bach's Clavierübung, Goldberg Variations, and Kunst der Fuge, Beethoven's Diabelli Variations, and some of the piano works of Haydn, Schumann, Chopin, and Brahms, in addition to discussions of a few works by Mozart, Schumann, and Brahms for piano and strings or winds.

Turner's book on Mozart has been seen in some stores marked down to $1.95; and if that means it is on its way out of print it is very bad news indeed; for the book contains some of the most penetrating and illuminating observations on Mozart's music that I have read. And it will not be replaced by Dr. Alfred Einstein's new "Mozart: His Character, His Work" (Oxford, $5), in which the scholar has assembled considerable factual material about Mozart and his music, some of it interesting, and the thinker has produced around this material a largely confused, pointless, pretentious gabble like that of Dr. Einstein's "Greatness in Music." The German scholars as compared with Tovey remind me of what someone I know said recently about Ernest Newman as compared with Turner—that Newman knew everything about music except what it is.

CONTRIBUTORS

ANITA BRENNER grew up in Mexico and has written several books about it, of which the most recent is "The Wind That Swept Mexico: The History of the Mexican Revolution 1910-1942," with 184 historical photographs assembled by George B. Leighton.

RAPHAEL LEMKIN was formerly a member of the International Office for Unification of Criminal Law and later head consultant to the Foreign Economic Administration. In this column on February 24 it was erroneously stated that he is now lecturing at the School of Military Government at Charlottesville, Virginia. He is no longer connected with the school.

EDWARD M. MAISEL was formerly director of the Service Men's and Veterans' Division of the National C. I. O. War Relief Committee and editor of the New Veteran.

MILTON BRACKER is a war correspondent for the New York Times.

JUDITH ROBINSON is the editor of News, a weekly journal of opinion, in Toronto.

SAMUEL WAINER was for seven years editor of Directives, a Rio de Janeiro weekly which has recently been suppressed.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, a contributing editor of The Nation, is professor of Christian Ethics at Union Theological Seminary and editor of Christianity and Crisis, a fortnightly journal of Christian opinion. His most recent book is "The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness." Among his other books are "The Nature and Destiny of Man" and "Christianity and Power Politics."

SIDNEY HOOK, chairman of the Department of Philosophy at New York University, is recognized as one of the leading exponents of logical empiricism. He is the author of "Reason, Social Myths, and Democracy" and "The Hero in History."

RALPH ADAMS BROWN is now an instructor in the Coast Guard Academy Preparatory School. He has written for the Yale Review, the Survey Graphic, the Christian Science Monitor, and other publications.

ARTHUR LIDOV is a young painter from Chicago.

Alcoholics

ARE

Sick People

ROBERT V. SELIGER, M.D.

Assistant Visiting Psychiatrist

JOHNS HOPKINS HOSPITAL

(An educational pocket-size monograph sent in a plain envelope.)

---

ALCOHOLISM PUBLICATIONS

2030 Park Avenue, Baltimore 17, Md.

Please send: ALCOHOLICS ARE SICK PEOPLE.

☐ copies $1.00 paper bound

☐ copies $2.00 cloth bound

Name.....

Address.....

BUY BONDS

Letters to the Editors

Conscription for Peace?

Dear Sirs: The proponents of peace-time conscription, and most of the critics as well, assume that the United States is a generous and peace-loving nation, working for all that is right and just in the world. But can the rest of the world afford any such assumption? If the United States demands the right to maintain a five-ocean navy and an army of some ten million men, including the trained reserves, will not the rest of the world be justified in looking at us as Public Enemy Number One of the world, and in taking economic and military measures to balance this threat to world peace? Will it not lead only to a new armament race? Will not a new armament race lead only to war?

Even the critics of peace-time conscription may hold that the attitude of the rest of the world is wrong, and that the United States will not use its armaments for aggressive purposes. Unfortunately for the peace of the world, the people of the United States are very apt to be wrong, and the rest of the world absolutely right.

There are many factors which indicate that the United States is almost certain to be the next nation to start out to conquer the world. This will be especially true if we have a huge army and navy to start with. There are many factors which indicate that the American industrialist who is credited with asking if we are seeking to destroy in Germany the very thing we are fighting to preserve at home may have been speaking as a prophet as far as the post-war United States is concerned. We are very apt to find ourselves in the same position following this war as Germany did prior to the present one. We are very apt to find that our failure to meet the domestic problems following the war will bring about a fascist dictatorship here in the United States. We did not fall so far short of going fascist in 1932 as most people would like to think. We had many of the elements here that would have given us fascism. Next time we may well be less successful in avoiding it.

I do not profess to say that cutting down the navy and army to the barest minimum will prevent us from becoming fascist. But it will help. It will also give the anti-fascist forces within this country a better chance to counteract it, and give the rest of the world the opportunity to prepare to meet this challenge.

When I read the title of the article by Mr. Nollen I thought that this might be the point of attack which he was going to make, for the really important thing is whether we build a peace-time army to promote world peace and security, or whether we build such an army to conquer the world.

CLARENCE ARMSTRONG
Baltimore, Md., February 26

A Chance for Negro Education

Dear Sirs: The bill introduced by Senators Hill of Alabama and Thomas of Utah to provide $300,000,000 for federal aid to education is a necessary and forward-looking measure because it will help to make our children better educated and better able to discharge their political duties as citizens and their economic duties as producers.

The Southern states tend to have the highest birth rate. Yet they have the lowest per capita income. Consequently they spend only about one-third as much per child for education, even for white children, as the national average. The bill would partially remedy this by providing that part of the federal funds should be distributed in greater proportion to those states where the income is less than the national average.

Negro children in most states which have separate schools get a still smaller sum for education because of racial discrimination. The bill would reduce this injustice by forbidding those states where there are separate schools to spend a smaller proportion of federal funds for the education of Negro children than the proportion of Negro children to the whole number of children. Otherwise the bill would provide no interference whatever with our tradition for the control of education.

In some states the proportion of men rejected in the draft for lack of a minimum education was from 7 per cent to 10 per cent. Since the proportion of Negroes rejected for this reason was higher than the proportion of whites in all the Southern states except Tennessee, it is obvious that the white man is forced to pay with blood for the anti-Negro prejudice which discriminates by denying to Negroes a fair proportion of the funds raised for education in some Southern states.

CONSUELO C. YOUNG,
N. A. A. C. P.

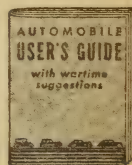

New York, February 13

Democracy in China

Dear Sirs: Like so many accounts of contemporary China, the conditions that the anonymous Chinese scholar (see The Nation for January 20) highlights need to be seen in a wider perspective than is usually accorded them.

The Kuomintang is indeed nearly all the bad things one wants to call it—reactionary, conservative, anti-foreign, anti-Communist, autocratic, fascist. Nevertheless (1) there are historical reasons for its having changed from its original role as a radical revolutionary party, one of which is that no nation can engage in total war without a good deal of regimentation; (2) the reign of the

FREE
to All
AUTO
owners

196 PRACTICAL SUGGESTIONS

that will help you to get

- better gas mileage
- longer tire life
- better performance
- lower upkeep costs

Get a FREE COPY from any General Motors dealer, or U.S. COASTAL RETAIL.

Customer Research Dept., Room 1817
GENERAL MOTORS, DETROIT 2, MICH.

Please send FREE COPY of new edition 64-page "Automobile User's Guide"—containing 196 practical suggestions on wartime operation.

Name..... please print

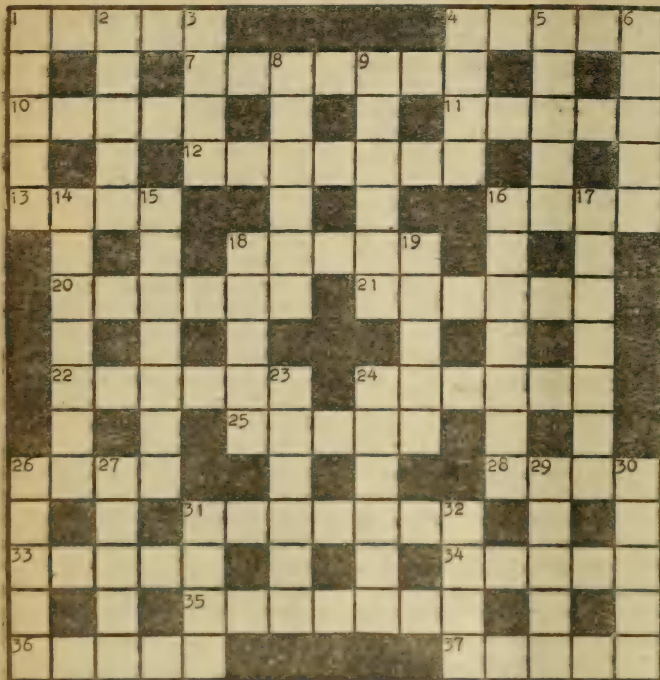

Address..... please print

City..... Zone..... State.....

Make of car.....
now owned..... year model.....

Crossword Puzzle No. 106

By JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 When lying is permissible to the upright
- 4 Giant, prince and astronomer, in Welsh tradition
- 7 Not down?
- 10 A nauseous but 'useful oil
- 11 This London Guildhall giant includes the other one
- 12 They come from a live set, these priests
- 13 Laws are broken to produce the tools
- 16 Alfred turns to tea and finds it tasteless
- 18 This Musketeer is a host in himself
- 20 Mariana said she was
- 21 Not a soul
- 22 He believed in smiting the enemy hip and thigh
- 24 Did he ever see the pie that was credited to him?
- 25 A Scot appears in this Italian opera
- 26 First brewed by the early Romans
- 28 Not founded to commemorate the Gunpowder Plot
- 31 Encircles
- 33 Go back in the bus
- 34 Vocalists have sung of this Robin
- 35 He owed much, had nothing, and gave the rest to the poor
- 36 A lightweight never seen in the ring
- 37 Devour (two words, 3 and 2)

DOWN

- 1 I am discovered in furnishing foreign capital
- 2 Mr. Ford

- 3 If you want things to come to you, try this
- 4 Theories which upset a spinster
- 5 Drink up in royal fashion
- 6 Gee, this is a spectacle!
- 8 The goal of wit
- 9 It has been said that the happiest one is that which has no great men
- 14 Dispute noisily
- 15 Slim with the end in the middle
- 16 Lion tied up in a fog, playing the giddy goat
- 17 What 21 hasn't got, either
- 18 Once the talk of thieves and vagabonds
- 19 It cannot be said that this composer didn't have a sou to start with
- 23 Bar with nuts on a tug
- 24 If you lose at this card game you may finish up in the middle!
- 26 Native bamboo mostly
- 27 Marbled ink
- 29 Here a punt is unsuitable
- 30 Sweet and soothing
- 31 Boy's, or a girl's, name
- 32 Blue photographic paper?

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 105
ACROSS: 1 UNDERSTAND; 6 CALL; 10 BAD FORM; 11 TRANSIT; 12 FIRECLAY; 13 REGAL; 15 EDGED; 17 MECHANISM; 19 HOME SITES; 21 ESTER; 23 SALOP; 24 PLODDING; 27 LININGS; 28 INVOICE; 29 HIBS; 30 PENNYROYAL.

DOWN: 1 UMBO; 2 DODGING; 3 RHONE; 4 TIME LIMIT; 5 NATTY; 7 ASSEGAI; 8 LITTLE MARY; 9 MARRIAGE; 15 MOTHUSLAH; 16 DUSTPANS; 18 CUSTODIAN; 20 MELANGE; 22 TANTIVY; 24 PASSE; 25 DIVER; 26 HELL.

Kuomintang is temporary, now that Chiang has promised constitutional government within the year and begun to bring some of the more prominent liberals into his Cabinet; and (3) there are many democratic movements going on in China outside its control.

One of these is democratic thinking. The Chinese cannot be regimented; like the Americans they can detect propaganda a mile off. Officialdom has been at its wits' end to keep up "spiritual mobilization," as the Japanese call it. There is no real indoctrination in Sanminism going on; students give the expected answers, meanwhile keeping their thoughts to themselves. This is not hypocrisy, simply prudence; the Oriental has a longer time-span than we; he can wait for freedom. Besides, there are ways of circumventing the rules—I have been doing it for twenty-five years. It is rather expected in China, which doesn't pay too much attention to the letter of the law. A greater danger than attempted "suppression of thought" in Chinese education is the fact that every student is supported by government bonuses and subsidies.

Finally, the fourth ideal of the New Life movement is not "modesty" but honor, to offset the theory of face-losing. Honor motivates apology, which the Orient has never practiced, preferring suicide (Japan) or resignation (China). No mistakes in China ever get repaired by the man who made them.

RODERICK SCOTT

Claremont, Cal., February 12

S. O. S.—S 101

Dear Sirs: Senator Taft of Ohio has introduced a bill which would create a permanent Fair Employment Practice Commission without enforcement powers. This is a severe blow to S 101, the bi-partisan FEPC bill introduced by Senators Chavez, Downey, Wagner, Murray, Capper, Langer, and Aiken, which has enforcement powers. S 101, drafted by a legal committee headed by Max Delson, counsel for the Workers' Defense League, is backed by every major progressive group.

Act now! Wire or write Senator Robert A. Taft, Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C., opposing his weak FEPC bill and urging him to withdraw it and to back S 101. Also urge your two Senators to work hard now for passage of S 101. Send their replies to us.

COMMITTEE ON DISCRIMINATION, WORKERS' DEFENSE LEAGUE
New York, February 11

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 17, 1945

NUMBER 11

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

289

EDITORIALS

Italian Mystery Thriller
Senatorial Trouble-Maker

291
292

ARTICLES

Fair Employment in Massachusetts?
by J. Mitchell Morse
Over the Rivers by Charles G. Bolté
It's Not the Clockwork by I. F. Stone
What Happened in Mexico? by Anita Brenner
10 Years Ago in The Nation
John Bull Looks for Customers by Keith Hutchison
Syria: Near East Cockpit by Michael Clark
In the Wind

293
294
295
297
298
299
301
303

POLITICAL WAR

V-Day and Revolution by J. Alvarez del Vayo

304

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Young Man Jefferson by Henry A. Wallace
Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall
Briefer Comment
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling
Art by Clement Greenberg
Films by James Agee

307
308
310
312
314
314

LETTERS TO EDITORS

315

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 107 by Jack Barrett

316

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARK

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

THIS IS A STORY STRAIGHT OUT OF BRAZIL'S recent pro-democratic somersault, when elections were announced and the tight Vargas press censorship was suddenly lifted. It seems that after General Eduardo Gómez visited the Minister of War to announce his intention to run for the presidency, certain Brazilian generals who had been most intimately associated with the dictatorship decided that the rules of military strategy demanded a change of front. General Goes Monteiro, chief of the General Staff and Vargas's right arm in the 1937 coup, was the first to embrace democracy. He sent a statement to the newspapers urging a return to normal constitutional government and the establishment of diplomatic relations with Russia. The Office of Censorship, part of the Department of Propaganda, immediately banned publication of the statement. Furious, Monteiro went to the Minister of War. It was the second time within forty-eight hours that the Minister had received a protesting general: first, the known anti-fascist Gómez; then the known fascist Monteiro. Wanting to avoid trouble, the Minister authorized the publication of the statement. News of the incident spread swiftly through the offices of the press. The liberal editors decided to be bold. One of them, just to explore the ground, prepared a strong anti-Vargas editorial and sent it to press without submitting it to censorship. The editors waited for their paper to be closed down. Nothing happened. So an inquiring reporter went to the Office of Censorship to see what was going on. He found the chief of the office in a rage. The Minister of War had gone over his head in the Monteiro case, and he no longer gave a hang what the press did. Twenty-four hours later, ignoring the censorship, the entire, pro-Allied and anti-Vargas press launched a campaign for the candidacy of Eduardo Gómez for the presidency of Brazil. Freedom of the press was a fact. Vargas evidently thought it best to accept the fact and put his signature to a solemn decree lifting the censorship.

✱

WE ARE GLAD THAT MR. MORGENTHAU IN HIS statement to the House Banking and Currency Committee on the Bretton Woods legislation emphasized the point that "our country has as much to gain, perhaps more, than any other" from the enactment of the monetary agreements. Propagandists inspired either by malice or ignorance, or both, have spread the idea that the proposals now before Congress are designed to subsidize foreign countries at our expense and were sold to our dull-witted Treasury officials by the machiavellian Lord Keynes. Actually, there is more truth in the charge of the British opposition to Bretton Woods that the scheme has been custom-built to American requirements and gives insufficient consideration to the problem of the debtor countries. Again, there is a notion that if Bretton Woods is dropped we shall return to pre-1914, or at least pre-1929, conditions in the foreign exchanges. Dean Acheson, Assistant Secretary of State, pointed out to the Banking and Currency Committee that the real alternative is the chaos that prevailed in the thirties. In the absence of a fund providing a cushion for currencies under pressure, many nations, he said, would be compelled to resort to "all the tricks" of economic warfare—multiple currencies, barter, dumping, quotas, exchange controls. As a creditor country, the United States would not find it easy to retaliate with the same weapons. With a large favorable trade balance we are not in a good position to use clearing arrangements, which would necessitate either reducing exports or increasing imports. Nor can we easily resort to currency depreciation: as the world is really on the "dollar standard" other countries would revise their exchange rates automatically. And, unless we cut loose from the gold standard altogether, we would have to raise our price for gold, encouraging mines the world over to increase production and pour the stuff in on us. Even bankers should know by now that it's not edible.

✱

WE ARE NOT IGNORING THE FACT THAT THE American Bankers Association has made provision for currency stabilization in its proposals for amending the Bretton Woods plan. While anxious to drop the International Monetary Fund the bankers have indorsed the International Bank and suggested a change in its articles so that it can make loans for stabilization purposes. We can understand the attraction of this scheme for the big financial interests. The International Bank is to operate mainly by guaranteeing loans made by private capital. A billion-dollar loan to Britain, guaranteed by an international institution, would be a very nice piece of business for Wall Street. The only difficulty is that Britain is determined not to borrow one dollar, let alone a billion, for stabilization. It takes the view that it is already sufficiently burdened by foreign debts and it is unwilling to increase the load except for projects which will earn the foreign exchange necessary to meet loan charges. Other countries with "soft" currencies are almost certain to follow the British lead. So the bankers' road to currency stabilization promises to prove a blind alley.

✱

THE ENTRY OF UNITED NATIONS TROOPS INTO Mandalay is the climax of one of the most brilliant campaigns in the war. For more than a year Chinese, American, Indian, and British forces have been pushing forward in a coordinated effort, in the face of seemingly insuperable natural obstacles, to clear the Japanese out of North Burma and the greater part of Central Burma. Although the campaign has received comparatively little newspaper space in this country, it has probably accounted for about as many Japanese as Admiral Nimitz's drive against the Pacific islands. And its full fruits are yet to be realized. A few days before Indian troops pushed into Mandalay a strong British armored and motorized column cut through the jungle to capture Meiktila and Thazi, thus cutting off a Japanese withdrawal into South Burma. Meanwhile the Chinese had pushed forward in the north to capture Lashio, former terminus of the Burma Road. The 50,000 Japanese in the Mandalay area were left the precarious prospect of withdrawing along mountain trails into Thailand, but as the Allies have complete mastery of the air not many of them are likely to escape. The success of the Burma campaign is important primarily because it raises the possibility of opening more direct supply lines into China. But it also represents a significant political setback for the Japanese, since it was in Burma that the Japanese originally enjoyed some success in obtaining active support from the native population. This support appears to have evaporated completely after three years' experience with co-prosperity.

✱

THERE'S A FINE OLD COLONIAL CUSTOM THAT the English have carried down through the centuries of stamping as "British" anything unclaimed by anybody else. It is undoubtedly meant as a compliment. Unfortunately, Australians, Canadians, New Zealanders, and South Africans—the ingrates—frequently fail to see it that way. Take this war. The combined war effort of the Commonwealth nations has been magnificent. But dispatches from fronts on which Commonwealth formations are engaged usually short-cut specific designation by reporting simply on "British" operations. Recently, much to British chagrin, the shoe was on the other foot. It so happened that at certain stages in the tough fighting at the northern extreme of the western front, a good proportion of the combat troops in the Canadian First Army under command of the Canadian General Crerar were from the United Kingdom. A question had to be raised in the House: "What, what, British serving in the Canadian army without proper recognition?" The official Canadian explanation of the outrage struck us as both dignified and sensible. It read: "Modern armies are not static in position. Divisions or other formations from other armies may be engaged with the Canadian army for varying periods, and similarly Canadian formations may in turn engage in operations under other than Canadian command. This is in keeping with the flexibility of modern warfare, which demands mobility of troops over wide areas. It must be remembered that the First Canadian Corps and other Canadian troops form a major part of the British Eighth Army in Italy." The statement might also have recalled that fully one-third of all air crew personnel under the British air command is Canadian, either in the squadrons of the R. C. A. F. or in the R. A. F. itself. From what we know of Canadians, they have no objection to serving alongside British forces or even having British forces serve under their command. Perhaps the issue will have to be settled once and for all by granting Britain dominion status!

✱

IN APPOINTING FRED M. VINSON AS FEDERAL Loan Administrator, William H. Davis as Director of Economic Stabilization, and George W. Taylor as chairman of the War Labor Board, President Roosevelt has done a good deal to improve his economic high command. All three men made enviable records in their previous positions. Judge Vinson has shown himself to be a man of courage and integrity, qualities which he will need in resisting the pressures of big business in his new post. His great popularity with Congress should prove an invaluable asset in the legislative storms that are bound to arise over the interpretation of post-war lending policy. Mr. Davis takes over as economic stabilizer at a particularly difficult period. Organized labor is intensifying its campaign against the Little Steel formula. The recent bull market in Wall Street reflects the opinion of financial circles that a mild inflation is already under way and a more drastic rise in prices cannot be long delayed. Mr. Davis's appointment and that of Mr. Taylor, who succeeds him as head of the War Labor Board, indicate that the Administration will continue to hew to the stabilization line. But it is probable that Davis will be somewhat more liberal than Vinson in authorizing "fringe" wage adjustments—most of which are non-inflationary in the sense that they do not justify an increase in the level of retail prices. The three appointments should go a long way toward assuring Congress, and the public, that economic affairs will be effectively handled during the crucial reconversion period.

✕

THE O'MAHONEY-KILGORE MAN-POWER BILL passed by the Senate was a far cry from the national-service act requested by the President at the urgent bidding of army and navy officials. And as it has little in common with the May-Bailey bill for "limited national service" passed by the House, it is difficult to foresee what sort of compromise measure is likely to be worked out by a House-Senate conference committee. The recent Allied triumphs on the eastern and western fronts, foreshadowing an early end to the European phase of the war, have undoubtedly dampened the enthusiasm of Congress for any kind of man-power bill. Few Congressmen appear to take seriously the Administration's argument that the need for man-power controls will be greatest after VE-Day, when it will be necessary to prevent employers and employees from carrying out their own private "reconversion" plans without regard for the requirements of the Japanese war. While the hour for a drastic national-service bill appears to have passed, it is to be hoped that the House-Senate conference will not let their differences over fundamental policy prevent the adoption of any measure at all. With all its faults, the O'Mahoney-Kilgore bill would serve a useful purpose in preventing labor hoarding and in giving teeth to the directives of the War Manpower Commission. There is much to be said for letting the WMC run the show, but it must have adequate power to carry out its program.

✕

IF THERE IS ANYTHING LESS ADMIRABLE THAN censorship, it is underhanded censorship like that indulged in by Paul Moss, who used his power over theater licenses in New York City to close down "Trio" because he disapproved of its theme—or was egged on by professional disapprovers of the sort of exposed by Wolcott Gibbs in the current New Yorker. Mayor LaGuardia, after having defended Moss with extremely illogical arguments, has now agreed to support legislation which would make it impossible for license commissioners to set up as commissioners of morals. This sensible ending doesn't help the producer of "Trio," of course. He is suing the Commissioner for $1,000,000. We hope he wins. We are in favor of any action that would set Moss back.

✕

WE'VE BEEN READING THE PAPERS AGAIN. Mexico's delegates in Chapultepec have introduced a charter for women of the Americas. "Women," says the preamble, "as individuals of the collectivity, are vital elements of life: first, as coproductive agents and, second, as the generic essence which is the building of human material from which new continents are made." . . . William C. Morland, Idaho Republican, took to the woods in 1932 because Hoover was defeated by Roosevelt. He stayed there until a week or so ago, when he was tracked down and arrested for pilfering supplies from ranger stations. He didn't know that Roosevelt was still President, and he hadn't heard that there was a war on. But then we didn't have any idea that we had been out of the woods for thirteen years. . . . "I have decided," Hitler is reported to have said, "to leave only ruins, rats, and epidemics to the Bolsheviks, Jews, and plutocrats." Obviously it should read:

Epidemics, ruins, and rats

To Bolsheviks, Jews, and plutocrats.

. . . A correspondent of the Herald Tribune has recalled what she describes as the "significant words" of the late Calvin Coolidge, uttered in an address February 23, 1926, in which he said: "Envy, malice, uncharitableness, class jealousies, race prejudices, and international enmities are not realities. They do not abide. They are only the fictions of unenlightened comprehension."

Italian Mystery Thriller

WHEN Mario Roatta walked out of the Virgilio Army Hospital in Rome he wrote the first chapter in a mystery thriller that is still unfinished. Nobody knows what the ending will be or exactly who the villain is; too many necessary clues are still hidden behind the blackout curtains of the Allied military censorship. Still, the facts already in hand are worth examining. They are suggestive if not conclusive.

Roatta is supposed to have been ill as the result of an automobile injury. (Was he really ill?) This was the reason given for his detention in the army hospital instead of in prison. Press reports stated that his wife had called on him about nine o'clock on the evening of his escape—long after visiting hours. (Why was she allowed to come at that time?) Then, it seems, "the lights went out for an hour." (Why?) At the end of an hour the lights came on, and, presto, the injured prisoner had disappeared through guards, locked gates, and over the high prison wall. (How?) He is still at large; the police are looking for him "with the help of the Allied authorities." (Where is Roatta hiding? Who is protecting him?)

Now let's go back a little. In any crime story the first things to do are to look for a motive and then figure out who had the best opportunity to do the deed.

Roatta was a wholesale murderer and terrorist and Marshal Badoglio's long-time chief of staff. He was on trial not only for his official conduct during the glorious days of the Ethiopian campaign and later in Spain and later still in Greece and Yugoslavia. He was on trial also for treasonable acts committed at the head of the S.I.M., the Fascist military intelligence service. After the 1943 armistice Badoglio had kept Roatta in this post with the full knowledge and approval of the British and American authorities. He was dropped only when both Yugoslavia and Greece, in the late autumn of 1943, demanded the right to try Roatta as a war criminal; he was charged among other things with the mass murder of hostages, including women and children.

Throughout the Fascist era in Italy Roatta was a favorite of the leading industrialists who maintained Mussolini in power and of the Black Shirt élite. They valued him because he knew leftist and liberal Italy and had no scruples about crushing opposition by blackmail, murder, and bribery.

When Badoglio came to power Roatta was obviously the man to handle the delicate job of shifting Italy from the losing to the winning side in the war without dislocating the social, financial, and industrial order established by fascism. This was what the British Tories wanted, too. But Count Sforza, as head of the purge commission, apparently took seriously the armistice provision that Italy be purged of Fascists. At any rate, he had Roatta arrested along with an underling, Colonel Santo Emanuele, and a number of lesser officers of the S.I.M.

These men quite naturally felt themselves betrayed. Had they not been faithful servants of the monarchy and the Marshal? Under examination they "squealed," and the evidence they gave, it is reliably reported, would, if made public, force a general purge of the whole Badoglio crew, the rich Fascist angels of banking and industry, including many men now working hand in glove with the new occupying authorities. It would have been a sharp defeat for Churchill and his policy in Italy and for the Allied military and political regime, a victory for the forces of the democratic left in Italy. The word went out that Roatta must not come to trial. Americans recently back from Italy have reported this without qualification. They do not know—or at least they have not told—who gave the order. But Roatta's escape saved both Fascist hold-overs and Allied officials from acute political embarrassment. The motive is there, not to be questioned; but many men share it.

As for the opportunity: The prisons under fascism were in the hands of Roatta's S.I.M. The Allied Commission had ordered the retention of a large proportion of the old guards and administrators on the ground that they were "experienced." Colonel Agrifoglio, who succeeded Roatta as chief of the S.I.M., was one of the S.I.M. gang from fascist days. Under such circumstances the necessary complicity of the authorities must have been easy to arrange.

Nor is this the first time a strategic disappearance has been arranged. Luigi Federzoni, ex-president of the Fascist Senate, skipped to Vatican City just before his purge trial was to begin. He is now in Portugal, and the report from Lisbon is that he arrived on an American plane. General Carboni, another S.I.M. chief who threatened to spill inconvenient facts, also disappeared; he has been variously reported in the United States, in England, and in the Portuguese embassy at Rome. It is even rumored that Badoglio himself spent some weeks in the British embassy—weeks that coincided with Count Sforza's last few weeks as head of the purge commission.

Meanwhile the Cabinet crisis that followed Roatta's escape and the riotous demonstration last week has ended for the moment with a decision that these events do not warrant the Cabinet's resignation. Instead it has decided upon "fundamental" reforms. The purge commission, diluted after the retirement of Sforza, has been reorganized and strengthened. And General Taddeo Orlando, another Roatta man, has been dismissed from his job as head of the Carabinieri.

This is the way things stand as we go to press: the mystery still unsolved; the Italian government shaken but holding on. One thing we are sure of is that things won't stand still for long. For the Italian people have shown that they will not forever stand being kicked around and sold out. They are sick of being ruled by left-over Fascists held in office by Allied officials; sick of seeing Fascist criminals protected by their fellows in office or by Allied intervention. The Roatta story isn't over—but enough has happened to show how the Italians feel about their present bosses.

Senatorial Trouble-Maker

SENATOR VANDENBERG'S latest speech indicated that he is almost certain to play a disruptive role at the San Francisco conference. He took as his starting-point in the Senate a statement on Poland made by Foreign Secretary Eden in the Commons, but the Senator from Michigan characteristically stressed only one side of that Eden "warning." "It is imperative," the British Foreign Secretary has declared, "both that the Lublin administration should take no measures against Poles merely because they do not recognize the authority and that such Poles should cease active resistance to local authorities which endangers the line of communications of the advancing Russian armies." Though Senator Vandenberg began by saying "both these warnings are imperative," he made no further reference to the second. Yet judging from the anti-Soviet propaganda and activities of Polish émigrés in London and Polish-American groups in this country, it is not difficult to imagine that the Lublin regime must be confronted by similar activities at home. Abroad the Poles have become the principal instrument on which rest German hopes for splitting the United Nations. The Copperhead press, which slyly apologized for Nazi aggression, is now weeping crocodile tears over "poor Poland," and under cover of his new "conversion" to international cooperation Vandenberg is encouraging Polish intransigence.

To suggest, as Vandenberg did, that the Yalta settlement on Poland "shall pass in full review at the final peace table," is to strike at the very basis of Allied unity. The support given by Kerensky and other anti-Soviet Russian sources abroad to Moscow's insistence on the Curzon line indicates how deeply Russians, irrespective of politics, feel about this issue. In their eyes the land east of the Curzon line was wrongfully taken from Russia at a time when it had been weakened by war and revolution, and taken from it in defiance of a ruling made by a British diplomat who was certainly no sympathizer with Bolshevism. Polish treatment of the Ukrainian people in that territory, once the subject of a sensational exposé by the Manchester Guardian, did not help to reconcile them to Polish overlordship. It may be added that the White Russians and the Jews often suffered the same kind of treatment. If Senator Vandenberg is concerned with "basic justice," as he says he is, he might well consider how much "basic justice" there would have been in a decision which returned to Poland this territory in which the Poles are and were a minority. It would have pleased the Poles, but would it have been just to the White Russians and the Ukrainians? In pursuit of that same "basic justice," Senator Vandenberg might also ask why the Polish government in exile never offered to return the Teschen area, which was Poland's share of the loot in the Nazi dismemberment of Czechoslovakia.

Anyone who tries to disentangle the historical rights and wrongs, the mingled ethnic populations, the equities of territorial allocation in Eastern Europe will soon see the impossibility of any solution that will seem fair and just to every group involved. In our own opinion the majority of the people east of the Curzon line will be better off in the Soviet Union than they were in Poland. The non-Polish peoples will not suffer racial discrimination—and neither for that matter will the Poles—and the peasants will certainly have greater opportunity than they had in the backward and landlord-ridden Polish state.

These considerations aside, the fact is that the Russians feel that this territory is justly theirs and necessary to their security. They will not give it up, and they would fight to retain it. This is a fact we must recognize. We must either accept it as the sine qua non of Allied unity or drift into a state of hostility toward an ally over lands the Poles themselves seized by force after the last war. The choice between those two courses was made long ago by the responsible leaders of the British and American peoples. The Poles would be well advised to accept it as a fact and to reconstruct their national life on that basis. No change can be made in those arrangements without a third world war. Therefore, those who suggest, as Vandenberg does, that the Polish settlement be revised are heading us away from world peace and toward a new catastrophe. Is this to be Vandenberg's line at San Francisco?

COMING IN The NATION

LIN YUTANG: Reply to Edgar Snow

JACQUES MARITAIN: The Faith Behind Democracy

CHARLES G. BOLTE: A Veteran Looks at Peace-Time Conscription

CHARLES ABRAMS: The Walls of Stuyvesant Town

Fair Employment in Massachusetts?

BY J. MITCHELL MORSE

Boston, March 7

THE Massachusetts Legislature's Committee on State Administration held a hearing today on legislation to outlaw racial and religious discrimination in employment. By an unaccountable lack of coordination the liberal groups backing such legislation had allowed seven bills to be presented instead of one, and at 10:30 this morning, when the hearing was scheduled to begin, they had not yet agreed on a united attack.

Fortunately, the committee was tied up elsewhere until noon. The eight hundred spectators were restless, but the witnesses for the C.I.O., the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and other interested groups improved the time by getting together on a program. When the hearing finally got under way witness after witness announced that his organization would support any one of the seven bills or any new synthesis that might be worked out. The legislators who came in to record themselves for the legislation followed suit. The committee will most probably have to write a new bill, and in the process differences can be ironed out.

The seven bills differ only on matters of administrative detail; the one serious point of disagreement was eliminated before the hearing started. The Massachusetts C.I.O. and the New England division of the American Jewish Congress, sponsoring identical bills, had made a deal for the support of the American Federation of Labor by exempting trade unions from the provisions of their bills. This would have allowed the A.F. of L. to continue its discrimination against Negroes. But the A. F. of L. didn't deliver, and its lack of support will probably turn out to be a good thing after all; for this morning the bills were amended to include unions.

The most sensational development of the day was a strong statement by Richard J. Cushing, Catholic Archbishop of Massachusetts, to the effect that he favored any bill that would outlaw the anti-Christian practice of discrimination. Similar statements were made by Henry K. Sherrill and Lewis O. Hartman, respectively the Episcopalian and Methodist Bishops of Massachusetts; Frank Jennings, executive secretary of the Massachusetts Council of Churches; the Rev. Kenneth Hughes, a leading Negro minister of Cambridge; Father John S. Sexton, editor of the Pilot, the official Catholic archdiocesan weekly; Emory Stevens Bucke, editor of Zion's Herald, an independent Methodist weekly, and Rabbi Joshua Liebman, of Temple Israel, Boston. Oddly enough, the Rabbinical Council was unable to agree on an official statement; Rabbi Liebman spoke only for himself.

No organized opposition is yet apparent. A few seedy-looking Christian Fronters circulated petitions outside the statehouse, but if it occurred to any of them to attend the hearing they held their peace. Backers of the legislation think the really effective opposition will take the form of private pressure on individual legislators by organizations which legislators are accustomed to regard with respect, if not with awe.

The committee itself was neither too friendly nor too bright. In questioning the labor witnesses several members made objections that drew shouts of laughter from the audience, and the chairman warned against "spontaneous outbursts." One said he didn't think questions as to race and religion on employment application blanks were intended for purposes of discrimination; another asked, "If an employer doesn't know his employees' religion, and one of them gets a heart attack, how will he know whether to call a rabbi or a priest?" The more astute objectors asked if it wouldn't be better to wait one or two years and see how the New York law works out, or to submit the Massachusetts bill to a referendum. I was reminded of Browning's Count Guido Franceschini:

—How, ready enough to rise at the right time,
I still could recognize no time mature.

But the committeemen's state of mind is simpler than that. From the hostile and badgering manner in which they put their questions it is obvious that they just don't want to outlaw discrimination, now or ever. Fortunately, they are on the defensive. The hearing will be resumed Tuesday, March 13.

Over the Rivers

BY CHARLES G. BOLTE

THE squeeze is now put on Germany hard, with the establishment of Allied bridgeheads on the Berlin side of both the Oder and the Rhine. The two great barriers of east and west have been breached; the Allied generals have a firm hold on the initiative; and the German high command has lost in a single week its two remaining chances of winning major delays in which it might have improvised some desperate measures of defense.

Withal, the only thing to be said about when the war will end in Europe is just what could have been said at any time in the last six months: it may be tomorrow and it may not be for weeks. After the way the Rhine was crossed, it is pretty clear that anything can happen in these closing phases of the war against Germany. And after the way the Germans rallied to make counter-attacks upon the bridgehead, it is also pretty clear that "anything" will not be enough to finish the Wehrmacht: everything will have to happen to it. Therefore the chances are that these crossings of the Rhine and the Oder, important though they are in saving lives and time and in embarrassing the German high command, have only brought us appreciably closer to victory; they have not established victory as an event of the next moment.

When this is said, one must admit that one would not like to be in the shoes of the German commander on either the eastern or the western front. Each heads a sadly battered force, patched together out of odd lots of troops, scrambled divisional elements, and ill-trained over-age Volksstürmers of dubious quality. They are short of armor and growing progressively shorter of gasoline, what with the repeated air attacks on refineries; yet they must keep their striking forces mobile so as to meet new threats in unexpected quarters—as when the Americans showed up on the wrong side of the Rhine fifty miles south of where they were expected. They almost entirely lack air support, not only for cover and counter-attack but for vital reconnaissance; so that they are, as it were, half-blind. And they face troops numerically far superior, backed by fresh reinforcements, enjoying plenty of armor and superlative air support, led by commanders who can dictate the time and place of every battle on terms most advantageous to themselves, and with their morale boosted sky high by the apparent closeness of victory.

The manner of the Rhine crossing must have been an added fillip to morale on both sides of the Reich, although hardly so within it. It is a scenario fit only for a Grade B movie: the rapid advance of the armored patrol through the quiet Rhine country above Remagen, the sighting of the great railroad bridge still standing, the hasty request for permission to cross passing up through channels, the lone and small explosion as the patrol went across, the pulling off of the detonators, the fanning out on the other side against meager opposition, the patrol leader's happy bride saying in New York that she was surprised her lieutenant could even find the Rhine because "he never could find anything at home."

These things are ordered better in Hollywood Grade A pictures: there the bridge would have been at Cologne or Düsseldorf. It is of incomparable advantage to have the bridge, and the fact that it was unblown and nearly unguarded is deeply significant of breakdown in the efficiency of the Wehrmacht; nevertheless, this is not the best place to cross the Rhine. Eisenhower's main strength is concentrated to the north, opposite the Ruhr, where lie industrial targets of great strategic value, as well as the beginnings of the wide, flat North German plain stretching toward Berlin. In the north is tank country, ideal for encirclement and pursuit; behind the Remagen bridgehead lie hills, woods, and no targets of great importance. On the other hand, it is probably fair to say that the seizing of the bridge saved a division in Allied casualties; and if the Allies win the race to pile up troops and guns inside the bridgehead for a breakout before the Germans move down troops and guns to smash it in, the fruits of a flanking sweep down the Rhine's east bank through Siegburg toward the Ruhr, or even farther east toward Kassel, are potentially great.

In any case, the forced transference of troops from the Düsseldorf-Wesel sector to contain the bridgehead will make a crossing in the north far less costly, and such a crossing—or crossings—with the British Second Army and the First Airborne Army not yet committed, is distinctly probable.

Meanwhile, the big Russian drive for Berlin seems to have got under way, after a month in which the flanks of Zhukov's dangerous salient were rolled out. With the enemy's Baltic front virtually eliminated and Danzig and Stettin invested, the Red Army points toward Berlin from a nearly straight line on the Oder-Neisse. From this firm base one of the last great battles of the European war will be fought; and its inevitable outcome will spell at least the beginning of the end of organized German resistance, for without Berlin the already shaky internal administration of the Reich will collapse.

It's Not the Clockwork

BY I. F. STONE

Washington, March 8

IN FREDERICK L. SCHUMAN'S apocalyptic "Europe on the Eve," there is a quotation from Arnold J. Toynbee that comes to mind in considering the voting arrangements agreed upon for the new international security organization. "The British electorate of this generation," Toynbee wrote in 1935, "were the children of an age in which a ci-devant Christian society had come to believe that its talent for clockwork—institutional as well as metallic—could dispense it from the need of holding convictions and of summoning up the courage to act upon them when the consequences of such action were likely to be unpleasant." Despite the wise and thoughtful position taken by such great organs of conservative opinion as the New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune, discussion of the new security organization is likely to focus on the voting arrangements, on the "clockwork," in a kind of naive and indolent reliance on the magic of formula. Preliminary rumblings from the Senate, as in the extraordinarily woozy speech made by Bushfield of South Dakota Tuesday, indicate that the obstructionist and the perfectionist will find this their happest hunting ground.

It may serve to clear the air of pending obfuscation if certain facts are made clear at the outset. The first is that the original proposals for Dumbarton Oaks, as put forward privately by President Roosevelt to the British and Russians last June, called for unanimity by the great powers whenever sanctions were to be applied against aggression. This veto against the use of force to be enjoyed by any one of the great powers flows in the sphere of theory from the concept of sovereignty; a sovereign power cannot be forced into war without its consent. More practically, in the sphere of politics, this veto reflected past experience with the Senate in the League and World Court fights. No proposal which would commit this country to military action without its consent stands a ghost of a chance in the Senate. Even before the meetings at Dumbarton Oaks, this principle of unanimity was accepted by the British, the Russians, and the Chinese.

So far as the great powers are concerned, the new voting arrangements are those of an association of sovereign nations, in the full sense of that term so sacred to the Senate, and not of a super-state. So far as the smaller powers are concerned, Dumbarton Oaks marks a first, though still vague and tentative, step toward a world order. The League of Nations operated, like the old Polish Diet, on the principle of unanimity; any power, however small, could block action by it. The new setup, still far from satisfactory, requires unanimous action by the five major powers which will occupy permanent seats on the proposed eleven-man Security Council and two of the six lesser powers to be elected to the Council by the Assembly of all the United Nations. Here it seems that the Russians, fearful of delays, were for action on the unanimous vote of the Big Five and that Mr. Roosevelt prevailed upon them to agree to add two votes by smaller powers. This may some day prove an additional clog on action, but it is certainly better than the voting arrangements of the League.

At Dumbarton Oaks the question arose as to what would happen if one of the great powers were itself accused of aggression. Would it have the right to veto action against itself? In the League an accused member was not allowed to vote on its own case. The Chinese seem to have been strongly opposed to giving an accused great power the right to veto action against itself. This was also the American position. The British position was not made public. The White Paper on Dumbarton Oaks does not even mention the problem. The one correspondent who was able to get real news out of Dumbarton Oaks, James B. Reston of the New York Times, reported on September 8 that the British "make clear that the whole success of the League will depend on the 'trust and confidence and sincerity of purpose of the four great powers' [this was before the decision to admit France as a fifth], and they seem to indicate that in dealing with the problem of aggression by one of the permanent members, there is a limit beyond which the machinery of the proposed league cannot go." The Russians were insistent on retaining their right to veto action against themselves, and the best information I can obtain is that they were adamant at Yalta on two points—(1) retaining the veto and (2) barring any further expansion of the membership of the Security Council, which they fear may become a debating society if it grows too large.

The reasons for the Soviet position were reflected in another Reston dispatch of September 29, which bore the earmarks of an "off-the-record" talk with some Soviet official. "Soviet Russia," Reston reported, "is eager to cooperate with the United Nations in a system of collective security, but she has not yet got over her fear that the other great powers may try to turn a proposed league of nations into a sort of capitalist alliance against her. . . . Soviet Russia still remembers that . . . while the League never seemed to be able to get the necessary 'unanimity' to take action against Germany or Japan, it was able to get the necessary support to ease Soviet Russia out of the League at the time of the first Finnish war. Furthermore, the Soviet officials cannot forget that, even as recently as late 1939 and early 1940, the British and French had prepared an expeditionary force to send to the aid of Finland against her . . . 'the capitalist bogey' in Russia is still as strong as 'the Communist bogey' in the West."

The few smaller powers which had already expressed an opinion on Dumbarton Oaks before these voting arrangements were made public all opposed the grant of veto powers to one of the Big Five in a case where it was itself accused. A possible compromise was foreshadowed by L. B. Pearson, the Canadian ambassador to the United States, in a speech at Winnipeg last December 27. "In any circumstances," Pearson said, "everything depends on the close and friendly co-operation of the great powers. The right of veto, in itself, is of no great importance. If it doesn't exist, and action is taken by a majority against a great power, then the organization may go down before the threat of another world war. If it is granted, without limitation, and is used by a great power to prevent the organization even considering a dispute to which that power is a party, then the organization becomes almost a farce, and the non-veto powers would probably not consider it worth preserving" (my italics). The compromise achieved by the President at Yalta permits the Security Council to hear a case against a great power without its consent and to do what it can to bring about a peaceful settlement. But it permits any great power to veto sanctions or military action in a case in which it is itself accused.

This has already been used to impute sinister designs to the Soviet Union and has furnished ammunition to the Soviet-baiters in Congress and out. It may be useful to recall that the compromise accepted by the Soviet Union goes considerably beyond what the Senate of the United States has been willing to accept in the past. One of the points which the Security Council can decide without the consent of the accused great power is "whether the legal aspect of the case should be referred to the court for advice." The court in question is the proposed new international court of justice which is to be part of the new security organization. The terms of the Dumbarton Oaks agreement provide that the statute of this court shall either be the statute of the Permanent Court of International Justice, the so-called World Court, or a new statute based on it. The Dumbarton Oaks agreement also provides that "all members of the organization shall ipso facto be parties to the statute of the international court of justice."

When the question of our adherence to the World Court was before the Senate in 1935, one of the fears was that the court might consider a case against the United States without our permission. This was reflected in the Vandenberg "reservation" put forward at that time. The late Senator Norris sought to make this reservation stronger. He insisted that as a condition of our adherence the World Court be forbidden to hear any case against the United States unless the Senate had first, by a two-thirds' vote, given its consent. This strict veto was demanded, not against sanctions, military or economic, but against the peaceful adjudication of an international dispute to which the United States was a party. The recollection of this may serve to make us a little less pharisaical about the Soviet position.

Had the Soviet Union not insisted on the retention of its veto against sanctions in complaints against itself, the Senate might very well have done so. It is not difficult to imagine Senatorial oratory on the threat of foreign armed interference in the event of a complaint by a Latin American country against the United States. The universal tendency seems to be to deny a veto to others but reserve one to oneself. Thus while the Dutch in their own official "Suggestions" on Dumbarton Oaks oppose the idea of allowing a great power to veto military action against itself, they want to retain the right to decide whether to join or not to join in sanctions in any dispute of this kind. This, to quote a famous comic-strip character who may be little known to our more erudite readers, is the "Let's you and him fight" attitude of Popeye's friend, the tireless moocher, Mr. Wimpy. Bushfield's is even simpler, a monumental piece of national egotism. His position seems to be that other powers should be governed by majority rule—while we should retain a veto against action of any kind. The real answer, of course, is that without unity on the part of the great powers, the new organization and the world with it are doomed to a new world war anyway. It is on the growth of better mutual understanding, on the willingness of the peoples of the major powers to see each other's point of view and to make the necessary adjustments and compromises, that security depends. Not on clock-work.

DISAPPROVING EYE

What Happened in Mexico

BY ANITA BRENNER

Mexico City, March 8

AT THE closing sessions of the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace, the twenty nations which had sought a formula on Argentina discarded the "having wonderful time, wish you were here" message favored by many at the beginning for a longer statement. The Argentine flag had been included in the decorations because, said the gentleman in charge of protocol, "We feel Argentina will be here with us before this conference ends." But obviously he had not consulted Mr. Stettinius. Even delegates from countries close enough to Argentina to fear its armaments favored hands off and thought the Argentine people should be left to handle their militarists themselves.

The rub, or as Latin Americans put it, the "neuralgic point," was that two issues not directly connected with the war had got tangled up with the Argentine government's equivocal behavior in regard to the Nazis. The first was an issue that for many years has disturbed relations between the United States and Latin American countries—whether granting or withholding recognition should be used to exert pressure on de facto governments. The second threatens the peace of some of our closest collaborators in this hemisphere—what price democracy? In Latin America as in the United States most people seem to believe that a victory for the Allies will by itself bring a victory for democracy, and our own propaganda in this hemisphere has certainly underscored this idea. Embarrassingly for us, however, in many American countries belligerence in the war is tied up with the notion of fighting immediately against tyranny at home.

Under the nimble generalship of Padilla, Berle, Rockefeller, and Messersmith, all speaking Spanish, these two most delicate questions were disentangled from the point the United States wished to press—namely, that we are all in the anti-Axis fight and the Argentine boys are disturbing our security by trafficking with the enemy. Since no American government could balk openly at this, the wish was expressed—wrapped in flowers, condolences, and regrets—that the Argentine nation would put itself in a position to become one of the United Nations, and not just on paper, either.

Very likely this can happen even if the Perón crew manage to engineer the announced Argentinian elections in their favor. But even as an ally Argentina can continue trafficking with the enemy through its main conduit, the Franco government, as long as the United States and other American governments, each for its own reasons, maintain friendly diplomatic relations with the Spanish dictator. No doubt the solution to that problem will be found in some clever device for enlisting Franco's Spain also as one of the United Nations.

The pronouncement on Argentina came bang at the very end of two weeks of deliberation on other matters. Since it was debated by the Foreign Ministers behind closed doors I cannot report on which negotiator argued for what. However, there was no secrecy in the discussion of the 287 proposals, telescoped into 60, that went through the democratic conference mill, and all agreements reached through this process were evidently genuine. Moreover, since they are healthily out in the open, they are susceptible to further friendly work on them. This, more than any resounding document, is the real achievement of the conference, and it is a truly momentous one.

The fundamental difference between the United States and the Latin American position was that we think first of the war and view most matters from that angle, whereas Latin America thinks first of national security. In page after page of objections to Dumbarton Oaks and in other statements the Latin Americans demanded that the political and territorial integrity of every nation, however small, be guaranteed. This was assured, in substance, by the two principal documents of the conference, the Act of Chapultepec and the Declaration of Mexico. The United States delegation, and American opinion generally, take them to mean that at last Latin America fears us no more; Latin America sees in them a strong pledge from us against interference of any kind in its affairs. But at any rate they were signed in mutual happiness, though how effective Chapultepec will be in inter-American clashes remains to be settled, alas, by the wider decisions to be taken at San Francisco.

The divergent voices of the United States and Latin America on the war and peace reshaped many proposals, altering some to dismal before-and-after exhibits. Haiti, for instance, proposed a strong-toothed agreement binding the Americas against racial or religious discrimination, on the ground that such discrimination and all propaganda for it are anti-scientific, anti-Christian, and fascist. As passed, the agreement merely remarks that racial and religious discrimination are indeed anti-scientific and un-Christian, and will every nation please do the best it can about them. A resolution binding the signatories to fight the activities of agents of totalitarian countries and their satellites was passed with "totalitarian" blue-penciled and "Axis" substituted, thus becoming a military measure rather than the broader and longer action against fascism that Latin American spokesmen wished to make it.

As between the American peoples, the only real difference of view that the conference brought into the limelight was a business argument. The delegates on the famous Economic Committee wrestled with the problem tenaciously, changing phrases as late as the night of the last day, but the basic difference remained: Mr. Clayton asked for every guaranty and protection for private enterprise, including lowered tariffs, while the Latin Americans upheld government participation in business, government price cushioning of products vital in each economy, and government development and protection of industry, including keeping tariffs up. It was all put into the Economic Charter, which, one delegate afterward drily remarked, is a "document for another world." There was strong unanimity on one point—that economic salvation lies in increased consumption, to be achieved by stepped-up production, lowered prices, and rising wages. Perhaps action based on this doctrine will bridge a good many of the conflicts at the inter-American economic conference scheduled for June. Some of the delegates muttered that what we were up to was imperialism and that Latin American economies would be sunk if they played the game our way. But one distinguished scholar said that, after all, at the end of the war the world will need to buy a lot of things, and that there might turn out to be no problem for his country if the Russians would learn to drink coffee. Banking, therefore, on a lot of buyers in Europe, Latin America is worrying over what the devastated lands are going to use for money.

The subcommittee that worked on economic problems from the angle of individual guaranties and benefits hardly locked horns at all. Its prettiest product is Miss Lenroot's "Declaration of Social Principles of America," founded on the idea "that man must be the center of interest and efforts of nations and governments." (America speaks here for physical protection in the form of public-health programs and industrial safety devices, for economic protection in the form of a real wage rising as the cost of living rises, plus freedom of organization and the right to strike, for social protection in the form of honestly adequate social-security programs, and for the implementing of these protections by private, governmental, and international action.)

Other proposals passed came out for increased participation of women in state and inter-state social-welfare activities, and for inter-American help to the homeless children of Europe. When this committee finished its work, its members spontaneously thanked Miss Lenroot for her brilliant leadership; one delegate, a doctor, burst out in a warm aside, "That woman is a jewel."

All these welfare recommendations can, of course, be dismissed as mere words, but they are not ambiguous words. They emphasize an important intangible that undeniably affected the whole tone and manner of the conference—the presence of what seemed to be an American spirit, a community of feeling on fundamental human questions. It is the real strength in the papers that were signed.

10 Years Again "The Nation"

ALMOST COINCIDENTALLY with the President's message to Congress asking that the National Recovery Administration be retained in substantially its present form for at least another year, Senator Wagner introduced his industrial-disputes bill, which he calls the National Labor Relations Act, and which calls for considerable modification of the labor provisions of the NIRA. Although Senator Wagner need not expect the support of either Mr. Roosevelt or Secretary Perkins—who prefers to keep industrial-disputes machinery under the aegis of the Department of Labor—his bill is in many respects admirably devised to eliminate the weaknesses of the present methods of dealing with labor troubles, and it deserves the support not only of the A. F. of L., which indeed it has, but of every employer who honestly wants to live on a democratic footing with his employees.—March 6, 1935.

A GREAT EDITOR and a still greater reformer and crusader was lost to journalism in the death of Fremont Older, editor of the San Francisco Call-Bulletin, on March 3. . . . It was he who came to the aid of Tom Mooney and ferreted out the truth about the case, for which achievement the rich and respectable of San Francisco were ready to tear him limb from limb.—March 13, 1935.

THE NEW OFFERING of the Group Theater is called "Awake and Sing" (Belasco Theater). The author is one Clifford Odets, who has long been a member of the Group's acting company, and the play reveals as interesting a new talent as I have seen in the theater for a long time.—JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH, March 13, 1935.

WITH THE DEATH of the second Oliver Wendell Holmes a generation practically disappears; in the handful of remaining survivors of the Civil War there is not one man of distinction. . . . All in all, if there was a man better entitled to be called the foremost American I cannot name him.—OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, March 20, 1935.

ADOLF HITLER has administered the coup de grâce to what remained of the authority of the Versailles treaty. By a dramatic act he has officially announced what everybody knew was under way—the complete rearmament of Germany—and has capped it by an impressive military parade down Unter den Linden.—March 27, 1935.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH: Ralph Bates, "Lean Men"; Harold J. Laski, "The State in Theory and Practice"; C. Day Lewis, "Collected Poems"; Vincent Sheean, "Personal History"; John Strachey, "The Nature of Capitalist Crisis"; Thomas Wolfe, "Of Time and the River"; Hans Zinsser, "Rats, Lice and History."

John Bull Looks for Customers

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

BRITAIN, scornfully dismissed by Napoleon as "a nation of shopkeepers," conducted its merchandising so successfully in the nineteenth century that it was able to build out of surplus earnings a large portfolio of investments. To a considerable degree it turned into a nation of rentiers and shoppers, buying far more on world markets than it sold and meeting the balance from its foreign interest and dividends. But in the course of two wars these investments have largely been liquidated, and now Britain must revert to the role of shopkeeper in order to maintain its position as an international shopper. The alternative—to reduce drastically its purchases from abroad—is, as I have explained in previous articles, no real alternative, for it would mean empty larders and factories idle for want of raw materials.

It is not surprising, therefore, that all official pronouncements on British post-war economic policy place particular emphasis on the revival of foreign trade. The very first paragraph of the White Paper on Employment Policy issued last June is devoted to the vital necessity not merely of maintaining the volume of pre-war exports but of expanding them greatly. Cabinet ministers, speaking on this subject, have frequently stated that a 50 per cent increase over the 1938 figure will be required. Good authorities consider this an underestimate, but even so it means a fivefold expansion over the 1943 level.

Although its spokesmen constantly stress the importance of exports, the British government has yet to make known any long-term plans to insure their growth. It talks in very general terms of cooperation with other nations for the removal of trade barriers and cites its signature of the Atlantic Charter and the Mutual Aid Agreement as "proof of its intentions." But it has not indicated what positive steps it is prepared to take toward fulfilling the obligations assumed in these agreements. Nor, indeed, has this country, and the truth is the British are waiting for America to make the first move. They are impressed by the blueprints for an expansion of world trade produced by the appropriate departments in Washington; but they know that these blueprints must remain worthless until stamped with Congressional approval, and they fear that economic thinking on Capitol Hill is still strongly tinged with nationalism. The Bretton Woods legislation is the first test; the renewal of the Trade Agreements Act, which expires in June, will follow shortly. Favorable action might induce Whitehall to get off the fence where it perches uneasily while business men clamor for guidance on national policy so that they may draw up their own post-war programs.

However, if official plans are lacking, there is no shortage of unofficial ones. Business organizations, trade unions, political bodies, and various research groups are all busy setting forth their solutions of the export problem. While these naturally vary widely they nearly all have some features in common. For instance, they almost all reject orthodox laissez faire principles; almost all accept the necessity of some degree of government intervention, guidance, or control. As the report of the International Trade Policy Committee of the Federation of British Industries (equivalent of the National Association of Manufacturers) puts it, "Market forces cannot be relied upon automatically to establish equilibrium in international trade. The choice is a return to the jungle law of unregulated competition or the adoption of conscious planning to raise world prosperity." As an instrument of such conscious planning the committee recommends the creation of an International Economic Council one of the functions of which would be to "guide international trade into channels where it would be most beneficial to both producer and consumer." The methods by which this objective would be achieved are not very well defined, but the committee approves of commodity marketing agreements and suggests investigation of the possibility of agreements of the same nature covering manufactured goods, to be negotiated by similar industries in different countries. This, of course, means cartels, or, as the British prefer to call them, "trade accords."

The fact is that British business men are terrified of American competition in export markets. "How will the United States use her surplus capacity after the war?" asked Sir George Schuster, M.P., in a speech last October to the American Chamber of Commerce in London. "Will she pour it out on the world . . . or will she concentrate on raising living standards at home and leave some leeway in the export trade for others? . . . We are frightened at what we read on your country's preparations for post-war industry and export."

A survey conducted last year by Harold Whitehead and Staff, Ltd., a London firm of industrial consultants, showed that 77 per cent of the business executives it polled anticipated post-war competition from American products in export markets. To a question whether they favored post-war arrangements with the United States regarding export spheres generally, 60 per cent gave an affirmative answer, while 59 per cent supported arrangements regarding sources of raw materials. Many letters received by the conductors of this survey stressed the strong desirability of close cooperation between both the British and American governments and British and American business. At the same time there was frank recognition of the immense difficulties involved resulting from differences in national outlook. One letter, for example, declared: "In Britain it is thought that wasteful competition can be curtailed with great advantage both to British industry and to American industry, and that in respect of many markets of the world it ought to be possible for arrangements to be made limiting particular lines of manufacture to one country or the other. But this would be completely unacceptable, as far as can be judged, to American industries."

Domestically, British industries have led a rather sheltered life in recent years, thanks to the thick matting of "orderly trading" agreements which they have been able to weave in the absence of any anti-trust laws. They would now like to protect themselves from the cold winds of competition in overseas markets, and in order to do so would be very happy to make a deal with American industry dividing up world trade, even on junior-partnership terms. In view of the probable strong competitive position of the United States in the immediate post-war era, their fear that American business will scoff at such a proposition may be justified. Actually, however, there does not seem a great deal of difference in the basic attitudes of British and American business men in this matter. The former frankly deplore competition and restrict it as far as possible; the latter talk loudly about their ability to take it neat but in practice dilute it as far as the Department of Justice will allow them.

The kind of deal the British have in mind is not, therefore, totally inconceivable later on, given an old-fashioned Republican administration here and a Tory government in Britain. Its dangers hardly need underlining, for since the primary aim of such a combination would be to secure maximum profits rather than maximum exchange of goods, it would undoubtedly involve fixing of prices to protect the less efficient members of the cartel and limitation of production. This would prove intolerable both to British and American workers and to consumers the world over.

Another British school of planners, which finds support both in the Labor and Liberal parties and even among the Tory progressives, starts from the premise of maximum expansion of production and trade. It seeks, in the first place, an agreement among all industrial countries to put into effect programs of full employment. This would mean a definite undertaking by each country to insure, by government action if necessary, that total outlay on goods and services would always be sufficient to absorb the production of a fully employed labor force. In the second place, planners of this persuasion look to international cooperation to raise the purchasing power of backward nations. As Lord Woolton, Minister of Reconstruction, said to me when I talked to him in London last November, "The great thing is to find means of increasing the consumption of the primary producers who form the greater part of the world's population but enjoy far too few of the world's goods. If the standards of the Asiatic and African masses can be improved even moderately, there will be no need to worry about industrial capacity being too great. There's no such thing as overproduction, though, God knows, there's plenty of underconsumption."

These two objectives—full employment in the "advanced" countries, greater consumption in the "backward" countries—are closely linked. Full industrial employment means a sustained demand for primary commodities and more purchasing power for their producers. And this in turn means steady markets for industrial products. Britain has been committed by its government, and even more strongly by public opinion, to a policy of full employment. And it is committed by circumstances to paying out for imports whatever it takes in for exports. It has abandoned the idea that a favorable balance of trade is a desirable objective; it sees it rather as an export of man-power for which there is no return, and it expects to be short of man-power for a long time.

The United States, on the other hand, is not committed to a full-employment policy; in fact, efforts to promote one are meeting the most intense kind of opposition. And at the same time the United States has taken no positive steps to reverse its consistent practice since the last war of selling abroad far more than it bought. Even now, while there is some talk of correcting the American trade balance so as to secure a steady flow of dollars into the hands of foreign customers, far more attention is being paid to plans for dumping excess production into overseas markets.

It was with regret rather than surprise that I discovered during my visit to England that many of the economic planners had abandoned hope that America would adopt adequate measures either for full domestic employment or to insure balanced trade. Consequently, they felt that a multilateral, free-exchange international system would neither solve Britain's employment problem nor enable it to expand exports. This argument led, as I explained in a recent article (Memo for Congress, March 3, 1945), to intense opposition to the Bretton Woods program, acceptance of which, it was felt, would preclude Britain from maintaining exchange controls, from using subsidies to offset fluctuations in world prices of export goods, and from making long-term sales and purchase agreements with other countries.

I have no space here to describe in detail the kind of closed trading system which is now being elaborated by some British economists. Its clearing arrangements, its blocked accounts, its thinly disguised barter methods proclaim it as the child of Dr. Schacht; its remoter ancestors are Colbert and the eighteenth-century mercantilists. Ignoring for the moment the political reactions to such a policy, we may ask: would it even achieve its aims of insulating British economy from external shocks and of insuring a balance between exports and imports? One of its enthusiastic proponents writes:

Being the world's largest single market for raw materials and foodstuffs, she [Britain] possesses an unbreakable bargaining power. If she employs that power not for purposes of buying cheaply and selling dearly, but so as to increase the volume both of her sales and her purchases, she can be certain of success. Where other nations might attempt to sell on credit, thus burdening their customers with debt, she would be selling goods for goods.*

It is difficult to imagine things working out so pleasantly while foreign trade remains in private hands either in Britain or in the countries it bargains with. The concern of the individual business man is to buy cheaply and sell dearly; as long as he functions he will seek to exploit a closed system to the utmost. As the Economist, which itself has toyed with bilateral ideas, said in a recent article: "Schachtian strong-arm tactics, exploiting the attractiveness of the British market to force expensive British goods on those countries that sell here, will work only until the victims find means of escaping."

Adherents of the bilateral principle profess to believe that Britain by adopting it would rally to its side a large group of nations. It would, they suggest, isolate the United States and teach it that America's need of the rest of the world was greater than the world's need of America. This naive view is not shared by many persons in a position to shape or influence British policy. There is, on the contrary, a complete realization in most political quarters that any attempt to insulate Britain from America by forming a rival system would be fraught with the gravest dangers; that the beginning would be a furious economic battle, the probable end, a clash of arms. But even the most responsible British spokesmen, while condemning the propaganda of the bilateralists, add: Do not drive us into a corner; do not make it impossible for us to carry on the foreign trade we must have as a condition of existence; do not force us to resort to desperate methods. We will not declare economic war on America, but if you force us to fight, we must use any weapon at hand.

*"Export Policy and Full Employment." By E. F. Schumacher. Fabian Research Series, 1943.

This is a reminder of responsibilities which have yet to be fully recognized in this country. There is, for instance, a tendency to assume that obstacles to international trade are almost entirely foreign growths. Americans are apt to talk of the "elimination" of quotas and import embargoes, the "removal" of exchange controls, the "abandonment" of discriminatory trade practices. These crimes against the spirit of the Atlantic Charter have not been practiced in America and hence are condemned out of hand. But when it comes to the tariff, the word is merely "reduction," and little is said against subsidies used as a weapon to overcome foreign competition. America is not yet leading the charge against the international barricades; it is merely exhorting from the rear.

Freedom of trade, however, is not the sole, or even the most important, contribution that America has to make to the restoration and expansion of world trade. In his foreword to "The United States in the World Economy"—a survey made by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce—Wayne C. Taylor, Under Secretary of the Department of Commerce, declares that its most important conclusion is the vital importance of maintaining conditions that permit a larger and more regular flow of dollars to other countries. "The most essential of these conditions," he adds, "lies not in the field of foreign economic policy as such but in the attainment of a more fully and more smoothly operating domestic economy—the major determinant of the volume and course of our purchases of foreign goods and services." In brief, for his own sake and the world's, Uncle Sam needs to cultivate more intensively his own garden. By maintaining full employment and raising living standards at home, a demand for foreign products and services will be automatically created, enabling American trade accounts to balance at a high level rather than a low one. Under such circumstances other nations will be encouraged to emerge from their barbed-wire entanglements and John Bull will not need to go hunting customers with bilateral dynamite.

[This is the third of a series of articles by Mr. Hutchison on Britain's international economic problems.]

Syria: Near East Cockpit

BY MICHAEL CLARK

IN HIS recent report to the Commons Mr. Churchill revealed that, so far as the Middle East and its perennial troubles are concerned, no important decisions were made either at Yalta or later in Egypt. The problems of the Arab world and of the Jewish people in Palestine, he said, must be solved when the war is over. His "clarification" of British policy in Syria and the Lebanon was, however, particularly significant in the light of past events there and of the insistence with which some Syrians and Lebanese have been demanding the total withdrawal of the French. His words were soothing: "Finally, we had the pleasure of a long discussion with President Shukri [Kuwatli] of Syria, in which we did our utmost to enjoin a friendly attitude toward the French and to encourage the negotiation of a suitable settlement with the French, affecting not only Syria but Lebanon."

Thus, in passing, Mr. Churchill disavowed Major General Sir Edward Spears, until December 3, 1944, British minister to the Levant states, and three years of British policy in Syria and the Lebanon. General Spears, it will be recalled, made a speech before the Royal Empire Society on January 17 last which is in curious contrast to Churchill's statement. In it he said that "the respect of the immense Arab world might be lost to us over either of two main issues: Zionism and the French position in the Levant." General Spears, as long as he could, worked tooth and nail to undermine the French position. The problem has not been, as Mr. Churchill's words suggested, essentially a local one, but rather an Anglo-French one. It is always easy to fish in the troubled waters of Middle Eastern politics. General Spears's success was certainly no greater than that of the Germans, who in 1941 were able to provoke an armed rebellion in Iraq, a country under British domination.

It is quite certain that had General Spears not followed a policy of deliberate provocation, there would be no French-Syrian problem at this moment. But the position of France in Syria and in the world was so weak at the time of the Syrian campaign in 1941 and until very recently that the moment seemed propitious for giving the coup de grâce to its influence in the Levant. The temptation was there, and General Spears, ignoring the remoter consequences of such an attitude, succumbed to it unreservedly. In this he had the full backing of British empire builders in the Middle East and, be it said parenthetically, of the American minister in Beirut, Mr. Wadsworth. The Foreign Office, however, does not seem to have wholly approved, to judge from the recent recall of Spears.

Since 1936 France has been committed to the independence of Syria and the Lebanon. By that time their constitutional structure had been completed, and local governments at Damascus and Beirut were functioning. Franco-Lebanese and Franco-Syrian treaties were therefore negotiated along lines very similar to those of the Anglo-Iraqi treaty of 1931. Unfortunately, the ratification of these treaties, bitterly opposed by reactionary elements in France, was blocked by Georges Bonnet's Ministry of Foreign Affairs after the fall of the Popular Front Cabinet. When General de Gaulle became "trustee" of French interests in the Levant, at the close of the bloody campaign which ousted the Vichy control in that area, he promptly returned to the policy of 1936, and in the fall of 1941 General Catroux, Free French delegate general in the Levant, proclaimed the independence of the two countries. In his proclamation he said: "On the eighth of last June, at the time of the Allied armies' entry into the Levant, in a manifesto which I addressed to you in the name of Free France and of its chief, General de Gaulle, I recognized Syria as a sovereign and independent state, under the guaranty of a treaty defining our reciprocal relations" (italics mine).

Although the principle of a treaty was recognized in every official British declaration of that period—for, indeed, Britain had adopted the same formula in Egypt and Iraq—General Spears did everything in his power to defeat it. And now he accuses France of "withholding the transfer of the army in the hope of forcing the republics to sign treaties."

The regime set up in the Levant in 1941, a species of Anglo-France condominium, gave General Spears ample opportunity to take a hand in local affairs. Although French control of civil affairs was maintained, military control came under British Middle East G.H.Q., and the country was, and is, occupied by elements of the British Ninth Army, with political officers—whose attributions are most vague—in every hamlet. Inasmuch as the dividing line between civil and military affairs often all but disappears in war time, there were actually two plenipotentiary authorities in Syria and the Lebanon—the French General Delegation, and the Spears mission plus the Ninth Army.

In January, 1943, General Catroux reestablished the constitutional life of Syria and the Lebanon and provided for general elections to be held in that year. Immediately there arose in Beirut a sharp controversy over what should be the proportionate number of Christian and Moslem seats in the Chamber of Deputies. Dr. Eyoub Tabet, president of the republic, decreed, on the basis of a census, that there should be fifty-four Christian seats to thirty-two Moslem seats. A howl went up not only from Lebanese Moslems but from Moslems everywhere. The Egyptian Premier, Nahas Pasha, supported by General Spears, brought strong pressure to bear on the French in order to obtain twenty-five Moslem seats to twenty-nine Christian seats. Catroux, cowed by this uproar, forced Dr. Tabet's resignation and fixed the number of seats at thirty for the Christians, twenty-five for the Moslems.

In this envenomed atmosphere the Lebanese elections were held. They provided every opportunity for outside intervention, and considerable sums of money were spent by those who had it. The new Chamber of Deputies, of a marked anti-French color, contained many deputies opposed to Lebanese independence in favor of Syrian and Arab unity, a concept dear to the British so long as it remains purely a concept. The British-supported candidate for President, Bechara el-Khoury, was elected by the Chamber while virtually all the country's senior statesmen, including three former chiefs of state—Messrs. Tabet, Naccache, and Eddé—absented themselves in protest. General Spears had previously warned the deputies that if the French-supported candidate, Emile Eddé, were elected, His Majesty's Government reserved the right not to recognize the new government on the ground that the general elections had been tampered with. With France deprived of a recognized government, that was potent pressure.

Bechara el-Khoury asked a prominent Moslem, Riad Solh, to form the new ministry. This man had worked for twenty years against the Lebanon's independence. Like so many of his coreligionists he looked upon himself as a Syrian and upon the Lebanon as a province of Syria artificially erected as an independent Christian state by the French to please the Christians. He had taken out his Lebanese identity card just two months before the elections. In spite of Riad Solh's former sympathies for Rachid Ali, the insurgent anti-Ally Premier of Iraq, General Spears found him a willing tool.

Almost the first act of the new government, on November 8, 1943, was to "abrogate" the League of Nations mandate, ipso facto, by an act of Parliament—in the absence of the French Delegate General, M. Jean Helleu, who was in Algiers. M. Helleu had left Beirut with Riad Solh's promise not to take any action before his return. While in Algiers he had announced that he was authorized to make effective immediately full de facto independence for Syria and Lebanon. The final disposition of the mandate would have to await the end of the war and the setting up of some new international authority. When he reached Beirut, however, he found himself face to face with a fait accompli. His reaction to what was undeniably a hostile and illegal gesture was nevertheless precipitate and very unwise: he arrested the President of the republic, the Premier, several ministers, and one deputy, formed a provisional government headed by Emile Eddé, and called for new elections. Trouble immediately broke out in the Moslem quarter of Beirut and elsewhere. Even the Christians, although fearful of Riad Solh's pan-Arab policies, were shocked that Bechara el-Khoury, a good Maronite Christian and the symbol of the republic, was arrested too. Dispatches from Cairo and Jerusalem, dramatically played up in the world press, picture the trouble as a real revolt, with Beirut put to fire and sword.

General Catroux, at that time Minister of State, was rushed from Algiers to take charge of the situation in Beirut. He was handed an ultimatum by the British giving him twenty-four hours to release the imprisoned statesmen, failing which the country would be occupied outright by the British Ninth Army. Military security was invoked as the reason for this ultimatum. General Catroux, fearing an abrupt liquidation of the French position in the Levant, yielded, and the Khoury government was restored.

Since that time, the Lebanese and Syrian governments, whose independence has been recognized by all the great powers, maintain that the French mandate is definitively abrogated. The French, feeling themselves bound by international obligations, have not been willing to concede this. Nor can Britain, also a mandatory power, afford to do so. Apparently, however, our government, represented in Beirut by a bitterly anti-French minister, George Wadsworth, is prepared to look upon the French mandate as a dead letter.

In December, 1943, a tripartite agreement was signed in Damascus by representatives of France, Syria, and the Lebanon providing for the immediate cession to Syria and the Lebanon of all the sovereign powers previously exercised in their name, except the territorial army. The transfer of the armed forces, comprising some 29,000 Syrian officers and men under French command, is being delayed, presumably until the end of the war. These troops, dedicated to the defense of the Levant, come under the Allied Middle East G. H. Q. at the present time. The French feel, and the British now appear to agree, that the Levantine governments lack the means, financial and other, to maintain the indigenous army on an efficient war footing. They point out that the internal police of the country, assured by two national gendarmeries, has been turned over to the local authorities and adequately armed by the British. Actually, Syria and the Lebanon are quite as independent as any of the neighboring countries. And France deserves some credit for being the only power which, in time of war, has granted independence to peoples placed under its control.

General Spears, in conversations with Syrians and Lebanese, used to stress the necessity of extorting integral independence at once, while France was only a poor relation and De Gaulle a ruler without a realm. Mr. Wadsworth and the OWI, too, tirelessly opposed a treaty with the Committee of National Liberation, which no one recognized as the legal government of France. Both Spears and Wadsworth realized, however, particularly after General de Gaulle had triumphantly weathered the storm in Algiers, that their maneuvers were essentially a race against time.

Their fears were well grounded. The recognition of General de Gaulle's government and the liberation of France strengthened the French hand to the point where overt provocation in the Levant would clearly jeopardize far greater interests. Churchill has emphasized time and again that a strong and friendly France, essential to the stability of Western Europe, is a cardinal point in British foreign policy. It would be pure folly to allow this new entente cordiale to come to grief in Syria. In December General Spears, by now anathema to the French, was recalled and replaced by a career diplomat. The Spears mission was at an end. This step taken, Churchill was able the other day to reaffirm the disinterested policy of Britain in the Levant:

I must make clear the position of His Majesty's Government in respect of Syria and the Lebanon and in relation to our French allies. The position is governed by a settlement made in 1941 in which the independence of these Levant states was definitely declared by Great Britain and France. At that time and ever since, His Majesty's Government have made it clear that they would never seek to supplant French influence by British influence in the Levant states.

If Spears is disavowed, however, whatever advantages may have accrued to Britain as a result of his policy in the Levant are tacitly accepted. Then, too, the United States, which is not bound by the same scruples, remains free to follow an independent course. Spears is recalled, but Wadsworth is not. Churchill was quick to add that his words in no way limited American freedom of action:

Too much must not be placed, however, upon the shoulders of Great Britain alone, and we have to take note of the fact that Russia and the United States have recognized and favor Syrian and Lebanese independence, but do not favor any special positions for any foreign countries.

Britain, of course, has special positions in Iraq and Egypt; it governs Palestine outright. These special positions may need defending at some future moment. It is not yet clear, for instance, what attitude Russia, whose awakened interest in the Middle East has been widely commented upon, will take with regard to the "independence" of Iraq, Palestine, Transjordan, and Egypt. A semblance of solidarity between Britain and France may, after all, be worth preserving, even in a British sphere like the Middle East. On the other hand, if what is left of the French position in the Levant succumbs to American, and possibly even Russian, pressure, Britain, whose Ninth Army still occupies Syria and the Lebanon, cannot be held responsible. Long experience has made the Cartesian French wary of the British in the Middle East. Today, as in the past, the French are apt to conclude: Plus ça change, plus c'est la même chose.

In the Wind

THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE apparently considered the first American crossing of the Rhine less important than a local murder. This is how the top of its front page looked on March 3:

 Chicago Daily Tribune ESTABLISHED 1847 .. FINAL

KILLS WOMAN, BURNS BODY

Report Yanks Cross Rhine; Nazis Flee Before 9th Army

THE MASSACHUSETTS Federation of Taxpayers' Associations, one of the most effective "economy" lobbies in the country, has urged the state legislature to raise the Governor's salary from $10,000 a year to $20,000.

A NEW YORK federal district court has held that maintenance employees of building, bank, brokerage, and law firms are outside the Wage-Hour Act because they are not engaged in producing goods for interstate commerce. The March 5 bulletin of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States finds the decision "significant and heartening."

ON PAGE TWO of the Wall Street Journal for March 7 was a story headed, "Aluminum Called Too Expensive for Wide Use in Autos, Engineer Says." On page four was an advertisement by the Bohn Aluminum and Brass Corporation showing a shiny dream car of the future. "Bohn," said the ad, "is one of America's foremost sources for both aluminum and magnesium products so vital in the modern car."

NOTWITHSTANDING the powerful American Bankers' Association's opposition to the Bretton Woods agreement, the Independent Bankers' Association, an organization of small and medium-sized banks opposed to chain banking, has issued a statement indorsing the agreement in full.

FESTUNG EUROPA: The old people's home at Oslo has been requisitioned by the Nazis. The inmates had to move out to make room for German soldiers. The only ones allowed to remain were the old ladies on the top floor, who are being held as hostages against Allied bombing.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.]

V-Day and Revolution

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

NINE MONTHS have not yet elapsed since the liberation of Paris, and already voices are bemoaning the waste of a great opportunity; the people's revolution, like the peace, they say, has been virtually lost. I refer to voices from the left. The right is always more shrewd. No matter what its feeling about the course of events, the right follows a strategy better designed to serve its own interest. And that strategy is to proclaim the imminent danger that all Europe will go bolshevik—still an excellent way of rallying and strengthening the counter-revolutionary forces.

The left, and within the left the intellectuals more than the workers, shows the same unhappy inclination it has had for the last two decades to raise the white flag before the battle has really started. In the summer of 1940 many leftists cried that the war was over, when, as we know now, it was only beginning. So today many leftists have admitted defeat when the great metamorphosis of Europe has just begun to unfold. Here, indeed, is a dangerous tendency, for it demoralizes and consequently weakens the left at the very moment when the real struggle between progress and reaction, inside the victorious coalition and inside almost every European country, has been made inevitable by the approaching end of the war.

It will be a terrific struggle. For that fact the chief responsibility rests with those Allied leaders who did not care to or were unable to wage the war as a political war, as a war which made sense only if it were fought for democracy and the complete destruction of fascism. True, Allied leaders have declared that to be their primary objective; but in practice they have looked for Badoglios to help them defeat Hitler—and revolution. Thus did the statesmen support reaction and give it new life, and thus did they provide the conditions for a clash which will be far more brutal than it need have been.

In 1942 civil war could have been avoided. It was still possible to reorient Allied policy so as to secure a democratic victory without obliging the left to launch a new kind of war against fascism as soon as the military war should have ended. The Western Allies did not want it that way. They did not want a victory of the people. So far as the British government was concerned, its attitude was, perhaps, deliberately counter-revolutionary. On the part of the Americans it was, rather, a lack of understanding of Europe and a still greater determination to ignore the true character of fascism.

No matter what it springs from, the fact remains that on the day Hitler falls we shall find ourselves with one defeated enemy and another enemy still to defeat. An artist friend of mine, who has a taste for Goyaesque etchings, sometimes tells me: "In the morning of that day I shall get drunk to celebrate his fall, and in the evening I shall hang myself in order not to witness the victory of the reaction." It is a question of temperament. For myself I prefer to see the reaction hanged. And it can be done, although the process may be long and bloody.

THE STRENGTH OF REACTION

The reaction, of course, is all for returning to the situation prior to 1939. Even British conservatives, with their reputation for flexibility and willingness to yield to the demands of the epoch, rejected the Beveridge Plan though it offered the capitalist regime an unexpected respite. The reactionaries will always fight to hold back the victory of the people. The century of the common man is not their century.

For their success, reactionaries everywhere count above all on support from the United States and Great Britain. They have been encouraged by certain miraculous recoveries made when everything spelled doom. Consider the case of the Vatican. Because it had a Pope whose anti-democratic ideas were well known, because of its scandalous silence on Nazi crimes in the years when Hitler was the winner, because of its intrigues in behalf of Franco and the Argentine dictatorship, people generally assumed that the Vatican would emerge from the war badly discredited. This feeling has nothing to do with religion. Splendid Catholics—Spaniards, Frenchmen, Belgians—have publicly expressed their disagreement with the policy of the Holy See. But since 1943 the two great Western Allies, which are officially Protestant, have done everything in their power to repair the much-damaged moral authority of the Vatican. In maneuvers of appeasement, in every attempt to thwart a real people's victory, a Pope with such good fascist connections was an invaluable collaborator.

Were it not for the direct and indirect support given to the reaction by powerful elements of Western diplomacy, working together with the Vatican, the progressive forces would unquestionably come to power all over Europe after the collapse of Nazi Germany. But the appeasers should not think that they are the only ones who will make decisions in Europe. They would give good proof of their sense of reality if they admitted that Russia, too, will have a few words to say.

I know what certain liberals will answer: Russia is interested only in its national advantage. But I would suggest that the national advantage of Russia and the destruction of fascism may be much more compatible than some of our leftist critics seem to think. The liquidation of feudalism is being speedily carried through in Eastern Europe. The great landed estates are being broken up and distributed to a peasant class which has been earth-hungry for centuries. The purge of fascists has been far more rapid in countries liberated by the Russians than in those liberated by the Western Allies. Whatever the final aims of Russia in Europe, an attempt to recapture 1939 is not among them.

So much for the influence exercised from without. Inside every country the reaction can count upon the "200 families" who, in the years before the war, had already chosen their quislings; upon part of the peasantry, which, although not actively reactionary, can be used by the reaction because of its traditional hostility to anything that smells of socialism; upon the work of Nazi agents distributed throughout Europe; upon the support of the more aggressive Catholics; upon the revival and exploitation of nationalistic sentiment. But all that put together will not be enough to win victory for the reactionaries unless a divided and defeatist left, lacking strong leadership, does half their job for them.

THE STRENGTH OF THE LEFT

The chief factor operating in favor of the left is the incapacity of the reaction to stabilize the European situation outside the fascist pattern. Before the outbreak of war that incapacity was already evident. Social stabilization, even in the degree that England achieved it, was not accomplished on the Continent after the First World War. It was that failure of capitalism to cope with the successive post-war crises that brought fascism to power. Everything that has happened since then has helped to intensify the disequilibrium.

To begin with, the middle classes, which in England and the United States are the main elements of stability, have been largely eliminated from the European scene. They have seen not only their homes, their businesses, and their savings destroyed by the Nazis but the very concept of ownership, which was their religion and their philosophy. A fourth of Europe has been destroyed. Of the 19,000 buildings in Le Havre, 10,000 have been utterly ruined, another 2,000 are considered irreparable, 5,000 can be repaired, and only 2,000 are relatively undamaged. But later came Dresden, to make Le Havre look like heaven. By the massive Allied air blows of February 14 and 15, "a great city," according to a direct witness, "has been wiped from the map of Europe."

The right is tied to the conception of property. When property breaks down, or is destroyed, the economic strength of the right deteriorates. And with its economic strength, its political power. Under the stress of pre-war instability the right invested in fascism. Now it has lost or is losing its investment, and the power that went with it. Even the monopoly which the right held over patriotism has slipped out of its hands. It was from the "200 families" that the majority of the collaborationists came. All over Europe the left is now the embodiment of patriotism, with all its magnetism.

The left has learned many things during these five years of war. It has learned, among other things, the Nazi art of clandestine activity. Not long ago, in the London New Statesman and Nation, Kingsley Martin told the fascinating story of the Athenian elections held during the German occupation. Loud speakers appeared as if by magic, urging everyone to vote, and then they disappeared from the street corners before the Gestapo could arrive. The Germans were inclined to believe that the elections would be held on a hill outside Athens and took the necessary precautions. Actually the voters filled in the forms in their homes. The voting sheets were carried from house to house, and 400,000 Athenians recorded their votes under the Germans' very noses.

Everywhere in Europe the left has trained itself in action. It is not the same left which in 1937 was satisfied to go to meetings and to pass resolutions demanding "avions pour l'Espagne" (planes for Spain) only to fall asleep again and allow the fascists to mature their plans and seize key posts in the administration. Today the left is alert. Under its pressure every Vichy mayor and police chief in France has been cast out. The revival of armed counter-revolutionary bands, of fascist parties, of organizations of conspiracy like the Cagoulauds will not be easy for the right today. Of course it will try, but the attempt will only lead to a sharper fight.

THE ROLE OF LABOR

But to win, the left must have a central force around which the various factions can rally and which will be capable of leading them to their last objective: the final destruction of fascism. That force can only be the labor movement. In the long run it cannot be the resistance as a whole. Our faith in the resistance movement as the ally most valuable to the regular armies in the liberation of Europe has been justified everywhere. Not one word written in these columns, from Joseph Kessel's brilliant narrative (January 22, 1944) to our own frequent tributes, need be retracted. One glorious memory will always remain from this war, and that is the memory of the underground's intrepid fight against Nazi armies and internal traitors. But in the resistance many divergent political tendencies were united by the determination to expel the invader. That is why the resistance movement, once the Germans have been conquered, cannot by itself carry a country through a victorious revolution. Its former cohesiveness and aggressiveness are bound to languish when the gigantic enterprise of national liberation is accomplished.

The unquestionable weakening of the movement of resistance from the end of last summer up to now, in France as in other liberated countries, might have proved fatal to the left if there had not been the great reservoir of the labor movement. A most encouraging development is the decision taken by the recent World Trade Union Conference in London to create a new international labor organization. Since it coincided with the meeting of the Big Three at Yalta and with the military successes of February, the conference got less space in the American press than it deserved. It is a supremely important fact that the representatives of more than thirty countries agreed on the need to liquidate the decrepit pre-war trade-union organization and replace it with a new and powerful body in which the most dynamic elements of American labor will work together with the Russian unions, the young but daring Latin American labor organization (the C. T. A. L.), and the reviving movement on the Continent. Labor is no longer the humble supplicant it was in the Geneva days, not when Sidney Hillman could say immediately after the announcement of the San Francisco conference: "The new trade-union international, representing sixty million workers, must take the place that is its due in the first conference called to organize the peace." A statement, not an entreaty. And a statement which made it clear that there is strong direction at the head of the new organization.

That is just what the labor movement has needed—a vigorous leadership, a leadership that knows the power of labor and will not hesitate to use it. We have missed it badly during the last five years. We have missed it particularly in England, where the Labor Party, because it was one of the few working men's parties not destroyed by the war and because of its presence in the government, had an obligation to the whole world labor movement to fight far more stubbornly than it did for the democratic conduct of the war. It was pitiable, and it plunged large sections of the left into premature pessimism, to see the Labor ministers and a big proportion of the Labor M.P.'s sit silent while Churchill threw life belts to the House of Savoy, uttered eulogies of General Franco, or abused the Greek patriots in the House of Commons. It seems inconceivable that labor should have allowed itself to be kept outside every important international meeting. And now, when a Labor Party representative is to be included in the British delegation to San Francisco, it is the indecisive Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Attlee, who has been chosen.

But though it has had weak leadership, British Labor can still be a powerful factor in the transformation of Europe. Its rank and file are eager to further amendment of the conditions prevalent in 1939. Meanwhile, other European Socialists, who were no more fortunate than the British in the matter of leadership, have begun to recover from the disaster into which the Second International's policy of capitulation had led them.

The same is true of the Communists. Although sometimes in retreat, they are still there. True, their position on various European issues has produced surprise and bewilderment among the left. I myself could not accept their explanations of their support of Badoglio. Similarly I was against their policy of including in the Spanish anti-Franco front Gil Robles, Minister of War responsible for the savage repression of the Asturian miners in 1935 and accomplice of Franco in launching the rebellion of 1936. But it is far-fetched to conclude from such mistakes, as many people on the left have done, that the Communists are going to act as a counter-revolutionary force in Europe.

We have the example of France. In September of last year the Communist Party was the strongest as a result of its splendid behavior in the resistance, acknowledged by every Frenchman, right or left, who participated in the movement. From that time on the Communists have been losing ground. L'Humanité, the Communist paper, as well as Le Populaire, the Socialist paper, have lost considerable circulation in recent months. Because of the need to support the war and their unwillingness to create further difficulties for General de Gaulle, the French Communists have been obliged to retreat since last September, and their influence in the country, as also in a lesser degree that of the Socialists, has been declining. But that does not mean that either party has forfeited its opportunity forever. Already pressure from within their own ranks is forcing them to take a more militant position. They are learning that the men and women who for five long years fought against fascism in the ranks of the resistance are still there—and not too tired to strike again.

THE THREE STAGES

This revolution cannot be successfully effected, the many pitfalls evaded, over night. In fact, viewed in historical perspective, the European revolution is going through three stages, none of which has been entirely completed. The first stage is that of the liberation of the occupied territories. There are still countries which must be freed, like Norway; countries like Italy, where large sections are still in enemy hands and where revolutionary forces are still primarily engaged in a desperate fight against the Nazis. The concern felt in Italy for the time when the strong proletarian forces of the north enter the Italian political scene was voiced by the venerable Benedetto Croce when he asked for the rapid formation of a great conservative party capable of checking revolution. But without waiting for the liberation of the north, the Italians in Rome showed last week that they cannot be forever pushed around. They showed it by the enthusiasm with which they demonstrated against the scandalous escape from prison of General Roatta.

And aside from those parts of Europe officially occupied, there is Spain, whose people, once they have again mastered their destiny, are hardly going to side with the reaction in European politics.

The second stage is the definite collapse of the Nazi state. Even if the outcome of the war has been self-evident for the last two years and may become effective at any moment, we are still waiting to experience its actual consequences. In itself the fall of Hitler will be an event of extraordinary revolutionary importance, which will give new impetus to the progressive elements of the resistance all over Europe. Few people realize what it will mean to the European peoples when the Red Army marches into Berlin.

During the third stage the greater part of the American and British troops will leave Europe, except, of course, those which will be retained for the military occupation of Germany. Their removal will leave the settlement of European problems to the European peoples. A powerful element of possible coercion will be gone. Gone, too, will be the days of "military expediency," in which any betrayal of the democratic cause found a ready excuse, and the days when the left parties themselves hesitated to attack the policy of appeasement lest they endanger the unity of the Allies.

There will remain, of course, the "invisible occupation," with all the subtle weapons of pressure which Europe's misery and America's enormous resources put into the hands of the Western Allies. It will be easy to say to Europe: if you want to eat, you must adapt yourself to our conception of democracy. The question, however, is not only one of eating. Many Europeans ate better under German occupation than they do today, but that did not make them submissive.

There will remain, above all, the iron hand of capital, particularly American capital, which will not yield a fraction of its sovereign rights and which will help in the reconstruction of Europe only if Europe is to be rebuilt, not for the advancement of the European peoples, but for the profit and power of free enterprise. But there is nothing new in that. After the First World War an attempt was made to stabilize Europe in terms of capitalism. It failed. The first result was fascism; the second, World War II. This time the attempt will fail even more quickly. Only through a planned economy and through solutions very close to socialism have the rebuilders of Europe any reasonable chance of success. The day of effective capitalist control is over; the trend of Europe is toward the left. If the democratic powers had been willing to gear their foreign policy to this trend, the change to a socialized society might have been a peaceful one. They have not done so; instead they have moved from one costly experiment in reaction to another, and in doing so they have only promoted revolution. Let them not count upon the apathy of the people to prevent it. Not even war weariness or disillusionment can head off a change which is part of the whole historical process of our time.

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Young Man Jefferson

THE YOUNG JEFFERSON. By Claude G. Bowers. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.75.

NO YOUNG man living 175 years ago more completely embodied in himself the nation as it was to be than did the Jefferson of 1775. What Jefferson envisaged before the American Revolution we are today in the United States in actuality. If Winston Churchill or Joseph Stalin or our Latin American neighbors wish to understand how deeply imbedded is the fundamental essence of American democracy, let them read this latest book by Claude Bowers.

More than any other single individual Jefferson is the prophet and the architect of New World democracy. The British democracy in the time of Jefferson was as restricted in its vision and as narrow in its application as the Jewish religion in the time of King David. Jefferson broke the bonds of an established aristocracy, an established church, and an established ignorance. He believed in the potentialities of black men and Indians as well as of white men. Just as the Apostle Paul was driven by the universal implications of the Christian religion, so Jefferson was driven by the universal implications of Anglo-Saxon democracy.

Prophets and Founding Fathers always seem strangely cold, distant, and inhuman. This circumstance is remedied so far as Jefferson is concerned by Mr. Bowers's most recent book. While not as exciting as his two volumes dealing with the Hamilton controversy and Jefferson as President, this book is probably more fundamentally important. And we gain many fascinating glimpses of Jefferson as a human being during the first forty-five years of his life.

Jefferson, despite his belief in democracy, was definitely not a common man. His father had started out as a common man but had accumulated enough property to marry into an aristocratic family. And so the young man Jefferson had an abundance of opportunity to study, to play the violin, to ride horseback, to dance, and to enjoy all the social amenities, including wine and good cooking. Jefferson was never in any sense dissipated, wild, or profligate; yet we can hardly hold up to the youth of the land his first year of college at William and Mary as one which they should imitate. Neither can we suggest that our young people should literally study their eyes out as Jefferson did during his later school career.

Jefferson undoubtedly felt within himself great creative power extending in many directions. Thus we see manifested at quite an early age an intense yet practical interest in science, in the arts, in agriculture, and in graceful living. His interests were not purely intellectual or passive—he did something about them. It was as a young man, not in his old age, that he designed Monticello. As a young man he was a practical lawyer, trying more than four hundred cases a year and earning more than three thousand dollars in lawyer's fees. As a farmer he made a net income of more than two thousand dollars. Wherever he went he had an excellent wine cellar. As seems so often to be the case with men of artistic temperament, he greatly appreciated association with women. Bowers's account of his lady friends in Paris just before the French Revolution makes most interesting reading.

It seems to me that Jefferson, a most uncommon man, sensed that every common man had in him many of the potentialities which he, Jefferson, recognized in himself. That is why the phrase, "All men are created equal," became the very core of Jefferson's being and eventually, because of Jefferson's efforts, the very core of American democracy. Believing this so strongly, he fought to make the new Virginia constitution, immediately after the Declaration of Independence, into an instrument for religious freedom, free education, and the abolition of slavery and feudalistic land-holding systems. In the most aristocratic of all the colonies Jefferson planted seed which will bear fruit as long as mankind exists.

Jefferson, because he felt in the very center of his being that the supremely important thing about government had to do with insuring to each individual the dignity of his own soul, was a great believer in freedom of all kinds. He was absent from our Constitutional Convention because he was serving as Minister to France, but when the new constitution was mailed to him he insisted by letter from France that there be added to it a bill of rights which would include among other things security for five freedoms—"freedom of religion, freedom of press, freedom from monopolies, freedom from unlawful imprisonment, and freedom from a permanent military."

It is interesting to note Jefferson's reference to "freedom from monopolies" in 1788, in view of the way in which various types of monopolists have been trying to hide behind the phrase "Jeffersonianism" and "states' rights" ever since the time of Theodore Roosevelt. Prior to the time of Theodore Roosevelt the corporations were on the whole against states' rights because they felt they had a better chance with the federal government than with the state governments. With them it has not been a matter of governmental philosophy but of expediency.

No one can read Mr. Bowers's book on "The Young Jefferson" and have any illusions as to where Jefferson himself would stand today if he had the opportunity to battle in his uncommon way for the common man against the forces of hereditary wealth, privilege, and monopoly.

There is an astonishing similarity between Jefferson and Franklin Roosevelt in many ways. I cannot help feeling that Roosevelt must have drawn more inspiration from Jefferson than from any other of our historical figures. In both are to be found the same artistic architectural bent, the same love of agriculture, the same joy in the amenities of life, the same capacity for the most careful and precise use of political power. In both also we find world-embracing statecraft. Jefferson as a young man visioned the westward expansion of our nation and the building of the Panama Canal. The importance of Mr. Bowers's book is that it spells out for our young people and our friends overseas just how the young man Jefferson got that way. HENRY A. WALLACE

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

ONE OF THE BEST DISCUSSIONS of the problem of Germany and of Europe that I have come across is an essay by Hannah Arendt in the winter issue of the Partisan Review—because it seems to me to take account not only of the relevant facts but of the feelings, many of them contradictory, which enter into one's thinking about the subject.

For one thing it cuts under the current argument as to whether or not all Germans are bad and always have been—an argument which seems to me, for practical purposes, fruitless. Parenthetically, I was glad to find William Allan Neilson making these sensible and calm remarks in a recent issue of Herald Tribune Books: "Slogans such as 'There are no good Germans' not only are contrary to fact and common sense but have as their corollary the total extermination of 80,000,000 people. We all know that this is not going to happen." Those who cling to the slogan in the first sentence must admit the fact in the second. And even if the United Nations go so far as to kill off several million Nazis, there will still be some 70,000,000 Germans in the center of Europe who must live and be lived with.

It will be assumed that Miss Arendt lets the Germans off easy. On the contrary, she gives them full credit for their crimes. But she also feels that when we copy the Nazis in identifying the present behavior of Germans with German history and character we are not only deluding ourselves into believing that to crush Germany is to eradicate fascism but are also bestowing upon Hitlerism the sanction and respectability of a national tradition—which by some fantastic legerdemain must be made to establish a continuity between Immanuel Kant and Adolf Hitler. "The real trouble lies not in the German national character but rather in the disintegration of this character. . . . But a greater trouble still is this, that the man who has replaced the German—namely, the type who in sensing the danger of utter destruction decides to turn himself into a destroying force—is not confined to Germany alone." We all know, deep in our hearts, that this is true.

According to her interpretation—which was once widely accepted but has been overborne by the far more comfortable concept of the "bad German"—the breakdown of the social, economic, and political structure not only of Germany but of Europe created a vacuum out of which Hitlerism sprang. And one of its most powerful instruments was a new sort of lie. As she puts it, the Nazis "lied the truth." Their answer to the truth that the class structure of European society could no longer function was "the lie of Volksgemeinschaft, based on complicity in crime and ruled by a bureaucracy of gangsters. The declassified [in all countries] could sympathize with this answer. And the truth of the decline of the national state was answered by the famous lie of the New Order in Europe, which debased peoples and prepared them for extermination."

"The gullibility of the European peoples—who in so many cases let the Nazis into their countries because the Nazi lies alluded to certain fundamental truths—has cost them an enormous price. But they have learned at least one great lesson: that none of the old forces which produced the maelstrom of the vacuum is so terrible as the new force which springs from this maelstrom and whose aim is to organize people according to the law of the maelstrom—which is destruction itself."

As proof that the Europeans have learned a great lesson she points out that the resistance movements are non-national in character. Their slogan is simply "Europe." This being so, they are not interested in the German problem as it is presented by the experts but only as it is part and parcel of the European problem. There is in Europe intense political hatred for fascists, collaborationists, and their like, of no matter what nationality. She asserts that there is little hatred of Germans as Germans. This seems hard to believe, but she cites telling evidence from the resistance in various countries. The most striking is the statement of Georges Bidault, former chief of the French resistance and now Foreign Minister, who spoke these words to wounded German soldiers immediately after the liberation of Paris: "German soldiers, I am the chief of the resistance. I have come to wish you good health. May you soon find yourselves in a free Germany and a free Europe." After all, she says, the European resistance "has in many instances fought side by side with German anti-fascists"—whom we find it convenient to forget; and she quotes the testimony of a French officer as to the "active help of German soldiers and workers" inside Germany in making possible some contact between French prisoners of war and the French underground.

The Dutch, the Poles, the Norwegians, and the French agree that German heavy industry must be nationalized—Europeanized would seem to be a more accurate word—that the Junkers and industrialists must be liquidated as social classes. There must be complete disarmament and control of industrial output. But they are against the destruction of German industry, lest half of Europe starve; they fear the transfer of populations lest it prolong chaos and reproduce the old dangers of economic imbalance and the secret rebuilding of an industrial war machine. One may imagine that they look upon proposals for forced labor and transported industry with the same misgivings. They are, moreover, aware of the danger of falling into the Nazi error of racism; and they repudiate the all-enveloping state.

One French program calls for the combining in a single economic system, without changing national boundaries, of the industrial regions of western Germany, the Ruhr, the Saar, the Rhineland, and Westphalia with the industrial regions of eastern France and Belgium. And in France also it has even been observed that "essential restrictions on German sovereignty can be envisaged without difficulty only if all the states likewise accept significant limitations on their own sovereignty."

Left to themselves and given luck, the resistance movements would, in a word, establish a socialist democratic United States of Europe, including Germany as an integrated part. But they are not being left to themselves. The governments in exile, largely as a result of having been in exile, lag far behind the resistance movements both in understanding and in policy. They are still preoccupied with territory and colonies and national glory. As for the Big Three, they have their own fish to fry.

Miss Arendt feels that the return of the governments in exile may quickly put a stop to the new feeling of European solidarity. But she makes a very interesting analysis of the special position of De Gaulle, whom she describes as a nationalist, not of yesterday, but of day before yesterday. For him the war is really a national and not an ideological conflict. By the same token he is a true, if old-fashioned, patriot. This meant that he was incapable of being a traitor. And "his patriotism is so deeply rooted in the popular will that the resistance, that is, the people, was able to support and influence his policies." On this score she notes, for instance, that though De Gaulle, in exile, had demanded annexation of the Rhineland, he stated soon after his return to Paris that all France wanted was an active share in its occupation. On the other hand, it must be noted that his opposition to fundamental economic changes in France is increasing, not diminishing, despite popular pressure for change. Is this the result of Big Three influence coinciding with his own conservative inclinations?

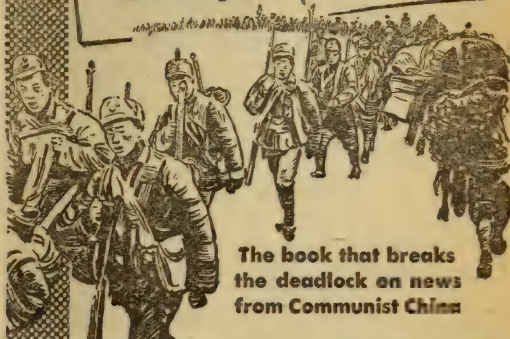

What Miss Arendt maintains, in short, is that nationalism is on the wane among the peoples of Western Europe and that a federated Europe is waiting to be born; that in such a federation the German people would become healthy and, on the political side, finally catch up with the rest of Western democratic Europe; and that the real problem today is how to prevent the Big Three and their dependents, the governments in exile, from smothering the new Europe under the blankets of power politics and attempts to restore the status quo.

I think it makes sense.

VOSKOVEC AND WERICH, who take the parts of Trinculo and Stephano in the current production of "The Tempest," and are, to my mind, the best part of the show, are probably the only comedians who may also be described as contributors to The Nation. As the program notes inform us, they have been mainly occupied since their arrival in this country in broadcasting to Czechoslovakia through the OWI. They write their own scripts, of course, and The Nation printed one of them two years ago.

FRANCE AMERIQUE, one of the French newspapers published here, reports that the first number of the magazine which will replace the defunct Nouvelle Revue Française will appear as soon as Jean Paul Sartre returns to Paris from his visit to the United States—in about three weeks. It is to be called Les Temps Modernes, not La Condition Humaine as was first planned. Sartre, so the report goes, will contribute an important manifesto under the title "Pour une littérature engagée." France Amérique wonders whether this means "the crumbling of the last ivory towers," and answers, "Perhaps." One can understand why the writers of France are not in a mood to look kindly on ivory towers. The great question is when is an ivory tower not an ivory tower. So often the so-called ivory tower turns out to be not only firmly "engagé" but the only structure that survives when the guns are silent.

The publishing scoop of 1945!

The book that breaks the deadlock on news from Communist China

REPORT from RED CHINA

By HARRISON FORMAN

Illustrated with the author's superb photographs

● From the cave city of Yen-an, the world's most remote fighting capital, comes this first-hand account of the courageous fighters who are outlawed by Chungking and feared by the Japanese. It is the first book-length report to reach America after six years of silence.

REPORT FROM RED CHINA is a bombshell of information. It gives the full and complete story of one of the most amazing fighting forces in the history of this war, and backs up the report with documents never before printed in this country, and with facts never before revealed.

$3.00

MCNTRY
HOLT
RINEHART & COMPANY

257 FOURTH AVE., NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

BRIEFER COMMENT

Falstaff and Doll Common

IT IS FREQUENTLY TAKEN FOR GRANTED by otherwise cautious scholars that the supreme greatness of Shakespeare was already recognized in the seventeenth century. In "Shakespeare and Jonson: Their Reputations in the Seventeenth Century Compared" (University of Chicago Press, two volumes, $7.50) Professor Gerald Eades Bentley presents the result of the most thorough objective inquiry ever made into the question he investigates, and comes up with somewhat surprising results. Having first collected a considerable number of allusions to both dramatists overlooked in the various existing "allusion books," he adds them to the corpus, discards all references which are doubtful or of no significance to this inquiry, and then classifies those which remain—more than fourteen hundred allusions to Shakespeare, more than eighteen hundred to Jonson—into such groups as "passages in which the name of the dramatist is used alone as a standard of poetic or dramatic greatness," "literary references to a character in the works of Shakespeare or Jonson," and so on. In nearly all the twenty different classes recognized, the references to Jonson are more numerous than those to Shakespeare, and Mr. Bentley's conclusion that "to writers of the seventeenth century Jonson was better known and more highly respected than Shakespeare" seems justified. The phrase "to writers" is very important, since writers would be prejudiced in favor of a man universally admitted to be more learned and "correct" than his rival, and it is highly significant that the one very important class of allusions in which references to the work of Shakespeare are strikingly more numerous than references to that of Jonson is the class in which there is a literary reference to a character in a play. The 696 such references to Shakespearean characters contrast strikingly with the 320 to characters from Jonson's dramatic works. It looks, in other words, as though the seventeenth-century writers who had intellectually convinced themselves of Jonson's superiority unconsciously betrayed the fact that even to them Shakespeare's personages were the more memorable. Falstaff, is mentioned nearly four times as often as his nearest rival, Brutus, and nearly five times as often as Hamlet, who comes next. And all three of these appear more often than does Doll Common, who heads the list of Ben Jonson's characters.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

A Momentous Decade

THE EIGHTEEN-EIGHTIES in England were the years when, according to your point of view, the termites of collectivism started to undermine the economic structure or the warm sun of socialism began to break up the laissez faire icefield. Winston Churchill, a nostalgic historian, has written of the period as "the end of an epoch"; Helen Merrell Lynd in "England in the Eighteen-Eighties: Toward a Social Basis for Freedom" (Oxford, $4.50) emphasizes its importance as the beginning of a new social era.

Although she carefully refrains from overstressing the point, Mrs. Lynd was obviously attracted to this decade in England because of the parallels it affords with that of the nineteen-thirties in America. It was an age when economic progress, which had enriched the middle classes and kept the workers buoyed with hope, no longer appeared automatic. It was an age of agricultural and industrial depression accentuated by the challenge to Britain's muscle-bound monopolies offered by the rising industries of America and Germany. It was an age when the newly enfranchised workers began to be aware of their political and industrial power and to exercise it to improve their conditions. "The poor" could no longer be "kept in their places"; they were becoming "the people," and both the traditional parties were forced to compete for their votes. Willy-nilly, the "upper classes" could no longer ignore such problems as housing, sweating, and unemployment—the word was first used in 1888.

Being a sociologist as well as a historian, Mrs. Lynd is concerned not only with what happened but with why it happened. "How did people more generally become aware of the basic discrepancy between social fact and social theory?" she asks, and seeking an answer she traces the changes in social values in many fields—politics, organized labor, religion, education. The new ideas did not come with a burst of enlightenment, but gradually taking hold, they laid the foundation for the "welfare state" which today is expressed by Beveridge schemes and plans for full employment. Now as in the eighties, Mrs. Lynd points out, we are still stating the problem of freedom negatively: we are seeking freedom from want, freedom from ignorance. The social structure which will provide freedom for the full realization of human potentialities is yet to be built.

In writing this book Mrs. Lynd has obviously mined assiduously a mountainous mass of memoirs, Blue Books, and reports of Royal Commissions, and her labor has been rewarded by many quotable nuggets of pure gold. Better still, she has written so well and organized her material with such skill that her book is as readable as it is scholarly.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Croce Nods

BENEDETTO CROCE'S "Politics and Morals" (Philosophical Library, $3) is something of a pot-boiler. Even a pot-boiler by a great master may deserve respect, for some of the wisdom of the master is almost bound to seep into even his most casual work. This new volume by Croce contains passages in which the precision and profundity of a great mind are quite apparent. Croce understands both the moral basis of the political order and the difficulty of equating political standards too simply with moral ones. Yet the work is on the whole slight.

Croce is concerned to defend the liberal tradition against both the authoritarianism of the right and the totalitarianism of the left. He defines liberalism as the capacity to "remain perpetually alive, and able to state and solve the problems that arise ad infinitum in life, and able to develop dogmas perpetually without ever nullifying them but making them always deeper and larger." Curiously enough, he derives political liberalism from philosophical idealism and declares that "naturalism, positivism, and scientific principles" are "all associated with authoritarian concepts or lead to them." There may be a larger measure of truth in this accusation than many a modern liberal is able to realize, but as a general proposition it seems almost as perverse as the belief that philosophical idealism is the father of political liberalism.

Croce believes in the theory of "free enterprise" as a general basis for the democratic community, but he also believes that "if the theory is changed from a legitimate economic principle to an illegitimate ethical theory, to a hedonistic and utilitarian morality," it sows confusion in politics. Whether modern technical developments give laissez faire theories the validity, even in the economic realm, which Croce ascribes to them is a question that cannot be settled by the obiter dicta of even a great philosopher.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Something Wrong Here

IT IS A STRANGE PHENOMENON that the war now being fought so bitterly against Japan seems destined to result in peace terms that will not greatly change the regime that plotted Pearl Harbor. Wilfrid Fleisher tells us that the terms sketched in his "What to Do with Japan" (Doubleday Doran, $2) are likely to constitute "the sort of peace we may expect." It will be a peace, he says, that will keep the emperor system, the big monopolists, the landlords, and the bureaucrats. The only group omitted is the militarists, but from this congenial "old crowd" it may be taken for granted that even they will not long be absent. And so one is forced to ask whether the "tough" disarmament provisions that make up the rest of Fleisher's plan will be adequate. A peace of this sort will return the Japanese people to their former servitude to their old despotic ruling groups. It will condemn to the hangman's noose those Japanese who may be expected to struggle for a democratically organized society in the aftermath of defeat. To put it very bluntly, we shall be deliberately seeing to it that the people of Japan are not permitted to have the democracy for which we are fighting. Somehow, one feels, there is something wrong here; this is not a sound basis for a lasting peace with Japan, nor does it square with our professed war aims.

T. A. B.

Asia Tomorrow

THE SIGNIFICANCE OF ASIA in the world of tomorrow is a subject on which most Americans have done far too little thinking and planning. But it is doubtful whether anyone can read Owen Lattimore's challenging "Solution in Asia" (Little, Brown and Company, Atlantic Monthly Press Book, $2) without a sober appreciation of the critical importance of that area in the post-war world. Mr. Lattimore makes it clear that our pre-war policies in the Far East were governed by an extraordinary hodge-podge of misinformation and smug illusions. We consistently underestimated Asia's revolutionary movements and stubbornly closed our eyes to the significance of the Russian revolution to millions of Orientals. We misread the plain implications of Japan's pan-Asiatic movement and rested comfortably in the assurance that our naval superiority would protect us. When Japan attacked China, we were sure that it was merely a local quarrel with Chiang Kai-shek; no one seemed to realize that the attack was pri-

22nd Anniversary Issue

March 17th

The New Leader

Is gratified to announce that the distinguished author

NORMAN ANGELL

begins to write for the New Leader and that the Anniversary Issue will contain the first of a series of articles by this famous publicist entitled

"THE LIBERAL SURRENDER OF FREEDOM"

In an accompanying letter Norman Angell writes: "I have been a reader of the New Leader on and off for some years, and have greatly liked it . . . because almost alone of leftist publications in this country, it seems to show some consciousness of the fact that much of what passes for liberal and progressive opinion has become pure reaction, in the sense of turning upside down the principles for which liberalism once stood and adopting those against which it was once a protest."

Beginning in this issue:

A Symposium on

THE PLIGHT OF REFUGEES

First Article by Joseph Chamberlain

Professor of Public Law, Columbia University

ALSO A SERIES OF RE-EVALUATIONS OF

THE PROPHETS OF OUR TIME

Articles by

SIDNEY HOOK MARK STARR
BERTRAND RUSSELL BERTRAM D. WOLFE
DR. HSU SHI MAX ASCOLI
RUDOLPH RÖCKER

Other Articles in this and later Issues:

Postwar World Security.....Herbert Morrison
What Health Insurance Means to America.....Sen. Robert F. Wagner
Insecurity Breeds Hatred.....Pearl Buck
Twilight of the British Empire.....Bertrand Russell
The Italian Colonies.....Luigi Sturzo
What Tennessee Valley People Think of the MVA.....James P. Pope, Director, TVA
London Trade Union Conference.....Robert Watt
Joint Occupation of Germany?.....David J. Dallin

AND OTHER FEATURE ARTICLES

ANNIVERSARY TRIAL SUBSCRIPTION

3 MONTHS — 13 ISSUES — Only $1.00

THE NEW LEADER, 7 E. 15th St., New York 3, N. Y.
Here's $1.00 (check, money order, cash). Send The New Leader to me for 3 months.

Name.....
Address.....
City.....Zone.....State.....

marily an attempt to eliminate American and British influence in the Far East.

As a protection against similar errors in the future, Mr. Lattimore makes a penetrating analysis of the Chinese internal situation. He points out that the Kuomintang has deteriorated from a coalition party embodying most of the elements in Chinese society to a relatively narrow one based on landlord support, while the Communists have broadened their basis of support to include not only peasants but a considerable number of landlords, small business men, and intellectuals. The solution of the Chinese situation, he suggests, depends on close collaboration among the British, American, and Soviet governments to coordinate military and economic policy, and on encouragement of democratic reforms. He warns against isolating the problem of the Communist troops, pointing out that a considerable part of the so-called National Army is in fact a Kuomintang Party army and should be treated on the same basis as the Communist army. Although the book was written weeks before the Crimea Conference, it is essentially a challenge to adapt the principles and policies of Yalta to the Pacific, to recognize the tremendous role that Russia is bound to play in the post-war world in Asia as well as in Europe, and, above all, to be sensitive to the newly awakened aspirations and ambitions of the common peoples of this great section of the earth.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

FICTION IN REVIEW

Mr. Wescott's War Work

BECAUSE Glenway Wescott's new novel, "Apartment in Athens" (Harper, $2.50), is written with a specific political purpose—to increase our hatred of Germans and warn us against trusting them even if they should begin to act better—I suppose that any response to it is in large part a response to this central idea; and perhaps, therefore, I should start by making clear my own stand on a controversial subject. Not that I cherish my confusions, but I publish them in order to feel free to discuss "Apartment in Athens" without reference to a hidden political point of view. On the one hand, then, I do not agree with my friends who think of Germany as simply a stage of historical development and of the German people as without special responsibility for the outrages of Nazism; I think that nations have temperaments or characters among which we can choose by a moral standard. On the other hand, I have never seen a statement of the case against the German people—as opposed to the Nazis—which didn't make me as uncomfortable about the condemner as about the condemned.

Of course, the fact that Mr. Wescott's novel suggests the need for this kind of preface to a review strikes me in itself as a sad commentary on the book. We don't expect a writer of Mr. Wescott's caliber to use his talents in the service of propaganda, and I especially didn't expect him to propagate hatred. To the writer of real creative power there is usually something deeply antipathetic in the act of subordinating free creativity to indoctrination, and where there is as much critical awareness of style as in all of Mr. Wescott's work,

I would have expected—though, I now see, mistakenly—to find enough critical awareness of self to save an author from guilty gestures. We are told that Mr. Wescott calls "Apartment in Athens" his war work. It is the kind of war work we commonly look for, not at the head or heart of intellectual and artistic life, but at its fringes, where conscience seems to exist only to be uneasy.

I have read dozens of anti-Nazi novels, set either within Germany itself or, like "Apartment in Athens," in a German-occupied country. Except for its distinction of prose which, through at least the first half of the book, keeps promising that this will be a disinterested creative effort, and except for its wonderful power to evoke physical fact, Mr. Wescott's novel doesn't in any important sense transcend this popular and bad category of fiction. There is not a single political-moral insight in "Apartment in Athens," not a new political perception, such as we have the right to demand from a serious novelist. Teaching us to hate, a questionable activity at best, it doesn't teach us to hate any more intelligently than we might be taught by any writers'-war-board hack. I even find something offensive, or at least wry, in the fact that Mr. Wescott's novel is set in Greece instead of Czechoslovakia or Norway. For although you may need only passion and four walls to make a drama, you need more than passion, four walls, and a glimpse of the Acropolis to give a drama classic dimensions.

In outline the story of "Apartment in Athens" is simple. The time is after the occupation. A German officer, Captain Kalter, has been billeted on the Helianos family—Mr. and Mrs. Helianos and their two children. At first only worn and humiliated by their service to Captain Kalter, gradually Mr. and Mrs. Helianos begin to experience a certain gratification in their subservient role. They are the type for conciliation: before the war Mr. Helianos had been a liberal editor; he loves to think and talk; and Mrs. Helianos is sickly and passive. Then Kalter goes home on leave and in Germany learns that his wife and sons have died in the war. Sufficiently demoralized by this blow to be softened in his attitude toward the Helianos family, Kalter tempts Mr. Helianos to speak a sentence in blame of Hitler and Mussolini. This is the point at which Mr. Wescott discloses the message of his novel: for all his apparent softness, Kalter shows himself to be deeply unregenerate. He has Helianos arrested for the insult to his Führer and even from beyond the grave, after he has shot himself, continues to teach the Helianos family the price they pay for supposing that a German is human when he appears human. The book ends with a series of letters from the imprisoned Greek to his wife, exhorting her to take this moral to heart, indeed, to see that a cousin in the underground gets to America with his urgent warning.

This is the broad substance of Mr. Wescott's novel. It is not a book of action so much as a thickly woven psychological study. But its psychology is chiefly the kind of psychopathological embroidery that current fiction, especially current anti-Nazi fiction, goes in for so lavishly: for instance, a good deal of space is devoted to the two Helianos children—Leda, who has been completely stupefied by her premature vision of slaughter, and Alex, a half-stupid, half-competent young boy whose mind has also been sickened by exposure to brutality. (Yet the fact that at the end of the book Mrs. Helianos dedicates this poor starveling to the underground is presented as a proper act of maternal fortitude.) However, there is also the detailed investigation of the relation between Helianos and his wife as it changes under the strain of Kalter's powerful presence: some of these domestic scenes are created with an almost unbearable naturalism. These are the moments in which Mr. Wescott is at his most gifted, giving us a glimpse of the talent which signalized even a book that was not entirely successful, his "The Pilgrim Hawk" of a few years ago.

I opened this review with a statement of my own position on the German question. It is a middle and, if you will, muddled position; it doesn't tell us what kind of peace to make with Germany. But it seems to me that as against the "practical" politics of Mr. Wescott's book, it allows for rather more realism. A novel about occupied Greece, "Apartment in Athens" purports to look to the future fate not only of Greece itself but of the other small countries of Europe, in fact, of the rest of the world. It was written not very long ago, and yet, in what was probably the interim between its composition and its publication, consider what actually happened in Athens. Greece was liberated from its German conquerors, but what part of a permanent solution of its political problems did this constitute? In the light of the very recent history of the very country in which Mr. Wescott sets his novel, nothing, it seems to me, could be less practical than to delude ourselves that the solution of the problems of Europe after this war hinges solely on the degree of our distrust of Germany. Whatever our need for realism about the Germans, if we are not going to see the whole political forest for this particular thicket, we are not only going to have bad novels in the post-war world, we are going to have a bad post-war world.

DIANA TRILLING

CONTRIBUTORS

ANITA BRENNER grew up in Mexico and has written several books about it, of which the most recent is "The Wind That Swept Mexico: The History of the Mexican Revolution 1910-1942," with 184 historical photographs assembled by George B. Leighton.

KEITH HUTCHISON, an associate editor of The Nation, has recently returned from a visit to England.

MICHAEL CLARK was for two years The Nation's accredited correspondent in North Africa and the Middle East.

HENRY A. WALLACE'S public career is sufficiently well known to need no recounting here. Among his books are "The Century of the Commn Man" and the forthcoming "Sixty Million Jobs," to be published at the end of April.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH is Brander Matthews Professor of Dramatic Literature at Columbia University. In addition to the recently published "Samuel Johnson" he is the author of "Comedy and Conscience After the Restoration" and "The American Drama Since 1918."

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, professor of Christian Ethics at Union Theological Seminary, is chairman of the Union for Democratic Action. Among his books are "The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness," "The Nature and Destiny of Man," and "Christianity and Power Politics."

MAXWELL S. STEWART, an associate editor of The Nation, lived in China for six years. He is a member of the American Council of the Institute of Pacific Relations and author of "War-Time China," published under the institute's auspices.

MOTION PICTURE

Paramount Presents Veronica LAKE Sonny TUFTS Eddie BRACKEN Marjorie REYNOLDS In "BRING ON THE GIRLS" IN TECHNICOLOR! NOW PLAYING PARAMOUNT	In Person The Ink Spots Ella Fitzgerald Buck and Bubbles Cootie Williams And His Orchestra Load Your .45 with WALL BONDS TIMES SQUARE
--	---

STAGE PLAYS

MICHAEL TODD PRODUCTIONS
"BELONGS ON THE MUST LIST."—Roscoe, World-Telegram.

UP IN CENTRAL PARK

Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS    Lyrics by DOROTHY FIELDS    Music by SIGMUND ROMBERG CENTURY THEATRE, 7th Avenue & 59th Street, Matinees Wed. & Sat.

BOBBY CLARK in

MEXICAN HAYRIDE

by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS • Staged by HASSARD SHORT
SONGS BY COLE PORTER
MAJESTIC
THEATRE, 43rd Street, West of B'way
Matinees Wednesday and Saturday 2:30

YOU WILL NEVER MISS the pint of blood you give to the Red Cross, or the contribution you make to the Red Cross War Fund. But the first may save the life of a fighting American, and the second will help furnish him with "a home away from home."

DO IT NOW! Give your blood to replace blood shed in your defense; telephone your Red Cross Blood Donor Center today and make an appointment for a donation. Send your check today to the Red Cross War Fund.

Art

CLEMENT
GREENBERG

FOUR or five pictures at Arnold Friedman's show at the Marquie Gallery (through March 24) establish him as one of the strongest and most original landscapists we have. A member chronologically of John Sloan's generation, Friedman has had trouble finding himself—he earned his living as a post-office clerk—and only lately, being able to devote all his time to painting, has he discovered his true vein—the atmospheric landscape. Perhaps this delay accounts for the unevenness of his work, which even today, like faulted strata that have broken through to the surface, exhibits simultaneously almost every phase of his past. Thus his genre scenes remind one poignantly of the American impressionist-realist school of the early century: Sloan, Glackens, and their fellows—who produced what in my opinion still remains the best American painting of our time. Details in other pictures are reminiscent of later developments. Only in his landscapes does Friedman arrive at himself.

Like most contemporary landscape painters of any merit, Friedman works with the inheritance left by impressionism and Cézanne, eschewing values for frank color and controlling space by warms and cools rather than by darks and lights. His preference for the simple, rectilinear composition is offset, as was the case with Pissarro too, by his success in intensifying surface and texture. He paints best with the palette knife, scumbling colors one over the other, and using very little medium. The result is complex, ripe, wistful, atmospheric, and at the same time solid and monumental.

None of this gives any idea of Friedman's originality. He is possibly the only really original landscapist left in this country after Marin. His originality is the expression of a pure, honest, serious, and independent personality rather than of a method. A character to which all chic and facility are foreign yields an absolute contribution—which is even greater than most of those who admire his art realize. Friedman has managed to make the landscape—hardly the typical genre of our age—express something of this age's abiding emotions: the sad remoteness of nature, the anonymity of cities, and the permanence of art. Here for the first time the real pessimism of suburban life comes through in painting.

Friedman will paint even better in the future, ironing out inconsistencies in quality and receiving, I feel sure, a recognition delayed so far only by the current tendency to identify art with chichi. The irony in the note which he himself wrote for his catalogue is justified, but not its humility.

Films

JAMES
AGEE

IN A newsreel theater not long ago I saw a version of the Crimea Conference which was so well photographed and so quietly, sensitively, leisuredly cut that I wished I might know whose work, or even which company's, it was. It had a feeling for weather and light and space, for the proper insertion of side detail, and for personalities and their proper timing, progression, and juxtaposition, which I am tempted to compare with the clean-water physical absoluteness of Tolstoy's writing. Actually, there was nothing about it of that grand order except in the event, even so much of it—a good deal—as one could read in glimpses of the faces; the way it was handled by camera men and cutters was merely right, which is a rarity and somewhere near a God's plenty. I would like especially to suggest that the shots of President Roosevelt, which I thought extremely moving, may turn out to be the most crucial and revealing portraits of him we are ever likely to get.

The other current movies are so tired-out and bleak that I can hardly write of them. "Hotel Berlin," the most heavily routine of Warner Brothers' political melodramas, is stuffed with sympathetic veterans like Peter Lorre and Henry Daniell and George Coulouris and Raymond Massey, and with sympathetic and understandably more eager young people like Andrea King and Faye Emerson and Kurt Kreuger, but the only thing that had even a chance for any pure quality was a bit by Helene Thimig. "Thunderhead, Son of Flicka" has some beautiful horses, especially a heart-stopping, blue-eyed, pure-white stallion whom I would love to see in any adequately fierce movie about Pegasus or the Houyhnhnms or, for that matter, in any really appreciative story about plain horses. This is not such a story. Whenever the horses are busy, it is pleasant to look at; but so are moving clouds, or water, without much credit to their recorder. The picture gets very little even out of the mild drama it allows itself; nothing whatever of the power and glory there could be in a properly unhuman film about wild and half-wild animals.

Two pictures that I can recommend you are unlikely to get a chance to see—even, I'm afraid, if you live within reach of the small "art" theaters which alone handle nearly all great or even half-good films, along with so much false art and simple trash. "Break the News" was made in England by René Clair, with Jack Buchanan and Maurice Chevalier. It isn't at all on the level with those Clair films of which the mere recall can bring me tears of admiration and of a detached sort of pride; but it is full of ease and fun and extravagant but unstrained irony, enjoyable of themselves, and worth watching too because they so clearly indicate that, though England was not a good place for Clair to work, it was not, like this country, a hell on earth. "I Met a Murderer" interests me particularly because I am forced more and more to the narrow, dismal hope that if good movies are to be made any more at all, in this country anyhow, they will have to be made on shoestrings, far outside the industry, and very likely by amateurs or at best semi-professionals. This one was made in England, several years ago; the only person involved in it whose name I know is the actor James Mason. An unpretentious murder story including a romance and a chase, and strongly influenced by Hitchcock, it seems obviously to have been made in the hope that it could get commercial distribution. And that on the whole I trust, believing that most though not all good films get much of their vitality and resonance by being designed for a broad mixed audience, whether or not they turn out to satisfy such an audience. Though it tries almost too hard for its own artistic good—and often with remarkable smoothness—to look "professional," the picture is streaked with enough amateurishness to pretty well guarantee its commercial failure. There are also some downright poor things in it, some undigested-arty, others catchpenny flops. Often, too, when it might be very exciting—as when the hunt for the killer and the hunt for a fox interinvolve—the picture fails in most of those establishments of casual reality, and oblique cutting-edges of ironic or sensuous detail, by which Hitchcock, for instance, would have absolved or even transfigured and reinforced the over-obviousness of the parallel. In such passages I have to admit that any professional would have got it by the audience better than any amateur, though probably more empty; and that only a thorough artist with a thorough professional training could really hope to make it come right.

Yet this is one of the fairly few movies I have seen in years in which it was clear that its makers knew and cared and in general had lively, sensible ideas how each shot should follow the next, and what in the way of emotion, atmosphere, observation, and psychological weight and progression each shot and each group of shots should contain. I also thought it graceful, gallant, resourceful, and in every way satisfying and encouraging in its broken-field run through the problems of cost. It is certainly not a great or even a memorably good movie, and in any ultimate sense I doubt that it was particularly worth the trouble to make: except that every such difficult undertaking, even half so well planned and carried out, seems of itself a worthier and more heartening achievement than any save the best films made under whatever circumstances. Without all these special prejudices in its favor, for that matter, I think it better and more enjoyable than most studio pictures.

B. H. Haggin's column on Music will appear as usual next week.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Prejudice Takes a Licking

Dear Sirs: I have read Dorothy Baruch's moving article, Sleep Comes Hard, in The Nation for January 27 and found particular interest in her account of how the Maxwell family was driven from a white community by ostracism, slander, and threats of violence. I'd like to say that it doesn't have to be that way. Prejudice can be licked. We did it in our own neighborhood. Perhaps the case of the Johnsons of West Hollywood and their victory can be taken as a pattern for similar victories in other communities. The backbone of the pattern is the militant decency of most people once they are informed, aroused, and organized.

The Johnsons—that isn't their real name—are a Negro family, and they couldn't find a place to live at any price. Finally they bought a house in our district, which is white, and moved in. Their next-door neighbors were outraged, drew up a petition, and began a campaign among the whites to force the Johnsons to vacate. The bigots were off to a flying start. But that was as far as they got. As they circulated their petition they were astonished and dismayed to find that people refused to sign it. The Johnsons still live in their new home, and they will continue to stay there. They have not been ostracized, and they are becoming part of the life of the community.

The Johnsons fared better than the Maxwells, not because we have fewer bigots in our district or are in any way unusual, but simply because neighborhood liberal elements were already geared to fight. This is the way we did it. Just before the last election a group of us had formed the West Hollywood Committee to help reelect Roosevelt and to further democracy. After election we enlarged our membership and tried to work at being responsible citizens—we studied local, state, national, and international affairs, formed investigating and study groups, and made our wishes known to our legislators in Sacramento and Washington.

When the Johnson incident occurred, we were prepared. Our first step was to welcome the Johnsons and assure them of our support and friendship. They were asked to join our club and did so. Next we studied the legal aspects of the case and conducted a whirlwind house-to-house campaign against the petition being circulated by the bigots. Members spoke to non-member friends, who were also pressed into the fight. Naturally not everyone was with us, but the decent people rallied to the cause and we were able to defeat the petition. As a result the Johnsons have a home, West Hollywood has acquired another worth-while family, and the practicing democrats are welded together more firmly than ever by this common experience.

This may be a small victory, but a million similar victories would be a good start toward reclaiming the Emancipation Proclamation and the Thirteenth Amendment from the junk pile. That is why, while I share Miss Baruch's bitterness at the plight of the Negro, I can by no means accept her despairing view of the problem.

JARMILA MARTON
West Hollywood, Cal., February 23

A Welcome Elimination

Dear Sirs: After noting the reference in the February 10 issue of The Nation to the Gideons and the requirement of that organization that any member be white, I wrote the secretary. You will be interested to know that I received a letter from him dated February 20 in which he says: "I am pleased to inclose a copy of the application blank which we are now using, and you will note the word 'white' has been eliminated therefrom." The Nation seems to have become a Christian evangelist.

G. BROMLEY OXNAM,
Bishop of the Methodist Church
New York, February 26

Arms and the Peace

Dear Sirs: The chief argument in favor of the enactment of peace-time military training and conscription in the United States advanced by Irving Lipkowitz in his article in the March 3 issue is that it will give us a citizen rather than a professional army.

The assumption on which Mr. Lipkowitz and others base their thesis is an ominous one and requires careful thought. We must be prepared to maintain a much bigger peace-time military establishment than before because "no matter what we say or do within our own country, the world is going to have an armed peace for some years to come."

LANGUAGE IS POWER

... Forge ahead, win special assignments, promotion, better job in global peace time opportunities through ability to speak a foreign language. MASTER A NEW LANGUAGE quickly, easily, correctly by LINGUAPHONE

The world-famous Linguaphone Conversational Method brings voices of native teachers INTO YOUR OWN HOME. You learn the new language by LISTENING. It's amazingly simple! Thousands have succeeded. ♦ 29 LANGUAGES Send for Free Book, Call for Free demonstration LINGUAPHONE INSTITUTE 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20 • Circle 7-0830

NOTICE OF CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Nation subscribers should give at least three weeks' notice of a change of address, indicating the old as well as the new address.

Crossword Puzzle No. 107 by JACK BARRETT

ACROSS

- 1 Of Dido's city
- 4 Two are better than one—except when you have a headache
- 7 Does such knowledge show that a scholar is ready to be plucked?
- 9 Disproves little more than a picturesque enigma
- 10 Treves
- 12 Flying castle
- 13 Usually 4 lbs. in every 104
- 15 A sort of "Who's Who" of the British peerage (two words, 3 & 4)
- 17 German ballads
- 18 A big punch isn't much good without this
- 19 Perhaps you have one to grind?
- 21 Drug popular with insomniacs
- 23 They evidently don't need 21 Across
- 24 Every schoolboy has used this crib
- 26 Not right angle, stupid!
- 28 Only Basques and Scots are supposed to know how to wear them
- 31 Penetrated
- 32 This maintained four men, according to Goldsmith, ere England's griefs began
- 35 A bad wind for anglers
- 36 Series of six numbers (though we can see ten in it!)
- 37 "Loveliest village of the plain" (Goldsmith)
- 38 He made his subjects pay through the nose
- 39 The sun is complete
- 40 Does your pronunciation of this English county suggest pain or cards to you?

DOWN

- 1 Keep up
- 2 A sexless creature, the honey-bee
- 3 Has yours beautiful eyes? Moliere's had
- 4 Vessel on fire? (hyphen, 3-3)

- 5 Not bad, I think, for a little 'un (hidden)
- 6 As a gun
- 7 "Not ----- sights alone, but ----- sounds, exhilarate the spirit"
- 8 Inclined but flat
- 11 Emblem of purity worn by judges
- 14 This is not what the Spanish and Portuguese call this river
- 15 A sign of indigestion, perhaps (two words, 3 and 4)
- 16 Congenial as a good-natured Russian
- 19 Surprize
- 20 A month on it is quite a fair time
- 21 A musician puts this flower against his neck
- 22 Good soldiers never retreat; they -----
- 25 It may be humbug to you; it is not to the druggist
- 27 Lad One coming up!
- 28 One half of this African stock is just like the rest
- 29 South African antelope found in part of England
- 30 Armchairs covered with this are intended to be
- 33 A hundred strike—for a scrap of paper!
- 34 No one's taken in by it
- 35 He will be sore if you stand him on his head!

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 106

ACROSS:—1 SLEEP; 4 IDRIS; 7 UPLANDS; 10 FUSIL; 11 MAGOG; 12 LEVITES; 13 AWLS; 14 FLAT; 15 ATHOS; 20 AWEARY; 21 NOBODY; 22 GILDEON; 24 ISKIMO; 25 TORCA; 26 BEER; 28 GUYS; 31 ENGIRDS; 32 BOGUS; 34 ADAIR; 35 MOTTEUX; 36 ONCE; 27 EAT UP.

DOWN:—1 SOPHIA; 2 EDSSEL; 3 PULL; 4 ISMS; 5 REGAL; 6 SIGHT; 8 LEVITY; 9 NATION; 14 WRANGLE; 15 SLENDER; 16 FOOLING; 17 ANYBODY; 18 ARGOT; 19 SOUSA; 23 NOUGAT; 24 ECARTE; 26 BAHOO; 27 ELGIN; 29 UNAPT; 30 SYRUP; 31 ESME; 32 SAXE.

Liberals are going to have to get over "their traditional antipathy to all things military," an antipathy of which we used to boast and which was largely responsible for bringing millions of immigrants from lands burdened with conscription to "free America."

To some of us it seems odd that under a system of "collective security" in which nations are going to pool their resources to achieve an "enforceable peace," all of them have to have bigger military establishments than before.

Harry Hopkins, who probably speaks with more authority than Mr. Lipkowitz, lays bare the real difficulty with admirable frankness in his article on the same theme in the March issue of the American: "We must accept a new and tough concept in world affairs. . . . America's heart and mind will work intensively day and night to keep the world in peace. But that isn't enough. We can't take a chance. When this war ends, we must immediately prepare to defend ourselves." There is to be an organization to keep the peace, but we can't depend on it; we have to rely on our own defense, hence conscription. Surely no one in his senses thinks other powers will not follow the same plan. This means an armament race of unprecedented magnitude. All such arguments as those we are discussing are escape mechanisms, evasions of the proposition that we can have world organization and genuine collective security or we can have huge national military establishments and an armament race; we can't have both.

Secondly, Mr. Lipkowitz does not deal with the question how large a professional standing army will be needed to train and—in this age of super-mechanized warfare—to supplement the conscript "civilian" forces. The Army and Navy Journal on September 9, 1944, remarked that "without a professional army of sufficient proportions, the large civilian reserve . . . would lose a great deal of its effectiveness." Lieutenant General Hugh A. Drum, writing in American Defense, July, 1944, presented a theoretical arrangement of figures for a military system based on universal training and allocated a million men to the standing forces of army, navy, and air. Until this and other points are cleared up, how do we know that it is either conscription or a large professional establishment and not rather both?

A. J. MUSTE, Executive Secretary,
Fellowship of Reconciliation

New York, March 5

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 160

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 24, 1945

NUMBER 12

IN THIS ISSUE

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

317

EDITORIALS

First Test of Yalta

319

Words that Breed Trouble

320

John Collier's Record

321

ARTICLES

Alcoa in Wonderland by I. F. Stone

322

China and Its Critics by Lin Yutang

324

75 Years Ago in The Nation

327

The Walls of Stuyvesant Town by Charles Abrams

328

Conscription Between Wars by Charles G. Bolté

330

In the Wind

332

POLITICAL WAR

Fascist Bridgehead in Bolivia by John W. White

333

Behind the Enemy Line by Argus

335

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Notes by the Way by Margaret Marshall

336

The Interior Voyage by Paul Rosenfeld

337

The Chinese Communists by Maxwell S. Stewart

338

Briefer Comment

339

Drama by Joseph Wood Krutch

340

Films by James Agee

342

Art by Clement Greenberg

342

Music by B. H. Haggin

343

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 108 by Jack Barrett

344

Editor and Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Managing Editor

J. KING GORDON

Washington Editor

I. F. STONE

Literary Editor

MARGARET MARSHALL

Associate Editors: KEITH HUTCHISON • MAXWELL S. STEWART

ROBERT BENDINER [On leave with the army]

Editor Political War Section

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Assistant Editor

J. MITCHELL MORSE

Music Critic

B. H. HAGGIN

Drama Critic

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Business Manager

HUGO VAN ARX

Advertising Manager

MARY HOWARD ELLISON

Director of Nation Associates

LILLIE SHULTZ

Board of Contributing Editors

NORMAN ANGELL

JONATHAN DANIELS

LOUIS FISCHER

CAREY MCWILLIAMS

REINHOLD NIEBUHR

Published weekly and copyright, 1945, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building.

The Shape of Things

GENERAL PATTON'S LATEST BREAK-THROUGH, this time across the Moselle west of Coblenz, spells the end of the last German holdings on the left bank of the Rhine, and the early expulsion of the enemy from his rich Saar and Palatinate territories. The break over the Moselle was a masterful stroke, rendering the southern portion of the Siegfried Line useless and a quick withdrawal from it imperative. As this is written—Monday morning—Patton's tanks have already advanced through Bad Kreuznach and Bingen on their way to Mainz, but the Germans are still resisting the Seventh Army's offensive, the southern arm of the big envelopment. The final bag of prisoners in this action will never be as big as the premature newspaper headlines, but if Patton maintains enough speed to cut off some more Rhine crossings he may considerably reduce the number of German effectives in the west. This is still the Allies' primary objective; it is still the only way to end the war. The effects of this process of attrition are already apparent in the furious scramble of the German high command to move troops north, south, and back again in an effort to meet each new thrust, and in the failure to mount a major counter-offensive against the Remagen bridgehead. General Eisenhower is taking maximum advantage of his increasing numerical superiority by this Russian-proved strategy of hitting several sectors one after another; and it is good generalship, not just numerical superiority, which has rolled the enemy back thus far in recent weeks. Meanwhile, the build-up of strength for the major Rhine crossing and for the break-out from the Russians' Oder bridgehead continues. The man-power to meet these onrushing contingencies is hardly to be found within the Reich today; yet the Germans continue to counter-attack the Russians in the Lake Balaton region, and to maintain twenty-five divisions in Italy. The only plausible explanation is that Hitler values Berlin and the North German plain less highly than the mountainous region of southern Germany and Austria, which these outlying troops are defending so bitterly. The Rhine break-through and the fall of Berlin will certainly spell the beginning of the end, but they will not necessarily spell the end itself.

★

SOME OF THAT MUCH-DESIRED MAN-POWER IS still holed up in the French Atlantic ports. Those who like to think of Franco as a potential friend should be interested in Ed Murrow's report from Paris Sunday that Allied aircraft recently sank six Spanish vessels attempting to run supplies in to these garrisons.

THE FIVE GREAT INCENDIARY ATTACKS ON Japan's chief cities are proof enough that the B-29 has been whipped into fighting form in a remarkably short time, fit to take its place as one of the most powerful weapons of the war. Flying out three hundred strong, the Superfortresses from the hard-won Marianas bases attacked Tokyo, Nagoya, Osaka, Kobe, and Nagoya again. At least twenty-nine square miles of the four cities were burned out in the first four attacks, which makes the A. A. F.'s insistence that these were "precision" raids a little puzzling. More precise aiming is certainly possible from 5,000 feet than from 25,000 to 30,000, the altitude of earlier B-29 attacks, and the planes went in singly so the bombardiers could get the best run on their targets; but the use of the fearsome gasoline-jell M-69 incendiary in such large clusters can do nothing less than devastate a large area. (The bomb weighs six pounds, burns for eight to ten minutes at above 3,000° Fahrenheit, and clings "tenaciously to any surface"; a large cluster of thirty-eight bombs breaks open at 1,000 feet and the separated bombs drop under individual parachutes; "upon impact the delayed fuse starts the mechanism which detonates after five seconds and coughs the oil-filled cheesecloth about twenty-five yards in all directions.") This is a useful variation on the R. A. F.'s incendiary technique, especially effective in cities where so many buildings house subassembly benches for war production. Bombers won't win the war against Japan, but the increased tempo of these attacks, plus further carrier strikes such as Admiral Mitscher's week-end blows at the southern Japanese islands, will mean a much-softened enemy when the troops go in. *

THE DISCOVERY THAT A "TRADE-UNION POPE" sits in the Vatican is very encouraging. When that Pope turns out to be Pacelli, it is more than encouraging; it is positively thrilling. At least it must have seemed so to the Italian Communists, who announced their discovery on the occasion of Pope Pius's address before the Christian Workers Association. Unità, the Communist publication, was profoundly moved by the liberal sentiments expressed by His Holiness and has probably greeted his talk on Sunday, March 18, attacking profiteers and religious intolerance, with even greater joy. For once Pacelli has decided to embrace the cause of the Common Man—now that his former Fascist friends are on the way out—none will surpass him in ardor. Undoubtedly, each of his Sunday pronouncements will be more radical than the last. But if Unità so easily forgets the record of the present Pope, Izvestia remembers better. On the same day that Rome welcomed Pius XII into the democratic fold, the Soviet paper mentioned him, together with other members of the former worldwide Cliveden set, as an appeaser who would bear constant watching. We are inclined to agree with Izvestia rather than with Unità. And we wager that before many months have passed the very people who are now singing psalms in praise of the "Trade-Union Pope" will again identify him for what he is—one of the high chiefs of international reaction. *

WASHINGTON SQUARE IS ONE OF THE FEW places in New York City where the sense of the past still lingers and mingles congenially with the present. Though the buildings on two sides of the park are more or less "modern," the row of old brick houses on the north side remains intact, and the glow of their faded bricks catching the sun, their dignity and charm still dominate the scene. The scene itself is ageless. The Square is a meeting place for babies and for grownups and for all the ages in between. For all the languages too, though Italian cadences predominate. And one of the chief ingredients is the sunshine which still has pretty much the run of the Square. Robert Moses is determined to keep it that way, and he and Lawrence M. Orton, members of the City Planning Commission, are introducing a zoning-law amendment designed to reduce the height limit on buildings facing parks of more than one acre and all other open spaces throughout the city. The immediate reason is the proposal to build a thirty-story skyscraper that would replace part of the old red-brick boundary of Washington Square on the north. We hope the amendment will be carried. The next thing is to save the old houses on Washington Square from being replaced at all. *

WE HEAR THAT AMBASSADOR ARMOUR HAS been instructed to ask Madrid for an explanation of the arrival in Spain of an average of fifty Nazi agents a week. As to the reasons for General Franco's generosity in granting entry permits, there is nothing to investigate. The story of the German occupation of Spain is six years old, and it is as natural for the occupying power to send in new men to strengthen or expand its services as for the satellite country to accept Nazi appointees without protest. Some of them are not even supposed to remain in Spain. Spain is simply a stepping-stone to Argentina, and surely General Franco is not going to transgress the tenets of Hispanidad by creating difficulties for dear Colonel Perón's prospective guests. But perhaps our Ambassador will inquire not why but how the Nazi agents arrive in fascist Spain. We can tell him several ways. First, there are the small boats which travel during the night between Spain and the French ports still in German hands. Some of those boats were sunk recently by British destroyers, so that we have official evidence of their operations. Then there are submarines which still find shelter in Spanish ports. Third, and quite openly, Nazi agents arrive by plane flying over France from Switzerland. But since all of these methods are well known to us we may assume that Mr. Armour and the State Department have heard about them too. So we are left to wonder what sort of questions our new Ambassador will put to Franco. We only wish we could hope that, instead of demanding explanations, Mr. Armour on his next visit to the Spanish Foreign Office would demand his passport and come back home. *

BILLS TO ESTABLISH A PERMANENT FAIR Employment Practices Committee as a regular agency in the federal government, with powers of enforcement, are being subjected to delaying tactics in both branches of Congress. In the House, where a bi-partisan bill has been approved by the Labor Committee, Southern Representatives, on the Rules Committee have succeeded in repeatedly postponing consideration of the measure. Although Republican members of the committee have sufficient votes to force the bill to the floor against Southern opposition, they have made no move to do so. A petition signed by a majority of the House will be necessary to bring the bill up for consideration. In the upper house Senator Taft, chairman of the Republican Platform Committee, which indorsed a permanent FEPC, has shifted his position and come out against the establishment of such an agency with enforcement powers. Taft has introduced a substitute measure calling for an investigation of racial bias in employment. Despite bitter opposition from the diehard Southern bloc, supporters of the measure believe that they have sufficient support to win in both houses if they can force a vote. The triumph of the New York anti-discrimination bill has made a tremendous impression in Washington, and if the church, labor, and other public-spirited groups that pushed that bill through can bring similar pressure on a national scale, the federal FEPC can undoubtedly be passed.

★

WE STRONGLY OPPOSE THE SUGGESTION OF THE special Campaign Expenditures Committee of the United States Senate to lift the present Hatch Act restriction on the size of individual contributions and the volume of partisan expenditure in political campaigns. It is true that the $5,000 limit on individual contributions is often circumvented by gifts made in the name of several members of the same family and to several different committees. It is also true that both parties in the last election evaded the $3,000,000 limitation on campaign expenditures by the use of state and supposedly independent committees. But the answer is to plug the loopholes, not to eliminate the restrictions. The Republican members of "the committee want not only to remove limits on political spending by the wealthy but to impose new restraints on trade-union expenditures through such organizations as the P. A. C. Large contributions by individuals distort democratic processes, but trade-union contributions are not open to the same criticism. If workers may take joint action in their economic interest, what is wrong with permitting them to pool their pennies for political action?

★

IT WOULD BE IRONIC IF THE UNITED STATES, after insisting fiercely upon freedom of the international air, were to submit to the erection of barriers across the domestic skies. But such a development is threatened by a challenge in the name of states' rights to the present system of federal regulation of commercial airlines. A number of state legislatures now have under consideration a model bill drafted by the National Association of Railroad and Public Utility Commissioners providing for state control of the interstate operations of interstate air carriers. With the airlines already very thoroughly regulated under federal laws, this is a proposal which at best would mean wasteful overlapping of authority and at worst forty-eight conflicting sets of rules and a state of confusion which might well ground airliners altogether. It is true that the association is seeking uniform legislation in all states, but as L. Welch Pogue, chairman of the Civil Aeronautics Board, has pointed out, "seldom have uniform statutes been uniformly interpreted and administered." If there must be state regulation of air traffic, the same authority continued, it should be limited to air carriers not subject to federal regulation. There is no doubt that in this instance Mr. Pogue voices the sentiments of the whole air-transport industry. The plight of the long-distance road carriers, forced to conform to regulations which change at every state border, is a sufficient warning. There have been too many successful efforts by the states in recent years to horn in on interstate traffic, which constitutionally lies within the realm of the federal government. On one pretext and another a network of internal tariffs and trade barriers is spreading across the land, and we are facing the loss of our greatest economic asset—a continent-wide free market. It is time to halt this balkanization of the United States.

★

THE FALL OF BERLIN WILL BE A JOYFUL DAY for every anti-fascist, including those Germans in exile who have been counting the years until their country would be freed of the brown scourge. Among them is Georg Ledebour, who has just celebrated his ninety-fifth birthday. He celebrates it with the same spirit that has made him one of the most amazing figures in the international socialist movement. Active until this very moment, Georg Ledebour has never yielded to pessimism or discouragement. He has been living in Switzerland, writing tract upon tract against Hitler, and waiting for the time when he would be allowed to go back to Berlin. It was in Berlin that he reached his greatest heights—in 1918-1919, at the end of the last war, when it seemed as though the German revolution might actually triumph. The responsibility for its collapse rests with many of his colleagues, but not with Ledebour. He may have been wrong in his obstinate decision to remain at the head of a small dissident group instead of trying to exercise his influence within the party. But he was right in insisting that the weak, continuously compromising policy of the German Sozialdemokratie was condemning the entire German labor movement to a state of impotency and heading it toward disaster. We hope that Georg Ledebour may live to return to his country.

First Test of Yalta

BEHIND the tight Russian censorship, behind the equally effective barrier of British and American diplomatic reticence, the meaning and durability of the Yalta agreement is undergoing a test in Rumania. The importance of the test can be, and is being, exaggerated. It is important, but not so much because it will prove whether the unity of the three big Allies is going to last as because it will indicate what elements are essential to the creation of genuine unity.

Let us look at the Rumanian situation realistically. The fall of the Radescu government was inevitable; correspondents saw it coming weeks before it happened. A slow and ineffective government, it was unable to prevent disorder or put a stop to the persecution of Jews and other minorities, and unwilling—perhaps too weak—to carry through a purge of the fascists and pro-Nazis with which the army and the whole government structure were riddled; indeed an effective purge would have wiped out too many of General Radescu's old friends. In spite of the array of parties it appeared to represent, it had little popular support; essentially it was the sort of sluggish rightist coalition that would never get around either to pressing social reforms or to a vigorous attack on internal fascism.

Certainly the Radescu government did not provide the conditions demanded by Russia—and Rumania is, as Mr. Eden said last week, a "back area of the Red Army" operating on the Hungarian front. It is not probable that Radescu resisted Russian demands; he simply could not and did not meet them. On February 28 Moscow dispatches announced that the Soviet Vice-Commissar of Foreign Affairs, Andrei Y. Vishinsky, had arrived in Bucharest; on the same day Radescu resigned.

His successor, Peter Groza, representing the left parties in what is called the National Democratic Front, is neither an important nor a particularly popular man. He is, however, acceptable to Russia. Vishinsky "consulted" at length with King Michael before the constitution of the new Cabinet was announced. And very soon after the Groza government took over, Rumania was rewarded—and the new regime fortified—by the restoration of the northern section of Transylvania, which had been handed to Hungary by Hitler in 1941. Meanwhile Radescu, the ousted Premier, took refuge in the British embassy, asserting that he feared attack by his political enemies. It was this act that first announced to the world a division over Rumania between Russia and its chief allies.

But presently the State Department let it be known that the United States had invoked the machinery provided at the Yalta meeting for joint consultation and action in regard to liberated areas and that talks with Russia about the Rumanian situation were going on.

That is all we know or are likely to know until after the talks end. But meanwhile it would be foolish to pin too many hopes or fears on their outcome. Without any doubt Russia acted unilaterally in helping General Radescu out of office and Mr. Groza in. On the other hand, the new government has apparently made a good start. Already a vigorous purge is reported under way, and Groza seems to have succeeded in ending anti-Semitic acts and bringing together Rumanians and Hungarians in Transylvania. What can the conversations with Moscow result in? Hardly more, it would appear, than an Allied indorsement of the new regime in Bucharest together with a polite request from the British and the United States that Russia talk things over before it takes action next time. Perhaps they will also get some assurance of protection for opposition politicians, and this would be useful and justified so long as it did not interfere with the legitimate progress of the purge of fascists. But certainly the Allies could not now, if they wanted to, run the picture in reverse: they could not hand Transylvania back to Hungary, release the war criminals, and restore the unfortunate Radescu to power.

The incident shows clearly the limits placed upon collective action by the exigencies of war. Under the formula worked out at Yalta the three major Allies agreed "to consult to-

